2. Pre-Homeric Period. This comprises mainly the second millennium B.C., during which the Greeks themselves were in the making. The preanthropomorphic and aniconic (i.e., worship without temple-images, but in fetishistic objects like the tree, tree-trunk, wooden pillar, and betylus or stone-pillar) hardly concerns us. The Aryan invaders entering the Balkan peninsula from the North had already arrived at the conception of some common prominent personal divinities, such as Zeus, Poseidon, and Apollo, when they confronted the Mediterranean stock in Crete and the Aegean islands. It is also reasonable to assume that they had, like their Eastern Aryan cousins, evolved one supreme personal Sky-God. And the female deities, and even the Mother or Earth-goddess, are of Aryan origin, the male deity held premier place among the Aryans when they came into contact with an advanced Minoan-Mycenean culture in which the female deities were prominent, e.g. the 'Mother' goddess of Crete, and which probably gave to the invaders Athena, Artemis, Aphrodite. Ritual had already been so specialized as to require priesthoods. This period presents a cruder side in traces of theriomorphism (e.g., Apollo Lykeios of Argos) or even theriolatry, beside anthropomorphism, the practise of magic, polydæmonism, or functional-deities, animism, human sacrifices, and of hero-cults which assumed such proportions in later paganism. These more primitive views manifested a wonderful persistence.

3. The Homeric Religion, well-known to us in the Homeric poems and works of Hesiod, which represent a religion of the beginning of the first millennium B.C. In it anthropomorphism has ripened into an advanced polytheism: the Gods of the Greek pantheon have become clear concrete individuals in a nominal hierarchy under Zeus (Jupiter), 'Father of Gods and men,' with some vague dæmones and dark underworld powers. They are elevated human beings with passions and jealousies. Yet the conception of morality is growing apace, as evidenced in the increasing hesitation to ascribe base conduct or acts of injustice to deity. The relations of men to deity are on lines of reward and retribution, and are on the whole genial. The sacrifice is not a bribe but a ritual act of communion. This classic religion did not dwell on the thought of an afterlife, or continuity of moral existence, except for egregious sinners and heroic saints. The lowliest lot here was preferable to the shadowy existence in the realms of Death. And the divinities of the underworld, such as Demeter, are beneficent vegetation powers.

4. Post-Homeric, 9th to middle of 7th cent., during which (a) image-worship has definitely superseded the aniconic cult or fetish agalma, and flowered into a full-blown idolatry intensifying the anthropomorphic polytheism. (b) The rise of the polis or city-state, with a political religion fostering civic virtues, in which the religious unit was the state rather than the individual, the latter joining in the cult not primarily for the good of his soul but for the health of the state with which were inextricably bound his weal and wo. (c) The coming of Dionysus-cult from the North, Thrace and Macedonia, which, probably as early as the 10th cent., began to penetrate the peninsula, and later forced its way into Thebes and Athens, and secured the sympathy of the Delphic oracle, was an epoch-making event in Greek religion, not only as the first introduction of the ecstatic and mystic element into the West, with a warmer and emotional faith, but because this cult was the first to offer an eschatology. It was the first sponsor of the idea of sacramental grace to the West and of a revolutionary conception of communion with deity by identification or divinization; as a corollary it demanded an esoteric worship. It also presented a new idea of divine personality both in its vagueness and in its facility for incarnations. In the heart of the ritual stood the birth and passion of the deity,—prophetic of much religious thinking for the coming centuries. The Dionysiac cult was also the harbinger of a non-political religion, which Orphism later developed. (d) The rise of the Delphic oracle, which, through its priesthood, played a momentous part in that Greek colonization which changed the character of the Mediterranean world, in its coordinating influence on Greek polytheism, in developing to a certain extent a Greek consciousness of nationality, in the extension of moral ideas and political justice, in appointing penalties for crime and exacting a katharsis for homicide. By its vacillating policy in the struggle with Persia and the suspicion of 'Laconizing' in the Peloponnesian war, the oracle lost its prestige, which it never recovered save for a brief period in the early Christian centuries. (e) The Eleusinian Mysteries, originally a local secret society for agrarian purposes, became part of the Athenian state-religion of the incorporation of Eleusis with Athens in the 8th cent. Through the coming of Demeter, the association of Iacchos and his consequent identification with Dionysus, and the wise policy of the Pisistratids in the 6th cent., these Mysteries became pan-Hellenic and of the loftiest spiritual value. Already in the 7th cent. the Hymn to Demeter indicates their high prestige. In later centuries they became ecumenical, and Eleusis 'a common sanctuary of the whole world' (Aristides). They proved to the later Greco-Roman world one of the chief supports of the hope of immortality. 'Thanks to the lovely Mysteries given us by the gods; Death is for us mortals no longer an evil but a blessing' is the testimony of an inscription unearthed on the spot.

5. The great Revival of the 7th-6th centuries, associated with the name of the legendary Orpheus. Orphism introduced a note of mysticism which resounds to this day in the religion of the West. It proclaimed for the first time in the West the doctrine of a fall, with the stain of original sin, the divine origin of the soul, the duality of man's nature as compact of Dionysiac or heavenly and Titanic or evil elements, the necessity for purity here in order to escape the cycle of reincarnation, and an awful Purgatory hereafter. The chief services of Orphism were the substitution of personal religion for political religion, and its unambiguous protest against gentile religion—prophetic of the coming era of individualism; the consequent founding of those religious guilds which, from the days of Alexander, have been the greatest religious momenta in history, with their voluntary spirit and the duty of self-diffusion; the refining, and adaptation to the Greek mind, of the orgiastic Dionysiac cult; and the strong hope of a blessed hereafter, which appealed to Plato, furnishing him with arguments for the eternity of the soul in the Phædrus.

6. The Period of Enlightenment, as it may be termed, overlapping the close of the previous period and extending to the middle of the 4th cent. The cramping authority of the polis provoked the inevitable reaction. The chief factors of disintegration were the Ionian philosophy in the 6th cent. and the Sophists and the Peloponnesian war in the 5th. An antidote to the mystic spirit of Orphism was supplied by the rise of European speculative thought in Ionia, which affected Greek religion by drawing the attention from political to physical science, by adumbrating a unitary principle which was to contribute to the monistic or pantheistic monotheism of latest Greek thought, and by disputing the regnant anthropomorphism by the juxtaposition of a metaphysical power or spiritual principle. It saved Greece from falling a prey to the sacerdotalism threatened by Orphism, and secured for her the brilliant career in philosophy which the mysticism of Orphism would have rendered impossible. The Sophists questioned all authority, and by their skeptical and eristic doctrines undermined accepted epistemology. By their theory of relativity they were the apostles of that ubiquitous individualism, so marked a feature of later Greco-Roman religious life. Thus they weakened the polis-civilization. Finally, the Peloponnesian war exposed the weakness and perils of the city-state with a political religion. The Greek drama of the 5th cent. was one of the potent educative forces of the Greek spirit. Æschylus probed the dark problem of Fate and moral responsibility. Sophocles presented not only the all-seeing justice of the Deity but equally his mercy, and did for the Greeks what the author of Job did for the Jews in demonstrating the moral, and not merely retributive, meaning of human suffering. Euripides was the prophet of a new age of criticism of traditional polytheism, of the demand that the gods should justify their ways to men, of a comprehensive humanitarianism which could feel the agony of captive Trojans, and of a deeper insight into ethical purity. Plato—still one of the unspent spiritual forces of the world—presented a view of the spiritual and ideal world which can never be lost to mankind. For him man is 'a heavenly plant and not of earth,' the 'spectator of all time and all existence,' for whom the only reality lies in the ideal and heavenly things, of which the things of earth are but faint copies, and of which the soul, by its divine origin, possesses an innate knowledge, whereby it is ever seeking to detach itself from sense to escape to its homeland. The moral life of man is a gigantic conflict, for 'fair is the prize, and the hope great, and the venture glorious.' Touched by the mystic spirit and other worldliness of the Orphic faith Plato made 'the noblest single offering that human reason has yet laid on the altar of human hope.'

7. The Greco-Roman Period, which may be dated from Alexander to Plotinus, or to the closing of the schools of Athens by Justinian. (a) Alexander produced as great a revolution in religion as in politics. By his far-sighted policy of the 'marriage of East and West' he promoted that active theocrasia or syncretism in religious matters which gave the Oriental religions a firm foothold in the West and proved a potent factor in early Christianity. By making all members of one empire he necessitated the rise of a universal religion. His striking personality gave a fresh impetus to apotheosis and prepared the way for the imperial cult which challenged Christianity. By releasing men from the polis-religion he opened wide the way for personal religion, which gave the mightiest impulse to those *thias*i or religious brotherhoods in which the voluntary principle of worship has operated to our day. (b) The Oriental Mystery-Religions, some of which had more than a century previously gained a footing on Greek soil, entered upon their long career, in the course of which they imposed on the West a new conception of religion. They banded men together in *Thias*i which broke down gentile barriers: they were the precursors of the house-churches of primitive Christianity, and, together with the synagogue, they offered the New Society a useful mode of organization. They were also the main exponents of the impulse toward personal religion with its craving for union with God. Synchronously, the Greek Mysteries of Eleusis gained rapidly in influence from the 4th cent., and a more sympathetic hearing was given to the Orphic gospel. (c) The monistic principle gained ground and worked toward an abstract monotheism or at least monistic pantheism. Aristotle had shrewdly remarked that the religion of a state takes its character from the polity, which held true of the polis-civilization, and holds true also for the empires of Alexander and of the Romans. One visible ruler on earth rendered inevitable one God in the Universe. Consequently the deities of various pantheons were identified, as 'One is Zeus, one Serapis, one Mithras,' or even a θεός πάνθεος was posited, or a supreme God chosen and the epithet pantheus assigned to him. The highest form of this monotheism found expression in the philosophic idea of one divine principle, the One or All, and in the imposing solar cult so conspicuous in the Christian centuries. (d) The Chthonian deities loomed larger beside the Ouranian or Heavenly deities owing to the increasing interest in eschatology and the collapse of the polis, which had kept these primitive cults submerged. There are traces of the Chthonian cult in the earliest forms of polytheism, but it is only in later literature that the cult becomes prominent. These Underworld deities were gods of vengeance, to whom sacrifice was a bribe. They are dark nameless powers without the individuality of the Upper-world personalities, and generally addressed in euphemism, as e.g., 'Gracious Ones.' In sacrificing to them the head of the victim was bent down over a pit which received the blood from the severed throat, and the offering was entirely devoted as a holocaust. For the Olympians (or Heavenly gods) the victim was raised up from the ground on a high altar, his head bent toward the heavens, and thus slain; a portion of the sacrifice was burned to the deities. (e) Closely associated with this resurgence of Chthonic ideas was the increasing vogue of hero-cults, or worship of the dead, the ritual of which was shaped after that of the Chthonians, and which was not without influence on the early Christian attitude toward saints and martyrs. (f) The demonic powers, which in earlier stages had but little terror for the Greek mind, became more tyrannous, causing resort to magic, exorcism, evocation, and similar unspiritual practises. One of the most welcome notes in the Evangel of Jesus to the Greco-Roman age was his conquest over the hierarchy of demons, who had crucified 'the Lord of Glory' (I Co 2 8), but whose act proved their own undoing in that God triumphed over them in the Cross (Col 2, 14, 15). (g) Astralism, the religion of Astrology, thoroughly terrified the ancient world, and shackled it in the chains of a determinism which enervated the moral initiative. Escape was sought in communion with the Mystery-gods, in a solar monotheism which astonished moderns by its religious fervor, in magic, and by many in Jesus from whose love 'neither the Ascension of the stars, nor their Declinations shall separate' (Ro 8 39). (h) Mention should be made of the remarkable demand for Savior- or Healing-Gods and the evolution of the idea of a Man-God, both conceptions so relevant to Christian history, and corresponding to the felt need for a divine sympathia and for an epiphany or humanizing of the Divine. This accounts for the astonishing fact that the obscure Thessalian earth-demon, Asklepios became the Healer and Savior, the 'greatest lover of men,' whose cult contributed to the salvationist terminology of Christianity, and whose figure, perhaps, suggested the model for the gracious 4th or 5th cent. figure of Christ. The Mystery-Gods were likewise Savior-Gods, into the fellowship of whose sufferings the initiate entered by sacrament. (i) Plotinus (3d cent. A.D.) may be taken as representing the last phase of Greek religion: his words on his death-bed at Puteoli—"I am striving to restore the Divine within us to the Divine in the All," as the swan-song of Hellenic religion. It has been given to few to explore so profoundly the spiritual nature of man, to live so consciously in communion with the Unseen, or to recognize more clearly the value of religious experience for philosophy. In his religious thought he draws together many of the syncretistic tendencies of the centuries after Alexander, and expresses the last hope of Greek religion as 'the flight of the Alone to the Alone.'

8. Greek Religion and Christianity. Yet Greek religion did not perish. It was disintegrated to reintegrate and bequeath its timeless truth to Christian theology. The Greeks consecrated their unique genius to Christ—an epochal event for our faith, contrasted with the failure of Mithraism to secure Greek loyalty. Platonism has become one of the richest strains in the interpretation of the religion of Jesus, whereby that religion has so permanently laid hold of the West. Through such Christian writers as Clement, Origen, Augustine, Pseudo-Dionysius, and the Hellenist, Philo of Alexandria, the perennial in the faith of Greece has become ours, especially that idealism which is so consonant with Jesus' view of human nature; its mystical tendencies; the dynamic conception of the Logos-Christology; and that view of immortality which bulks so largely in historic Christianity beside the realistic Judaistic eschatology. If Augustine has been the most formative of our Western theologians Plotinus was the most formative influence for Augustine, who cites with approbation the words of his master: "we must fly to that dear, dear Fatherland; there is the Father, there the All . . . to be Godlike."

GRINDERS: In Ec 12 3 the Heb. term ṭōḥānōth is a fem. participle plural. Women were accustomed to grind the meal in the Hebrew home, often accompanying their work with song (cf. ver. 4). The expression is used here (probably in a figurative way) for the molar teeth, apt to fall out in old age.

GROSS: 'Waxed gross' is the translation in Mt 13 15; Ac 28 27 of the Gr. παχύνειν ('to make thick' or 'fat'). The N T passages are both quotations (after the LXX.) of Is 6 9, where the Heb. has a similar meaning. The same Heb. expression is found elsewhere in the O T (Dt 32 15; Neh 9 25; Jer 5 28), always meaning that prosperity had rendered the people so satisfied that they cared nothing for the higher moral or spiritual ideals.

E. E. N.

GROUND: In most cases this word renders ʾādhā-māh (generally meaning 'cultivated ground,' e.g., Gn 2 5), or ʾerets, 'earth,' or γῆ, 'earth,' or 'ground.' Other terms so rendered are: (1) helqāh, 'portion' (II S 23 12 AV); (2) hārīsh, 'plowing' (I S 8 12); (3) ʾāphār, 'dust,' or 'soil' (Job 14 8); (4) sādheh, 'open country,' 'field' (Gn 33 10; Jos 24 32; I S 14 25; I Ch 11 13 AV); (5) ʾēdāqos, 'bottom,' 'base' (Ac 22 7); (6) ēdpatōma, 'stay,' 'support' (I Ti 3 15); (7) χώρα, 'place' (Lk 12 16); (8) χωριον, dim. of (7) (Jn 4 5); (9) ἀγρός, 'field' (Lk 14 18 AV); (10) χαμαί, adv., 'to the ground' (Jn 9 6, 18 6). In Lk 19 44 'ground' does not represent a separate Gr. word, but is involved in the verb ἐδαφίζεν, from ἔδαρος; see (5), above.

E. E. N.

GROVE. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 11.

GUARD: The rendering of several Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) ṭabbāh, 'slaughterer,' used only of three foreigners (Potiphar in Gn 37 36, etc.; Nebuzaradan in II K 25 8, etc., and Jer 39 9, etc., and Arioch in Dn 2 14). The Heb. term is perhaps not an exact reproduction of the Egyptian or Babylonian originals, tho the 'chief of the slayers' may well have been an official who was entrusted with the duty of guarding the royal person and of 'slaughtering' any one who attempted the king's harm. (2) rūts, 'runner,' used of Hebrews themselves in I and II K and II Ch. These 'runners,' or trusted foot-soldiers, stood close to the king and performed various functions. Their 'chief' was doubtless an officer of rank. That they were a 'body-guard' in the strictest sense is not certain. David, e.g., had a special guard of foreigners (Cherethites and Pelethites; cf. II S 20 23, 23 23, where mishma'ath, not rūts, is used). (3) mishmār, 'watch' (Neh 4 22 f.; Ezk 38 7). (4) On Ac 28 16; Ph 1 13, see PRÆTORIUM. (5) The κουστωδία, 'guard' RV, 'watch' AV of Mt 27 65 f., is somewhat difficult to explain. It may refer to the Temple guard that under a Roman officer kept charge of the high-priestly vestments (see Jos. Ant. XV, 11 4). (6) In Mk 6 27 σπεκουλάτωρ, a Roman military term, means here probably one of the officers at hand ready for any duty the king might demand.

E. E. N.

GUARDIANS. In Gal 4 2 RV renders ἐπίτροποι by 'guardians' in place of the AV 'tutors.' The legal system which Paul had in mind (whether Jewish, Greek, Roman or some other) is not certain, but the general sense of the reference is perfectly clear (cf. Burton in ICC, ad loc.).

GUDGODAH, gud-gō'da (גִּדְגֹּדָה, gudhgōdhāh): A station on Israel's march from Kadesh to Moab, probably somewhere in Edom (Dt 10 7).

GUEST, GUEST-CHAMBER: (1) The rendering of the Heb. qerū'im, 'invited ones' in I K 1 41, 40; Pr 9 18; Zeph 1 7. (2) Present participle of ἀνακλίσθαι, 'to recline at table' (Mt 22 10 f.). (3) Aor. infin. of καταλύειν, 'to lodge' (Lk 19 7 AV, 'gone in to lodge' RV). (See HOSPITALITY.) The larger houses had a guest-chamber (Mk 14 14; Lk 22 11; I S 9 22, 'parlor' AV). C. S. T.

GUILLE: In general this word conveys the same meaning in Biblical usage as elsewhere (Ex 21 14; Ps 34 13; Jn 1 47), i.e., the quality, or act, of concealing one's true intention and producing a misleading impression. It is named as something to be deprecated and avoided, except in II Co 12 18, where it is used in a good sense. A. C. Z.

GUILT, GUILTINESS, GUILTY: (1) These words in most cases render derivatives of the root 'shm (verb: 'to be [or feel] guilty'; noun: 'guilt' ['guiltiness' Gn 26 10]; adjective: 'guilty'). In AV the word 'trespass' is frequently used to render these terms, also 'desolate' (Is 24 6; Hos 13 16), 'faulty' (II S 14 13), and 'offend' (Jer 2 3). (2) The Heb. rāshā', 'wicked,' 'godless,' is also so rendered (Nu 35 31; Ps 109 7, 'condemned' AV). (3) ἐνοχος, 'held in,' 'subject to,' 'liable' (Mk 3 29, 'in danger of' AV, 14 64 and ||, 'worthy of' RV; I Co 11 27; Ja 2 10). (4) On Mt 23 18 and Ro 3 19 cf. RV. E. E. N.

GUILTLESS: This word renders: (1) the Heb. nāqāh (vb.) and nāqī (adj.), the root idea being 'to empty' (as a vessel, by pouring out its contents), and hence 'to cleanse,' or purify (Nu 3 22; Jos 2 19, 20, 'quit' AV; II S 3 28, 14 9). (2) ἀναίτιος, 'free from legal blame,' from the negative α(ν) and αἰτία, 'legal cause for complaint' (Mt 12 5, 7, 'blameless' AV in v. 5). E. E. N.

GUILT-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 9.

GULF. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 38.

GUNI, gū'nai (גֻּנִי, gūnī): 1. The ancestral head of the clan of Gunites, of the tribe of Naphtali (Gn 46 24; Nu 26 48; I Ch 7 13). 2. The head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 15).

GUR, gūr (גֹּר, gūr), ASCENT OF: A place near Ibleam where Ahaziah, King of Judah, was wounded (II K 9 27). Site unknown.

GUR-BAAL, -bē'al (גֹּר בַּעַל, gūr ba'al), 'dwelling of Baal': An unidentified place, probably somewhere in Edom, inhabited by Arabians (II Ch 26 7). The true reading may be tūr-ba'al, 'rock of Baal,' as suggested by MSS. of the LXX. and the Vulgate.

E. E. N.

GUTTER: 1. The word rahat, so translated in Gn 30 38, 41, is much better rendered 'trough' as in Ex 2 16. The addition 'in the watering-troughs' (v. 38) is probably in apposition, i.e., explanatory of the preceding term. 2. In II S 5 8 RV has 'watercourse' for 'gutter' AV. The text of the verse is corrupt and the sense impossible to make out. It is not known what is meant here by the term tsinnōr. Cf. the || text in I Ch 11 6, and consult Driver, HTS, pp. 259-261, and also PETQ (1924) on the new light on II S 5 8 from the recent excavations at Jerusalem.

H

HAAHASHTARI, hē'a-hash'tā-rai, (חֲשִׁאשְׁתָּרִי, hā'āhashtārī): A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 6).

HABAHIAH, hab-ē'ya (חֲבַיָּה, hābhāyāh), 'J' hides': The ancestral head of a priestly family whose members could not establish their genealogy (Ezr 2 61, called Hobaiah in Neh 7 63).

HABAKKUK, ha-bak'ok or hab-a-kuk (חֲבַקּוּק, hābhaqqūq), either from hābaq, 'to embrace,' or cognate with Assyr. hambukāku, the name of a plant (Delitzsch, Proleg. 84): 1. The Prophet. A prophet of Judah, probably a resident of Jerusalem. All that is known of him is to be found in the book which bears his name. All other alleged information is valueless. In the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon he is said to have been of the tribe of Levi. One rabbinical legend identifies him with the son of the Shunammite widow whom Elisha restored to life (II K 4 16), another with the sentinel referred to in Is 21 6.

2. The Book and its Contents. The Book of Habakkuk ('the burden which Habakkuk the prophet did see') is mainly concerned with the menace to the national existence of Israel presented by the rapid development of the Chaldean power. Its three chapters present the thought of the reality and greatness of this danger and its meaning. In the first, the prophet expresses his personal distress upon realizing the condition of things. The thought is cast into the form of a complaint to J' (1 2-4), to which J' is represented as making the reply that the Chaldeans are raised up by Himself (1 5-11). The prophet responds with a declaration of his satisfaction; for if this is the case, it can mean no permanent evil, and the explanation of the evil conditions must be found in the sin of Judah, which demands a visitation of judgment (1 12-27). The second chapter opens with the preliminaries of a new vision (2 1-3), proceeds to a description of the Chaldean's greed and violence (2 4-8), records three woes against him because of his 'evil gain' (vs. 9-11), because he 'buildeth a town with blood and establisheth a city by iniquity' (vs. 12-14), and because he 'giveth his neighbor drink' (vs. 15-17), and ends with a denunciation of the vanity of his idolatry (2 18-20). The third chapter, entitled 'A prayer of Habakkuk,' is a psalm of praise to J' and of confidence in His purpose to deliver His people (3 1-19).

3. Literary Form. The literary form of Habakkuk is striking, if not unique, among the prophetic books. The prophet casts his thought into a dramatic representation, with J' and himself as the speakers. And both in conception and expression the result is highly poetic. In ch. 3 especially there is a lofty tone and a rhythmic flow quite up to the standard of the best Hebrew poetry.

4. Unity. The question of importance for the proper understanding and use of the Book is that of its unity: (1) Some scholars believe that the three parts belong to three different settings and authors, of which only the first is traceable to H. (Kuenen). (2) Others hold that the first and second parts are a single composition by H., but that the third is a later production. And (3) a third group assigns the whole to H. The reasons for dividing the book into three separate sections are not very strong, and its advocates are constrained to admit that they can only establish a high degree of probability. The reasons for detaching ch. 3 and ascribing it to a later date are: the lack of a definite setting for it, such as the rest of the book reflects, and a certain difference of style and temper. In the first two chapters H. addresses God as an individual; in the third he puts a prayer in the mouth of the people. Moreover, in form and content there are strong resemblances between ch. 3 and some exilic psalms, leading to the conclusion that this poem is excerpted from an exilic liturgical collection and attached to the prophecy of H. (Wellhausen, Nowack, Cornill, Cheyne). Of these considerations the last offers the greatest cogency and pertinence. The alleged lack of definite setting is a purely negative condition on which no conclusion can be based. Upon the whole, the reasons for doubting the integrity of the book are unsatisfactory and many of the most competent scholars (Ewald, König, Sinker, Kirkpatrick, and Von Orelli) believe in its unity, while many others declare in favor of the verdict 'not proven' (Driver, G. A. Smith).

5. The Text. The condition of the Hebrew text of H. is not satisfactory; in fact, in many places it is hopelessly corrupt.

6. The Date. The date of the prophecy has been generally fixed between 625 and 600 B.C. This was the period of the rapid progress of the Babylonians toward supreme power under Nebopolassar and his more illustrious son Nebuchadnezzar. The Chaldeans had captured Nineveh in 612. In 604 they had overwhelmingly defeated the Egyptian army led by Pharaoh Necho at Carchemish (Jer 46 2). From that day onward it was only a question of time as to when they should become complete masters of Western Asia. Altho they did not actually invade Judea until the year 601, it is probable that the prophecy was uttered in view of the time expectation of their coming somewhat before that year.

HABAZZINIAH, hā'baz-i- or hab''a-zi-nai'a (הַבַּזְצִינְיָה, hābhatstsiyāh, Habaziniāh AV): A Rechabite (Jer 35 3).

HABERGEON, hab'er-jen or ha-būr'ji-en. See ARMS and ARMOR, § 1.

HABITATION: The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) z'bhāl, 'dwelling' (cf. Zebulun, Gn 30 20) (II Ch 6 2; Is 63 15; Hab 3 11; Ps 49 14, 'dwelling' AV). (2) šārāh, 'encampment' (Ps 69 25). (3) shebhelh (inf. construct of yāshabh, 'to seat oneself,' 'to dwell') (I K 8 13; Ps 33 14; Jer 9 6; Ob ver. 3). (4) mōshābh (also from yāshabh) (Gn 36 43; Lv 13 46 AV; Ps 107 4 RV, etc.). (5)

mākhōn (from kān, 'to be upright,' 'firm,' or 'fixed'), a 'place,' or 'foundation' (Ps 89 14, 97 2; cf. RV; Is 4 5). (6) m'khūrāh, 'descent,' or 'origin' (Ezk 29 14 AV; cf. RV). (7) m'khērāh, of uncertain meaning (Gn 49 5 AV, 'swords' RV). (8) mā'ōn and m'ōnāh, 'dwelling' (Dt 26 15; II Ch 30 27, etc.; I Ch 4 41 AV, 'Meunim' RV). (9) shākhān, 'to dwell,' and mishkān, 'dwelling-place' (Dt 12 5; II Ch 29 6, etc.; Ps 132 5 AV, 'tabernacles' RV). (10) nāweh (frequently in the pl. n'ōth), the feeding- and resting-place of the flocks, hence 'pastures,' 'folds' and then, of men, 'dwelling,' etc. (Ex 15 13, etc.; Job 5 24, and Jer 25 37 AV, 'fold' RV; Ps 79 7, and Pr 24 15, 'dwelling-place' AV; Jer 9 10, 50 19, and Am 1 2 AV, 'pastures' RV; Ps 83 12, 'houses' AV). On Ex 15 2 cf. RV. (11) ἐπαυλις (Ac 1 20, the Gr. rendering of (2), above). (12) σκήνη, 'tent,' Lk 16 9, 'tabernacles' RV. (13) κατοικία (Ac 17 26), οικητήριον (II Co 5 2, 'house' AV; Jude ver. 6), κατοικητήριον (Eph 2 22; Rev 18 2), all derived from οικία, 'house.' (14) σκήνωμα (Ac 7 46 RV; cf. II P. 1 13 f.)

HABOR, hē'bār (הַבּוֹר, hābhōr): A tributary of the Euphrates, on whose banks some Israelites, deported during the reign of Hoshea, were settled by Sargon (722-705 B.C.) (II K 17 6, 18 11; I Ch 5 26). Others had been taken to the same region by Tiglath-pileser III (745-727). The stream is identified with the Habur of the Assyrians (COT, II, p. 267) and the Chaboras of classic literature (not to be confused with Chebar, q.v.). A. C. Z.

HACALIAH, hak''a-lai'a (הַכַּלְיָה, hākhalyāh, Hachaliah AV): The father of Nehemiah (Neh 1 1, 10 1).

HACHILAH, hā-kai'la or hak'i-la (הַכִּילָה, hākhilāh): A hill near the wilderness of Jeshimon, in the wilderness of Ziph (I S 23 19, 26 1 ff.). Map II F 3, but the exact location is unknown.

HACHMONI, hak-mō'nai or hak'mo-nai (הַכְּמוֹנִי, hākhmōnī), 'the wise': The father of Jehiel (I Ch 27 32).

HACHMONITE, hak'mo-nait (הַכְּמוֹנִי, hākhmōnī): In I Ch 11 11 Jashobeam, one of David's heroes, is said to be 'the son of a Hachmonite.' In the || II S 23 8 the word is 'Tahchemonite,' which is probably an error for 'Hachmonite.' See JASHOBEAM. E. E. N.

HADAD, hē'dad (הַדָּד, hādhadh), name of an Aramean god, see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 30. 1. A son of Ishmael, also spelled Hādhadh (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 30). 2. An early king of Edom, son of Bedad (Gn 36 35 f.; I Ch 1 46 f.), who smote Midian in the field of Moab. His city was Avith. 3. The last in the list of the kings of Edom (I Ch 1 50 f. = Hadar, Gn 36 39). He was perhaps slain with his family by Joab, captain of David's host (I K 11 15). His city was Pau. 4. An Edomite of royal line, perhaps grandson of 3. He escaped from Joab to Egypt, and received favors from Pharaoh. After the death of Joab and David, and probably toward the end of Solomon's reign, he returned to Edom and troubled Israel (I K 11 4 ff.). C. S. T.

HADADEZER, had''e-di'zer (חַדְדַּזְר, hādhadh-zer), 'Hadad is help': A king of Zobah, near Damascus (II S 8 3-12; I K 11 23=Hadaezer, II S 10 18, 19; I Ch 18 3 ff., 19 18, 19). After his defeat by David, the Syrians of Damascus came to aid him, and were defeated and made tributary. At another time he joined the Ammonites and Syrians against David (II S 10 16), and was defeated at Helam. II S 8 3 and 10 15 f. suggest that he was ruler over an extended Aramaic kingdom, but this is uncertain.

C. S. T.

HADADRIMMON, hē'dad-rim'en (חַדְדַּרִּמּוֹן, hādhadrīmōn), compounded of two names of divinities, Zech 12 11): The name, according to Jerome, of Maximianopolis, the modern Rummāne, near Megiddo, where Israel lamented the death of King Josiah. Nowack, Handkom. ad. loc., and others find here the name of a god (Adonis?) whose death is lamented. Cf. W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites<sup>2</sup>, 411.

HADAR, hē'dar. See HADAD.

HADAREZER, had''er-i'zer. See HADADEZER.

HADASHAH, ha-dash'a or had'a-sha (חֲדָשָׁה, hādhāshāh), 'new' (town?): A town of Judah (Jos 15 37). Site unknown.

HADASSAH, ha-das'a. See ESTHER, BOOK OF, § 6.

HADATTAH, ha-dat'a. See HAZOR-HADATTAH.

HADES, hē'diz. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 17-21, 34.

HADID, hē'did (חֲדִיד, hādhīd): An ancient site not mentioned in the preexilic books (but found on Egyptian inscriptions of the 16th cent. B.C.), the recolonized by postexilic Jews (Ezr 2 33=Neh 7 37, 11 34) and later fortified by Simon Maccabeus (I Mac 12 38; here called Adida). See Map III, D 5.

E. E. N.

HADLAI, had'lē-ai or had'lē (חֲדַלַּי, hādhlai): The father of Amasa (II Ch 28 12).

HADORAM, ha-dō'ram (חֲדֹרָם, hādhōrām), 1. The son of Tou (Tou II S 8 9 f. [here the form is Joram): King of Hamath, sent to King David by his father on a congratulatory embassy on the occasion of his victory over Hadadezer (I Ch 18 10). 2. For H in Gn 10 27, see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 3. For H in II Ch 10 18, see ADONIRAM.

HADRACH, had'rak or hē'drak (חֲדַרְחַ, hādh-rāk): Only in Zec 9 1, as the name of a land against which a prophetic burden is declared. The context determines the region to be a portion of Syria and its capital, Damascus. It is associated with Hamath, Tyre, and Sidon. It was the same as the Assyrian Hatarakka or Hatarakka (cf. COT, II, p. 453).

HAGAB, hē-gab (חֲגָב, hāghāb), 'grasshopper': The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 45).

HAGABA, HAGABAH, hag'a-ba, hag'a-bū (חֲגָבָא, hāghābhā, hāghābhāh, variant forms of Hagab): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 45=Neh 7 48).

HAGAR, hē'gār (חֲגָר, hāghār, Agar AV, in N T), meaning uncertain; the root means possibly 'to flee'; cf. the Arab. Hegira, the 'flight' of Mohammed: The name of Sarai's handmaid, the mother of Ishmael. The story of H. is told both in J and E, with some additions in P. The story in J (Gn 16 1b, 2, 4-14) relates how the childless Sarai gave H., her Egyptian (mīsrīth) handmaid, to Abram, hoping thereby to obtain children. But the insolence of H. offended Sarai, who treated her so harshly that she fled to the desert. Here an angel appeared to her near a well and comforted her by the promise that her seed should be very numerous, told her to name the child soon to be born Ishmael, and indicated beforehand his character. In gratitude she named the well Beer-lahai-roi (q.v.). In obedience to the angel, she returned to Sarai (16 9, which may be editorial, to harmonize J with E). In E (Gn 21 8-21) the story follows much the same fundamental outline. Ishmael, a child still quite young (cf. vs. 14 f.), playing about on the occasion of the feast celebrating the weaning of Isaac, aroused Sarai's jealousy, who demanded the expulsion of the 'bondwoman' H. and her child. Abraham, loath to consent, does this only in obedience to a Divine command. With a bit of provision H. was sent away the next morning into the wilderness. Here she and the child were saved from dying of thirst by an angel of God, who showed her a well and also promised that her son should be the father of a great nation.

The additions of P (Gn 16 1a [?], 3, 15 f.) are chronological notices fitting the stories into P's chronological scheme.

The two accounts of J and E are so similar in their main points that it seems probable that they are both based upon the same group of legendary or traditional materials connected with early (and now unknown) tribal movements, which resulted in the formation of closely related tribal groups (Isaac, Ishmael). H. is called an 'Egyptian,' but the adjective mīsrīth may possibly refer to Mutsri—a N. Arabian locality. H. (viewed as a tribe) may also have some connection with the E. Jordan Hagrites, or Hagarenes (I Ch 5 10, 19-21; Ps 83 6). The story as now found in Gn emphasizes the Divine selection of and special providence over Isaac (Isaac), and at the same time reveals a broad sympathy for other tribes (Ishmael), for whom there is also a place in the same providential care.

Both Jewish and Mohammedan speculations have indulged in many fancies concerning H. (cf. Ryle in HDB s.v.). Even Paul does not hesitate to allegorize (in rabbinical fashion and largely on the basis of a late but incorrect interpretation of the Heb. mītsāhēq 'playing' which was understood as indicating 'mocking' as in AV, cf. RVmg.) the story for an illustration in his argument in Galatians (4 21-31). See Skinner in ICC. Genesis, ad loc.

HAGARENES, hē'ga-rīnz or hag'a-rīnz. See HAGRI.

HAGGAI, hag-gā'ai (חֲגַי, haggay), 'festal': A prophet by whom, with his fellow-prophet Zechariah (q.v.) the returned exiles were aroused to the duty of rebuilding the Temple and encouraged in bringing the difficult task to completion. Such is the statement in Ezr 4 24-5 2 (= I Es 5 73b-6 2), the late when the work was begun being the 2nd year of Darius (Darius I), i.e. 520 B.C.

Fortunately, this brief mention of H. in Ezr is supplemented and the full significance of H.'s messages made more clear by the small collection of at least some if not all of those messages in the little book known as The Book of Haggai, one of the twelve so called 'Minor Prophets.'

According to the Book of Haggai the prophet, on the 1st day of the 6th month of the 2nd year of Darius (=some time in Aug.-Sept. of 520 B.C.), delivered an oracle in the name of J'' to Zerubbabel the governor and Joshua the high priest, rebuking the people ('this people') for not building J''s house, and giving this as the reason for the drought and other misfortunes from which the community was suffering. The two leaders were stirred to action and the work was begun. Other messages followed, the last one, the 5th in the entire series, being delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month of the same year (Dec. 520 B.C.).

From these messages we may gain a fairly close view of some of the reasons and motives that were operative in the work of building the second Temple.

The first message 1 2-11 (6th mo. 1st day) would seem to indicate that the duty of building the Temple had been before the community for some time but had been neglected, the people having time and means for their own private houses, but letting the house of J'' lie in ruins. But when drought and misfortune came the prophet found his opportunity to declare that they could not expect J''s blessing unless they built His house. Let them start to build and J'' will bless them (1 8). The response seems to have been immediate (1 12-14) and the prophet cheered Zerubbabel and Joshua with the assurance that J'' was with them as they undertook the difficult task.

The next word of the prophet is probably to be found in the misplaced passage 2 15-19, which, with Rothstein, we would connect with the date given in 1 15 (which as the text stands now is a mere date with no message attached). This message, delivered on the 24th day of the 6th month (reading 'sixth' instead of 'ninth' in 2 18) was one of further encouragement. It was on that day that the foundation stone of the new building was laid and the prophet made bold to promise that from that day J''s blessing was assured. These strong assertions probably imply that some of the community had misgivings as to the success of the undertaking. About a month later (7th mo. 21st day, the last day but one of the Feast of Tabernacles) a still bolder word was uttered by H. (2 1-9). That house might seem unworthy of comparison with the beautiful Solomonic Temple of preexilic days, but it was destined to have a greater glory. J''s decisive day is soon to come. The 'nations' are to be 'shaken' and their treasures brought to this house. So let all work that the house may be completed and the great blessing come. The 'shaking' of all the nations had some reference probably to the great revolt in the Persian Empire which Darius was engaged in suppressing.

The work was being pushed as rapidly as possible and soon attracted the attention of the 'people of the land' that is the non-Jewish population in the territory of the old Northern Kingdom of Israel. These people, of mixed race, partly old Israelitic stock and partly 'heathen' (cf. II K 17 24-41; Ezr 4 9b.) professed to worship J'' (the 'God of the land,' II K 17 26). They now came forward with an offer to help in building the Temple of J'' (Ezr 4 1-2). The notice here is correct but it is out of place, as are other sections in Ezr. It is evident that it was not as 'adversaries' but as friends that they made the offer. The author of Ezr calls them 'adversaries' (by anticipation). Should the offer be accepted? If it were, the 'holiness' of the community would be violated for those people were 'unclean' from the strict legalistic point of view (as set forth, e.g. by Ezekiel). On the other hand, to refuse it would be to incur the hostility of these neighbors and place the community in a dangerous situation. The stricter party were for refusal and in this they were supported by Zechariah in his first message (8th month 1st (?) day) cf. Zech 1 1-6, and by H. who on the 24th day of the 9th month uttered what seems to have been the decisive word (2 10-14) in which he declared that 'this people,' 'this nation' (i.e. those who were making the offer) were unclean and would contaminate the holy community. The offer was therefore refused (cf. Ezr 4 3-5a; 5b gives a wrong date) with the result that the neighbors were turned from being friends into enemies (cf. Ezr 4 4-5a and 5 3 ff.). It was a decisive day, this 24th day of the 9th mo. 520 B.C. and none felt its significance more than H. His faith was equal to the emergency and in his last (recorded) word (2 20-23) he declares that J'' will 'overthrow the throne of kingdoms' and makes bold to add that He will make Zerubbabel 'a signet' for 'I have chosen thee, saith J'' of hosts,' practically declaring Z. to be the head of the new age or in later terminology, the Messiah.

In the revision of the present arrangement of the messages of H. the writer has been guided largely by the investigations of Rothstein (Juden und Samaritaner, 1908). There is no indication that the Book of Haggai was written by H. himself. It is evidently but a collection by some other and probably later person of H.'s messages. The dates attached appear to be correct (except in 2 18) but through some mistake or accident the message in 2 15-19 got misplaced and separated from 1 15, its date-heading.

Nowhere else in the O T do we get such an insight into the spirit and motives and hopes that were embodied in the great effort of the weak community to build the Second Temple. The narrative in Ezr 3 2-13 fits in admirably between H.'s first and third messages and it is from the Book of Haggai that we get the correct dating for this and other sections in Ezr. The compiler of Ezr was mistaken in thinking that the foundation of the Second Temple was laid immediately after the Return in 536 B.C. It was not until 520 B.C.—16 years after the first exiles returned—that they set themselves to the task of building the house. This explains the severity of H.'s rebuke in Hag. 1 2 f.

It was essentially the Messianic hope that inspired the building of the second Temple. Only if that house were built could the Jews expect the realization of J''s promises of glory and prosperity to His people. This was H.'s conviction and it was this his faith that led him to make the promises he did.

H. was of the school of Ezekiel. The principle of 'holiness' (the 'holy' community) and the all-importance of the Temple as J''s house, as formulated by Ezekiel were guiding principles for H.

HAGGI, hag-gai (חַגִּי, haggi), 'my feast': The ancestral head of one of the clans of Gad, the Haggites (Gn 46 16; Nu 26 15).

HAGGIAH, hag-gai'a (חַגִּיָּה, haggiyāh), 'J' is my feast': A Levite (I Ch 6 30).

HAGGITH, hag-giḥ (חַגִּית, haggiṭh), 'festive': The wife of David and mother of Adonijah (II S 3 4, etc.).

HAGRI, hag'rai (חַגְרִי, hagri): 1. The father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 33, Haggeri AV), but probably more correctly given in II S 23 33 as 'the Gadite.' 2. Jaziz, the Hagrite, superintendent of David's flocks (I Ch 27 30, 31, Hagarite AV). Both 1 and 2 may be explained by 3. 3. The Hagrites (I Ch 5 10, 19, 20, Hagarites AV; also Hagarenes, Ps 83 6, but RVmg. 'Hagrites'), the name of a tribe with which the Reubenites waged war and from which they took spoils. Following the suggestion furnished by the name, the tribe was later derived by Jewish writers from Hagar. A similar, probably cognate, name appears in the list of Tiglath-pileser III (COT, II, 32), and it is certain that such a tribe flourished in northern Arabia.

HAHIROTH, ha-hai'roth. See PI-HAHIROTH.

HAI, hē'ai. See AI.

HAIL. See PALESTINE, § 19; and PLAGUES.

HAIR: Among the Hebrews black hair was common (Song 4 1, 5 11), and a luxuriant growth was considered a mark of beauty. Men wore their hair trimmed (Ezk 44 20), but not shaven, and the beard was carefully dressed. A few had long hair (Ab-salom, II S 14 26), which might be braided (Samson, Jg 16 13, 19). Women wore the hair long (Song 4 1; I Co 11 15), but fastened in some way, often in artistic locks and coils (II K 9 20; Is 3 24). Baldness was a disgrace (II K 2 23; Is 3 24). Shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Jer 7 29; Am 8 10), which was forbidden in later times (Dt 14 1), as were also certain forms of cutting the hair (Lv 19 27; Ezk 44 20). In connection with the Nazirite vow, the hair was allowed to grow until the vow was accomplished (Nu 6 2, 5), when it was cut off and burned (Nu 6 18; cf. Ac 18 18, 21 24). The expression 'a hairy' man in II K 1 8 does not refer to the prophet's person, but to his mantle, which in all likelihood consisted of undressed skin (cf. Gn 25 25; Zech 13 4). C. S. T.

HAKKATAN, hak'a-tan (חַקְטָן, haggātān), 'the little one': The father of Johanan (Ezr 8 12).

HAKKOZ, hak'kez (חַקְקֹז, haggōts), 'the thorn' (?): 1. The head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 8 Coz AV). 2. The ancestral head of the seventh course of priests (I Ch 24 10; Ezr 2 61; Neh 3 4, 21, 7 63, Koz AV).

HAKUPHA, ha-kiū'fə (חַקֻּפָּה, hāqūphā): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 51 = Neh 7 53).

HALAH, hē'la (חֲלָה, hālāh): Sargon, after he had captured Samaria, transported the captive Israelites to Halah, and to the Habor, the river of Gozan, and to the cities of the Medes (II K 17 6, 18 11). There are several views as to the location of Halah. (a) It has been identified with the Calachene of Strabo, a plain of N. Assyria, which lies to the E. of the Tigris. (b) Others regard it as the Hebrew name of Chalkitis in Mesopotamia, near the river Chaboras. A cuneiform inscription mentions a territory, Halāḥḥa, near Haran. This points to the same region as Chalkitis. (c) The LXX. regards Halah as the name of a river of Gozan. The second view of its location is the most probable. J. A. K.

HALAK, hē'lak (חֲלָק, hālāq), 'the smooth (bare) mountain': In Jos 11 17, 12 7 it is given as the southern limit of Joshua's conquest. It has been identified with the white cliffs 8 m. S. of the Dead Sea, and also with Jebel Madara, SW. of the pass on the road between Petra and Hebron.

C. S. T.

HALHUL, hal-hol (חֲלָחֻל, hālḥul): A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 58). It is the modern Halḥūl, a well-situated village 4 m. N. of Hebron, on a hill just E. of the road to Jerusalem. A spring, rock tombs, and old walls are near at hand. Map II, E 2.

C. S. T.

HALI, hē'lai (חֲלִי, hālī): A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 25). Map IV, C 5. Identification uncertain.

HALL. See HOUSE, § 6 (f); and PRETORIUM.

HALLELUJAH, hal'lu-lu'ya, literally, 'Praise Jah': A liturgical ejaculation frequent in the last part of the Psalter. It occurs at the opening of eleven Psalms (106, 111, 112, 113, 117, 135, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150), and at the close of thirteen (104, 105, 106, 113, 115, 116, 117, 135, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150). In all these cases it is probably not an integral part of the Psalms, but rather a traditional acclamation used with them. From its occurrence the group Pss 113-118 was known as the Hallel (or Egyptian Hallelujah), which was regularly used at the celebration of the Passover, doubtless being the hymn sung at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26 30; Mk 14 26). Another Hallel (the Greek or Great Hallelujah) included more or less of the group Pss 146-150, and part of it was sometimes added to the foregoing. In the N T the word occurs only in Rev 19 1-6 in the Greek form Alleluia, which has been extensively adopted in Christian liturgies and hymns.

W. S. P.

HALLOHESH, hā-lō'hesh (חֲלוֹהֶשֶׁת, hallōhēsh, Halohesh AV), 'the whisperer': The ancestral head of a postexilic family (Neh 3 12, 10 24).

HALLOW, HALLOWED, THINGS: The Heb. terms so rendered are all connected with the root חָדַשׁ, qādash, which meant primarily 'separation' or 'placing apart' and (in its different forms) is most commonly rendered 'holy,' be 'holy,' 'holiness,' etc. A 'hallowed thing' was thus something set apart from ordinary to a sacred use. To 'hallow' a person or thing was to withdraw him, or it, from common occupations, or uses, to those of a sacred character (cf. Ex 20 11, 29 1; I S 21 4, etc.) God's name is to be 'hallowed' in that it is not to be treated as common, but with all due reverence (Mt 6 9; Lk 11 2). See also HOLY. E. E. N.

HALT. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6.

HAM (חָם, hām): I. The younger son of Noah (Gn 9 24 RVmg.). The name has been derived from chem or keme (Egyptian for 'black'). Ebers (Aegypten, I, p. 55) makes it refer to the color of the soil. Others derive it from a Semitic (Late Heb.) root, hām, 'hot,' relating the patriarch to the peoples of the warm southern countries in general. The later derivation seems better founded (cf. PRE<sup>3</sup>, article Aegypten). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 5, 7, 12.

II. 1. Poetically, Ham denotes Egypt ('land of Ham,' Ps 105 23, 27, 106 22, also 'tents of Ham,' Ps 78 51 ['tabernacles' AV], for the dwellings of the Egyptians). 2. A place where Chedorlaomer is said to have defeated the Zuzim (Gn 14 5); but since these are the same as the Zamzumim, who dwelt in the territory known as Ammon, it is safe to infer that Ham here stands for Ammon. A. C. Z.

HAMAN, hē'mān (חָמָן, hāmān), etymology doubtful: The prime minister and favorite of Ahasuerus (Xerxes, 485-464 B.C.). He is one of the chief personalities in the story of Esther (3 1 ff.), and is represented as the great enemy of the Jews. He is also called an Agagite (Est 3 1, 10, etc. = Amalekite; cf. I S 15 8) in the Hebrew text, but a Bugean (in 9 24, a Macedonian) in the LXX. There may be a suggestion in this of the enmity of the Macedonians for the Jews in the later age. In the feast of Purim the hanging of an effigy of Haman was a feature. See also ESTHER, § 6. A. C. Z.

HAMATH, HEMATH, hē'māth (חֲמַת, hāmāth): Perhaps, to be distinguished from 'Hamath the great' (q.v.), a district lying on the SW. slope of Hermon, reaching at least as far as the Jordan to the W., and forming the boundary of Palestine and Israel to the NE. (Nu 34 8; I K 8 65; II K 14 25; Ezk 47 16; Am 6 14). In the 10th cent. B.C. it was an Aramean kingdom, whose ruler To'u, altho not joining in the league against Israel, became tributary to David (II S 8 9 ff.; cf. I Ch 18 9). As the frontier of a rival people, its control was always aimed at by the powerful kings of Israel (II Ch 8 4; II K 14 28). See Winckler in KAT<sup>3</sup>, 182, 231 f., and Oriental. Forschungen, III, Heft 3 (1905). The common view is that this Hamath is to be identified with 'Hamath the great,' the modern Ḥamā, which at the time of its greatest power controlled the territory as far south as the north border of Israel. See also ARAM, § 4 (4). J. F. McC.—L. B. P.

HAMATH (the Great), HAMATHITE, hē'māth, hē'mā-thait. See ARAM; and ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

HAMATH-ZOBAB, -zō'ba (חֲמַת צוֹבָב, hāmāth tsōbhāh), 'fortress of Zoba': A place in Syria conquered by Solomon (II Ch 8 3), near Hamath and Tadmor. C. S. T.

HAMMATH, ham'āth (חֲמַת, hāmāth), 'hot spring': I. The father of the house of Rechab (I Ch 2 55). II. A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 35), probably the well-known hot springs S. of Tiberias, the Gr. Emmaus, the modern Hammām (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 2 3, 'Ἀμμαθούς) = possibly Hammoth-dor (Jos 21 32), and Hammon (I Ch 6 76 [61]). C. S. T.

HAMMEAH, ham'mi-a, TOWER OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

HAMMEDATHA, ham'mi-dē'thā (חֲמֵדָתָה, ham-mēdhāthā): The father of Haman (Est 3 1, etc.).

HAMMELECH, ham'i-lek (חֲמֵלֶךְ, hammelekh), 'the king': So in Jer 36 26, 38 6 (AV), but RV reads simply 'the king.'

HAMMER: The rendering of several Heb. words. (1) maqgebbeth, the hammer used by the carpenter or stone-mason (I K 6 7; Jer 10 4), or the smith (Is 44 12). It is also used of the mallet by which tent-pins were driven into the ground (Jg 4 21). (2) halmūth, of uncertain meaning, the instrument used by Jael to slay Sisera (Jg 5 26; cf. Moore in Int. Crit. Com. ad loc.). (3) paṭṭīsh, the large hammer of the smith (Is 41 7; Jer 23 29), used figuratively of Babylon, or Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 50 23). (4) kēlappōth (pl.), probably a cutting implement like an ax, not a hammer (Ps 74 6). E. E. N.

HAMMIPHKAD, ham-mif'kad, GATE OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

HAMMOLECHETH, hām-mel'i-keth (חֲמֹלֶכֶת, hammōlekheth, Hammo-leketh AV): Apparently a Manassite clan closely connected with the Gileadites E. of the Jordan (I Ch 7 18).

HAMMON, ham'an (חַמּוֹן, hāmōn), 'hot spring': 1. A border town of Asher (Jos 19 28), near Kanah, and therefore not far from Tyre. Unidentified. Evidence of a sanctuary of Baal Hamman has been found in two inscriptions at Khirbet Ummel 'Amud, S. of Tyre. 2. A Gershonite Levitical city in Naphtali (I Ch 6 76 [61]) = Hammoth-dor (Jos 21 32), and possibly Hammath (Jos 19 35). C. S. T.

HAMMOTH-DOR, ham'āth-dōr' (חֲמַת דּוֹר, hāmōth dō'r): A Levitical city of Naphtali (Jos 21 32), apparently the same as Hammath (Jos 19 35) and Hammon (I Ch 6 76). Map IV, E 7. See also HAMMATH.

HAMMUEL, ham'mu-el (חַמּוּאֵל, hāmū'ēl, Hamuel AV): The ancestral head of a Simeonite clan (I Ch 4 26).

HAMONAH, hā-mō'na (חַמּוֹנָה, hāmōnāh, Hammonah AV), 'multitude': The symbolic name for a city near the place where the armies of Gog were to meet their fate (Ezk 39 18). It is not likely that any actual city is referred to HAMON-GOG, hē'men-gēg' (חֲמוֹן גִּגְיִן, hāmōn gōgh), 'the multitude of Gog': the valley, described quite specifically as 'the valley of them that pass through on the east of the [Dead] sea' (Ezk 39 11 ff.). It is likely that some actual valley, a thoroughfare between the regions E. and W. of the Jordan, is meant. The prophet uses it symbolically. It is to be filled with the dead bodies (of the hosts of Gog) and passage through it will thereby be blocked. The AV reading in ver. 11, 'stop the noses,' has no basis in the Heb. E. E. N.

HAMOR, hē'mōr (חָמֹר, hāmōr), 'ass': The name of a Hivite, 'the father of Shechem,' who along with his son was slain by the sons of Jacob for the wrong done their sister Dinah (Gn 34 2 ff. Emmor in Ac 7 16 AV). Some maintain that under the guise of an incident in the life of two families, the story has embalmed an episode in the tribal relations of Israel with a Canaanite tribe, Hamor (a totem-clan, whose symbol was the ass). Another view identifies the sons of Hamor, the Hamorites, with the Amorites. A. C. Z.

HAMRAN, ham'rān. See HEMDAN.

HAMUEL, ham'yu-el or hā-miū'el. See HAMMUEL.

HAMUL, hē'mol (חָמֹל, hāmūl), 'pitied': The ancestral head of one of the clans of Judah, the Hamulites (Gn 46 12; Nu 26 21; I Ch 2 5).

HAMUTAL, hī-mū'tal (חָמוּטָל, hāmūtal), 'my husband's father is the dew?': The wife of Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, kings of Judah (II K 23 31, 24 18; Jer 52 1).

HANAMEL, han'a-mel (חָנָמֶל, hānam'el, Hanameel AV), 'God is kind?': The cousin of Jeremiah from whom the prophet purchased an ancestral field, according to the law of redemption (Lv 25 25), in the faith that after God's judgment had been visited on Jerusalem the land would again be inhabited (Jer 32 7 ff.). The notice of the transfer of the deed is of archeological interest. E. E. N.

HANAN, hē'nān (חָנָן, hānān), 'gracious': 1. A Benjaminite chief (I Ch 8 23). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 23, 24). 3. One of David's mighty men (I Ch 11 43). 4. The head of a family of the Nethinim, who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 46; Neh 7 49). 5. One who assisted Ezra in explaining the Law (Neh 8 7), perhaps the same as Neh 10 10(11). 6. One of the four treasurers in charge of the tithes (Neh 13 13). 7, 8. Two who 'sealed the covenant' (Neh 10 22 [23], 26 [27]). 9. A son of Igdaliah, and a 'man of God' (prophet), whose sons had a cell in the Temple at Jerusalem (Jer 35 4). C. S. T.

HANANEL, han'a-nel, TOWER OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

HANANI, hā-nē'nai (חָנָנִי, hānānī), 'gracious': 1. A seer, father of Jehu (I K 16 1, 7; II Ch 19 2, 20 34), who rebuked Asa for relying on Syria, and was cast into prison. 2. A 'brother,' or kinsman, of Nehemiah, who brought news of the fate of Jerusalem to Susa (Neh 1 2), and later was over the city gatekeepers in Jerusalem (Neh 7 2). 3. A chief musician who took part in the dedication of the wall at Jerusalem (Neh 12 36). 4. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 20). 5. A musician, son of Heman, in David's service (I Ch 25 4, 26). C. S. T.

HANANIAH, han'a-nai'a (חַנְיָהּ, hānanyāhū, חַנְיָה, hānanyāh), 'J' is gracious': Fourteen persons bearing this name are mentioned in the O T. 1. An officer under Uzziah (II Ch 26 11). 2. The father of Zedekiah, prince of Judah (Jer 36 12). 3. A prophet of the popular party who publicly opposed Jeremiah's policy and contradicted his declarations regarding the outcome of the siege of Jerusalem. In his reply Jeremiah predicted the speedy death of H. (Jer ch. 28). 4. The grandfather of Irijah (Jer 37 13). 5. One of Daniel's three companions (Dn 1 6 ff., 2 17 ff.). 6. A Hemanite musician (I Ch 25 4, 23). 7. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 24). 8. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 19, 21). 9. One of the 'sons of Bebai' who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 28). 10. A perfumer of Jerusalem who helped repair the wall (Neh 3 8). 11. A son of Shelemiah who helped repair the wall (Neh 3 30). 12. An officer under Nehemiah (Neh 7 2). 13. A representative of a family of the same name who signed the covenant (Neh 10 23). 14. A priest (Neh 12 12, 41).

HAND (יָד, yād) (figurative use): While 'hand' is one of the anthropomorphic expressions which abound in the O T, its figurative use is not confined to Divine actions and expressions. A language which possesses few abstract terms is compelled to use objective words for the wide range of ideas that come with changed conditions and growing civilization. Even in the Assyrian, idu means 'strength' and in the Hebrew, phrases like 'strengthen the hand' readily pass into those in which the hand itself is a synonym for power: 'none of the men of might have found their hands' (Ps 76 5). In Jos 8 20 'power' is 'hands' in the Hebrew; cf. also Lv 5 7, 11, where 'means' is literally 'hands.' It is also rendered 'dominion' (II S 8 3; I Ch 18 3). Closely connected with this use are the phrases in which the Lord's hand is spoken of; it is 'heavy' in chastisement (I S 5 6); it is strong to deliver (Ex 13 3, 14, 16): it is not 'short' (Nu 11 23): it is 'stretched out' (Is 5 25, etc.); it seizes upon the prophet in inspiration (Is 8 11); even its 'shadow' may be spoken of (Is 49 2). Other figurative uses are more akin to its physical meaning, as 'side' (I S 4 18), 'direction' ('coast,' Nu 24 24), special 'place' (Dt 23 12; Nu 2 17). The Heb. word may also mean a 'monument' (I S 15 12), a share (Gn 47 24), or parts of objects, like an axletree and supports.

Many prepositional phrases occur which are rendered literally into English, like 'under the hand' (Gn 41 35). Certain other Heb. words are rendered idiomatically by 'hand' in various combinations in the AV, which are now obsolete or rare. There is also a wide range of emotional experiences in which the hand plays a large part—the hand that is waved in defiance, or pointed in scorn, that is raised in blessing, or extended for an oath, or that is laid upon the neophyte when inducted into his duties, speaks where the voice is unheard, or has ceased forever. The narrative and poetic sections of the O T owe their dramatic power in no small degree to this. 'A hand upon the throne of Jah' (Ex 17 16 mg.) has all the significance of a gage of battle, and is as well an appeal that fears not to bring J" Himself into the fray. The priest who enters on his functions must have his 'hands filled,' Eng. 'be consecrated' (Ex 29 9; Jg 17 6)—whether with sacrificial portions, or priestly emblems, or the dignity of the office is uncertain. Washing hands in innocency, real or assumed, was a practised rite (Dt 21 6-8; Mt 27 24), and ministration to a leader could be symbolized by the phrase 'pour water on the hands' (II K 3 11). But 'clean hands' and a 'pure heart' are correlative terms by which the citizen of Zion is distinguished from those who have not shrunk from touching the unclean thing (Ps 24 4). For the late Jewish expression 'defile the hands' see O T CANON, § 8 ff. A. S. C.—O. R. S.

HANDBREATH. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

HANDKERCHIEF: The word so rendered, σουδάριον (Ac 19 12), is a Lat. word, sudarium (from sudor, 'sweat'), signifying a cloth for wiping off perspiration, or for similar purposes. The same word is rendered 'napkin' (Lk 19 20; Jn 11 44, 20 7). The word rendered aprons (σινιχίτιον) in the same passage (Ac 19 12) is also a Lat. word, semicinctium (a 'half-girdle,' from semi, 'half,' and cingere, 'to bind'), meaning a 'small girdle' and then applied to a cloth worn over the clothing to protect it and fastened, or girded, about the waist. In Gn 3 7 the Heb. word rendered 'aprons' means 'girdle,' on which see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 1. E. E. N.

HANDMAID. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 7; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 3; and SLAVERY, § 2.

HANDSTAVES: The Heb word maqṣel, often rendered 'staff' ('staves'; cf. I S 17 40, 42), is found in Ezk 39 9 joined with 'hand,' maqṣel yādh, 'staff of the hand' (the sing. for the plural), denoting one of the many kinds of weapons used by the hosts of Gog. Probably the simplest sort of weapon such as clubs, is meant, tho possibly the goads, or sticks, used for driving the animals may be intended (so A. B. Davidson in Camb. Bible, Ezekiel).

E. E. N.

HANDWRITING (χειρόγραφον): The literal rendering (in Col 2 14 AV) of a term used in the sense of a 'written obligation,' as a 'note,' 'bond,' etc. Here Paul uses it of the Law, as if it were a note, or bond, indicative of an infinite debt. E. E. N.

HANES, hē'niz (חנִּיִּס, hānēs): An Egyptian city, mentioned with Zoan (Is 30 4), giving perhaps the limits of the Egyptian kingdom. If so, it may be Heracleopolis magna (Coptic Hnēs, Gr. Ἡρακλεῖς, Herod. 2 137) in middle Egypt, between the Nile and Fayūm, the ruins Ahnās el Medīna. The texts and versions of Is 30 4 f. vary, and the meaning is obscure. Some think that Hanes is for Taphanhes on the NE. frontier of Egypt, near Zoan, which would give two cities near Palestine. C. S. T.

HANG, HANGING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3.

HANGING, HANGINGS. See TABERNACLE, § 3.

HANIEL. See HANNIEL.

HANNAH, han'a or han'a (חַנָּה, hannāh), 'grace': One of the two wives of Elkanah and the mother of Samuel, the prophet. In the rather late narrative (I S chs. 1-2; see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF) H. is represented as a pious woman, but unhappy because of her childlessness. Samuel was born in answer to her prayer and devoted by his mother to the service of J". Afterward she became the mother of five other children (I S 2 21).

In the LXX. the Song is inserted after 1 28a, and after the Song we read at 2 11a, 'And she left him (Samuel) there before the Lord and returned to Ramathaim.' This difference between the Heb. and the LXX. shows that the Song is probably a later insertion into the text of I S of a poem that originally had nothing to do with either Hannah or Samuel. See further SAMUEL, BOOKS OF, § 3.

E. E. N.

HANNATHON, han'na-then (חַנְּתָן, hannāthōn): A place on the N. border of Zebulun (Jos 19 14); perhaps the modern Kefr 'Anān, a little E. of Ramah, Map IV, D 6. C. S. T.

HANNIEL, han'ni-el (חַנְּיָאֵל, hannī'ēl), 'God is grace,' or 'pity': 1. A 'prince' of Manasseh (Nu 34 23). 2. The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 39, Haniel AV).

HANOCH, hē'nek (חֲנוֹךְ, hānōkh): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gn 25 4; I Ch 1 33, Henoah AV) (see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13). 2. The ancestral head of a clan of Reuben, the Hanochites (Gn 46 9; Nu 26 5, etc.).

HANUN, hē'nun (חַנּוּן, hāmūn), 'pitied': 1. The son of Nahash, King of Ammon. His insolent treatment of the messengers of David brought on a war in which the Ammonites lost their independence (II S 10 1 ff.; I Ch 19 1 ff.). 2, 3. The name of two persons who assisted in the work on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 13, 30).

HAPHARAIM, haf'a-rē'im (חַפְּרַיִם, hāphārayim, Haphraim AV): A town on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 19), not yet certainly identified.

HAPPIZEZ, hap'piz-ez (חַפְּצִיזִים, happitsēls, Aphses AV): The ancestral head of the 18th course of priests (I Ch 24 15).

HARA, hē'rā (חָרָא, hārā): A section of the Assyrian Kingdom, to which the Israelites from Samaria were deported (I Ch 5 26). The corresponding account in II K 17 6, 18 11 reads 'in the cities of the Medes,' for which the LXX. has 'in the mountains of the Medes' ('הָרֵי מְדַי, hārē mādāy). The LXX. is to be preferred, and would account for הָרָא (I Ch 5 26). C. S. T.

HARADAH, hā-rē'da or har'a-da (חָרָדָה, hārādhāh): A station on the wilderness route between Sinai and Kadesh (Nu 33 24). Site unknown.

HARAN, hē'ran (חָרָן, hārān): 1. A son of Terah and brother of Abraham. He was the father of Lot, and of Milcah, the wife of his brother Nahor, and of Iscah. He is represented as dying before his father Terah (Gn 11 26 f., 31 [P], 28 f. [J]). Probably behind these individual names tribal or clan relations are signified. 2. A Levite (I Ch 23 9).

E. E. N.

HARAN, hē'rān (חָרָן, hārān, in N T Χάρραν, Charran AV): 1. A city of Mesopotamia situated on the Bēlikh about 60 m. above its confluence with the Euphrates. It was a junction-point on the great trade-route from Nineveh to Carchemish (see Map of Ancient Semitic World), and was a place of great commercial importance (cf. Ezk 27 23). It was also a chief seat of the worship of the moon-god Sin, and is frequently mentioned in the Assyr. inscriptions (cf. II K 19 12; Is 37 12). At H. after the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., the remnant of the Assyrian forces made a last stand against the Babylonians and Medes, but were utterly defeated (611-609 B.C.). H. maintained its importance to quite recent times (13th cent.), its ancient paganism continuing until the 11th cent. It was at or near H. that the family of Abram either had their original home (so J, Gn 12 1, 4 f. Cf. 24 4, 7, 10, etc.), or made their home after their migration from Ur, another great center of moon-worship (so P, Gn 11 28b, 31 f., 15 7, etc.). A range of mounds on both sides of the river is all that remains of the ancient city.

II. A son of Caleb (I Ch 2 46).

E. E. N.

HARARITĒ, hē'rā-rait (חָרָרִי, hārārī), 'the mountaineer' (or 'the man from Harar?'): A designation of two of David's heroes. 1. Shammah (II S 23 11, 33; I Ch 11 34, where 'Shagee' perhaps = Shammah). 2. Abiam (II S 23 33, Ararite RV; I Ch 11 35). It is possible that in I Ch 11 34 'Hararite' refers to Jonathan. There is much text-confusion in these passages.

E. E. N.

HARBONA, HARBONAH, hār-bō'nā, hār-bō'nā. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

HARD QUESTION. See PROVERBS.

HARDEN (THE HEART): In the O T this expression occurs mainly in the story of the plagues (Ex chs. 7-10), or in reference to the rebellious spirit often manifested by Israel (cf. II K 17 14; Neh 9 16 f.; Ps 95 8; Jer 7 26). The Heb. terms used are derivatives of three roots differing in meaning: (1) hāzaq, 'to be stable,' 'strong' ('to do a thing,' or 'to resist,' etc.), frequently found in the causative form with j' as the subject (cf. Ex 4 21, 9 12, 10 20, 27, 11 10, 14 4, 8, 17; Jos 11 20). Tho the most of such passages belong to the later strands of the narratives, the same idea is found also in the early writers J and E. They did not think of this 'hardening' as a capricious or arbitrary proceeding on God's part. It was rather a step in His sovereign process of judgment on those who had already incurred the Divine displeasure by first 'hardening' their own hearts (cf. Ex 7 13, 22, 8 19, 9 35). There is no instance in the Bible of God arbitrarily 'hardening' the heart of an innocent man simply to punish him. (2) kābhēdh, 'to be heavy,' with the idea of 'stubbornness' most prominent (cf. Ex 7 14, 8 15, 32, 9 7, 34, 10 1; I S 6 6). (3) qāshāh, 'to be (or make) hard,' figuratively applied to a moral disposition unresponsive to discipline or appeal (cf. Ex 7 3; Dt 2 30, and the reff. in Neh, etc., noted above). (4) 'āmats, 'to be strong' (Dt 15 7; II Ch 36 13).

In the N T we have echoes of the O T expressions, with no specific difference of conception (cf. Mk 8 17; Jn 12 40; Ac 19 9, etc.). Paul's words (Ro 9 18) are not to be understood as taking absolutely no account of moral responsibility (see Sanday on Romans 9 18 in ICC).

E. E. N.

HARE. See PALESTINE, § 24.HAREPH, hē'ref. See HARIPH.HARETH, hē'reth. See HERETH.

HARHAIHAH, hār-hē'ya (חָרְחִי, harhāyāh): The father of Uzziel (Neh 3 8).

HARHAS, hūr'has (חֲרָשׁ, harhas): The grandfather of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (II K 22 14; Hasrah in II Ch 34 22).

HARHUR, hūr'hūr (חֲרֻר, harhūr), 'fever' (?): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53).

HARIM, hē'rim (חָרִים, and חָרִם, hārīm, 'dedicated,' or 'devoted': 1. The ancestral name of a large postexilic family (Ezr 2 32, 10 31; Neh 3 11, 7 35, 10 27). Like other names in the list this may also be the name of the place where these returned Jews lived, tho it is not yet identified. 2. The ancestral head of the third course of priests (I Ch 24 8), i.e., of the large priestly family called by this name (Ezr 2 39, 10 21; Neh 7, 42, 10 5). 3. An individual belonging to 1 or 2 (Neh 12 15).

E. E. N.

HARIPH, hē'rif (חָרִיפִּי, hārīph, Hareph I Ch 2 51 RV): 1. The 'father of Beth-gader' in a Calebite genealogy (I Ch 2 51). The names here are place-names, by which movements of population are indicated, and probably the reference is to the town elsewhere called Haruph (I Ch 12 5). 2. A postexilic family, or community, apparently living at Haruph, of Hariph (Neh 7 24, 10 19). In Ezr 2 18 Jorah instead of Hariph occurs.

E. E. N.

HARLOT: Prostitution was a deeply rooted and widely practised evil in the ancient Semitic world. There was not only common prostitution for hire but religious prostitution, in which the votaries were attached to a temple or shrine, and gave themselves in this way to the service of deity, a practise closely connected with the deification of the reproductive forces of nature. In the O T the technical term for a religious prostitute (חֲדָשָׁה, q'hdēshāh) occurs but seldom (Gn 38 21 f.; Dt 23 17; Hos 4 14). The more general term for common harlotry (זָנָה, zā-nāh (often rendered in AV by whore, whoredom, etc.)) is used in both senses. In the O T legislation there are no specific statutes against common prostitution, except in Lv 19 29, due probably to the somewhat lower standard of morality. Against religious prostitution the attitude was much more positive. Not only were the priestly families to keep clear of such practises (Lv 21 7, 9, 14; Dt 23 18), but the many prohibitions and warnings directly against the practise of the Canaanite religion by Israelites, characterizing it as harlotry, are due, at least in part, to the degrading nature of such worship (cf. Ex 34 15; Hos 1 2, 4 12 ff.; Ezk 16 23 ff., etc.). In the prophetic period, and later, many voices were raised against the all too-prevalent sexual immorality (cf. Gn 34 31; Am 2 7; Hos 4 2, 11; Jn 2 20 ff., 3 6 ff.; Pr 6 26, etc.). Children by such illegitimate connections could be brought up in the father's house (cf. Jg 11 1 f.). See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c); and MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 4. E. E. N.

HAR-MAGEDON, hār'-mā-ged'on (Ἀρμαγεδών) (Rev 16 16, Armageddon AV, Ar-Magedon RVmg): An apocalyptic symbol for the site of the final conflict between the forces of good and evil. Its explanation depends on the form of the underlying Hebrew. Hippolytus is supposed to have read something like 'Valley of Megiddo,' with allusion to Zec 12 11 (cf. Lagarde, Analecta, 1858, p. 27, n. 18). Origen's (Eus. Onom. Sacr. ed. Lagarde, p. 187 reading was 'Ar-Miqqedem ('the plain before'). Luther's marginal gloss is based on the N T, but derives the word from herem, 'curse.' Gunkel (Schöpfung u. Chaos, 1894) elaborates Hommel's suggestion that the Hebrew was har mō'ēdh ('mount of congregation', cf. Is 14 13), and connects it with the Babylonian notion of a world-conflict on some mountain height. But, according to the commonly accepted view, Har-Magedon is simply a Greek transliteration of the Hebrew for 'mountain of Megiddo.' This does not occur in the O T, but the plain of Megiddo[n] was proverbially the scene of decisive contests (Zec 12 11; Jg 5 19; II K 9 27, 23 29), and Gunkel's theory may be correct in so far as it accounts for a change, under Babylonian influence, of 'the plain of Megiddo' into 'a mountain of Megiddo.' A. C. Z.

HARMON. This word is taken as a place-name by RV at Am 4 3, but the reading is uncertain. No such place is known.

HARNEPHER, hār'nī-fēr (הַרְנֵפֶר, harnepher): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36).

HARNES: The AV rendering of shiryōn in I K 22 34 || II Ch 18 33. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 9.

HAROD, hē'rod (הָרֹד, hārōdh): 1. The spring of Harod was the place where Gideon's army encamped before his night attack on the Midianites (Jg 7 1). It is now identified with 'Ain Jāhud, at the foot of Mt. Gilboa, at the W. end of the valley Jezreel (see Map IV, D 8). 2. Shammoth, the Harodite, one of David's captains (II S 23 25; in I Ch 11 27 Harorite, which is clearly an error).

J. A. K.

HAROEH, hā-rō'e or har'o-i (הָרֹעִי, hārō'eh), 'the seer': The name of a small clan or, possibly, of a place, in the genealogy of the Calebites descended from Hur (I Ch 2 52). Perhaps the name here is a mistake for Reaiah (cf. 4 2). E. E. N.

HARORITE, hē'ro-raih. See HAROD, 2.

HAROSHETH, hā-rō'sheth (הָרוֹשֶׁת, hārōsheth): The headquarters of Sisera, the general of Jabin's forces (Jg 4 2, 13, 16). It is usually identified with el-Harithiyeh, near the Kishon at the W. end of the Plain of Esdraelon. It is situated at the narrowest point of the defile, commanding the entrance to the plain (see Map IV, B 7). J. A. K.

HARP, HARPER. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3.

HARROW. See AGRICULTURE, § 4.

HARSHA, hār'sha (חַרְשָׁא, harshā'), 'deaf': The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54).

HARSITH, hār'sith, THE GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 32.

HART. See FOOD, § 10; and PALESTINE, § 24.

HARUM, hē'rom (חָרוֹם, hārūm): The ancestral head of a family of Judah (I Ch 4 8).

HARUMAPH, hā-rū'maf (חָרוּמָפִי, hārūmaph), 'with pierced nose' (?): The father of Jedaiah (Neh 3 10).

HARUPHITE, hā-rū'fait (חָרוּפִי, hārūphī): In I Ch 12 5 Shephatiah is called 'the Haruphite,' i.e., he belonged to Haruph. See HARIPH.

HARUZ, hē'ruz (חָרוּץ, hārūts): The father of Meshullemeth, wife of King Manasseh (II K 21 19).

HARVEST. See AGRICULTURE, §§ 6, 7; and PALESTINE, §§ 17-20.

HASADIAH, has''e-dai'a (חַסְדִּיָּה, hāsadyāh), 'J' is kind': A son of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 20).

HASENUAH, has''i-nū'a. See HASENUAH.

HASHABIAH, hash''e-bai'a (חַשְׁבִּיָּה, hāshabhyāh), 'J' has taken account': 1. Two Levites of the sons of Merari (I Ch 6 45 [30], 9 14; Neh 11 15). 2. A son of Jeduthun (I Ch 25 3, 19). 3. A Hebronite (I Ch 26 30). 4. The ruler of the Levites (I Ch 27 17). 5. A chief Levite under King Josiah (II Ch 35 9). 6. A Levite who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 19). 7. One of twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels (Ezr 8 24=Neh 12 24). 8. One who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 17) and sealed the covenant (10 11 [12], 12 24). 9. A Levite (11 22). 10. A priest (Neh 12 21). C. S. T.

HASHABNAH, hash-ab'nā (חַשְׁבִּנָּה, hāshabnāh): The head of a postexilic family (Neh 10 25).

HASHABNEIAH, hash''ab-nū-ai'a (חַשְׁבִּנְיָה, hāshabhn'yāh, Hashabniah AV), 'J' has thought of me': 1. The father of Hattush (Neh 3 10). 2. A Levite (Neh 9 5).

HASHBADDANAH, hash-bad'a-na (חַשְׁבַּדָּנָה, hashbaddānāh, Hashbadana AV): A scribe or priest (Neh 8 4).

HASHEM, hē'shem. See JASHEN.

HASHMONAH, hash-mō'na (חַשְׁמוֹנָה, hashmō-nāh): A station on the wilderness route (Nu 33 29 f.), not yet identified.

HASHUB, hē'shub. See HASSEHUB.

HASHUBAH, ha-shū'ba (חַשְׁבָּה, hāshūbhāh): A son of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 20).

HASHUM, hē'shum (חַשֻּׁם, hāshūm): 1. The ancestral head of a large postexilic family, also possibly the home of the family, as well as its representative men (Ezr 2 19, 10 33; Neh 7 22, 10 18). 2. A priest or scribe (Neh 8 4).

HASHUPHA, hæ-shū'fā. See HASUPHA.

HASIDEANS has'ī-dī'enz or dē'enz. See PHARISEES, § 3.

HASMONEANS, has'mo-nī'enz or -nē'enz. See MACCABEES.

HASRAH, haz'rū or has'rū. See HARHAS.

HASSENAAH, has'ī-nē'a (חַסְנָא, ḥasṣenā'āh): The 'sons of H.' repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 3). The name is peculiar, but as yet there is no satisfactory explanation (cf. Cheyne in EB s.v.). See also SENAAB. E. E. N.

HASSENUAH, has'ī-niū'a (חַסְנִי, ḥasṣenū'āh, Hasenuah and Senuah AV): Apparently a Benjamite clan-name (I Ch 9 7; Neh 11 9). See SENAAB.

HASSHUB, hash'ub (חַשְׁבָּה, ḥashshūbh), 'thought of' (i.e., by God): 1. Apparently the ancestral head of a subdivision of Merarite Levites (I Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15, Hashub AV). 2. The name of several individuals (Neh 3 11, 23, 10 23).

HASSOPHERETH, has'o-fī'reth. See SOPHERETH.

HASTY FRUIT: This expression is found in Is 28 4 AV. For the correct rendering see RV.

HASUPHA, hæ-sū'fā (חַשְׁפָּה, ḥāsūphā, Hashupha AV): The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43=Neh 7 40).

HAT: The Aramaic original, חַתְּ, karb'la' (Dn 3 21), is rare and occurs but once in the OT, and while 'hat' (AV) conveys a wrong idea of its meaning, the RV rendering 'tunic' is not certain. 'Helmet' or 'cap' (so BDB.) would seem to be nearer the correct meaning. See DRESS, §8. E. E. N.

HATACH, hē'tak. See HATHACH.

HATCHET. See Ax.

HATE (OF GOD). See God, § 2.

HATHACH, hē'thak (חַתָּח, ḥāthākh, Hatach AV): A eunuch at the court of Ahasuerus (Est 4 5 ff.).

HATHATH, hē'thaṭh (חַתָּח, ḥāthath): A son of Othniel (I Ch 4 13).

HATIPHA, hæ-tai'fā or hat'i-fā (חַטִּיפָה, ḥāṭīphā), 'snatched away': The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 54=Neh 7 56).

HATITA, hæ-tai'tā or hat'i-tā (חַטִּיטָה, ḥāṭīṭā): The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the porters, or doorkeepers, of the Second Temple (Ezr 2 42=Neh 7 45).

HATTIL, hat'il (חַטִּיל, ḥāṭīl): The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 57=Neh 7 59).

HATTUSH, hat'ush (חַטִּיּוּשׁ, ḥāṭīūsh): 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 22). The same person is probably referred to in Ezr 8 2, tho the texts of Ch and Ezr are not quite harmonious. 2. A priest (Neh 10 4, 12 2). 3. One of those who helped in building the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 10).

HAURAN, hau'rān or hē'ron (חֲוָרָן, ḥawrān), 'hollow land': The fertile basin, now practically treeless, about 50 m. square and 2,000 ft. above sea-level, SE. of Mt. Hermon, between Jaulān and the Lejā (sometimes considered a part of the Hauran). In the Bible the name is found only in Ezk 47 16, 18 as marking the ideal border of Canaan on the E. The modern Arabs call essentially the same district el-Hawrān. The name occurs also in the ancient inscriptions of Assyria. In Græco-Roman times the same region was known as Auranitis, which was bounded on the N. by Trachonitis, and on the NW. by Gaulantis and Batanæa, all included in the kingdom of Herod the Great. Upon his death they fell to Philip (Lk 3 1). Troglodytes, doubtless, once occupied the rocky E. portion. G. L. R.

HAVEN: In the 'blessing of Jacob' (Gn 49 13) Zebulun is represented as dwelling at the 'haven' of the sea and becoming a 'haven' for ships. The Heb. hōph, however, means no more than 'shore' or 'beach,' and is so rendered where it occurs elsewhere (Dt 1 7; Jos 9 1; Jg 5 17 [AV]; Jer 47 7; Ezk 25 16). It is the proximity of Zebulun to the Mediterranean coast and to the Phœnicians with their maritime commerce that is implied. In Ps 107 30 the word māhōz may mean 'city' rather than 'haven,' but this is not certain. On Ac 27 12 see FAIR HAVENS. E. E. N.

HAVENS, FAIR. See FAIR HAVENS.

HAVE TO DO WITH: In all instances but one this phrase is the rendering of idiomatic questions which read literally, 'What is there to you [sing. or pl.] and to me [or some other person],' i.e., what community of interest or what relationship can be supposed to exist between the two parties, a negative answer being implied (Jos 22 24; Jg 11 12; II S 16 10; I K 17 18; Mt 8 29, 27 19; Mk 1 24; Jn 2 4, etc.). In He 4 13 the literal reading is: 'with whom is our account' (or reckoning, λόγος), referring to man's accountability to God. E. E. N.

HAVILAH, hav'i-lā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

HAVVOTH-JAIR, hē'veth-jē'ir (חַוּוֹת יָאִיר, ḥawwōth yā'ir): A group of trans-Jordanic towns, or villages (60 in Dt 3 4, 30 in Jg 10 4), conquered by the Manassite clan Jair (Nu 32 41, spoken of as an individual in Jg 10 4). The term hawwōth, originally signifying a group of Bedawin tents, was later applied even to fortified cities (I K 4 13). The two traditions, one locating them in Gilead (I K 4 13), the other in Bashan (Dt 3 14), are not mutually exclusive; the former includes the latter. J. A. K.

HAWK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

HAY: The terms so rendered (hātsir, Pr 27 25; Is 15 6 AV, and χότρος I Co 3 12) are very general in meaning, signifying grass or the early blade of grains, such as barley, rye, etc. See also PALESTINE, § 22. E. E. N.

HAZAEI, hē'zā-el or haz'a-el (חַזְאֵי, ḥāzā'el), 'God sees,' Assyr. Hazailu: A king of Damascus, c. 844-804 B.C. He had been singled out by Elijah to succeed Ben-hadad II, and when sent by that king to Elisha to inquire the issue of a sickness, he was told by the prophet that he would succeed his master and inflict distress on the people of Israel. The next day H. put Ben-hadad to death and usurped the throne. He was one of the most vigorous of the kings of Damascus, and in war against Jehu and Jehoahaz (II K 10 32, 33, 13 22) he brought Israel to the brink of destruction. He also successfully resisted the attacks of Shalmaneser III in 842 and 839. A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

HAZAIHAH, ha-zē'ya (חַזַּיָּה, hāzāyāh), 'J' hath seen': The head of a postexilic family (Neh 11 5).

HAZAR-ADDAR, hē'zār-ad'dār. See ADDAR.

HAZAR-ENAN, hē'zār-i'nan (חַזָּר עֲנָן, hātsar 'ēnān), HAZAR-ENON, -i'nen (חַזָּר עֵינֹן, h. 'ēnōn), 'enclosure of the fountains': The NE. corner of the (ideal) border of the land of Israel in the priestly theory of Israel (Nu 34 9 f.; Ezk 47 17, 48 1). Some point near Dan was evidently meant. E. E. N.

HAZAR-GADDAH, hē'zār-gad'a (חַזָּר גַּדָּה, hātsar gaddāh): A city in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 27). Site unknown.

HAZAR-HATTICON, hē'zār-hat'iken. See HAZER-HATTICON.

HAZARMAVETH, hē'zār-mē'veth (חַזָּר מַוֶּת, hātsarmāvēth): An Arabian clan, descended from Joktan (Gn 10 26; I Ch 1 20). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

HAZAR-SHUAL, hē'zār-shū'al (חַזָּר שׁוּאֵל, hātsar-shū'al): A town in the S. of Judah near Beersheba (Jos 15 28), assigned also to Simeon (Jos 19 3; I Ch 4 28). It was reoccupied in postexilic days (Neh 11 27). Not yet certainly identified.

HAZAR-SUSAH, HAZARSUSIM, hē'zār-sū'sā, -sū'sim (חַזָּר סוּסָה, hātsar sūsāh [or -īm]), 'village of horses': A town in SW. Judah occupied by Simeonites (Jos 19 5; I Ch 4 31), also called Sansannah (Jos 15 31). It may have had some connection with the commerce in horses carried on by Solomon (I K 10 28 f.). Site unknown. See also BETH-MARCABOTH. E. E. N.

HAZAZON - TAMAR, haz' a - zōn - tē' mār (חַזָּזוֹן תָּמָר, hātsāzōn tāmār, Hazezon-tamar AV), 'Hazezon of the palm': A place identified with En-gedi (q.v.) in II Ch 20 2. But this does not well suit the other notice in Gn 14 7, which seems to demand a location farther S. That En-gedi was famous for its palm-trees seems well attested (Jos Ant. IX, 1 2), and the notice in II Ch 20 2 is probably correct. But there may have been another town of the same name, possibly the Tamar in the S. of Judah (cf. Ezk 47 19), to which Gn 14 7 refers. See TAMAR. E. E. N.

HAZEL. See PALESTINE, § 21.

HAZELEPONI, haz' i - lel - pō' nai. See HAZELEPONI.

HAZER - HATTICON, hē'zēr-hat'i-ken (חַזָּר חַטִּיקוֹן, hātsēr hattīkhōn, Hazar-hatticon AV), 'the middle village': A place on the (ideal) N. border of the land of Israel (Ezk 47 16). It is probable that the original reading was Hazar-enon (q.v.).

HAZERIM, ha-zī'rim (חַזְרִים, hātsērīm), 'villages': This term, found in Dt 2 23 AV (cf. RV), refers to the original inhabitants of the coast region

W. of Judah, who were expelled from their rude villages by the Philistine invaders.

HAZEROTH, ha-zī'reth (חַזְרוֹת, hātsērōth): One of the encampments of the Israelites between Sinai and Kadesh. In the list of stations it is situated between Kibroth-hattaavah and Rithmah (Nu 33 17 f). It has been questionably identified with 'Ain el-Hadra, which lies 40 m. N.E. of Jebel Māsa, toward the head of the Gulf of 'Akabāh. J. A. K.

HAZEON - TAMAR, haz' i - zōn - tē' mār. See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

HAZIEL, hē'zi-el (חַזִּיֵּל, hāzī-ēl), 'God sees': A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 23 9).

HAZO, hē'zō (חַזוֹ, hāzō): An Aramean clan, counted among the descendants of Nahor (Gn 22 22). Perhaps the Hazū in N. Arabia of the Assyrian inscriptions.

HAZOR, hē'zōr (חַזוֹר, hātsōr, 'settlement'): 1. The capital of Jabin's kingdom (Jos 11 1), possibly at Jebel Hadīreh W. of the waters of Merom. Map IV, D 5. 2, 3. Two towns in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15 23, 25). The site of the first is unknown. The second is also called Kerioth-hezron (q.v.). 4. A Benjamite town (Neh 11 33), probably the ruin Hazzur, 4 m. NW. of Jerusalem. Map II, F 1. 5. An unknown locality mentioned in connection with Kedar (Jer 49 28 f.). L. G. L.—L. B. P.

HAZOR-HADATTAH, hē'zōr-ha-dat'a (חַזוֹר חֲדַתָּה, hātsōr hādhattāh, Hazor Hadattah AV), 'new Hazor': A place in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 25). Site unknown. The text here may contain an error.

HAZELEPONI, haz' i - lel - pō' nai (חַזְעֵלְפֹנִי, hātsēlēpōnī, Hazelelponi AV): The name of a female in the genealogy of Judah (I Ch 4 3).

C. S. T.

HEAD: While nearly all the instances in which the word 'head' occurs in the Bible are self-explanatory, a few specimens of idiomatic usage may be noted. (1) 'Heads' of 'fathers' houses,' or of the people or of tribes, etc., is a non-technical way of designating chieftains, princes, elders, etc. (2) To say that blood was 'upon the head' of any one was to charge him with responsibility for the death of some one (cf. Jos 2 19; II S 1 16). (3) To say that any one 'lifted up' his head meant that he asserted himself in pride or power etc. (cf. Jg 8 23; Ps 83 2, etc.) (4) To 'lift up' another's head was to exalt him to a station of power, etc. (cf. Gn 40 26; II K 25 27). E. E. N.

HEADBAND. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

HEADTIRE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

HEAL, HEALING. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3; and, in general, MIRACLES.

HEALING, GIFTS OF. See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 7.

HEALTH: This Eng. word once had a much broader meaning than it now has. In the O T we find it representing: (1) 'ārūkhāh (from 'ārakh, 'to be long'), primarily meaning the new flesh that gradually forms in the case of a wound, then healing, or health (Is 58 8; Jer 8 22, 30 17, 33 6). (2) marpē' and rīph'āth (both from rāphā', 'to heal'), 'healing.'

(Pr 4 22, 12 18, 13 17, 16 24; Jer 8 15, and Pr 3 8) (3) In Ps 42 11, 43 5, 67 2 the Heb. means 'salvation,' 'help,' or 'safety,' and is so rendered in RV. (4) In II S 20 9 the Heb. is shalôm, the ordinary salutation (lit. 'Is there peace?' or 'Is it well with you?' So RV). In Ac 27 34 cf. RV for the correct rendering.
E. E. N.

HEAP, HEAPS: (1) In Jg 15 16 the Heb. contains a play on words, the terms for 'ass,' 'heap,' 'to be red,' and the verb 'to heap up' all being quite alike in sound. The RV rendering of v. 16a is probably not quite correct. Moore would read, 'With the jaw-bone of an ass I have piled them in heaps. Burney conjectures 'with a red ass's jawbone I have reddened them right red.' (2) The Heb. ṭēl, 'mound' or hill on which a city was built (cf. Jos 11 13; Jer 31 21) is also rendered 'heap' where the reference is the ruins of a city (Dt 13 17; Jos 8 28; Jer 49 2) (3) The Heb. ʾā, 'ruin,' is also rendered 'heap' (pl. 'heaps') in Jer 26 18; Mi 1 6, 3 12; Ps 79 1; and probably also in Is 17, the original reading was ʾā (not ʾāp).

HEAR, HEARING. See PROPHECY, § 6.

HEART. See MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 8; and GOD, § 2.

HEART, DISEASES OF. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (2).

HEARTH: A word which occurs in the AV seven times; the RV retains 'hearth' in only one of these passages, Is 30 14, and uses it in three additional ones. Several Heb. words are thus translated. (1) ʾah (Jer 36 22 f.) is correctly translated in RV brazier, which was used to warm the winter-room. The modern brazier is made of burnt clay, and, filled with coals, is placed in a hollow in the center of the room. When the coals are burned out, a wooden frame is placed over the brazier and on this a rug, to keep in the warmth. (2) kiyyôr (Zec 12 6 RV), a pan of fire, for domestic use, perhaps similar to (1). (3) môgēdh (Ps 102 3 [4] RV), 'firebrand' (cf. Is 33 14, 'burnings'). (4) yāqūdh (Is 30 14), 'fire burning on the hearth.' (5) môg-dhāh (Lv 6 9 [2] RV), the hearth ('place of burning') on top of the altar, translated by some 'fire-wood.' (6) har'el = ʾār'el (Ezk 43 15 f. RV; cf. Is 29 1 f. RVmg.), 'altar hearth,' the upper portion of the altar on which the offerings were burned. See also ARIEL. Gn 18 6 is correctly translated (RV) 'make cakes,' omitting 'on the hearth.'
C. S. T.

HEAT OF THE DAY. See TIME, § 1.

HEATH: There is no heath in Palestine or in the deserts near by. The plant referred to in Jer 17 6, 48 6 is thought to be a variety of juniper, with small scale-like leaves close to the stem, and consequently called 'ar'ar ('naked').
E. E. N.

HEATHEN. See GENTILES.

HEAVE, HEAVE-OFFERING. The Heb. ʿrūmah (from rūm 'to be high') meaning 'something lifted' or 'separated' was applied first in a general way to contributions or offerings, as things 'set aside' to J', and later more specifically to the share set aside for the Priests or Levites out of the general offerings of the people (cf. Dt 12 6, 11; Ezk 45 6-16, 48 10-21; (here rendered oblation in EV); and esp. Ex 29 27 f. Lev 7 34, 10 14 f.; Nu 15 19 f. 18 8 f. etc.). See also SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 17.

E. E. N.

HEAVEN (in the O T generally expressed by shāmayim; in the N T by οὐρανός, pl. -ot): 1. Twofold Interest. The Biblical conception of heaven may be viewed either as a cosmological or as a religious one. These two, however, are closely inter-related. It is because the cosmological notion was what it was that the religious conception was an outgrowth from it.

2. Cosmological Conception. Cosmologically, heaven is either one of the two great divisions of the universe (Gn 1 1) or one of the three (heaven, earth, and the waters under the earth, Ex 20 4). The usage is not exact, and the twofold division of the universe, in the first case, as well as the threefold in the second, is made for the sake of presenting the idea of the universe exhaustively rather than for the sake of showing its parts analytically. A more fixed cosmological notion is given in the identification of heaven with the firmament, which was conceived in the form of an inverted bowl resting upon the earth and keeping the waters above separated from the waters under the earth. This dome was provided with windows (Windows of Heaven Gn 7 11, 8 2) through which the waters above fell in rains and floods. Besides this function, heaven, or the firmament, was viewed as the place in which the sun, the moon, and the stars were fixed (Ezk 32 7 f.; Gn 1 14 f.; Mt 24 29). In this sense heaven is the sky (Mt 16 2). Whether heaven was thought to be a simple vault with several divisions or stories is a disputed question. As a matter of fact, the conception is not the same through all the stages of Biblical cosmology. There is no clear trace of more than one heaven in the earlier Hebrew thought. By 'heaven of heavens' (Dt 10 14; I K 8 27; Ps 148 4) is meant probably 'the height of heaven.' The word shāmayim is itself a plural form. Yet, as both the Babylonian and Persian cosmologies recognize seven heavens, and as the apocalyptic literature unmistakably presents this conception (Slav. En.; Asc. Is., etc.), it is no longer doubted that later Biblical thought adopted this idea. Yet there is no evidence of a belief in more than three heavens (cf. Paul's reference to the 'third heaven,' II Co 12 2; also cf. 'all the heavens,' Eph 4 10).

3. Religious Conception. The religious conception of heaven is built altogether upon the fact that heaven is above. What is above is higher in dignity and worth than what is beneath. Hence heaven was viewed as the abode of God (I K 8 30). The prohibition of the making of images of God deepened and intensified this thought, and in the days of the restoration from the Exile the distinctive name of God became 'God of Heaven' (Ezr 1 2, 5 11; Neh 1 4, 5). Meanwhile the same feeling which led to the disuse of the proper name Jahweh and the substitution for it of 'ādhōnāy, 'Lord,' worked toward the exclusion of the word 'God' from the language of life and the substitution of 'heaven' for it, the LXX. furnishing the connecting-link in the transition. At the opening of the N T period 'Kingdom of God' and 'Kingdom of Heaven' were already synonymous and interchangeable (cf. KINGDOM OF GOD).

4. The Abode of God and other Beings. Besides the person of God, other superhuman beings, such as angels, are thought to dwell in heaven (Mk 12 25; Mt 18 10; Lk 2 13); also the Messiah and all preexistent beings, even the Torah and a prototype of the sanctuary are found there (He 9 23). Finally, the redeemed are to be gathered in heaven (II Co ch. 5; Jn 14 2 f.; cf. I Th 4 16 f.). It is there that Jesus has gone (I P 3 22), and it is thence that the Holy Spirit comes (I P 1 12). Heaven is, therefore, in general, the abode of the blest. But, at least in apocalyptic literature, suffering was not excluded from a certain portion of it. Slav. En. (7 2) represents the second heaven as the place where the fallen angels were held in prison in misery (cf. also Tests. of the Twelve Patr.), and the fifth heaven is inhabited by the Crigari, who are sad and silent on account of sympathy with their fallen brethren in the second heaven.

5. Spiritual Heaven. In the N T the idea of heaven is very much spiritualized. At times it appears indeed as nothing more than a symbol of the state of ideal perfection (Eph 1 3, 2 6). When it is called paradise, for instance (Lk 23 43), it is in order to present the innocence of the Garden of Eden as restored in the final sinless condition of true believers. Hence the many characterizations of the heavenly life as the reward of the believer (Mt 5 12; Col 1 5; I P 1 4). Heaven is also regarded as lasting forever (Ps 89 29; cf. also Jer 33 25 of the sun and stars as everlasting). But such representations express the thought of the relative permanency of the celestial as compared with the terrestrial.

6. Heaven in Eschatology. In all the eschatological representations the renovation of the whole creation includes also the passing away of the heavens as they exist and the creation of new heavens (II P 3 10, 13; Rev 21 1 ff.). As they now stand, they are blemished by the moral imperfection of man, and must give place to substitutes which are absolutely free from sin. All these representations of heaven are conventional and pertain to the form rather than to the essence of religious teaching. Hence the perplexities that sometimes appear in the effort to make a full and consistent picture to the mind of the realities of heaven, either in the cosmological or in the eschatological sphere, must be relegated to the region where the figure is transcended by the reality.

HEAVENS. See COSMOGONY, § 3.

HEBER, hī'bār (הֶבֶר, heber), 'associate': 1. A Kenite, the husband of Jael who slew Sisera (Jg 4 11 ff.). 2. An Asherite head of a family, the son of Beriah (Gn 46 17). 3. The father of Soco, and a son of Ezra (I Ch 4 18). 4. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (I Ch 8 17). See also EBER.

HEBREW, HEBREWS. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 9, and Eber in § 13.

HEBREW ARCHEOLOGY. See ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF.

HEBREW LANGUAGE: Hebrew is one of the most important members of the Semitic group, closely related both to the Arabic and to the Aramaic, and emerging upon the field of history long after the Babylonian.

1. Affinities. The name 'Hebrew' properly covers the dialects of the group of kindred peoples, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and Israel, as well as the Phœnicians. Hebrew was sometimes called the 'language of Canaan' (Is 19 18), which would suggest that it was spoken by the Canaanites, or Amorites, who were dispossessed by Israel.

2. Monuments. Very few inscriptions remain by which the primitive character of the language may be determined. The Siloam inscription (see JERUSALEM, § 34), dating perhaps from Hezekiah's reign (8th cent. B.C.), is the oldest on Palestinian soil. The Moabite Stone, written in a dialect almost identical with that of the O T, is about a century older. There are some forty seal stones containing little but Hebrew proper names, some pre-exilic. (See ALPHABET). A large number of inscriptions on fragments of jars were found at Samaria by the Harvard Expedition. Phœnician inscriptions of various dates are also found, and coins of the Maccabean period exist. The LXX. may be regarded as furnishing some data for the study of early Hebrew.

3. Linguistic Development and Change. The O T Hebrew has been so carefully worked over by the scribes that many of its irregularities have been obliterated. As originally spoken and written, it must have been more irregular than its present written form. It has been rhetorically developed, probably from an early period, as the result of its religious use. The LXX. is a witness to some pronunciations and spellings current about 250 B.C., which differ from the present Massoretic text. The Massoretes themselves worked with sedulous care upon the words and forms and have given to us a vocalization which represents the synagog method of reading. This uniformity makes it difficult to distinguish between the form of the language at different periods, but, speaking broadly, there are two main divisions: the golden age of Hebrew literature, which produced the historical books (excluding Ch, Ez, Neh, Est), most of the Prophets, and some of the poetical writings; and the postexilic, in which were written most of the books of the Hagiographa and the latest prophets. The differences in style, while not numerous, consist in a general lack of lucidity. In marked contrast to Chronicles, the Books of Kings are striking examples of simplicity, clearness, and brilliancy. Yet the general likeness is noteworthy in a language whose literary monuments cover 1,000 years.

4. Linguistic Structure. Hebrew has much in common with its kindred tongues: the triliterality of its roots, the structure of its verb system, its noun formation, its tendency to coordinate its sentences, together with a sparing use of particles, and the use of suffixed pronominal forms, where Aryan languages use separate pronouns. All these testify to a common origin and a close relationship to the primitive speech. Word-formation by prefixes, by prefixed

(ch 7) would have a natural explanation if the Epistle is addressed to such a group of readers. The elaborate use of the O T coupled with the earnestness of the author would also seem to be more naturally explained on this hypothesis. That we do not have direct evidence of such a liberal speculative Judaism which would prove attractive to Jewish Christians is not fatal to this suggestion in view of the fact that the Epistle was probably sent to a small group who may well have been rather sophisticated. Hebrews gained and deserved wider currency however because of its powerful argument for the finality of Christianity, which argument would have weight whatever the racial background of the readers.

It is now generally admitted that the Epistle is written to a definite group of Christians (cf. 5 11 f., 10 32-34, 12 1-5) but the circumstances of the readers are not concretely enough referred to for any betrayal of their local surroundings. Jerusalem, Rome, Alexandria and parts of Asia Minor have been urged. There are strong arguments against both Jerusalem and Alexandria (see Ayles, Destination, Date and Authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1899). Zahn's suggestion that the readers were 'part of the whole church of a large city, . . . a congregation attached to some household,' meets many of the conditions which the Epistle reveals. On the whole Rome seems the most probable destination.

5. Place and Time. The phrase 'they of Italy' 13 24 is used more naturally of Italians outside Italy who send greetings to those in the homeland altho grammatically it may be taken the other way. We have nothing more definite as to the place of composition. The Epistle was used by Clement of Rome (96 A.D.). It is not possible to identify the persecutions referred to. Hebrews does not reflect, however, the Jewish-Gentile controversy of the Pauline literature and should accordingly be placed after the Neronian persecution of 64 A.D. The references to ritual are to the tabernacle and not to the Temple hence it is not required that the date be before 70 A.D. On the other hand, the position that Hebrews was written to those so familiar with the LXX. as to make detailed argument from it effective, irrespective of their race, and the suggestion that the readers are tempted by a liberal Judaism, both call for a relatively late date. Perhaps the years 81 to 85 A.D., when persecution arose under Domitian, best meet all requirements.

6. Author. Paul, Barnabas, Apollos, Silas, Peter, Luke, Clement, Aristion, Philip the Deacon, Priscilla and Aquila: This is a partial list of those whose claims to the authorship of the Epistle have been preferred by ancient or modern students. Altho attention is more profitably centered upon a re-examination of the purpose of the Epistle and its relation to N T thought, the problem of the identity of the author remains of perennial interest. Protestant scholarship is practically unanimous in the negative opinion that Paul can not be thought of as its author. Tradition is not very favorable to him. The earliest use of Hebrews gives no name and for centuries the west did not know it as his. In Alexandria it was accounted as Paul's but Clement and Origen felt the difficulties. The internal evidence is even more decisive against the Pauline authorship: (1) Paul was accustomed to authenticate his epistles. (2) The style of the Epistle is in contrast to Paul's letters, being slow, massive, studied as against Paul's rapid brilliant dialectic. Vocabulary and Greek style are also in contrast to Pauline usage. (3) The structure of the Epistle, with each argument issuing immediately in a practical exhortation, differs from Paul's characteristic division of his letters into two sections, a doctrinal and a practical. (4) The theology of the Epistle is not Pauline (see below, § 7). (5) Such a verse as 2 3 (cf. Gal. 1 11) is almost of itself decisive against the Pauline authorship. (6) The Alexandrian cast of thought, including both formal and material analogies to Philo, sets this Epistle over against Paul. No marked progress has been made, perhaps ever can be made, in positively identifying the author. It is clear that he was a Jewish Christian of decided culture, and one whose culture was of that peculiar character which belonged to Alexandrianism. He differs fundamentally from Philo in his main position, for the fact of the earthly life of Jesus i.e. a set of historical facts (note his frequent use of the simple name Jesus 2 6, 3 1, 6 20, 7 22, 10 19, 12 2, 24, 13 12) is determinative for his thought. But he was evidently acquainted with the philosophy of that writer, whose allegorical method of interpretation he does not hesitate to use (ch 7), with whose peculiar conception of the typological relation between the visible and the invisible world he is in large agreement (cf. 6 5, 8 2, 9 23, 11 10, 16, 12 22-23, 13 14) and to whose phraseology he exhibits often striking similarities (cf. 11 10, 13 14 with passages from Philo cited in Drummond, II, 53; 10 27, 12 20 with II, 17; 8 5, 9 23 with I, 289; 1 7, 14 with I, 289; 6 20, 7 25 with II, 193, 235). Either Apollos (whose name was first given currency by Luther) or Barnabas (whose name was cited by Tertullian as the author of the Epistle and first revived by Cameron, a Scotch critic of the 17th cent.) might satisfy this requirement. Apollos was an Alexandrian Jew, a man of culture, learned in the scriptures (Ac 18 24; cf. I Co passim) and of special power in reasoning with the Jews (Ac 18 25 f.). At the same time, as far as we know, he was not specifically a disciple of the original Apostles; so that, if 2 3 be taken literally, it militates against his authorship. Barnabas was a Levite of the island of Cyprus (Ac 4 36), which would bring him easily within the influence of Alexandrianism, altho we have no positive evidence as in the case of Apollos, that such was the type of his thought. His close connection with the original disciples (Ac 4 36, 9 26 f., 11 22 f.) together with his association with Paul (Ac 11 26, 15 35) might account for the fact that the Epistle deals with some of Paul's great themes yet not in Paul's manner (see § 7). His Levitical background fits very well with the theme of the Epistle and its treatment. But our knowledge of both Barnabas and Apollos is meager—only in the case of Barnabas is there any supporting tradition—so that their names can only be suggested as of the type required. Even less can be said for the other names listed.

7. Relation of Epistle to N T Thought. The abiding value of this Epistle is twofold: a profound argument for the finality of Christianity which altho stated in very technical form as over against Judaism is yet an attempt to show how it meets religious needs; a witness to another way of interpreting Christianity than the Pauline. Both contributions can best be seen by comparing the thought of the Epistle with Paul's theology. The author deals with Pauline themes: Christianity as superseding Judaism, the death of Christ and its significance, and faith. Yet each of these themes is treated from his own view-point. The Law is for him not a system of commands and prohibitions with the purpose of producing righteousness, but a system of ritual with the purpose of securing access to the Divine presence. Access to God through the veil (6 19, 20), fellowship with Him, satisfying worship—this is the dominant religious need (cf. ch. 4 esp. ver. 16 and 10 19 ff.). This need Judaism imperfectly satisfies (chs. 8, 9, 10) yet foreshadows 'good things to come' 10 1. (Judaism is a stage in an evolutionary process, while for Paul the process is revolutionary involving a return to a condition before the Law cf. Gal 3 6). Perhaps the readers feel that Christianity does not satisfy this need at all. To them the author offers elaborate proof by analogy. Christianity carries to finality that which Judaism initiates in that Christ is superior to angels (ch 1), to Moses (ch 3), to the Levitical priesthood (chs 7-10) in His relation to the Covenant upon which Judaism rests; in that He is fitted to administer the Covenant as a priest (7 11-28) who can alone satisfactorily offer sacrifice (10 1-18); and in that He inaugurates the better Covenant (7 22, 8 6-13) and its ordinances (9 ff.) which supersedes the imperfect earthly institutions of the old Covenant—the tabernacle (8 2, 5, 9 1-11, 23 f.), the sacrifices (9 12-14, 25 f.), the ceremonies (9 18-22), the whole cultus (10 1; cf. 12 18-27). In effect he is saying, Think of Christ as priest and you will find that He qualifies and brings men to God once and for all. The death of Christ, while central for this Epistle as for Paul, is also differently viewed, not under the categories of law i.e., ransom from the curse of the Law, condemnation of sin in the flesh, reconciliation to God through the death of His Son, but analogous to the ritual of the Day of Atonement as the inaugural sacrifice of the New Covenant (chs. 9, 10). The author does not explain how the death of Christ brings men to God. He argues by analogy that if the old ceremonial ensuring right of access into the Divine presence—an access symbolized by the entrance of the high priest with the blood of the sacrifice into the Holy of Holies—was partly satisfying, then Christ, who is the Divine Son, superior to angels, Moses, and the priests yet brought into closest sympathy with human needs (2 10, 18, 4 15, 5 7 f. 12 2 f.), and who has entered the heavenly sanctuary once for all, has offered a sacrifice which completely satisfies. Accordingly those whose hearts have been cleansed from an evil conscience (10 22) through His sacrifice may draw near to God with courage and confidence.

Faith also is central both for Paul and this Epistle, but Paul's profound conception of faith as inner union with Christ is lacking here. The author of Hebrews views faith rather as confidence in the reality of the heavenly world, assurance of the heritage which God has promised—in a word, loyalty to the Christian position. This is the Epistle to the non-mystic. Paul's words, 'it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me' . . . (Gal 2 20) would be out of place here. The language of Hebrews is rather, ' . . . run . . . the race . . . looking unto Jesus . . . who hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God,' (12 1-2). But it is not necessarily a lower conception of union with Christ to which the author summons his readers. It is a different approach set forth in terms which his readers will understand and which describe his own attainment of fellowship with Christ. A following of Jesus with true loyalty of purpose in afflictions and reproaches such as were His lot will bring union with Him. It is noteworthy that this Epistle, the most ritualistic and sacramental in its phraseology of the N T writings, is almost totally silent concerning Baptism and the Eucharist. Of three possible references to Baptism, the first (6 2) if it includes Christian Baptism is incidental and does not assign great significance to the rite, the second (9 10) is clearly to O T usages and the third (10 22) if it refers to Christian Baptism does not give it large significance. All possible references to the Eucharist (9 20, 6 4, 13 10) are extremely doubtful. This does not mean that these sacraments were not practised in a section of the early Church to which Hebrews is a witness. That would be an unwarranted use of the argument from silence. It rather means that to readers attracted by 'meats' and 'divers and strange teachings' (13 9) to whom, conceivably, the Christian sacraments seemed not very imposing, the author presents the Christian revelation, especially the life of Jesus, as in its entirety a magnificent sacrament.

LITERATURE: For Introductions, that of Jülicher (Eng. transl., 1904) gives an admirable discussion of the Epistle's thought, as well as of its critical questions; that of Zahn (Eng. transl., 1908) is exhaustive on the newer critical problems. For Commentaries, Rendall (1888); Westcott (1892); Davidson (in Handbooks for Bible Classes); Edwards (in Expositor's Bible, 1888); Peake in The New Century Bible; Rignebach in *Zahn's Kommentar z. HEBRON, hī'brən (הֶבְרֹן, hebrōn), 'association': I. A city, probably the oldest in Palestine (so Jos. BJ, IV, 9 7), said by J to have been built seven years before Zoan (Tanis) in Egypt (Nu 13 22). Its early name, Kiriath-arba (q.v.), was apparently revived after the Exile (Gn 23 2; Jos 14 15; Neh 11 25). The crusaders called it 'The Castle of St. Abraham.' It is now known as el-Khalil, 'The Friend,' i.e., Abraham (cf. Is 41 8, Ja 2 23). One cycle of the stories of the patriarchs centers about this ancient city (Gn 13 18, 35 27, 37 14). According to the early J document, H. was conquered by the tribe of Judah singly, under the leadership of Caleb (Jg 1 10-15, Jos 15 14). According to the later Deuteronomic editor, it was captured by all Israel, under the leadership of Joshua (Jos 10 36 f., 11 21). According to P, H. was made a city of refuge (Jos 20 7) and consigned to the Kohathite Levites (Jos 21 11). David was twice anointed king in H. (II S 2 4, 5 3), and reigned here as king of Judah alone for seven and a half years (II S 2 11). Here six sons were born to him (II S 3 2-5), one of whom, Absalom, later chose his birthplace as headquarters for his rebellion (II S 15 7, 10).

After the time of David, H. is seldom mentioned in Scripture (only II Ch 11 10; Neh 11 25). In post-exilic times it came into the possession of the Edomites, from whom it was recovered by Judas Maccabaeus (I Mac 5 65; Jos Ant. XII, 8 6). It was seized without bloodshed by the rebel Simon bar-Gioras, but was soon recaptured and burned by the Romans (Jos. BJ, IV, 9 7, 9). From the 7th to the 11th cent. A.D., H. was under Moslem rule. It was then taken by the crusaders and, in 1100, was bestowed as a fief upon Gerhard of Avennes. In 1167 it became the seat of a Latin bishopric; but in 1187 it fell into the hands of Saladin, and has ever since remained in the possession of the Moslems, who reverence it as one of the four sacred cities of the world.<sup>1</sup>

H. is 19 m. SW. of Jerusalem, with which it is now connected by a good automobile road. The un-walled city lies about 3,000 ft. above sea-level, and stretches from NW. to SE. along a fertile valley<sup>2</sup> (cf. 'the vale of Hebron,' Gn 37 14), which is noted for its vineyards. Map II, E 2. An ancient reservoir in the lower part of the valley may be the 'pool' by which the murderers of Ish-baal (Ish-bosheth) were hanged (II S 4 12). The population numbers about 18,000, of whom 1,500 are Jews, the remainder being Moslems of a fanatical type. The manufacture of glass and of water-skins are important industries. The most conspicuous object in H. is the structure enclosing the traditional cave of Machpelah (q.v.).

II. 1. A son of Kohath, the son of Levi, according to P (Ex 6 18), whose family, the Hebronites (Nu 3 27), or 'sons of Hebron' (I Ch 15 9), are frequently mentioned by the Chronicler in enumerations of Levites. In the time of David, according to the Chronicler, the clan was large and powerful (I Ch 26 30-32); but this reflects conditions in the time of the author. 2. In I Ch 2 42 f. H. is probably not the name of a person, but of the Calebite town (cf. I, above). 3. A town of Asher (Jos 19 28 AV); see EBROH.

HELED, hi'led. See HELDAI, 1.

HELEK, hi'lek (הֶלֶק, hēleg), 'portion': The ancestral head of a Manassite clan in Gilead, the Helekites (Nu 26 30; Jos 17 2).

HELEM, hi'lem (הֶלֶם, hēlem): 1. The ancestral head of an Asherite clan (I Ch 7 35), apparently the same as Hotham (ver. 32). 2. (helem) See HELDAI, 2.

HELEPH, hi'lef (הֶלֶף, hēleph): A town on the border of Naphtali (Jos 19 23). Site unknown.

HELEZ, hi'lez (הֶלֶז, hēlets): 1. One of David's heroes and an officer in his army, called a 'Paltite' in II S 23 26, i.e., an inhabitant of Beth-pelet in S. Judah, but a 'Pelonite' (I Ch 11 27) and a man of Ephraim in I Ch 27 10. 2. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 2 39).

HELI, hi'lai (הֵלִי): The father of Joseph, husband of Mary (Lk 3 23).

HELKAI, hel'kai-ai or hel'kē (הֶלְקַי, helqay): The head of a priestly family (Neh 12 15).

HELKATH, hel'kath (הֶלְקָת, helqath), 'portion': A town assigned to the Levites on the border of Asher (Jos 19 25, 21 31; Hukok in I Ch 6 75). See Map IV, C 6, but the identification is uncertain.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM, hel'kath-haz'ziu-rim (הֶלְקָת הַצֻּרִים, helqath hatszūrīm), 'the field of the sword-edges': The name given to the place of the conflict mentioned in II S 216. Some would emend to read 'field of the sides' (cf. Driver HTS).

HEM. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 3.

HEMAM, hī'mām (חֶמָם, hēmām): The ancestral head of a Seirite family (Gn 36 22; Homam in I Ch 1 39).

HEMAN, hī'mān (חֶמָן, hēmān), 1. A son of Ezrah (Zerah), one of the three wisest men with whom Solomon was compared (I K 4 31). 2. A Kohathite Levite (I Ch 6 33, 15 17) and head of a division of the musicians (I Ch 25 1, etc.).

HEMATH, hī'māth. See HAMATH.

HEMDAN, hem'dān (חֶמְדָּן, hemdān): The eldest son of a Horite family (Gn 36 28; Hamran [Amran AV] in I Ch 1 41).

HEMLOCK: The rendering of the Heb. rō'sh in Hos 10 4. The same Heb. word is elsewhere rendered 'gall' or 'poison' (Dt 29 17 [cf. RVmg.]; Ps 69 21; La 3 5; Jer 9 14, etc.). In Hos 10 4 it is evident that some troublesome, quick-growing, and probably noxious weed is meant, a fit symbol of the corruption of justice then prevalent in Israel. Its frequent collocation with wormwood (Am 6 12, etc.) shows that it was bitter, and other references indicate that it was considered poisonous. See GALL. In Am 6 12 AV, 'hemlock' is the rendering of la'ānāh, 'wormwood' (q.v.). See also PALESTINE, §22.

E. E. N.

HEN (חֵן, hēn), 'grace': This word (in Zec 6 14) may not be a proper noun (cf. RVmg.), or it may be a mistake for 'Josiah'; cf. ver. 10.

HEN. See PALESTINE, § 25.

HENA, hē'nā (חֵנָא, hēnā): A city named with Sepharvaim and others as conquered by the Assyrians (II K 18 34, 19 13; Is 37 13). Site unknown.

HENADAD, hen'ā-dad (חֵנְאֲדָד, hēnādhād): The ancestral head of a sub-division of the Levites (Ezr 3 9; Neh 3 18, 24, 10 9).

HENNA. See PALESTINE, § 21.

HENOCH. See ENOCH; and HANOCH.

HEPHER, hī'fār (חֶפֶר, hēpher): I. 1. The ancestral head of a Manassite clan of Gilead, the Hephherites (Nu 26 32, 27 1; Jos 17 2 f.). 2. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 36). II. 1. A district of Judah in the neighborhood of Socoh, i.e., in S. Judah (I K 4 10). It is this district, probably, that is called in I Ch 4 6 a 'son' of Ashhur. 2. A Canaanite city (Jos 12 17). Site unknown.

HEPHZI-BAH, hef'zi-ba (חֶפְצִיבָּה, hephzi-bāh), 'my delight is in her': 1. The wife of Hezekiah and mother of Manasseh (II K 21 1). 2. An ideal name for the New Jerusalem of prophecy (Is 62 4).

HERALD: Found only once in the Bible (Dn 3 4). The Aramaic original, kārōz, was probably derived from the Gr. κήρυξ (from κηρύσσειν, 'to proclaim'), 'crier' or 'proclaimer.'

E. E. N.

HERB: This word renders several Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) The most common is 'ēsebh, which includes both grains and grasses (e.g., Gn 1 11; Ps 106 20), and is often rendered 'grass.' (2) deshe, the 'fresh,' 'young grass' (II K 19 20, etc.). (3) yārāq, 'green plants,' including vegetables (Dt 11 10; I K 21 2; Pr 15 17). (4) 'ōr, 'ōrāh, apparently, the 'bright,' 'shining grass,' tho used in a broader sense (II K 4 39; Is 26 19). (5) In Job 8 12 hātsir evidently refers to tall grass. (6) The two N T terms, βοτάνη (only Heb 67) and λάχανον, are both of general significance, the former indicating a plant fit for food, the latter a cultivated (vs. a wild) herb or garden vegetable.

HERD. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE.

HERES, hī'rīz (חֶרֶץ, heres), 'sun': 1. Mt. Heres (Jg 1 35), a locality in the territory of Dan, probably the same as Ir Shemesh (q.v.), or Beth Shemesh (q.v.); cf. Jos 19 41; I K 4 9; II Ch 28 18 (so Moore, on Judges in ICC). Map II, D 1. 2. The Ascent of Heres (Jg 8 13, 'when the sun was up' AV) was if the Heb. text is correct a pass near Succoth, E. of the Jordan, but the text is suspicious. See also (on No. 1.) CITY OF DESTRUCTION; and TIMNATH-SERAH.

HERESH, hī'resh (חֶרֶשׁ, heresh): A Levite (I Ch 9 15).

HERESY, 'division,' 'sect': The Gr. αἵρεσις is applied to parties or types of religious thought in N T times. Both the Sadducees and the Pharisees were called 'heresies' (EV 'sect,' Ac 5 17, 15 5, 26 5; cf. also Jos. Ant. XIII, 5 9). The term was early used in designating the Christians ('the sect' [Gr. 'heresy'] of the Nazarenes, EVV 'sect,' Ac 24 5, 14, 28 22). In these cases it is the approximate equivalent of the modern 'denomination.' It is used, however, in the Epistles also of pernicious (but not necessarily doctrinal) divisions or strifes ('factions' (I Co 11 19; Gal 5 20; cf. Tit 3 10; II P 2 1). The use of the term 'heresy' for a departure from a doctrinal standard of orthodoxy is not found in the Bible.

A. C. Z.

HERETH, hī'reth (חֶרֶת, hereth, Hareth AV): A forest in Judah which was one of the hiding-places of David (I S 22 5). The proposed identification, Map II, E 2, is unsatisfactory phonetically (so Driver *HTS*²).

HERITAGE. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8.

HERMAS, hōr'məs ('Ερμάς): One of those saluted in Ro 16 14. From the last clause of the verse, 'the brethren that are with them,' we infer that his house was used as a meeting-place for the Christians (cf. Ro 16 4, 15). By Origen (Com. ad Rom., in loc.) H. is identified with the author of 'The Shepherd,' but as this is a work of the 2d cent., and since Ro ch. 16 was apparently contained in very early Mss. of the Ep. to the Romans, the identification is impossible. J. M. T.

HERMES, hōr'mīz ('Ερμής): Saluted by Paul in Ro 16 14. Confusion between this name and that of Hermas, mentioned in the same verse, appears in some MSS. J. M. T.

HERMOGENES, hēr-moj'i-nīz ('Ερμογένης ['E-, WH]): Mentioned only in II Ti 1 15, where he is said by Paul to have been among those ('all') in Asia who 'turned away from me.' The special mention of H. and Phygelus would seem to indicate that they were leaders in the movement. Later apocryphal stories concerning H. are found in the Acts of Paul and Thecla, 1 and 4, 11-14. J. M. T.

HERMON, hōr'mən (הר מן, hermōn), 'sacred [mountain]': The large mountain that forms the S. portion of the Antilebanon range. As its name indicates, it was probably from ancient times viewed as a sacred locality and, in fact, numerous shrines existed on its slopes, and one even on its summit. In Dt 3 9 we learn that the Phenicians called H. Sirion (cf. also Ps 29 6), while the Amorites called it Senir, which, however, designated probably some adjacent part of the same range (cf. also I Ch 5 23; Song 4 8; Ezk 27 5). This same name (as Sanīru) is given to the mountain in the Assyr. inscriptions, and (as Sanīr) to the portion of the range N. of Damascus by the Arabs. A fourth name, Sion, is found in Dt 4 48. H. is a lofty mountain (9,363 ft. high), whose summit, consisting of three peaks ('the Hermons,' Ps 42 6, Hermonites AV), is rarely free from snow. The cool heights of H. condense the moisture of the atmosphere so rapidly that mists frequently obstruct the view from its summit, and at night the dew is so heavy as to be almost equal to rain (cf. Ps 42 6, 7, 133 3). The upper part of the mountain is bare, but the slopes are well covered with vegetation. In ancient times it furnished cypress, or fir, for the boat-builders of Phenicia (Ezk 27 5). It was the haunt of wild beasts (Song 4 8), and to-day is the only haunt of the Syrian bear. At present it is the home of the Druses, who have extensive orchards and vineyards on its N. and W. slopes. Its modern name, Jebel esh-Sheikh, 'mount of the chief,' is due to the fact that the founder of the sect made his headquarters here (10th cent. A.D.). E. E. N.

HEROD, her'əd: Herod ('Ηρώδης) is the name of the founder of an Idumæan family which furnished a number of kings and other rulers for Palestine and the adjacent countries during the latter half of the century before Christ and throughout the first century of the Christian era. The father of Herod was Antipater, a man of remarkable ability, whose father was governor of Idumæa under Alexander Jannæus and Queen Alexandra. The origin of the family is not known. Possibly it came from Ascalon. Antipater had probably succeeded his father when the civil war broke out between Hyrcanus II and his brother Aristobulus (69 B.C.), and the opportunity was given for him to employ his abilities as the former's champion and master.

I. HEROD I (THE GREAT), 37-4 B.C. 1. Herod as Governor of Galilee. Herod, the son of Antipater, was early given office by his father, who had been made procurator of Judea by Cæsar, Hyrcanus II, the high priest and ethnarch, being little more than a puppet in the hands of the energetic Idumæan. The first office which Herod held was that of governor of Galilee. He was then a young man of about twenty-five, energetic and athletic. Immediately he set about the eradication of the robber bands that infested his district, and soon was able to execute the robber chief Hezekiah and several of his followers. For this he was summoned to Jerusalem by the Sanhedrin, tried and condemned, but with the connivance of Hyrcanus II he escaped by night.

During the disorders following the assassination of Cæsar, Herod and Antipater were loyal to Cassius, and assisted him in raising money from the towns of Palestine. In 42 B.C. Antipater was assassinated by one Malchus, who in turn was killed by assassins sent by Herod. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi, Herod and his brother Phasael were accused by the Jewish aristocracy at least twice before Antony; but in each case Antony showed favor to the brothers and finally appointed them tetrarchs. In 40 B.C. Antigonius, the son of Aristobulus II, attempted to recover the throne by using the Parthians as allies. He succeeded in getting hold of Phasael, who committed suicide in prison, but Herod escaped to the fortress of Massada, whence he was forced to flee with his entire family to Petra. Being refused refuge there, he went to Alexandria and thence to Rome, via Rhodes.

2. As King of Judea. Herod's purpose in going to Rome seems to have been to obtain the kingship for Aristobulus, the grandson of Hyrcanus II, whose sister Mariamne he was to marry. But on his arrival at Rome, Antony and Octavius appointed him rather than Aristobulus king, and within a few days after his arrival at the capital he returned to Palestine to get possession of his kingdom (39 B.C.). For the next two years he was engaged in fighting the forces of Antigonius, whom he finally defeated, and in 37 B.C. gained possession of Jerusalem. Antigonius was beheaded by Antony at the request of Herod.

2a. Problems of His Reign. As king, Herod confronted serious difficulties. The Jews objected to him because of his birth and reputation. The Hasmonean family regarded him as a usurper, notwithstanding the fact that he had married Mariamne. The Pharisees were shocked at his Hellenistic sympathies, as well as at his severe methods of government. On the other hand, the Romans held him responsible for maintaining order in his kingdom, and for the protection of the eastern frontier of the Republic. Herod met these various difficulties with characteristic energy and even cruelty, but generally with cold sagacity.

Altho he taxed the people severely, in times of famine he remitted their dues, and even sold his plate to get means to buy them food. While he never became actually friendly with the Pharisees, they profited by his hostility to the party of the Hasmonians, which at the beginning of his reign led to the execution of a number of Sadducees who were members of the Sanhedrin.

2b. Building Activity. The fact that Herod's kingdom included many Greeks as well as Jews led him to adopt a self-contradictory policy. He favored both parties of his subjects. For the Greeks he built temples in the cities where they lived, as well as in towns outside of his own kingdom. It was this general policy, as well as the example of Augustus, that led Herod to rebuild a number of cities. The most important work of this sort was the refounding of the city of Strato's Tower, which he named Caesarea (q.v.), and beautified with a temple to Augustus, colonnades, a mole, and many public buildings, making it the chief city of his kingdom. Throughout the Roman period it remained the seat of the Roman governor of Judaea. He also rebuilt the city of Samaria (q.v.), renaming it Sebaste in honor of the wife of Augustus. Here also he erected a great pagan temple and other public buildings, the ruins of some of which remain to-day. He built many amphitheaters and theaters at Jerusalem and in other cities, and established games at Caesarea and at Jerusalem. He surrounded himself with Greek scholars, the most prominent among whom was Nicolas of Damascus. For the Jews he rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem in great magnificence, making it, with its courts and colonnades, one of the noblest buildings of antiquity. This rebuilding apparently began about 20 B.C., and was not finally completed until in the time of the procurator Albinus, 62-64 A.D. (cf. Jn 2 20, and see TEMPLE). Altho he removed the high priests at will, Herod was careful to respect the prejudices of the Jews, and did not attempt to introduce statues into the public buildings of Jerusalem, and even omitted images on his coins.

2c. Maintenance of Order. By way of maintaining order, he established citadels throughout the territory, and maintained a strong band of mercenaries. In addition, he established strict police regulations, and maintained a system of spies. Notwithstanding the fact that there were popular disturbances—doubtless to some extent associated with the Messianic movement—Judaea was at peace throughout his reign. During his last years, it is true, the people became increasingly uneasy, and there was a threatened revolt under Pharisaic leadership; but the old king crushed this with characteristic severity.

2d. Relations to Rome. As an allied king with Rome, Herod was expected to maintain order on the frontier (see above, 2a). In pursuit of this policy he fought, and was given suzerainty over the Arabians. He annexed and colonized Trachonitis, which had been held by a body of robbers; and he seems to have been able to keep back the wandering tribes of the desert. In fact, it was because of this energetic policing of the frontier, as well as maintenance of peace within his own dominion, that he kept the friendship of Augustus. At least twice during his reign this friendship was threatened, but he was able to adjust matters. The conjecture (Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? [1898]) that during the latter half of his reign Judaea was more completely under the control of the empire, even to the point of being subject to the census, can hardly be said to be as yet thoroughly established. Throughout his reign, however, he was never given complete independence, but was subject to the general limitations set allied kings, among them being the restriction of the coinage to copper coins, liability to a certain degree of control from the nearest propretor—in Herod's case that of Syria—inability to carry on war, except with the consent of the emperor, or to appoint his own successor, except with the imperial approval.

2e. Intrigues of His Reign. It is probably because of the animus of Josephus, as well as the perspective of his narrative, that Herod's success as an administrator has been considerably obscured by the tragedies within his own family circle. In estimating the prejudice which led to the successive execution of the surviving members of the Hasmonian house, including his wife Mariamne and their two sons Alexander and Aristobulus, it is to be borne in mind that, like all Oriental kings, Herod was subject to constant plots on the part of his family and the sympathizers with the Hasmonian house. A study of his reign will show that his executions were the outcome of the efforts of his rivals to displace him. The only exception to this was his execution of his wife Mariamne, because of jealousy born of intrigues instigated to a large extent by his sister, who was jealous of the influence of Mariamne and her mother. The execution of his two sons (by Mariamne) was due to a series of plots on their part, and an antiplot on the part of his eldest son, Antipater, to secure the succession. It can hardly be doubted, further, that during the later years of the old king's life he was suffering from a disease which made him easily susceptible to suspicion (cf. Mt 2 3-12, 16-19).

2f. Disposition of His Kingdom. At his death (4 B.C.) Herod left a will, according to which his kingdom was to be divided among his three sons. Archelaus was to have Judea, Idumaea, and Samaria, with the title of king (Mt 2 22); Herod Antipas was to receive Galilee and Perca, with the title of tetrarch; Philip was to come into possession of the trans-Jordan territory, with the title of tetrach (Lk 3 1). This will was ratified by Augustus, with the exception of the title given Archelaus.

II. SONS AND DESCENDANTS OF HEROD THE GREAT. 3. Archelaus. Archelaus (4 B.C.-6 A.D.), after the ratification of Herod's will by Augustus, succeeded to the rule of Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea, having the title of ethnarch, with the understanding that, if he ruled well, he was to become king. He was, however, highly unpopular with his people, and his reign was marked by disturbances and acts of oppression. The situation finally became so intolerable that the Jews appealed to Augustus, and Archelaus was removed and sent into exile. This accounts for the statement in Mt 2 22, and possibly also suggested the point of the parable in Lk 19 12 ff. His territory became a procuratorial province subject to the census. Archelaus, like all his family, was a builder, among his public works being the establishment of the city Archelais.

4. Herod Antipas. Herod Antipas (4 B.C.-37 A.D.) was the son of Herod I and Malthace, and was a full brother of Archelaus. By the will of his father he was appointed tetrarch of Galilee and Perea in 4 B.C. His long reign was marked by no serious outbreak or disturbance, and Galilee seems to have become exceedingly prosperous. Perea also enjoyed prosperity, altho this must have been due in considerable measure to the development of the Greek cities within Perea territory belonging to the Decapolis. Herod Antipas was a builder of cities, his most important undertaking being the erection of Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee (q.v.). The city was built and organized in the Greek style, and was controlled by a castle rising above it. It was built in part over a graveyard, and for some time was regarded as unclean by the Jews. Antipas also rebuilt Sepphoris, and walled the city of Betharampha, naming it Livias (or Julias). He also helped the Greek islands, as tablets found in Cos and Delos indicate. His general policy was that of friendship with the Romans, but he was also careful to attend feasts at Jerusalem, and to stamp no image on his coins. He joined in a protest against Pilate for having set up a votive shield in the Temple. He married his niece Herodias (Mk 6 17; Mt 14 3), the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip (not the tetrarch Philip), of Rome. This necessitated the divorcing of his wife, who was the daughter of Aretas, King of Arabia, and involved him in war with that monarch, in which he was defeated. At the time of the Gospel history, however, Galilee was at peace.

In 37 A.D. Agrippa, the brother of Herodias, was made king of the former tetrarch of Philip, and Herod was induced by his wife to seek royal honors for himself. Agrippa, however, who had quarreled with his brother-in-law while superintendent of the markets in Tiberias, poisoned the mind of Caligula by charging that Antipas was gathering an army preparatory to revolt. Antipas was in consequence executed (39 A.D.) by Tigellius, while Agrippa accompanied him, and where probably he died. This is the 'Herod' most frequently mentioned in the N T (Mt 6 17 ff., 8 15; Lk 3 1, 9 7, 13 31 f.; Ac 4 27, 13 1, etc.). He was the one who imprisoned the Baptist (Mk 6 14-29, and ||s) and the one to whom Pilate sent Jesus (Lk 23 7-15).

5. Herod Philip. Herod Philip, son of Herod I and Cleopatra of Jerusalem (4 B.C.-34 A.D.). By the will of his father he was made tetrarch of that section of the Herodian kingdom lying E. and N. of the Sea of Galilee. The region was not strictly Jewish, and was composed of a number of small districts which had been conquered by, or given to, Herod I—Batanaea, Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, Iturea, and Auranitis. He was, on the whole, the most respectable of Herod's sons. He was fond of building. Baniyas he rebuilt as a Greek city, with the right of asylum, and named it Cæsarea. In order to distinguish it from various other towns of the same name, it was known as Cæsarea Philippi (q.v.). He also rebuilt Bethsaida (q.v.), a town a few miles from the entrance of the Jordan into the Sea of Galilee, and named it Julias, in honor of the daughter of Augustus. Furthermore, he built various temples to the heathen gods, and stamped an image on his coins. In general, he seems to have been a good ruler, traveling over his territories, rendering justice to his subjects. He was married to Salome, the daughter of Herodias, and died in 34 A.D. without issue.

6. Herod Agrippa I. Herod Agrippa I, son of Aristobulus, the son of Herod I and Mariamne (37-44 A.D.). He was one of the most interesting characters of the period. After the execution of his father he seems to have gone to Rome and to have acquired the habits of the wealthy young men of the early empire. At forty he found himself bankrupt, in disfavor with Tiberius, and compelled to leave Rome to escape his creditors. He went to Palestine, and was about to commit suicide when his wife Cypros induced his sister Herodias, at that time the wife of Herod Antipas, to obtain for him the position of superintendent of markets in Tiberias. In a short time he quarreled with Herod Antipas, and became a friend of Flaccus, propretor of Syria. He lost favor with that official by taking bribes from the citizens of Damascus. Reduced to extremities, he went to Italy, where he was imprisoned by Tiberius, because he had been overheard to tell Caius that he desired the death of the emperor. Upon the death of Tiberius he was released from prison by his friend Caius, and made king over the territory which had belonged to his uncle Philip (37 A.D.). He does not seem to have lived much in his kingdom until after the deposition of Herod Antipas. In 39 A.D. he was given the latter's tetrarchy. During the antisemitic outbreak under Caius (Caligula) he was able to obtain some favors from the emperor, and so won popularity with the Jews. He seems to have had some share in the elevation of Claudius to the empire after the assassination of Caius, and, in consequence, was given the province of Judea (41 A.D.). His kingdom thus became practically co-extensive with that of Herod I. Herod Agrippa was popular with the Jews, because he was careful to regard Jewish observances. He had power to appoint the high priest, but he was careful in no way to outrage the feelings of the Jews, and further added to his popularity by using his influence with Claudius for the good of the Jews throughout the empire. According to Ac 12 1 ff. he persecuted Christians to increase his popularity. He strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem and apparently began the formation of a confederacy of neighboring kings. This project, however, was nipped in the bud by the legate of Syria. Notwithstanding his regard for Jewish customs, outside of Palestine he was a thoroughgoing Hellenist. In Beirût he built baths and a sumptuous theater. He also erected an amphitheater for gladiatorial games. He was in the midst of games in Cæsarea when he was seized with a fatal disease after being saluted by the people as a god (44 A.D.; cf. Ac 12 20-23).

7. Herod Agrippa II. Herod Agrippa II (49-c. 100 A.D.), son of the preceding, was a boy at the death of his father and was not allowed to succeed him. He was, if possible, more friendly to the Jews than his father had been, and maintained also friendship with Claudius. In 49 A.D. he was appointed the successor of his uncle Herod, as king of the little kingdom of Chalcis, with which position went also the right to appoint the high priest. In 53 A.D. he exchanged Chalcis for territory that had been a part of the tetrarchy of Philip, to which Nero added portions of Perea and Galilee, including the city of Tiberias. At the outbreak of the revolt of 66 A.D. he did all that he could to restore peace, and to persuade the Jews to give up their mad undertaking. In this, however, he was unsuccessful, and took the side of the Romans against the Jews. He seems to have reigned until his death, which was probably about 100 A.D. It was before this Agrippa and his sister Bernice that Paul was brought by Festus (Ac 25 13-26 32).

8. The Herodian Women Mentioned in the N T. Herod Agrippa I had three daughters. The eldest, Bernice, married her uncle Herod of Chalcis, and subsequently Polemon II, King of Cilicia, and lived as wife on the Palatine with Titus. She is mentioned in the N T as being present at the trial of Paul (Ac 25 13, 23, 26 30). The youngest of the three was Drusilla. After various adventures she became the wife of Felix, procurator of Judea. She was present at the trial of Paul (Ac 24 24). Like her sister Bernice, she gained a reputation not above reproach. Herodias was the daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great. It was her unholy relationship with Herod Antipas (see § 4 above) that brought her and Antipas under the denunciation of the Baptist, and it was her resentment that led finally to John's death (Mk 6 17-28).

LITERATURE: Besides Josephus and the Latin historians, the best modern authority is Schürer, HJP, (3d-4th Germ. ed., 1901-1909). S. M.

HERODIANS, hī-rō'di-anz: The adherents, or partisans, of the Herod dynasty and, as such, well content with Roman overlordship, but desirous of seeing one of this family over Judea in the place of the Roman procurator (Mk 3 6, 12 13 and ||s). The principles of Jesus' teaching were no more favorable to the Herodian policy and ideals than they were to Pharisaism. The women of the Herodian house were, as a rule, devoted to Judaism, which may partly explain the union of Herodian and Pharisee against Jesus. E. E. N.

HERODIAS, hī-rō'di-as. See HEROD, § 8.

HERODION, hī-rō'di-an (Ἡρώδης): A relative of Paul (Ro 16 11).

HERON. See PALESTINE, § 25.

HESED, hī'sed. See BEN-HESED.

HESHBON, hesh'ben (חֶשְׁבֹן, heshbōn): A city of Moab, advantageously situated on two hills commanding an extensive view of the lower Jordan Valley. Map II, J 1. Sihon made H. the capital of his Amorite kingdom (Nu 21 25-34; Dt 1 4; etc.). Taken from Sihon by Israel, it was occupied by the Reubenites and Gadites (Nu 32 3, 37; Jos 13 26 f.;

I Ch 8 31; and cf. MESHA, Moabite Stone, line 10). Later, we find it again in possession of Moab and its overthrow predicted by Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is 15 4, 16 8 f.; Jer 48 2 ff., 49 3). The site is one of great fertility, well supplied with water (cf. Song 7 4, where AV reads fish pools instead of 'pools'). The extensive ruins show that it was a flourishing city in Roman times. E. E. N.

HESHMON, hesh'men (חֶשְׁמוֹן, heshmōn): A town of Judah (Jos 15 27). Site unknown.

HETH, heth (חֶת, hēth): The people of Hebron, in Gn ch. 23, are called 'children of Heth,' also in ver. 10 Hittites (חִתִּי, hittī). The same usage meets us in Gn 27 46 and 26 34 regarding Esau's wives (cf. also 49 29 ff.). These 'Hittites,' as an element of the pre-Israelitic population of S. Palestine, are referred to a number of times (Gn 15 20; Ex 3 8, 17, 13 5, 23 23, 28; Jos 12 8, etc.). All such terms as Canaanite, Amorite, Hittite are used somewhat loosely in the O T and in different senses by different writers. The question here is: were the Hebron 'Hittites' simply Canaanites who were considered as being connected genealogically with a certain Heth, or were they an offshoot or remnant of the great Hittite people who had become separated from the main body and had remained in S. Palestine? While the first view is the prevalent one, there are good reasons (cf. Burney, Judges, pp. lxxxiii ff.) for the latter. Ahimelech (I S 26 6) and Uriah (II S 11 3 ff.) probably belonged to these S. Palestine Hittites, and Ezk 16 3, 45 is to be explained in the same way. On Gn 10 15 and other references see HITTITES. (Cf. also Driver, Com. on Genesis, 1904, and Skinner ICC on Gn 23.) E. E. N.

HETHLON, heth'lon (חֶתְלֹן, hethlōn): A place on the ideal N. boundary of Israel (Ezk 47 15, 48 1), not mentioned elsewhere. Perhaps the modern Heitela (Furrer, ZDPV, VIII, 27), N. of Tripoli. Others make the ideal N. boundary S. of the foot of Hermon, and identify H. with 'Adlān, N. of the mouth of the Kasimiyyeh (Litany) river. C. S. T.

HEXATEUCH.

INTRODUCTORY, §§ 1-3. II. ANALYSIS INTO THE ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS, §§ 10-13.

I. THE STRUCTURE OF THE HEXATEUCH IS COMPOSITE, §§ 4-9.

III. HISTORY OF THE FORMATION OF THE HEXATEUCH, §§ 14-30.

1. The Term. The term 'Hexateuch' (ἑξάτευχος, 'the six-book treatise') is used to designate the first six books of the O T. This term is preferable to the older, Pentateuch, i.e., the first five books, or the Law, since modern study has shown that Joshua is a part of the same literary production and must be included in any comprehensive study of the Pentateuch.

2. General Outline. The H. presents a general historical account extending from the Creation to Israel's occupation of Canaan, disposed as follows: (1) The Ancient World, the starting-point of all history (Gn chs. 1-11). (2) The origin of the Covenant-People Israel and its history during the patriarchal age (Gn chs. 12-50). (3) The organization of Israel and the origin of its laws and institutions (Ex 11-Nu 10 10). (4) The discipline in the desert, ending in the conquest of the East-Jordan region (Nu 10 11-Dt 34 12). (5) Israel's conquest and occupation of Canaan (Jos).

3. Mosaic Authorship a Late Idea. Not until the Persian period did the Jews think of Moses as the author of the entire Pentateuch. The references in Kings, Joshua, and the Pentateuch itself to a 'book' or books, by Moses can not be shown to refer to the Pentateuch in its present form. But from the Greek period it was the general opinion that Moses wrote the Law (i.e., the Pentateuch). Christianity took over this opinion from Judaism, and, until critical methods of study showed it to be untenable, it was the prevalent opinion.

I. THE STRUCTURE OF THE HEXATEUCH IS COMPOSITE—PROOF.

That the H. is of composite structure many facts in the work itself conclusively prove.

4. From Genesis. (1) A comparison of Gn 1 1-2 4a with 2 4b-3 24 discloses two distinct narratives. In 1 1-2 4a the word for the deity is God (Heb. 'ēlōhīm), and a cosmic process is described, the order being: the universe, earth, plant and animal life, man. The conceptions are somewhat abstract, and the idea of God is monotheistic and free from anthropomorphism. This section has also a noticeable literary style. But in 2 4b-3 24 the word for deity is Jehovah (LORD AV) God. Interest is centred, not on the cosmos, but on the earth, especially as the abode of man. The animals are made after man, and for his sake. The conception of God is more anthropomorphic, and the literary style is altogether unlike that of 1 1-2 4a. (2) The Flood narrative, 6 5-9 17, presents the same features. Sections using God alternate with others using Jehovah. The passages 6 5-8, 7 1-5, 8 20-22 are clearly 'Jehovah' paragraphs, and on the basis of similarity of style and conception 7 7-10 (in the main), 12, 18 (last clause), 17b, 22, 23, 8 2b, 6-12, 13b are to be classed with them. On the other hand, 6 13-22, 7 6, 11, 13-16a, 17a, 18-21, 24, 8 1-2a, 3b-5, 13a, 14-19, 9 1-17 make up another narrative in which God is the name for deity. In this, in contrast with the narrative using Jehovah, the conception of deity is more abstract, the style is formal and statistical, and the catastrophe is cosmic rather than local. (3) There are two ancient genealogical tables, 4 1, 18-24 and 5 1-28. In the first, man's descent is traced through Cain to Lamech; in the second, through Seth to Lamech. Since the two tables are altogether or nearly identical in respect to a number of the names, they may represent but two versions of some very ancient list. In the first Jehovah is used, in the second God, with corresponding differences in style. (4) The story of Abraham's experience in Egypt, 12 10-20, is parallel, in general outline, to 20 1-18, and in one Jehovah, in the other God, is the name for deity. But now a new phenomenon appears: The style of 20 1-18 is unlike that of the preceding sections which use the same name God. It is the easy, flowing narrative style of the Jehovah passages. The significance of this will be noted later. (5) In ch. 17 God gives Abraham the promise of seed, while in ch. 18 Jehovah makes a similar promise. The sequel of ch. 18 is found in 21 1 (Jehovah); that of ch. 17 in 21 2-8 (God). (6) Ch. 37 contains two stories of Joseph's transportation to Egypt. In one (vs. 28a, 36), Midianites take him out of the pit and carry him away. In the other (vs. 27, 28b) his brethren sell him to the Ishmaelites. (See GENESIS).

5. From Exodus. (1) 1 1-7 7 there is, on the whole, a triple narrative. (a) 1 1-5 (with 6 14-27), 7, 13, 14b, 2 23b-25, 6 2-7 7 form a complete account of the initial stages of the Exodus movement. They neither presuppose nor require anything mentioned in the intervening sections. It is also evident that 6 2-3 directly conflicts with those passages in Genesis in which a knowledge of Jehovah in the patriarchal age is assumed (cf. Gn 4 26, 12 8, 13 18, 15 2, 7, 16 5, 22 14, 24 3, 7, 12, 27, 31, 35, 40, 42, 44, 48 and many others. (b) Separating out from Ex 1 1-7 7 the passages noted under (a), there remains a series of paragraphs, some using God, others Jehovah, the rest being less distinctive. Naturally, after ch. 3 9b-15, where God reveals His name Jehovah, and to a greater degree after 6 2-3, the name J' could be used freely by all the writers. But this only makes the alternation of Jehovah and God more significant, and such a passage as 3 2-7 evidently consists of two separate threads of narrative. Using this hint we may tentatively assign 1 15-21, 3 1, 4b, 8, 9b-15, and 4 17, 20b to the document using God, and the remaining passages to the one using Jehovah. (2) The plague narrative, 7 8-12 36, is also seen to be composed of several strands. In some passages Moses and Aaron together deal with Pharaoh, Aaron as speaker and performer of the wonders (7 2, 10, 19-20, 8 5, 6, 16, 9 8), while in others Moses acts alone (7 14-15, 8 1, 20, 9 1, 13, 22, 10 21-29). In some the emphasis is laid on Aaron's rod (7 9, 19, 8 5, 16), in others on Moses' rod, or hand (9 22 f., 10 12 f., 21 f.; cf. also 14 5 f., 21). 11 1-3 breaks the connection between 10 28 f. and 11 4-8 by introducing a matter belonging to an entirely different situation, and apparently from another narrative. (3) In 18 13-17 assistant judges are appointed by Moses at Jethro's suggestion, but in Dt 1 9-18 the same transaction is placed after the giving of the Law, Jethro is not mentioned, and the selection is made by the people, not by Moses. (4) In 19 1-24 18 there are evidently three accounts. a. 19 1-2 and 24 15-18a form a complete altho brief introduction to the great revelation concerning the Sanctuary and its services (Ex chs. 25-31, 35-40; Lv [all]; etc.). b. A closely interwoven double narrative in 19 3-24 14, 15b. Evidence for this is (a) the alternation of God and Jehovah, which is otherwise inexplicable (19 3, 17-20, 20 1); (b) in the Jehovah parts of ch. 19 the people keep away from the mount when Jehovah descends, but in 19 17, 19, 20 1, 18-21 Moses and the people are quite near where God is, and only at the people's request is the distance between them and God increased; (c) 24 1-2, 9-11 can be interpreted only as describing the ratification of a covenant, or a covenant-meal. But essentially the same significance must be given to 24 3-8; (d) the religious injunctions in 20 22-26, 22 29-30, and 23 10-33 are repeated partly in identical words in 34 10-27, a passage which also is loosely attached to its context. (See EXODUS.)

6. From Leviticus. Ex. chs. 25-31, 35-40, the entire Book of Leviticus, and Nu 1-10 28 are closely connected, marked by the same general style, deal with the same subject, and are written from the same points of view. In all these respects they are sharply distinguished from the narrative sections that precede and follow them. (See also LEVITICUS and NUMBERS.)

7. From Numbers. (1) Examining the narrative in Nu from 10 29 on, we find there are two accounts of the expedition of the spies. (a) In 13 17b-20, 22-24, 26b-31, the region about Hebron is the limit reached. (b) In 13 1-17a, 21b, the whole land of Canaan is examined. Dt 1 19-25 agrees with (a) rather than with (b). (2) The account of the great rebellion in ch. 16 shows itself to be composite. (a) On, son of Peleth, is mentioned at first as one of the leaders, but nothing more is said of him. (b) The motive of the rebels is twofold. That of Korah is religious—a protest against the exclusive claims of the Levites vs. the rights of the whole people, or a protest against the claims of the priests vs. the whole body of Levites (see NUMBERS, § 2). But Dathan and Abiram are hostile to Moses' civil authority and declare that he has not fulfilled his promises. (c) The paragraphs alternate, vs. 4-11 dealing with Korah, 12-14 with Dathan and Abiram, 15-19 with Korah, while 20-35 is a composite account of the punishment, which differs in each case. (3) In the Balak and Balaam story (ch. 22) there seem to be two narratives. (a) In ver. 7 the 'elders of Midian' go for Balaam, but in ver. 8 it is the 'princes of Moab.' (b) In ver. 20 God directs Balaam to go, but in ver. 22 ff. He is angry with him for going. (c) In ver. 5a Balaam lives in Pethor by the Euphrates, in ver. 5b in 'the land of the children of his people' (i.e., according to the probable reading, in the land of Ammon). (d) The form of the oracles in ch. 23 is very different from that in ch. 24.

8. From Deuteronomy. Deuteronomy forms a separate book directly connected neither with Numbers nor with Joshua. Its style is distinct from that of the preceding books. Its introductory narrative traverses briefly the same ground as Exodus and Numbers, but its representation of the events is different (cf. Dt 1 9-18 with Ex 13 13-26; Dt 1 19-40 with Nu ch. 13; Dt 2 1-3 with Nu 20 14-21). Its code (chs. 12-26, 28) is an amplification of the brief code in Ex chs. 20-23, the additional matter being suitable to a time much later than the Mosaic age. The religious polemic in Dt chs. 4-11 fits the situation in Judah in the 7th cent. as it does no other, while the literary affinities between Dt and other portions of the O T appear only from the 7th cent. onward (e.g., Jeremiah has much in common with Dt., but Hosea, Amos, Micah, and Isaiah [I] practically nothing; see DEUTERONOMY).

9. From Joshua. The Book of Joshua presents a complex, difficult to disentangle. At some points there are traces of double or threefold narratives, as in other parts of the Hex. (1) In 2 15 a suitable conclusion of the narrative between Rahab and the spies is reached and vs. 16-21 appear to be part of another account. (2) In 2 15 Rahab's house is built into, or a part of, the city wall; but in 6 22, after the wall has fallen down flat (6 20), Joshua sends the spies into the city to find the house. Evidently here are two different traditions. A careful study of ch. 6 does, in fact, reveal a twofold narrative of the capture of the city. (3) In 8 3 ff. Joshua sends 30,000 men to lie in hiding behind Ai, while he makes a feigned attack in front. But in 8 10 ff. the very same plan is described, only the ambushment consists of but 5,000 men. (4) In 10 36-43 Joshua, at the head of all Israel, attacks and utterly destroys, among other places, Hebron, Debir, and the towns in the whole southern country, from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza. But in 14 6-12 the same region is given to Caleb to be conquered by him, and the story of its conquest by Caleb follows in 15 13-19 (cf. Judges 1 9-21). Similarly in ch. 8 all Israel makes the attack on Bethel and Ai, while in Judges 1 22-26 Bethel is captured by the house of Joseph alone. (5) In 13 1 Joshua, at Gilgal, 'old and well stricken in years,' apparently after the main work of conquest is over, is commanded to divide the land (13 7). But 18 1 ff. breaks into this procedure with another account of an allotment to only seven tribes at Shiloh. In 23 1 Joshua, again 'old and well stricken in years,' gives his farewell charge to Israel (place not mentioned), but in ch. 24 we have another and different farewell at Shechem. Such features indicate the use of originally different narratives.

II. ANALYSIS INTO THE ORIGINAL DOCUMENTS.

10. Not Many Fragments, but Several Main Documents. It is, from what has been said, evident that Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, and Joshua are composite, everywhere based upon older and originally separate strands of material. The unity is only apparent, due to editorial adjustment, not to single authorship. The separate strands, which are constantly revealing themselves, are, however, not all independent. The component elements of any given section are related to those of other sections. In other words, the separate strands are but sections of long, comprehensive documents that underlie the whole H. The character of these documents must next be determined.

11. The 'Priestly' Document. P or PC. As we have seen, Gn 11-2 4a has a distinct style, vocabulary, and theological point of view. Gn ch. 5 has the same style, vocabulary, and point of view, also 6 9-22, many verses of ch. 7 (especially in vs. 13-24), 8 13-19, 9 1-17, 28-29, 10 1-32, and 11 10-27. In all these we find the same strict monotheism, somewhat transcendental, the emphasis on Divine plan rather than on human motives, and long stretches of history covered in a merely statistical way. The writer has an exact and comprehensive chronology. The plan of the history is genealogical—note the 'generations' of (1) the heavens and the earth, 2 4a; (2) of Adam, 5 1; (3) of Noah, 6 9; (4) of the sons of Noah, 10 1; (5) of Shem, 11 10; (6) of Terah, 11 27 (cf. the continuation in 25 12, 19, 36 1, 37 1). In 1 29-30, 2 1-3, 9 3-4, 12 we detect an interest in ceremonial usage and symbolism. In fact, we have an originally complete narrative, in which the same style and point of view are consistently maintained. This narrative can be traced by its characteristic marks through the rest of the Pentateuch and on into Joshua (see below, § 28). It is the narrative of the origin of Israel, as the theocracy, and of Israel's religious institutions. The goal of the national development was reached in the establishment of the Sanctuary, Priesthood, and religious services. It neglected, sometimes contradicted, popular tradition. According to it the patriarchs did not offer sacrifices (as they had no priests or legitimate sanctuaries), nor did they know, or use, the name Jehovah (Ex 6 2-3). Because of its character this document is known as the Priestly narrative (symbol P), and the legislation in it as the Priest's Code (PC).

12. The J and E Histories. On the same basis of stylistic and other affinities other passages show that they once belonged together. Gn 2 4b-4 26 finds its continuation in 5 29b, 6 1-8, 7 1-5, 7-9, 12, 16b, 17b, 22 f., 8 2b, 6-12, 13b, 20-22, 9 18-27, etc. In all these the name for deity is Jehovah, the style is that of the story, told vividly and realistically. The tone is deeply religious and a profound interest is felt in man as a moral-religious being who is working out his lot in struggle and sorrow. He set forth the diversified character of the ancient world by a genealogical table, fragments of which remain, 10 8-19, 24-26, and 11 28-30, and by the story of the confusion of tongues, 11 1-10. With Abraham, summoned by Jehovah to leave his native land, the real history of Israel begins. The writer loves to detail the personal experiences of his heroes. His style, marked neither by diffuseness nor brevity, is remarkably attractive. In Gn ch. 20 God is first used in a section of popular, story-telling character. Up to this point such sections use the name Jehovah. The explanation is that there were originally two separate narratives, of this character, one using the name Jehovah throughout, the other using God, until the scene recorded in Ex ch. 3, when the name Jehovah was revealed to Moses. In style and mode of thought these two popular narratives are quite similar. Unlike P, they are not statistical, and have no systematic chronology. It is often difficult, sometimes impossible, to determine to which one a specific word, sentence, or paragraph is to be assigned. Yet each has its distinctive terminology, more evident in Hebrew than in English, and the frequent occurrence of duplicate accounts is ample proof that two such narratives once existed and were quite similar in plan and content. Like P, both of these narratives can be traced from Genesis on into Joshua. On the basis of their use of the Divine names God (Heb. 'ēlōhīm) and Jehovah, these documents are denoted by the letters E and J.

13. The Documents No Longer in Their Original Form. The three histories J, E, and P, with the once separate work Deuteronomy (D), form the documentary basis of the H. They now survive only as combined into one large work, not in their original form. Omissions and other changes were necessary in order to weave them into one. The combination was made, however, in a conservative spirit. In most cases as much as possible of the original documents was preserved. Very different accounts of the same thing could, in some instances, be placed one after the other, as Gn 1 1-2 4a (P), and 2 4b-25 (J). Very similar ones could be interwoven, as the story of the Flood (J and P), or of the call of Moses in Ex ch. 3 (J and E). In some cases the compiler let differences or contradictions stand (e.g., Ex ch. 3 [JE] and Ex ch. 6 [P]) or changed the order (e.g., Ex 34 10-26 [J] = parts of Ex chs. 20-23 [E], but placed at a different time), or omitted parts of one narrative in favor of the representation in another (the account of the organization of the worship by Moses in J and E was mostly omitted in favor of P's account). This process of editing and combining was long and complex, not all done in one period, by the same persons or always under the same influences. This can be shown most satisfactorily by tracing the history of the H. from its beginning to its final form.

III. HISTORY OF THE FORMATION OF THE HEXATEUCH.

1. The Two Most Ancient Histories J and E.

14. The Sources of J and E. Of the four main documents from which the H. was compiled the oldest were J and E. Each was a complete narrative beginning very early, J with the making of the first man and E at least as far back as Abraham, both concerned mainly with Israel's origins, and closing (apparently) with the conquest of Canaan by Jehovah's Chosen People. It is evident that their authors used such information as was at their disposal. They describe events that happened long before their day, and nowhere claim personal knowledge of the facts. Whence, then, did they draw their information? This legitimate question may be answered as follows: (1) They had at hand a limited amount of fixed material, possessing historical significance, such as (a) laws already codified and assigned to the period of Moses; e.g., a Decalog, a series of religious regulations (Ex 20 23-26, 22 29-30, 23 10-16; cf. 34 10-26), and a civil code (Ex 21 1-23 9). (b) Ancient poems or songs, believed to have originated on specific occasions; e.g., Lamech's (Gn 4 23-24), Noah's (Gn 9 25-27), Isaac's (Gn 27 27-29), Jacob's (Gn 49 2-27), the Song of Victory in Ex ch. 15, the curse on Amalek (Ex 17 16), the invocation concerning the Ark (Nu 10 35-36), the fragments in Nu 21 14 f., 17 f., 27-30, the Balaam Oracles (Nu chs. 23 and 24), the Blessing of Moses (Dt ch. 33), and the poetic fragment in Jos 10 12-13. (c) Institutions, as to the origin of which tradition was fixed, as the Passover (Ex 12 21-27), the Priesthood (Ex 23 25-27), and the Sanctuary (Ex 33 7-11). (2) They also had access to tradition, which among people of simple culture always holds a most important place. This historical tradition was of two kinds: (a) A general national tradition, much the same everywhere in Israel, to the effect that their forefathers came originally from the Aram, once lived in Canaan, had been delivered by Moses from oppression in Egypt, and had conquered Canaan after receiving from Moses a national and religious organization. Any Israelite historian would have constructed his history on this general basis. (b) There were also many specific, particularly local, traditions varying greatly in quantity and character, according to locality, or according to the tribe in whose midst they were handed down. The tribe of Ephraim, e.g., was particularly interested in the traditions concerning Joshua the Ephraimite, Judah in those concerning Caleb. Each local sanctuary, as Beersheba, Hebron, Bethel, Gilgal, Shechem, was a center of tradition. Originally these traditions were independent and of different values. Some may have been Israelite transformations of Canaanite originals. The process of amalgamating these various traditions and building up therefrom a connected story of the patriarchal age began long before the writing of J and E. The tendency to embellishment as the stories were repeated from generation to generation must have been strong, and it is no longer easy to get back to the original facts on which they were based. In many cases it is best to admit this frankly and not to insist upon the historical accuracy of details. (3) Finally, there were current in Israel many general views regarding God, man, and the world which Israel shared with the general Semitic world of the day. The presence of these is very noticeable in the early narratives in J. While the historians of Israel used these conceptions freely, they also modified them in accordance with their own higher ideas of deity, duty, worship, etc.

15. The Spirit in Which J and E Were Written. Such was the general character of the material to which our two historians had access. They used it carefully and conscientiously. Actuated mainly by practical religious motives, they were not 'critical' in the modern sense. But they were not inclined to sacrifice truth in order to glorify the men of the past. Of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Moses, Aaron, Miriam, and others, things are told which are not to their credit. A degree of objectivity was actually attained, rare indeed in the annals of the ancient world.

16. Comparison of J with E. Altho of independent origin, the two histories followed much the same general outline, and frequently related the same events. Each has its own style and other peculiarities. J is the richer in the variety of his material, broader in view, more liberal in spirit, and of deeper insight into the motives that actuate human conduct. In E the conception of God is, perhaps, more abstract. In both, the mastery of a chaste narrative style marked by profound pathos and winsomeness is noteworthy.

17. The Authors: Their Date and Place. The questions that center about the authorship of J and E can be answered only approximately. (1) Who the authors were is unknown, as is the case with most O T books. It may be more correct, especially in regard to J, to think of a 'school' rather than an individual author. The designation 'prophetic' histories, because of alleged harmony with the teaching of such prophets as Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah is somewhat misleading. The harmony is superficial rather than profound and there is no evidence of acquaintance with the most distinctive prophetic teachings. All that can be said with certainty is that the writers were earnest, sincere Jehovah-worshippers, representative of the better type of religious thought apart from the advance made by the great prophets. (2) In regard to the place of composition, many points of difference between the two histories seem best explained by the theory that J was written in Judah, and E in the Northern Kingdom. And it may be noted that the general agreement of these narratives, written by different hands and in different parts of Israel, is incidental evidence of no small value for the antiquity and essential accuracy of the historical tradition contained in them.

18. The Preservation of J and E. The way in which J and E were preserved is a matter of no little importance. Careful study shows that they are not now complete and that both have suffered at the hands of copyists or editors. Since they had no strictly 'canonical' character at first, they were easily subject to changes of various kinds. They could be supplemented here and there by additions. A possible case of this is the Flood narrative in J, which does not seem to be anticipated in Gn ch. 4. The process of copying gave abundant opportunity for many minor changes. It is likely that E was brought into Judah, probably to Jerusalem, about the time of the fall of the Northern Kingdom (722 B.C.). There it was preserved and studied, and furnished, in addition to J, a valuable history of Israel's origins. Of far greater importance was the fusion of the two histories into one compilation, JE. When this took place, since the two narratives presented many differences, considerable editorial adjustment was necessary. Passages belonging to this editor, or redactor, are denoted by the symbol RJE. As the author of Deuteronomy (in its original form, which we designate as D) appears to have had some of these RJE passages before him, the combination probably took place before D was written, i.e., not later than c. 650 B.C. The separate existence of J and E did not cease at once when they were combined into JE, but it was only in this form that they attained to a permanent place in Israel's literature.

2. Deuteronomy (D).

19. The Influence of Deuteronomy. With the details of the origin of D we are not here concerned (see DEUTERONOMY). Assuming that the original D was composed near 650 B.C. and was, in 621, made the basis of the covenant obligation of II K ch. 23, it is evident that the book must have become very soon widely known and influential. This explains why the O T literature dating from c. 600 and for a time after is full of Deuteronomistic phraseology and is written from a distinctly 'Deuteronomistic' point of view. When Judah went into exile in 586, they carried D with them as their law-book and JE as the record of their early history.

20. Combination of JE with D. During the Exile these writings were studied with great seriousness, and at last they were combined with D into one work by a 'Deuteronomistic' editor. This was accomplished by simply wedging D into JE at the place where Moses' last days were recorded, thus displacing the JE account of Moses' farewell address. The editor left the record of JE from the beginning to the Mosaic period practically intact. There are no clear signs of his work up to Ex ch. 13. From there on many sentences, or expressions, in Ex and Nu seem to be from him. Into D the editor inserted from JE Dt 25 5-7, 31 14-23 (in part), ch. 33, and 34 1-10

(in part). But the narrative of the conquest of Canaan by JE was completely worked over under the influence of a radically different view from that of JE. According to JE, Israel, except the East-Jordan tribes, crossed the Jordan at one time and united in the attack on Jericho, but then divided and conquered the highland region slowly and with difficulty. Judah and Simeon worked their way southward, conquered Hebron, and thence gradually spread over the whole territory later known as Judah. The house of Joseph conquered the middle highlands under Joshua. The other tribes followed in the wake of the house of Joseph, and gradually conquered the territory in and north of the Plain of Esdraelon. But the Deuteronomic school, forgetful of all this, held that all Israel, including the East-Jordan tribes, marching en masse under Joshua, conquered the whole land in one or two great sweeping campaigns, exterminating the Canaanites, and in many cases destroying their cities. Compare, e.g., Jos 14 6 ff. and 15 14-19 (JE) with 10 28-43 (Deuteronomic), or Jos 17 11 f. (JE) with 12 21 (Deuteronomic). The Deuteronomic school held that, since in D Moses had commanded Israel to conquer and utterly destroy (7 2) the Canaanites, and stamp out their worship, and since Joshua had been divinely appointed to carry out this command, it certainly must have been accomplished in just such a way. The more ancient and accurate notices of JE, therefore, while preserved in part, were practically ignored, as not describing the conquest in its true character as God's signal and complete act of providence for His people (cf. 9 1-5). The combination of JE with D may be exhibited thus:

NARRATIVE LINE	From the Creation to the last days of Moses.		Moses' last days.		Conquest.
	JE (slightly revised by Deuteronomic editor).		D and small selections from JE.		JE extensively revised.

The critical symbol of this combination is  $\frac{JE+D}{Rd}$ .

3. The 'Priestly' Material of the Hexateuch (P and PC).

21. The Priests the Teachers of the Law. When Israel settled in Canaan and the religion of Jehovah became established, its official custodians were the priests of the various sanctuaries. These made known the 'law' or custom, regarding all matters of religious or moral character, and of right procedure in the courts of justice (such as they were). Within priestly circles there grew up gradually an extensive body of such teaching regulative of worship and conduct, supposed or alleged to be based on Moses' directions, especially as time passed and much of it became very ancient.

22. Codification of Priestly Law. Of the early history of this material we actually know very little. Codifications were made early, as is seen from the code in E (Ex chs. 21-23, in the main). At the more important sanctuaries this body of priestly 'law' was preserved with care, and also continuously expanded, with increasing emphasis on ritual, and in view of the constant need of new applications of principles already formulated. Such legal material as we find in the H., apart from what was recorded in E, probably represents mainly the work of the priests of the great Sanctuary at Jerusalem—the Temple—and their exilic and postexilic successors. In Jerusalem, in preexilic times, a large body of such 'law' was probably in possession of the priests of the Temple, partly written, but much also unwritten, consisting either of oral tradition or of well-known ceremonial. On this the author of D must have drawn mainly in constructing his written code (Dt chs. 12-26, 28), which was adopted as the national constitution in 621 B.C. (cf. II K 23 1-3).

23. The Holiness Code (HC). Another example of such codification is the code found embedded in Lv, mainly in chs. 17-26 (see LEVITICUS). This section, as a whole, presents such striking contrasts to the main portion of the P material in the Hex. that it probably represents the conditions of a time earlier than that to which the main body of P belongs. In its present form it has been extensively worked over and altered by later postexilic hands. This code covers the following points (see Carpenter and Harford, Comp. of Hex., p. 428 ff.):

1. Fundamental distinctions:
  - (1) Exclusive loyalty to Jehovah vs. all 'Canaanite' practises, 18 1-5.
  - (2) Animals killed to be eaten are sacrifices—regulations as to these, 17 1-16, 91 26a, 20 25 f.
  - (3) Distinctions between clean and unclean animals, ch. 11 [?].
2. The family and sexual purity, 18 6-20, 19 20-21, 20 1-24.
3. Miscellaneous laws, mainly of a 'civil' character, chs. 19 and 24 15-22.
4. Priestly holiness, 21 1-22 16.
5. Offerings, 22 17-28.
6. The calendar and related matter, 19 23-25, 23 1, ch. 25.
7. Hortatory conclusion, ch. 26.

The moral tone of this code is high and its religious spirit earnest and pure. Its emphasis on form, shows the tendency to reduce religion to correct formal practise. Many of the laws of HC were already old when incorporated into the code, and thus afford little evidence for its date. The question as to its date is complicated by the similarities between it and Ezk. Its affinities with D and with Ezk point to a date either a little before or after the Exile. If Ezekiel used HC, it would then be pre-exilic. If HC was influenced by Ezk, its date would then be somewhere near 540 B.C.

24. Ezekiel and the Priestly Legislation. The influence of Ezekiel on the priestly legislation must have been large. In his outline for the organization of the new community (chs. 40-48), when it should once more occupy the Holy Land, holiness to Jehovah was the governing principle, a holiness that was to find expression in every detail of formal worship and community life. The outline deals first with the Sanctuary and its details (chs. 40-43), passes next to the worship (chs. 44-46), and then gives regulations for the holy territory, to be occupied exclusively by a holy people (chs. 47-48). In this sketch it is noteworthy how important a place is assigned to the priests.

25. Interest of the Exiles in the Law. Under such influences many of the Exiles looked forward to the establishment in Palestine of a community life which should perfectly express exclusive devotion to Jehovah. In such circles, composed mainly of priests, the work of perfecting an ideal constitution for Israel was undertaken. In addition to the codes in JE, D, and HC, they had doubtless much traditional material. Probably little progress had been made at the time of the Return in 536. The colonists who rebuilt the Temple and restored the worship probably used mainly the codes of D and HC. But those who remained in the land of captivity had an idealistic love for Jerusalem with its Temple, and for the institutions of Israel, and for these they worked assiduously.

26. Ezra's Law-Book. The result of such work we hear of first in the case of Ezra, who, c. 458 B.C., set out from Babylonia for Jerusalem with 'the book of the law,' evidently something new, in his hands, intending to make its contents known to the community there (Ezr 7 6, 10; Neh 8). Just what the contents of this 'book' were is a question of great importance, but difficult to decide.

27. Contents of P. The correctness of the prevalent view that it was P can be estimated best after a general survey of the contents of this ancient document. The material in P comprises two main elements: (1) a historical narrative and (2) a large body of laws. The manner in which these two elements are related to each other is seen in the following summary.

After the example of J the writer began with the Creation. From a standpoint of rigid monotheism, in exact, statistical style he unfolded the Divine plan of which Israel, a holy nation was to be the culmination. In ten sections he sketched the Creation (Gn 1 1-2 4a), the ten genealogical steps from Adam to Noah (5 1-28, 30-32), the great universal deluge (6 9-22, chs. 7 and 8 [passim], 9 1-17), the descendants of the sons of Noah (10 1-7, 20, 22-23, 26-27), the 'generations' of Shem (11 7-26), of Terah (= Abraham) (11 27-25 11 [passim]), of Ishmael (25 12-18), of Isaac (25 19-35 29 [passim]), of Esau (ch. 36 [in part]), and of Jacob (chs. 37-50 [passim]). In the history of Abraham he gave exact statistics of A's age, tells of his separation from his family (11 27, 31 1, 12 1b, 3), and from Lot (13 4, 11b-12a). After relating the birth of Ishmael (16 1a, 2, 16 1) in A's eighty-seventh year, he recorded the appearance of God Almighty to A. in his ninety-ninth year, promising to make him a father of many nations, at the same time instituting the rite of circumcision, and definitely assuring him of the birth of Isaac (ch. 17), who, in due time, was born (21 1, 2b-5). After this Sarah died (ch. 23), and then Abraham (25 7-11a). After a formal notice of Ishmael (25 12-17), a brief account of Isaac follows (25 18-29). Only fragments of P's narrative of the boys Jacob and Esau remain (25 26b, 26 34-35, 28 1-9), also of Jacob's experience with Laban (29 24, 29). The covenant relation of Jacob is clearly indicated (35 9-12, 14). Jacob's sons and his return to Isaac are noted (35 23b-29). After a summary description of Esau's descendants (36 1-39, 40-43), the history of the line of Jacob is given, preserved only in fragments (37 1-2, 41 4b, 42a, 46 6-27, 47 1-4a, 7-11, 28), closing with the notices of the adoption of Joseph's sons (48 3-5), of the last words of the patriarch (49 1a, 28b-29a), and of his burial (50 1-13).

The oppression in Egypt is briefly told (Ex 1 1-5, 7, 13, 14b, 2 3b-15). Then comes the great revelation of God as Jehovah (Ex 6 2-3), with the commission to Moses and Aaron (6 6-7 13). Four plagues—blood, frogs, lice, boils—follow (7 10, 11 10 [passim]), as demonstrations of Jehovah's supreme power. The Passover is then instituted to be observed on the 14th of the current month, henceforth to be the first month of the year, and its law is given at length (12 1-26, 24, 28, 46-51, 13 1-3). The itinerary is narrated briefly, special attention being given to the law concerning the manna (13 20, 14 [passim], 16 1-3, 5-30, 17 1a, 19 1-2a).

At Sinai the theocracy was formally organized. Moses ascended the Mount (24 13b-14a) and there received the Divine plans concerning the Sanctuary, called in P 'the dwelling' (generally rendered 'Tabernacle'), and its officials and services (chs. 25-31). Coming down with radiant face (34 29-35) he at once undertook the construction of the Tabernacle and the organization of the worship (Ex chs. 35-40, and Lv [all; see § 23, above]). A census was then taken (Nu chs. 1-4), in which special care was given to the enumeration of the Levites. After several laws (chs. 5-6), the offerings of the 'princes' at the dedication of the altar are described (ch. 7); then come regulations on various topics, closing with details regarding the order of the camp (8-10 29).

Next comes the story of the spies (13 1-17a, 31b, 26-26a, 32, 14 1a, 2, 6-7, 10, 20-30, 32, 37). Ch. 15 contains legal material and chs. 16-17 record the great rebellion of Korah, in which the divinely appointed prerogatives of the Aaronic priesthood are vindicated (see NUMBERS). Appropriately, ch. 18 contains legislation concerning priestly revenues, and ch. 19 deals with the purification of the ceremonially unclean. In ch. 20 the itinerary is resumed with the story of the rebellion at Kadesh (20 1a, 2, 3b, 4, 6-8a, 9-13). At Mt. Hor Aaron died, succeeded by Eleazar (20 22-29). Finally the steppes of Moab were reached (21 4a, 10-11a, 22 1), and the Promised Land was in sight. Here Israel fell into grievous sin, in connection with which the zeal of the priest Phinehas, son of Eleazar, was conspicuous (25 6-15). A second census was taken, which is recorded with extensive genealogical details (ch. 26). At this place the law of inheritance for heiresses is given (27 1-11). Moses warned that he is soon to die, was now directed to have Joshua consecrated by Eleazar as his successor (27 12-23). Very curiously, we have next a list of the offerings proper to the several calendar seasons (chs. 28-29), followed by a law regulating vows (ch. 30). In this strange place occurs the record of the holy war against Midian (properly belonging after ch. 25), ending with the law concerning division of spoil (ch. 31). Next comes the arrangements made with the East-Jordan tribes (32 1a, 2b, 4, 18, 19, 28-30). An old itinerary, somewhat out of place, follows (33 1-49). Then come directions concerning the allotment of the land (33 50-51, 54, 34) and the Levitical cities (ch. 35) and, once more, the law concerning heiresses (ch. 36). Moses then ascended the mountains of Abarim and died (Dt 32 48-52, 34 5b, 7-9). Following this we have the story of the conquest of Canaan by Joshua (Jos 3 4a, 8, 14b-16, 4 7b, 13, 15-17, 19, 5 10-12, 6 19, 7 1, 9 17-21, 27), and the final establishment of Israel in full possession of its religious institutions in the land (13 15-33, 14 1-5, 15 1-18, 20-52, 16 4-9, 17 1-10, 18 1, 11-28, 19 1-46, 48-51, 20 1-9, 21 1-40, 22 9-34).

28. The Construction of P. In this extended history the relation between the narrative and much of the legal material is so close that they can not be separated. The narrative, evidently, was written largely to furnish a setting for the legal or ceremonial matter. On the other hand, many laws seem to have been inserted irrespective of any connection with the narrative. Furthermore, the code is not entirely homogeneous and self-consistent. The same subject is frequently treated in different places, not always harmoniously. Many sections seem to be supplementary additions registering the altered practise of later times (for details, see especially Carpenter and Harford, op. cit., pp. 429-506). The only plausible explanation of such phenomena seems to be that after the main work had been completed, it was afterward and at many different times supplemented by additional material, some of it already well known, as, e.g., HC, and other sections later in date and registering new developments of priestly teaching. In this way the old was preserved and the new was incorporated into the body of authoritative law. No serious attempt was made to reconcile differences. It was probably felt that later enactments simply superseded earlier ones.

Returning to the subject of Ezra's 'book of the law' the question actually is, whether Ezra had in his hand only the original draft of P, without its later supplements, or a later edition, in the 'editing' of which he himself may well have been concerned. To the present writer it seems most probable that, while the original draft of P antedated Ezra, the edition Ezra succeeded in getting adopted as the constitution of the community in Palestine was not PC as we have it now, since there are a number of sections that appear to be later than the time of Ezra.

29. The Combination of P with JE+D. It remains, finally, to consider the combination of the four main elements of the H. into their present form. It was the fusion of  $\frac{JE+D}{Rd}$  (see § 20) with P that produced the H. By the time this was done, D had practically assumed its present form, Deuteronomy. The editor who did this took for his basis P's well-concatenated chronological narrative. This was not a difficult matter, since P itself had followed the general outline of JE. To combine JE with P was therefore easy for an editor who was not anxious to smooth away or eliminate all conflicting or contradictory representations (see § 13). His method was simply to insert in P at the proper places the more discursive narratives of J and E. In most places where this was not possible, the representation in P was retained and that of JE omitted. The material of Dt was left practically intact. The whole process required naturally more or less editorial work. The date of this final combination is in dispute. At all events, it took place probably in Ezra's day, or not long after, since the sect of the Samaritans (q.v.), which probably originated not far from c. 400 B.C., possesses the same Pentateuch as the Jews; that is, they took over the H., and preserved the legal portion (to the death of Moses) practically intact. Of the 'Joshua' part they were less careful, and therefore the Samaritan Book of Joshua is not identical with that of the O.T.

30. Later Subdivisions. The subsequent division into the Law (Gn-Dt) and Joshua, and the still later subdivision of the Law (Torah) into five parts, called by the Jewish scholars the 'five-fifths of the Torah,' were early, probably before 250 B.C., but the details are not known.

LITERATURE: The literature on the H. is voluminous, and a complete bibliography is out of the question here. The English reader will find an exhaustive and satisfactory treatment of the whole subject, with analytical tables, etc., in The Composition of the Hexateuch by Carpenter and Harford, London (1902); see also Driver, LOT (1913); A. T. Chapman An Introd. to the Pentateuch (Camb. Bible) (1911); and the Introduction in Skinner's Genesis in ICC (1910).

HEZEKI, hez'1-kai. See HIZKI.

HEZEKIAH, hez'1-kai'a (הִזְקִיָּה, also הִזְקִיָּהוּ, hizqiyyāh (-yāhū), 'J' strengtheneth': 1. King of Judah (II K 18-20, Is 36-39). In view of the difficulty in harmonizing the chronological statements in II K 18, 9 and 13 with other data in II K and also with the well ascertained dates of the Assyrian records, it seems best to give 719-691 B.C. as the approximately correct dates for his reign without attempting to give a final solution of the problem.

Our sources for the reign of H. are (1) the record in

II K chs. 18-20, to most of which Is chs. 36-39 is an exact parallel, and therefore probably only an excerpt from II K. (2) A number of Isaiah's oracles of different dates and therefore dealing with a number of different situations. (3) The messages of Micah in Mi 1 8-2 11, and 3 1-12. (4) Inscriptions of Sargon, King of Assyria (722-705 B.C.), which throw light on political conditions, altho H. is not mentioned, and of Sennacherib, Sargon's successor (705-681), which give us Sennacherib's version of his campaign in Palestine against H. and other rebellious vassals.

H. came to the throne of Judah in troublous times. His father Ahaz had placed himself under the protection of Assyria when he was threatened by Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus for refusing to join with them against Assyria. This made Judah safe but subservient. Both of the neighboring kingdoms were crushed out of existence by Assyria—Damascus in 732 and Israel in 722—evidence enough to show the boldest spirit the danger in opposing the overlordship of Assyria. But the Assyrian yoke was galling to any freedom-loving people. The Assyrian kings were cruel and hard. They had no regard for the interests or feelings of the peoples on whom they imposed their rule. H. was high-spirited and patriotic, and was very unwilling to remain under Assyrian domination. In this he was at one with most of the kings of the many small principalities of the E. Mediterranean coast-region. The temptation was strong to join hands with such men as Jaubi'di of Hamath, Azuri of Ashdod, Hanno of Gaza, and others in rebellion against Assyria. The first one of such combinations (behind which were the machinations of the new Ethiopian control of Egypt) was promptly put down by Sargon in 720, and in this Hezekiah (who may not yet have begun to reign) had no part. A few years later, in 713 (or 711) Sargon was again compelled to put down a revolt of these E. Med. coast-districts, and in this H. appears to have been implicated, sympathetically if not directly. 'The people of Philistia, Judah, Edom, and Moab dwelling by the sea . . . who plotted seditions without number and treason, who unto Pharaoh carried presents . . . ' is the statement in one of Sargon's inscriptions. In this campaign Sargon defeated and deposed Azuri of Ashdod, took Ashdod, Gath, and other places, and laid heavy tribute on the whole region. The participation in this Anti-Assyrian Confederacy seems to have been directly against the advice of Isaiah, who had no faith in the promised help of Egypt (Is 19 1-17, 20 1-6), and clearly perceived the disastrous effects of resisting Assyria (cf. also Is 21 11-17).

H. was not convinced, and when Sargon died in 705 he was more than ready to lend a willing ear to proposals looking to a general uprising against Assyria brought by messengers from Merodach-baladan, a Chaldean chieftain who had usurped the throne of Babylon, and had held his own against Sargon for 12 years, and altho defeated and driven out by Sargon was now once more master of Babylon. It is likely that H. entered into some definite arrangement with Merodach-baladan, according to which H. was to organize the revolt in the West while M-b. engaged Sennacherib, Sargon's successor, in the East. The prophet Isaiah was closely watching the course of events, and sharply rebuked H. for receiving the messengers (II K 20 12-19; Is ch. 39). In spite of Isaiah's warnings and severe rebukes H. set himself vigorously to carry out his part of the program. Messengers went back and forth between Jerusalem and Egypt (cf. Is 18 1-7, 30 1-7, 31 1-3). The Philistine cities came into the alliance, H. assisting the anti-Assyrian party in Ekron in deposing their king Padi who wished to remain loyal to Assyria. Padi was put in fetters and taken to Jerusalem as H.'s prisoner (so Sennacherib's inscription). The revolt was widespread, including finally all the coast cities from Sidon southward and the adjacent countries like Edom, Moab, Ammon, etc. In all this H. was a leading spirit. In Judah vigorous preparations for war were carried through (Is 22 8), with improvements in the water-supply and fortifications of Jerusalem as precautions against a possible siege (Is 22 9-11; and see JERUSALEM, §§ 13, 34, 35). In vain Isaiah protested against the whole policy. The spirit that actuated the court and the nation seemed to the far-seeing prophet-statesman anything but wise. He condemned the policy and the men who advocated it as utterly opposed to J'', and accused them of knowingly disobeying Him (cf. 22, 28 7-29, 29 1-16, 30 8-17, 32 9-14). It is difficult to hold that H. was not condemned as well as his advisers. And when the crisis came, and the Assyrians were ravaging the land, Isaiah did not hesitate to condemn not only the false confidence in religious forms, but the injustice and wrong that were everywhere prevalent under H.'s administration (Is 1 1-23; cf. Mi 3 1-12).

In 701 B.C. Sennacherib, after crushing Merodach-baladan, appeared in the West with a large army, defeated the allied rebels at Elteku, took or received the surrender of the Philistine cities, took and plundered 46 cities of Judah, counting out 200,000 captives, and sent to H. demanding an immense indemnity (30 talents of gold, 300 [800 in S.'s inscription] of silver and many other valuables). H. stripped Temple and palace and emptied his treasury to comply with the demand. He also released Padi (II K 18 13-16; Is 36 6; Insc. of S.). But the great king was not satisfied and sent a second time to H. demanding the surrender of Jerusalem. H. was in despair and might have yielded had it not been for the counsel of Isaiah who, disregarding the previous disobedience of H., encouraged him to refuse the demand of Sennacherib, predicting that the Assyrian would soon be called home by disquieting news and fail in his purpose to take Jerusalem (cf. Is 10 5-34, 14 24-27, 17 12-14, 31 5-9, 30 27-33, 33, 36 1-37 35; II K 18 17-19 34). The narrative in II K 18 17-19 34 (with the || in Is) consists of two accounts (1) 18 17-19 7 and (2) 19 8-34 of which (2) seems to be a later and less accurate story of the same events as are narrated in (1). Sennacherib's army met with some misfortune (pestilence?) as it was advancing toward Egypt (II K 19 35), and this, with rumors of trouble at home, caused him to return to Assyria, taking with him immense booty, but having failed to capture Jerusalem and put an end to the Kingdom of Judah (II K 79 36). H. was saved, but as by fire, and Judah remained subject to Assyria's overlordship. The sickness of H. related in II K 20 1-11 seems to have occurred during the crisis of the Assyrian invasion (ver. 8).

The impression produced by study of Isaiah's messages is that H. was intensely anti-Assyrian, and in carrying out this policy he and his advisers deliberately rejected the counsel and warnings of Isaiah. There is nothing in Is to indicate that H. was a docile pupil of the prophet as he is often represented to have been. And also in both Is and Mi the moral conditions prevailing in H.'s day are viewed as very corrupt. On the other hand, the judgment pronounced upon him in II K is extremely favorable. Here (II K 18 2-8, especially vs. 3-7) he is represented as absolutely loyal to J'', as having reformed religious conditions, and as having been greatly prospered in his political policy. As to the last point we know that the statement in II K is quite at variance with the facts, for he brought great disaster on his realm by his rash rebellion against Assyria. Is the representation in II K as to the other two points any more reliable? One may say, yes; but not for the beginning of his reign. The only way the picture drawn in II K 18 3-7 can be saved from flat contradiction with the impression one gains from Is and Mi is on the supposition that H. was brought to his senses by the terrible experiences of the Assyrian invasion and while that was in process, and after it had passed, he became a humbled and penitent man. It was then that he gave serious attention to the warnings and rebukes uttered in the name of J'' by Isaiah and Micah. He repented (cf. Jer 26 16-19) and also probably did something in the way of reforming conditions at the Temple. The devastation by the Assyrians of most of the cities of Judah except Jerusalem, and the salvation of the latter with the Temple, due it was believed to J'''s special regard for His great Sanctuary, must have favored, if it did not originate, the idea that the Temple was the one sanctuary where J'' was really present and where the worship was acceptable to Him. This gives an adequate reason for the removal or prohibition by H. of worship at the 'high places' (i.e., sanctuaries other than the Temple), and probably the attempt was made to carry out some such measure. But it could have been only partially successful, as the later reform of Josiah shows. There is no cogent evidence to show that H.'s Temple-reform was suggested or guided by Isaiah.

HIDDAI, hid'də-ai or hid'dē (הִידַי, hiddai): One of David's heroes, from near Mt. Gaash (II S 23 30), called Hurai in I Ch 11 32.

HIDDEKEL, hid'de-kel. See TIGRIS.

HIEL, hai'al (חִיל, hī'el), 'El lives': A Beth-elite, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (I K 16 34), and brought upon himself the curse of Joshua (Jos 6 26). A building accident may have caused the death of his two sons, or they may have been sacrificed to insure the stability of the foundation and wall. Cf. Macalister, Bible Side Lights from the Mound of Gezer (1907), p. 165 f. C. S. T.

HIERAPOLIS, hai'rap'o-lis (Ἱερά Πολις): A Phrygian city between the Mæander and Lycus rivers. H. grew up around a shrine of Cybele, the sacred nature of which was enhanced by two natural phenomena: hot mineral (medicinal) springs and the Ploutonium. The water of the springs, charged with carbonate of lime, rapidly forms an incrustation on anything over which it flows (it has raised the ancient level 15-20 ft., and has partially covered many of the ancient buildings). It now falls from numerous pool-basins in cascades (white stalactites) over a precipice 100 ft. high. The site is visible from afar (called 'Cotton Castle'). The Ploutonium, or 'Entrance to Hades,' was a narrow hole in the ground which emitted fumes deadly to all breathing them (eunuch priests of Cybele alone were immune). The former 'city of the hieron' (Hieropolis) became under Greek influence Hieropolis, the 'sacred city.' The local form of the mother-goddess was Leto; that of the god Lairbenos. The mineral water was efficacious for rheumatism and well adapted to dyeing, hence gilds of dyers flourished here. Christianity was introduced into H. in connection with Paul's mission work at Ephesus (Ac 19 10. Cf. Col 4 13 f.). John and Philip labored here. H. was the home of Papias (70-130 A.D.). In 320 A.D. H. was wholly Christian, and the mouth of the Ploutonium was closed. Cybele-worship and the woolen industries made H. wealthy, as attested by its vast ruins, both pagan and Christian. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

HIGGAION, hig-gai'yen: A word of debated meaning that occurs apparently as a rubric, or musical direction, in Ps 9 16 (with selāh), but also in the text proper of Ps 19 14 ('meditation' RV), 92 3 ('solemn sound' RV), and La 3 62 ('imagination'

RV, better 'murmuring' or 'muttering'). The versions of the LXX. render it in Ps 9 by various words, mostly meaning 'song' (ὕμνος, μέλος, φθογγή, etc.). Its derivation would favor some meaning like 'meditative murmur,' a low, unobtrusive sound, a talking to oneself. W. S. P.

HIGH, MOST. See GOD, § 1.

HIGH PLACE: This is the literal rendering of the Heb. bāmāh, which, while often meaning simply 'heights' or 'elevations of land' (cf. Dt 32 13; II S 1 19, 25; Am 4 13; Mic 1 3), is most frequently used of places of worship located on such heights (I S 9 12-25, etc.), and then of sanctuaries in general, irrespective of their location. The ancient Semites appear to have looked upon a hilltop as especially suitable for places of worship. When Israel entered Canaan the land was dotted with these 'high-place' sanctuaries. The term became the general one for a local sanctuary, and was used even when the 'high place' was not on an elevation. The Israelite conquerors appropriated many of these to their own worship of J'', altho retaining many of the features common to the old Canaanite worship. Throughout the preprophetic literature there is nothing to indicate that this was considered contrary to Israel's religion. Such a passage as Ex 20 24, in fact, expressly sanctions such sanctuaries, since a place where J'' recorded His name was likely to become a 'high place' (i.e., a local sanctuary). These local sanctuaries were numerous in ancient Israel. Mizpah in Gilead (Jg 11 11), Dan (Jg 18 29 ff.), Bethel (Gn 12 8, 28 20-22; Jg 20 26 f., 21 2; I S 10 3; Am 7 13), Mizpah in central Israel (Jg 20 1; I S 7 6), Gibeon (I K 3 4; note the apology in ver. 2, and the apologetic reason given in II Ch 1 3), Ramah (I S 7 17, 9 12 ff., used by Samuel), Gilgal (I S 10 8, 11 15; Am 4 4, 5 6), Nob (I S 21 2), Bethlehem (I S 20 6, 29), Hebron (II S 5 1 ff., 15 7), Beersheba (Gn 21 33; Am 5 5)—all these, and doubtless many others, were 'high places' whose altars even Elijah held in highest honor (I K 19 10, 14). In the course of time the popular worship at these places degenerated, becoming more sensual. In the 8th cent. Amos, and especially Hosea, severely condemned it; cf. Am 2 7, 4 4 ff.; Hos 5 12 ff.; Jer 2 20 ff., 3 1 ff., etc. The Code of Dt placed all these sanctuaries under the ban by prescribing that only in one place (Jerusalem) should sacrifices be offered (Dt 12), while the hortatory sections of Dt severely condemned all Canaanite forms of worship. It was in consequence of the public adoption of Dt in the reform under Josiah (621 B.C.) that these ideas became authoritative. The Books of Kings, edited in the spirit of Dt, consequently viewed all high places as illegitimate and condemned the kings of Judah who (in all innocence) had not prohibited the worship at their altars. HIGHWAY. See WAY.

HILEN, hai'len. See HOLON.

HILKIAH, hil-kai'a (חִלְקִיָּא, hīlqiyāhū), 'my portion is J'': 1. A son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite in the reign of David (I Ch 26 11). 2. The father of Eliakim, the steward of Hezekiah (II K 18 18 ff.). 3. A son of Shallum (I Ch 6 13), and high priest during the reign of Josiah. He discovered the Book of the Law, which revealed to the king the great need for a reformation (II K 22 4 ff.). 4. A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 45). 5. A priest residing at Anathoth, and father of Jeremiah the prophet (Jer 1 1). 6. A priest contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8 4, 11 11, 12 7, 21). 7. The father of Gemariah (Jer 29 3), probably the same as 3.

HILL, HILL-COUNTRY: In both the AV and RV the Heb. gibh'ah is always translated by 'hill,' when it is not used as the name of a town situated on a hill (Jos 24 33; Jg 19 16; I S 11 4). In a few other passages it might be understood as a proper name (cf. Jos 5 3; Jg 7 1; II S 2 24). It is the Heb. term for isolated elevations which can not be classed as mountains. In poetical passages, however, it is used as parallel with 'mountain' (Is 42 15, 55 12; cf. Gn 49 26; Dt 33 15). The idolatrous rites of the Canaanites, which were adopted in part by Israel, took place on the 'hills' (Is 65 7; Jer 13 27; cf. Dt 12 2; II K 17 10; Hos 4 13, etc.). In the AV (I S 9 11) ma'aleh is translated 'hill.' RV has it correctly 'ascent.' In Is 5 1 geren ('the horn,' or 'top') is translated 'hill.' The RV translates 'ophel ('the height' in a fortified city, and especially the name of an elevation on the SE. portion of the Temple Hill, II Ch 27 3, 33 14; Neh 3 26 f.) by 'hill' (II K 5 24; Is 32 14; Mic 4 8). In the N T 'hill' is the translation of βουνός (Lk 3 5, 23 30) and ὄρος (Mt 5 14; Lk 4 29, 9 37 AV). In the AV we find 'hill' as the translation of har, which is a much more general term than gibh'ah. In most instances the RV has more correctly used 'mountain' (Ex 24 4; Nu 14 44; I K 11 7, etc.). The Heb. har means a 'mountain' or 'mountain range,' and also a 'mountainous region'; with this last meaning it is translated in the AV (Jos 13 6, 21 11; cf. Lk 1 39, 65) 'hill-country,' but elsewhere 'mound' or 'mountains.' The RV uses 'hill-country' more frequently and uniformly for the mountainous tracts of country on both sides of the Jordan (Dt 2 37, 3 12). From a distance they have the appearance of one mountain. It is used also of the whole mountain range of W. Palestine (Dt 1 7, 19, 20), which is divided into the 'hill-country of Judah' (Jos 11 21, 20 7, etc.) and the 'hill-country of Ephraim' (Jos 17 15, 18 12; Jg 2 9; I K 12 25, etc.). In Jos 20 7 the 'hill-country of Naphtali' is mentioned. See PALESTINE, §§ 4 ff.

HIRAH, hai'ra (ררר, hīrāh): An Adullamite, a friend of Judah (Gn 38 1, 12; cf. Gn 38 20 f.).

C. S. T.

HIRAM, hai'rem (ררר, hīrām), probably from 'āhīrām, 'exalted brother'; an alternate form in Chronicles is HURAM: 1. A king of Tyre whose reign overlapped the last portion of David's and the first of Solomon's (II S 5 11; I K 5 1). Josephus (Ant. VIII, 2 4-9, 5 3; cf. Cont. Ap. I, 17 f.) testifies that Hiram was the son of Abibaal and reigned thirty-four years, dying at the age of fifty-three. But II S represents him as offering aid to David toward the building of his palace immediately after the latter's settlement at Jerusalem, or in the eighth year of his reign, and I K alludes to him as still living in the twentieth year of Solomon, thus giving his reign not less than fifty-two years. The difficulty has been met by the supposition that the order of II S is not chronological, the help given to David having come at the end of that king's reign. Others assume a corruption of text in II S, or a corruption, or error, in Josephus' account. A better explanation is that the H. of II S is the Abibaal of Josephus. Of the two names, however, that used by Josephus is only an official title. H.'s reign constitutes the Golden Age of the history of Phenicia. For his services in the building of the Temple, Solomon offered him twenty cities in Galilee, which he declined. The relations of H. and Solomon were, on the whole, intimate and friendly. 2. The artificer whom the king of Tyre sent to Solomon to assist in the completion and decoration of the Temple (I K 7 13, 40, 43; II Ch 2 13, 4 11, 16). He was the offspring of a mixed marriage, his mother being either a Danitess (I K 7 14) or the widow of a man of Naphtali, and his father a Tyrian. His name is given also as Hūrām-ābhī (II Ch 2 13 Heb. text).

HIRELING (or hired servant, sākhīr, μισθωτός, misothōtós): The man who works for wages, and not a mere slave ('servant'). While ordinary day-labor was not unknown in Palestine (cf. Mt 20 1, 7), probably it was quite usual for men to be hired for stipulated periods (cf. Lv 25 50-55; Is 16 14). The Law protected the rights of such (cf. 19 13, 25 50 ff.; Dt 24 14 f.). In the N T cf. Lk 15 17, 19; Jn 10 12 f.

HISTORY. This word is the RV rendering of dibhrē, 'words [of],' ('book' AV), in I Ch 29 29; II Ch 9 29, 12 15, 30 34, 33 19, where reference is made to writings alleged to have been written by Samuel, Nathan, etc., some of which may have been among the sources used by the Chronicler. None of these can be thought of as genuine.

HITTITE, hit'ait (ררר, hittī, pl. ררר, hittīm, Egyptian hetā, Assy. hatti): For the general history of this people see ASIA MINOR, I; and for the question as to Hittites in Palestine, see HETH.

HIVITE, hai'vait (ררר, hīvūt): A petty tribe of Canaan, which was conquered by the Israelites. They seem to have inhabited central Palestine, for they are found chiefly at Gibeon (Jos 9 7) and Shechem (Gn 34 2). They scarcely could have pushed their way as far N. as Lebanon (consequently instead of 'Hivite' read 'Hittite' in II S 24 7). Racially they were closely connected with the Amorites; in fact the most recent research indicates that the Hivites were a sub-division of this people

(cf. the LXX. of Is 17 9). Many take 'Hivite' as a descriptive adjective rather than an ethnological term. If this view be correct, it signifies a tent-dweller (Lat. Paganus). In and after the reign of Solomon, the Hivites who had not been assimilated by the Israelites were subjected to forced labor (I K 9 20 f.). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

J. A. K.

HIZKI, hiz'kai (חִזְקִי, hizqī): A Benjamite (I Ch 3 17, Hezeki AV). E. E. N.

HIZKIAH, hiz-kai'a, HIZKIJAH, hiz-kai'ja (חִזְקִיָּה, hizqiyāh, usually vocalized to spell Hezekiah, q.v.): A postexilic descendant of David (I Ch 3 23). See also HEZEKIAH, 2.

HOBAB, hō'bab (חֻבַּב, hōbhābh), 'beloved': A man whom Moses pressed into service as the guide of the tribes of Israel through the wilderness (Nu 10 29-32). He was related to Moses by marriage, but the exact nature of this relation remains an unsolved question. According to EVV (Jg 4 11) he was Moses' brother-in-law. In Nu 10 29 the same Heb. word is rendered 'father-in-law.' But, as in the last-named passage, the word 'father-in-law' may with equal propriety be regarded as applying to Reuel, it is more likely that H. was a brother of Zipporah, the wife of Moses. The two passages also differ in that Nu makes him a Midianite and Jg a Kenite. The Kenites, however, may have been a Midianite clan.

A. C. Z.

HOBAB, hō'ba (חֻבַּב, hōbhāh): The place to which Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer and his allies. It was on the 'left hand' (i.e., N.) of Damascus (Gn 14 15). A spring, Hoba, about 50 m. N. of Damascus, may indicate the locality.

HOBABIAH, ho-bē'ya. See HABABIAH.

HOCK (hough AV): A verb meaning to cut the cords of the hock joints of horses in order to render them unfit for use (Jos 11 6, 9; II S 8 4; I Ch 18 4). See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6; and WARFARE, § 5.

HOD, hed (הוֹד, hōdh), 'glory': An Asherite (I Ch 7 37).

HODABIAH, ho-dē'ya, HODAVIAH, hed''a-vai'a, HODEVAH, hō-dī-va; three variant forms of the same name (הוֹדִיָּה, hōdhyāhū), meaning 'praise J''': 1. Apparently the name of a son of Haddanai (I Ch 5 24). 2. A son of Elieonai (I Ch 3 24). 3. A son of Hassenuah (I Ch 9 7). 4. The ancestral head of a family of Levites (Ezr 2 40=Neh 7 43, called 'Judah' in Ezr 3 9).

HODESH, hō'desh (חֹדֶשׁ, hōdesh), 'new moon' (i.e., 'born at the new-moon feast?'): The wife of Shaharaim (I Ch 8 9).

HODIAH, ho-dai'a, HODIJAH, ho-dai'ja (הוֹדִיָּה, hōdhyāh), 'J'' is my glory': 1. The name of a man (as in RV), not of a woman (AV) (I Ch 4 19). 2. The name of several individuals, or families, in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8 7, 9 5, 10 10, 13, 18).

† HOGLAH, hog'la (הוֹגְלָה, hoglāh), 'partridge': One of the 'daughters' of Zelophehad. Probably a clan- or place-name (Nu 26 33, 27 1, 36 11; Jos 17 3).

HOHAM, hō'ham (חֹהָם, hōhām): The Canaanite king of Hebron, one of the confederates against Gibeon, defeated by Joshua (Jos 10 3 π.).

HOLD: A word frequently used in AV as the rendering of: (1) mētsādh, mētsūdhāh, 'a mountain fastness' or 'stronghold' (cf. I S 22 4, etc.). In a number of these references the cave of Adullam seems to be meant. (2) ts'riah, the meaning of which is uncertain in Jg 9 46, 49, tho in I S 13 6 it evidently means a hiding-place, and is rendered 'pits.' In all such instances ARV gives 'stronghold.' (3) τῆρησις (Ac 4 3, 'ward' RV), 'a place of confinement.' (4) φυλακή (Rev 18 2), 'a prison.'

HOLINESS: 1. Notion of Tabu. In the O T 'holiness' is the rendering of qōdhash (Ex 15 11, etc.); in the N T of ἁγιότης (Lk 1 75; Eph 4 24), ἁγιότης (II Co 1 12; He 12 10), and ἁγιωσύνη (Ro 1 4, etc.); holy, renders qādhōsh (Ex 19 6, etc.), also rarely hāšīdh (Dt 33 8, RV 'godly,' etc.; ἅγιος (Mt 4 5); ἁγίος (I Co 9 13, RV 'sacred things'); ἅγιος (Ac 2 27). Among the ancient Oriental people, including the Semites, the idea of holiness appears to have been at first non-moral. At its root lies the notion of tabu, i.e., the prohibition of contact with some things from fear of harm, because of a mysterious and supernatural force in them (cf. J. G. Frazer, Golden Bough, 1900, I, 319 f., 387 f.; see Von Orelli, Religionsgeschichte, 1899, pp. 830 π.). But the notion of tabu taken up into Hebrew thought was subjected to a process of spiritualization, culminating in its becoming a unique ruling idea through the O T.

2. Separateness of God. The O T word qōdhash, is derived from a root kindred to that which means 'newness' (hādhāsh, so Dillmann; Delitzsch, however, associates it with the Sumerian kadistu, 'free from defect,' putting it into connection with sacrifice). But whatever the origin of the word, its usage is quite fixed; it means 'separateness' as the basis of relation to God; God's separateness, which requires the same in the creature's relation to Him; and an adequate conception of the notion of holiness, must therefore begin with the definition of it as God's uniqueness. God is holy, because He is God. His holiness is His divinity. It includes His majesty, His greatness, His exaltation, His matchlessness ('Who is like to thee, glorious in holiness' [Ex 15 11]; 'There is none holy as J'' [I S 2 2]). God swears by His holiness as He swears by Himself (Am 4 2, 6 8; Ps 60 6, 89 35; Is 45 23).

3. The Holy One. The name Holy One (of Israel), used predominantly in the prophetic period, is simply a qualitative equivalent for God (cf. Hos 11 12). This is shown in the parallelisms of expression, where the terms are interchangeable (the ascription of holiness to the deity, however, is not an exclusively Hebrew idea). The Phoenician inscriptions contain the phrase 'the holy gods.' According to Ezekiel, God reveals Himself as Jehovah, the God of Israel the mighty and true God, by sanctifying (i.e., manifesting) Himself in His holiness (20 41 f., 28 22, 36 23 38 16, 23, 39 7). Holiness, therefore, when predicated of J'', denotes not so much an attribute of His as the totality of His character. It distinguishes Him from all other beings.

4. Holiness and Moral Purity. When holiness came to be identified with divinity in its breadth, it necessarily placed supreme emphasis on moral excellence (purity), lifting this element to a determinative place in the conception. Hence, altho holiness and moral purity never seem to coalesce, yet absence of purity from a holy being becomes inconceivable when it is associated with godhead, for God is supremely pure (Hab 1 12 f.).

5. Holiness a Positive Quality. Furthermore, holiness is not a negative quality; it is not merely the absence of stain or corruption, but rather a positive force. It secures (1) resistance to all that is unholy. No one can come into the presence of God; for His presence is a consuming force (I S 6 20; Is 6 5; cf. also Ex 3 5). This is probably the connecting-link between the extra-biblical notion of tabu and holiness. When the positive energy of God's holiness was realized to be a force incompatible with the evil of sin, it undoubtedly worked a corresponding fear that creature weakness likewise might perish in His presence, because of its frailty and unworthiness.

(2) Self-impartation. What it does not destroy it changes into its own kind. If holiness in God is divinity, holiness in all must be grounded in and measured by its relation to God. Hence, those who are nearest to God are holiest. For this reason, to angels is attributed this characteristic; they are even called 'holy ones' (Job 5 1, 15 15; Dn 8 13), tho this does not mean that they are absolutely pure or perfect, for God finds folly in them (Job 4 18, 15 15). From this relation to Himself, which justifies their being called holy, they also receive the name of 'sons of God' (Job 38 7).

6. Holiness in Man. The holiness of human beings is based on their relation to God. But this relation requires both an outward and an inner character. As far as it is outward its ethical value lies simply in association with and serviceableness to God. It may be, therefore, merely formal. Priests are made holy as they are by a special ceremony set apart to the service of J' (Ex 29 1 ff.), and are to be distinguished and respected as such (Lv 21 8). Prophets likewise are called 'holy men of God' (II K 4 9; II P 1 21 AV), and become holy by appointment of God (Jer 1 5). The Nazirite during the days of his separation was to be called holy (Nu 6 5). In this sense the men with David at Nob are called holy (I S 21 5 f.), and the whole nation was holy (Dt 7 6, 14 2).

7. Holiness and Righteousness. Human holiness, as an attribute of character, is by the same reasoning dependent on a true relation to God, but goes deeper into one's inner being. Its mainspring and controlling principle are the realization of God's true character ('ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy,' Lv 19 1). In this command the so called Law of Holiness is summed up. Such holiness must be attained by perfect conformity to the will of J', but, in accordance with the whole conception of the O T, this will is expressed in a system of precepts including both moral and ceremonial prescriptions. At the heart of the system lies the moral element; and in the purer outbursts of devotional feeling it extricates itself and finds expression in its simplicity (Ps 15 1-5, 24 3).

8. Holiness of Things. The holiness of impersonal beings is determined by their introduction into the service of religion, or, in general, into relation with God. Heaven as God's habitation is expressly called holy (Jer 25 30; Zec 2 13). Upon earth the places in which He appears to men are holy ground (Ex 3 5; Jos 5 15). Most naturally the Temple, in which He had His mercy-seat and which is His house, deserves this epithet (Hab 2 20), and to its parts, according to the degree of nearness to His most intimate throne, are ascribed higher degrees of sanctity. So also Mount Zion and the whole city of Jerusalem (Is 11 9, 27 13, 48 2, 52 1; Dn 9 16, 20, 24; Zeph 3 11), and even the whole country in which God's people are to dwell, are made sharers in its holiness (Ex 15 13; Zec 2 13). Further, the articles to be used in His service, such as the showbread (I S 21 6), the incense (Ex 30 35, 37), the oil (Ex 30 25), the sacrifices (Ex 28 38), and the priestly garments (Ezk 42 14) are all declared holy.

9. Holiness and Ceremonial Cleanness. The relation of the idea of ceremonial holiness to that of ceremonial cleanness is not simple. In general, these differ in degree or intensity (cf. PURIFICATION). That which is holy may be declared not clean ceremonially, and that which is clean may not be holy. The holy is declared unclean in order that it may not be touched without penalty. The distinction may be put in the convenient formula that the common and permissible stand between the two extremes, unclean and holy, both of which, but for ultimately different and contrary reasons, are prohibited. The distinction is illustrated in the rabbinical rule, 'All holy Scriptures defile the hands' (Ryle, Canon of O T, 1892, p. 199).

10. Holiness in N T. In the N T the idea of holiness attains its completely spiritual stage. The standard pronounced for it is the sinlessness of Jesus Christ. The etymology of the words employed can not be pressed. The sense of these words is already fixed. They are not chosen for their etymological connotations. Accordingly, to give the essence of the N T idea would be simply to repeat that God only is absolutely holy (I P 1 16); all other holiness is derivative. But God is holy because He is morally good. And both impersonal and personal beings become holy by association with and assimilation to Him. Those who have entered into the ideal relation with God, as given in the person and teaching of Christ, are holy ones (saints).

HOLY SPIRIT: The name given in the O T to certain phases of the action of God upon nature and man, and in the N T (Holy Ghost AV) to the inner workings of God upon the human soul, as these were conditioned by the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The name is thus given in Christian theology to the third person of the Trinity.

1. In the O T. The word 'spirit' (Heb. רוּחַ, rūah, Gr. πνεῦμα) originally meant 'breath.' In the act of breathing, probably, all primitive peoples have found the seat of life. For when death comes, it is breathing which first seems to stop, and in the last act of expiration the soul departs from the body. Hence most languages have used the same word, both for the breath or the wind, and for the mysterious self or seat of life, even long after the crude first conceptions of the latter had been transcended. The Hebrews with their bold anthropomorphism applied this term to God Himself, primarily as exerting power, and thus gave it a place of supreme importance in the religion of revelation. (1) Thus they conceived of Jehovah as ruling over the powers of the natural world by His Spirit (Gn 1 2; Job 26 13, 37 10; Is 40 7), but the allusions to this sphere of action are not numerous. (2) Much more numerous are those which describe man's life as due to the power of the Spirit of Jehovah (Gn 2 7; Job 33 4; Ps 104 29 f.; Ec 3 18-21; Ezk 37 3-14). In this view, the life of man is more than a mere effect of the Spirit of God. It is that Spirit in a special form and manifestation. The metaphysical problems were not yet in sight. With complete naïveté the individual life was thus pictured as a work of the Spirit of God which, when life ceased, returned, not as a human soul, but as the product or creation of the Spirit of God to Him who gave it. (3) A further step is involved where the Spirit of Jehovah is associated with the performance of special feats of strength, valor, or skill, in the service of the theocratic kingdom (Jg 3 10, 6 34, 11 20, 14 6; I S 11 6). So far, however, the activities of the Spirit are a mere manifold, and their unity or ethical character is not discerned. (4) This doctrine attains a new and most characteristic form when it is connected with the work of the prophets. True, other religions had their prophets (as the prophets of Baal, I K 18 19), but prophecy in Israel possessed features which are unique and traceable only to the selective will and purpose of God (cf. Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, ch. I; A. B. Davidson, Old Testament Prophecy, chs. I, IX, X). No other people attributed their prophetic prowess to the Spirit of their God. This was peculiar to Israel, and was one of the vital elements in the development of their whole view of God, and His relation to men. At first, as in all else, this feature of Divine revelation connects itself with the crude beginnings of what later became distinctive and complete. Prophecy appeared in connection with abnormal excitation, and these states of frenzy and ecstasy were taken as manifest proofs of the Spirit's presence and power (I S 10 6, 10, 19 2, 20, 23 f.). At times J" even sent forth a 'lying spirit' (I K 22 21 ff.). But gradually this view gave way to a higher one, according to which the Spirit of J" possessed the mind and heart of men, who were not subjects of physical convulsions, but who were in living communion with Himself (Mic 2 7, 3 8; Hos 9 7; Ezk 2 2, 3 12, 14, 24, etc.; Neh 9 30; I Ch 12 18; II Ch 15 1). This was accompanied by the growth of the conception that the Holy Spirit controlled the history of Israel as a whole (Neh 9 20 ff.; Is 63 10-14), and above all was guiding it toward the Messianic Age, in which the Spirit would come upon all God's people (Ezk 36 26 f., 39 20; Is 4 4, 44 3; Zec 4 6; Jl 2 28 f.). The more direct connection of the work of the Spirit with man's moral and spiritual experience appears in the directly Messianic prophecies, especially as they gather round the figure of the Servant of Jehovah (cf. Is 11 2, 4, 42 1, 59 21, 61 1). (5) Beyond this, passages are not wanting which view the Holy Spirit as connected with the inner experience of the individual (Ps 51 10 f., 139 7, 143 10). It was reserved for a later stage of revelation to bring this into full view.

Throughout this O T usage of the words 'Holy Spirit, or 'Spirit of Jehovah,' we do not find any attempt to define these terms. There is in certain passages (Ps 51 10; Is 48 16, 63 10-14; Ezk, passim) a tendency to hypostatize the Spirit. But even there we can not assert that a distinct subsistence is attributed to it. It may be still either a personification of an attribute or a periphrastic expression for Jehovah Himself. And yet the persistent, deliberate concentration of thought upon the idea of the Spirit of Jehovah as coming forth to deal with human nature and history has confessedly produced this tendency to use language which at least is not inconsistent with, and to a later age may even sound like the recognition of distinctions within the Divine nature. This was a stage through which the minds of men were compelled to pass.

2. In the N T. The Gospels. When we enter upon the N T we find the doctrine of the Spirit marvelously enriched, the main idea involved being still that of power. Professor Wood has pointed out that in the Jewish period (in the apocryphal lit.) the Spirit is used to describe God's relation to Israel in the past (O T hist.) and in the future (Messianic hope), but that no one claimed the gift of the Spirit for himself or his contemporaries. The spirit of prophecy had ceased. The N T is filled with the fact that the Messianic Age had now arrived and the ancient promise that the Holy Spirit would be no official or esoteric boon, but be poured out upon 'all flesh' was now made good (Ac 2 4, 17 f., 33, 38). (1) This age was heralded by the revival of the prophetic gift in the case of John the Baptist (Lk 1 15-17; cf. 1 41, 67, 2 25-27, 36). But he himself claimed it not, conscious of the surpassing glory of the kingdom which was at hand (Mk 1 8, 10; Mt 3 11, 16; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 32 f.). (2) The Messiah Himself, Jesus of Nazareth, stood in relations to the Spirit of God which were all His own, and which yet were the channel through which He entered into His new action upon human history. (a) Even within the apostolic period accounts had arisen of the new foundations for His very self and nature, some accounts tracing these to the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit (Mt 1 18, 20; Lk 1 35; cf. Jn 1 14). (b) All the Gospels affirm the descent of the Spirit upon Him at His baptism (Mk 1 10, 12; Mt 3 16, 41; Lk 3 22, 4 1, 14; Jn 1 32 f.). (c) Thus, Jesus asserts that the Messianic prophecy (Is 61 1) is fulfilled in His person (Lk 4 18; cf. Mt. 12 18, 28, 32; Jn 3 34). Without signalizing more than one or two details, the Evangelists leave us to infer from the Divine power manifest in His words and deeds, that He was Spirit-filled. And yet, in His own recorded sayings the mention of the Spirit does not occur often. 'It is significant that in no case does Christ speak of the Spirit as acting upon his followers while he is present with them. He would keep the thought of the disciples fixed upon himself as the revelation of the Father' (I. H. Wood, ut inf., p. 137; cf. pp. 141-143). Possibly, too, for Jesus' mind the idea of His Spirit was included in that of the kingdom as an order of supernatural powers. (d) Apart from Mt 12 28 (cf. Lk 11 20) and Lk 11 13 (cf. Mt 7 11), we have one reference to the prophetic action of the Spirit in the O T (Mt 22 43), one terrible warning that in resisting Him the Jewish leaders were in danger of the supreme sin (Mt 12 31 f.; Mk 3 29), one promise that the Spirit will aid His disciples in future emergencies (Mt 10 20; Mk 13 11; Lk 12 12), and the final command to baptize 'into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit' (Mt 28 19).

In the Fourth Gospel our Lord is represented as speaking at great length regarding the Spirit with His disciples at their last gathering. His previous references are even more sparse than in the Synoptics (Jn 3 5-8, 6 63), and the Spirit's coming is declared (by the Evangelist, however, not by Jesus) to be conditioned by Jesus' being glorified (7 39). But the last discourses glow with references to the coming of the Spirit, as to the supreme gift of God and the supreme experiences of man. (a) The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of truth, the paraclete, the comforter, without whom even the person and work of Christ in their hearts would not be complete (16 7-13a). (b) He will open up to them the truth in its fulness as Jesus taught it (14 26) and as it concerned their destiny (16 13). (c) He will not give a new revelation to supersede that of Jesus, but will unfold to their hearts and minds the whole meaning and power of Jesus Himself (15 26, 16 14 f.). (d) This Holy Spirit is sent by the Father in Christ's name (14 26); He is also sent by Christ (16 7), 'from the Father' (15 26), but He also 'comes' (16 7). It seems violent to say that these passages either merely personify a mode of the Divine action, or so identify the Spirit with God that He is in no way distinguished from the Father. While no ontological definition is given, it is not too much to say that an ontological distinction is involved in this mode of speech.

3. Acts and Epistles. Judging by the mere number of our Lord's references to the Holy Spirit, we should be quite unprepared for the extraordinary phenomena disclosed in the remainder of the N T as to His presence and power. (1) In the Book of Acts, we find events which remind us of the O T. The entrance upon the new age is marked by excitements which affect even the physical life (Ac 2 2-4, 15 f., 33, 38). Like phenomena occur repeatedly, not only to Jews (9 17), but to Samaritans (8 15-19) and to Gentiles (10 44, 11 15). (2) Among the more striking results were the strange gift of tongues (I Co chs. 12-14), working of miracles (Ac 13 9 ff.; I Co. 12 10, 29; Gal 3 5), prophecy (Ac 11 28, 21 4, 10 f.). (3) In the Epistles of Paul we find abundant references to the Holy Spirit. There are apparently two main points of departure, in addition to his knowledge of the O T and the influence of the Christian community, into whose atmosphere his conversion brought him, viz., his own experiences of the transforming power of the Gospel as the organ of God's Spirit, and the connection of the Holy Spirit with the person and work of Jesus Christ. (a) The inner power of the Spirit is found in the new consciousness of sonship toward God (Gal 4 6; Ro 8 9, 16), through apprehension of God's love and mercy (Ro 5 5; Tit 3 4-6). This Spirit is the means of our approach to God (Ro 8 12 f.; Eph 2 18; Ph 2 1, 3 3); the enlightener of our minds (I Co 2 10-16); the source of our power, as individual Christians (Eph 3 16) and as preachers (Ro 15 19; I Co 2 4); the seal of our acceptance with God and the earnest of our immortal life (Ro 8 15 f.; I Co 6 11; II Co 1 22; Eph 1 13 f., 4 30); the stimulator of acts of worship (I Co 14 2, 12, 14 f.); the bond of Christian communion (I Co 12 13; II Co 13 14; Ph 2 1); the life of the Church, 'the body of Christ' (Eph 4 4; I Co 6 19, 20). See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, §§ 5 ff. The Church is founded on the confession of Jesus as Messiah, a confession which is due to the Holy Spirit (I Co 12 3; cf. I Jn 4 2 f.); the confessor passes under 'the law of the Spirit of life' (Ro 8 2), his whole ethical and religious experience flows from that new principle (Ro 8 5-10, 12-14), the new warfare of which he is conscious is the proof of that Spirit's living presence in him (Gal 5 16 f.), and his reception of the Spirit means the possession of all the present virtues and joys (Gal 5 22). Paul's teaching on the effects of the Spirit in human life marks an epoch-making change of emphasis from abnormal phenomena to Christian character, from what is intermittent to what is ethical and permanent. (b) The Holy Spirit is constantly connected with the person and work of Christ. The Spirit without the historical Christ has no grip on intelligent faith, the historical Christ without the inner power of the Spirit has no meaning or relation to the individual will. The Spirit is 'of Christ' as well as 'of God' (Ro 8 9); in Him was the Spirit of holiness (Ro 1 4), and it is even said 'the Lord is the Spirit' (II Co 3 17 f.). Accordingly, the effects of the Divine grace in the heart are traceable to both (Gal 4 6; Eph 3 16 f.). As was said of the Johannine, so of the Pauline teaching, the Holy Spirit is both distinguished from, and identified with, both Christ and God. No theological explanation is attempted. Something greater is here, the disclosure in the field of experience through inspired men of the threefold operation of God upon human nature. That the Father, Son, and Spirit, thus revealed in relation to man, are described in mutual relations and in a fundamental identity is the conviction which underlies all the historical discussions of the doctrine of the Trinity.

HOMER. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

HONEST: (1) The AV use of this word to translate the adjective καλός, which means 'excellent,' 'beautiful,' 'good' (originally in an esthetic rather than moral sense), was in accord with the usage of its day (1611). In modern English the word 'honest' is of much more restricted meaning. Consequently, in RV 'honorable,' 'honorably' have been substituted (except in Lk 8 15) as more suitable renderings (cf. Ro 12 17; I P 2 12; etc.). (2) In Ph 4 8; I Ti 2 2 for σεμνός, σεμνότης ('grave,' 'venerable,' and 'gravity,' 'dignity'), RV gives 'honorable' and 'gravity.' (3) In Ro 13 13; I Th 4 12 the Gr. εὐσχημόνως is exactly rendered 'becoming' in ARV.

HONEY. See FOOD, § 7; and PALESTINE, § 26.

HOOD. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

HOOK: The translation of several Heb. words: (1) wāw, a 'hook,' or 'peg,' of silver fastened on, or in, the posts of the tabernacle to support hangings (Ex 26 32, 35 25, etc.). (2) ḥāḥ, a 'hook,' or 'ring,' for the nose, used in reference to captives (II K 19 28; Is 37 29; Ezk 29 4, 38 4. Also Ezk 19 4, 9 RV for 'chains' AV). (3) ḥakkāh, a 'fish-hook' (Job 41 1 [40 25]; Is 19 8; Hab 1 15 'angle' EV). (4) aghmōn (Job 41 2 [40 26]), 'hook' AV, more correctly 'cord' RV. (5) ḥōāh (Job 41 2 [40 26]), 'thorn' AV, 'hook' RV. (6) sh'phattayim (Ezk 40 43), 'hooks' or 'pegs'; by some translated 'their edge.' (7) tsinnāh (Am 4 2), the 'hook' or the 'barb' of a fishing-spear. (8) ἄγκιστρον (Mt 17 27), 'fish-hook,' C. S. T.

HOPOE, hū'pō. See PALESTINE, § 25.

HOPE: Both the elements of the generic idea of hope—i.e., expectation and desire for the thing expected—distinctly appear in the Biblical usage. As soon as that which is expected is realized, hope ceases (Ro 8 24). Further, the term sometimes designates the expectation itself, and sometimes the thing expected (Col 1 5 is an instance of the latter usage). Hope and faith are closely related, but whereas faith seizes upon the invisible in general, whether past, present, or future, hope is limited to the realization of future good. Faith as a living principle, however, includes true hope. The hope of the wicked shall come to naught (Pr 11 23, 24 20), but the hope of the righteous is not vain (Ps 115 11, 9 18, 37 5, 40 4). Hence the definition of faith in Heb 11 1 as 'the assurance of things hoped for.' The close association of the three basal elements of Christian experience, faith, hope, and love, is significantly indicated in such passages as I Th 1 3; Col 1 4 f.; I Co 13 13; Ro 5 1-11. It was a living hope, full of a sense of reality, that was born into the world by Christianity and with which the N T is vibrant throughout (cf. Ro 5 2 f., 8 24 f.; I P 1 3). The pagan world was 'without hope' (Eph 2 12).

HOPHNI, hef'nai (הֲפִנִי, hophni): One of the two sons of Eli, called 'base men' (I S 2 12, 'sons of Belial' AV). Hophni and Phineas were priests and through their selfish and arbitrary exercise of the priestly function brought disrepute upon the worship of J". For this they were twice rebuked (I S 2 27-36, 3 11). Both perished in the battle of Aphek, whither they had accompanied the Ark of the Covenant (I S 4 11 f.).

HOPHRA, hef'ra. See PHARAOH.

HOR, hōr (הָר, hōr): 1. A mountain-top on which Aaron died (Nu 20 22 f., 21 4 [P]; Dt 32 50, noted also as one of the stages in the wilderness wanderings, Nu 33 37), not far from Kadesh-barnea, identified with the modern Jebel Nebi Harun, about 50 m. S. of the Dead Sea, near Petra, by a tradition as old as Josephus (Ant. IV, 4 7) and supported by Jerome (Onom. 303, 144). This mountain is nearly 5,000 ft. in height and crowned by a rugged double peak. But Mount Hor is defined as 'by the border of the land of Edom'; and this description does not suit the location of Jebel Nebi Harun. H. C. Trumbull (Kadesh Barnea, pp. 128 ff.) probably is right in locating Mount Hor at Jebel Madurah, NW. of Edom (cf. Buhl, Edomiter, p. 22). 2. A peak named as the ideal N. boundary of Canaan in Nu 34 7, 8 [P]. There is nothing to determine its exact identity.

A. C. Z.

HORAM, hō'ram (רָאִם, hōrām): A Canaanite king of Gezer who was conquered and slain by Joshua (Jos 10 33, but cf. 16 10; Jg 1 29).

HOREB, hō'reb. See SINAI.

HOREM, hō'rem (רָמָה, hōrēm), 'sacred': A fortified city in Naphtali (Jos 19 38). Site unknown.

C. S. T.

HOR-HAGIDGAD, hōr'-ha-gid'gad (הָרִי הַגִּידְגָּד, hōr haggidgād): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 32 f.). The same as Gudgodah (Dt 10 7).

HORI, hō'rai, HORIM, hō'rim, HORITES, hō'-raits (הִרִי, הִרִים, hōrī, hōrīm): The original inhabitants of Edom or Mt. Seir, who were dispossessed by the Edomites (Gn 14 6, 36 2 [?], 20-29; Dt 2 12, 22; I Ch 1 39). The name is usually held as equivalent to 'cave-dwellers,' and as the primitive inhabitants of Palestine were of this character, this explanation seems most reasonable. In Edom, in particular, there are many evidences of this. The name was thus probably an epithet given them by their conquerors. The apparent connection between the Heb. hōrī and the old Egn. term haru for S.W. Pal. is not certain. E. E. N.

HORMAH, hēr'ma (הֶרְמָה, hormāh), 'devoted' (to deity, which could be understood in several senses): A city in the 'South.' Here the Israelites were defeated by the Canaanites (Nu 14 45; Dt 1 44), but later, apparently in the same place, won a victory over the Canaanite king of Arad (Nu 21 3). Similarly, Judah and Simeon, 'devoted' the Canaanites of Zephath to destruction, and then called the place Hormah (Jg 1 17). It is possible that the last two references (also Jos 12 14) are to the same event. H. was counted both to Judah and to Simeon (Jos 15 30, 19 4; cf. I S 30 30; I Ch 4 30). The site is uncertain. E. E. N.

HORN (קֶרֶן, qeren, κέρας): 1. Horns of cattle were used as substitutes for bottles, being made into flasks for carrying oil (I S 16 1; I K 1 39). Long horns (especially of rams) were also used as trumpets (Jos 6 5). 2. Its pointed shape makes the horn the emblem of a peak (Is 5 1, RVmg.). 3. Since an animal uses its horns as weapons, they are emblems of power (I K 22 11; Dn 8 3 ff.). To 'exalt the horn' is either to confirm power or to claim power for oneself (I S 2 10; Ps 75 4 f., 89 24). 4. The corners of the altar were also called horns (I K 1 50 f.) from the horn-like extensions with which they were finished off (Jos. BJ. V, 5 6). See also ALTAR, § 2; and MUSIC, § 3 (2). A. C. Z.

HORNET (תִּצְרָח, tsir'āh, from tsāra', 'to strike'): The hornet is named as a pest through which God was to drive out Israel's enemies from the land of promise (Ex 23 28; Dt 7 20). There is no record of a literal plague of hornets during the period of the conquest, unless Jos 24 12 be taken as such (as it is in Wis 12 8-10). See also PALESTINE, § 26.

HORONAIM, her'o-nē'im (חֲרוֹנַיִם, hōrōnāyim), 'two hollows': A city in S. Moab (Jer 48 3, 34; Is 15 5, 'the way of H.'). Jer 48 5, 'the descent of H.'). near Zoar. It is mentioned on the Moabite Stone as a city to which one descended. It was probably at the foot of some cliff, and S. of the Arnon. See also Map II, H 1. C. S. T.

HORONITE, hēr'o-nait (חֲרוֹנִי, hahōrōnī), 'the Horonite': A title given to Sanballat, who opposed Nehemiah (Neh 2 10, 19, 13 28), since he was from Beth-horon. C. S. T.

HORSE. The horse was a late-comer into Bible-lands. It was brought into the Tigris-Euphrates Valley by the invading Aryans (c. 2000 B.C.), and was not known in Egypt before the Hyksos invasion (c. 1700 B.C.). It was first used in war, especially with the chariot. When the Israelites conquered Canaan they did not know what to do with the horses of their conquered foes (Jos 11 9; cf. II S 8 4). See also PALESTINE, § 24; and WARFARE, § 4 f.

HORSE GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 32.

HORSELEACH: The Heb. term (עֲלֻגָּה, 'alagah) is of uncertain significance, and may mean 'sucker.' The reference (Pr 30 15) may be to a variety of leaches, or bloodsuckers, well known in the East and very troublesome to man and beast. Some scholars, however, think that a mythological vampire-like creature is referred to. E. E. N.

HORSEMEN. See WARFARE, § 4; (For Ezk 27 14 AV, see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13, under Togarmah.)

HOSAH, hō'sa (הֹסָה, hōsāh): I. A city on the NW. border of Asher, and apparently S. of Tyre (Jos 19 29). Site unknown, as the identification with Ushū of the Assy. and Usu of the Egypt. inscriptions is uncertain. II. The ancestral head of a division of the door-keepers of the Second Temple (I Ch 16 38, 26 10-16).

HOSANNA: An acclamation which occurs in the Gospels in the story of the triumphal entry (Mt 21 9, 15; Mk 11 9-10; Jn 12 13), being quoted from Ps 118 25. It is the Gr. form of the Heb. hōshā'āh-nā', 'Savel we pray.' The same expression occurs with the plural (of the object) in II K 19 19, and similar ones, without the particle of urgency, frequently in the Psalter. W. S. P.

HOSEA, ho-zī'a. 1. Personal History. Hosea (חֹשֵׁעַ, hōshēa', also Osee in N T [AV], identical with Hoshea and Joshua in derivation and meaning), the son of Beeri, the first of the minor prophets in the order given in the Hebrew canon. His ministry fell within the Assyrian period, which began with the middle of the 8th cent. B.C., and was located in the Northern Kingdom (Israel). According to the superscription of the book, he prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah (790-690 B.C.), and Jeroboam, the son of Joash, King of Israel (784-745 B.C.). While this superscription may be by a later hand, there is no doubt that it is in general correct. But it does not definitely fix the length of his prophetic ministry, as it does not indicate how much of the reigns of Uzziah and Hezekiah is to be included. Yet it may be safely inferred that the prophet was in public life not less than ten years and not more than thirty—i.e., from about 750 to about 730 B.C. Of his personal life and experiences nothing is known, except what is gathered from incidental allusions in his discourses. He was evidently a native as well as a prophet of the Northern Kingdom. He cherished a living interest in the affairs of his generation. Whether he occupied an official position of any sort it is not certain. Some have conjectured that he belonged to the guild of prophets, while others have inferred from his intimate knowledge of the corruptions of the priesthood that he was a priest. It is probable that he was a leading citizen of the realm.

2. Domestic Experience Used as a Parable. H.'s call to the prophetic work came in connection with a sad domestic experience. He married a woman (Gomer) who afterward proved unfaithful to him. When her eldest son was born, H. gave him the symbolical name of Jezreel, 'God sows (seed),' as appreciative of the Divine blessing on his marriage

(1 4). To the next child, a daughter, he gave the name 'Lo-ruhamah' (RVmg., 'that hath not obtained mercy,' 1 6). The next son was called 'Lommi' (RVmg., 'not my people,' 1 9). After this, Gomer left H., and became the slave concubine of a man who could better satisfy her love of luxurious living (2 5). But H. persisted in his affection for her, sought her out, and bought her back with the price of a slave. She was thus brought into the new relation of a slave to her husband. That all this is the story of an actual occurrence has been denied by some ancient and some modern scholars. It has been alleged that it would be unthinkable for God to command conduct so contrary to His own moral law; that it must have taken years to bring into view the significance of the Divine command, if the prophet's experience had been literally lived through; and that during this time the prophet must have endured mental agony on account of the compulsory but revolting relationship with an unchaste woman. But these considerations are based upon the supposition that the literal occurrence of the transaction followed the command; or that the statement that Hosea was bidden to 'take a wife of whoredom' (1 2) means that he was told to deliberately marry a harlot. The facts in the case do not bear out such an interpretation. A 'wife of whoredom' is not a prostitute, but a woman who has violated her marriage vow. The case rather stands thus: H., being married, discovered that his wife was unfaithful to him, and, realizing the strength of his own feelings of affection toward her, was led to find in this feeling an illustration of God's greater love for idolatrous Israel. In his taking back his unfaithful wife he was further led naturally to see God's willingness to forgive Israel and restore to it His favor. Inasmuch as this experience was manifestly under Divine guidance and control, he construed it as God's will that he should pass through it as a means of his prophetic equipment, and in the vivid style of the prophet represented it as God's command.

It is certain that Hosea often came into conflict with the priests of his day (4 9, 5 1, 6 9); but he relates nothing like the concrete dispute narrated by Amos out of his own experience (Am 7 10 ff.). H.'s character is distinguished by fulness of feeling, combined with a keen perception of spiritual truth, and courage in its expression.

3. Contents of Book of H. The Book of H. may be conveniently subdivided into two main parts. Chs. 1-3 are in narrative form and give the allegorization of his tragic domestic experience, as already explained. Chs. 4-14 are a series of denunciations, relieved by pleas in behalf of J'', addressed to the people (exhortations to turn from idolatry and sin). A more minute analysis of this section is not practicable (for an attempted analysis see Harper in ICC., Amos and Hosea, p. clx), partly because of the abrupt breaks and reiterations to which the prophet resorts in his passionate way of preaching his message. In general, however, the theme of the whole section is given in the opening words of 4 1: 'There is no truth, nor goodness, nor knowledge of God in the land.'

4. Condition of Text. The text of the book has been very much tampered with by later hands. A sufficient occasion for this was furnished by the obscurity of H.'s style. His utterances are at times ejaculatory. It is doubtful, however, whether the amount of corruption has not been largely exaggerated in recent efforts at criticism. Some instances where the text appears to be corrupt may be nothing more than the natural irregularities of the author's own method of expression, or the consequences of the arrangement of his discourses. These were no doubt at the beginning fragmentary.

5. Religious Message. H.'s religious message is one of the most profound and spiritual in the O T. While his earlier contemporary Amos stood for the righteousness of J'' and named righteousness of conduct as the one supreme demand of J'' (5 24), Hosea laid the emphasis on J'''s personality and pleaded for a truer conception of God as a personal being whose relation to His worshipers is that of an ethical personality. This means that man's response to God's demand must be in terms of personal devotion, with an intelligent appreciation of the Divine personality. J'' desires 'knowledge' of Himself and 'loving-kindness' (or 'goodness') more than sacrifices and burnt-offerings (Hos 6 6). For the cultus and the whole physical conception of the Divine nature on which it rested, Hosea had only condemnation. To him the idea at the basis of the whole ceremonial system was fundamentally mistaken. The highest and purest in human nature, Hosea felt, was the true if only partial key to the understanding of the perfect Divine personality. Rightly understood, Hosea is perhaps nearer to Jesus in his teaching than is any other O T prophet.

HOSEN: In 16th cent. English 'hosen' meant a garment covering the legs and hips much like very tight trousers. In Dn 3 21 RV we read 'their hosen, their tunics, and their mantles'; the AV reads 'their coats, their hosen, and their hats.' The Aramaic ṣarbāl ('hosen' RV, 'coats' AV) may perhaps mean 'mantle,' tho this is not certain. The word nallāsh or nēlāsh ('tunics' RV, 'hosen' AV) is still more obscure, and no probable meaning can be suggested (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, Daniel, in loc.). E. E. N.

HOSHAIH, ho-shē'yu (הוֹשִׁיָּהוּ, hōsha'āyāh), 'J'' saves': 1. The father of Jezaniah (or Azariah) (Jer 42 1, 43 2). 2. A prominent Jew in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 32).

HOSHAMA, hōsh'a-mā (חֹשָׁמָא, hōshāmā'), a shortened form (or error) for 'Jehoshama,' 'J'' has heard': A son of Jehoiachin, King of Judah (I Ch 3 18).

HOSHEA, ho-shī'a (חֹשִׁיָּהוּ, hōshēa'), 'salvation'; in Assy. inscriptions, Ausi': 1. The son of Elah, and the last king of Israel (733-722 B.C.) (II K 15 30, 17 1 ff.). Having assassinated Pekah, who had been defeated in his rebellion against Tiglathpileser III of Assyria, Hoshea was placed on the throne of a greatly reduced kingdom by the Assyrian king, with the understanding that he would be an obedient vassal. For a few years H. proved loyal to the king of Assyria, and then defaulted the usual tribute and ranged himself with Egypt in an anti-Assyrian movement. Shalmaneser V, 727-722 B.C. invaded his territory and laid siege to Samaria. Sargon, 722-705 B.C., completed the work of Shalmaneser, captured the city, and put an end to the kingdom of Israel. As to H.'s fate nothing is known certainly; probably he was slain or captured before the city of Samaria was taken. 2. The original name of Joshua, the son of Nun (Nu 13 8, Oshea AV; Dt 32 44). 3. A son of Azaziah, an Ephraimite chief under David (I Ch 27 20). 4. A Levite who, with others, set his seal to the covenant (Neh 10 23).

HOSPITALITY (φιλοξενία), 'love of strangers': Hospitality, as the act and habit of entertaining strangers, is not a purely Biblical or Oriental characteristic. The Greeks recognized it and sanctioned it by the doctrine of a patron of all travelers and strangers (cf. Zeus-Xenios. Hom. Odyss. IX, 270; XIV, 57). In the O T times the total absence of inns made the exercise of hospitality an indispensable condition of all enterprise, as well as an expression of kindness (cf. Abraham, Gn 18 13; cf. He 13 2; also other cases, Gn 19 2, 24 25; Jg 19 16). The Deuteronomic law expressly provides for the care of strangers (Dt 14 29). The neglect of hospitality was a defect in the perfect man's character (Job 31 32). In Roman days, inns and taverns had come into existence, but they were notoriously dangerous, and often no more than houses of ill fame. Their keepers were for the most part unscrupulous, and their infamous practises are alluded to even in legal enactments, which were designed to check and correct the evils of the system (Ulpian, Dig. iii, 2, 4, 2, xxiii, 2, 43, 1; Tertullian, De Fuga in Persec. 13; Marquardt, Privat. p. 471, n. 5); hence the injunction to hospitality as a duty in Apostolic and in early Christian times (Ro 12 13; cf. I Ti 3 2; Tit 1 8; I P 4 9; Clem. Ad Cor. I 10-12, 35) was not intended merely as a means of cultivating or otherwise expressing good-will toward men, but also as a protection of Christian travelers.

HOST: The rendering of (1) hayil, 'strength,' 'force,' often used of an army (Ex 14 4, 17, 28; I S 14 48, AV, etc.). (2) maḥāneh, 'camp,' or 'encampment,' also used frequently of a great company, or an army (Gn 32 2; Ex 14 24, 16 13, AV, etc.). (3) tsābhā (from the verb tsābhā, 'to carry on war'), 'army' (Gn 21 22, 32; Jos 5 14; Jg 4 2; I S 17 55, etc.). This word is very common in the O T and is sometimes used in a broader sense of the whole body of Israel (Ex 12 41), very often of the multitude of the heavenly bodies, i.e., the stars (Gn 21; Dt 4 19, etc.), which were frequently worshiped (Dt 17 3; II K 17 16, etc.). The most common occurrence of the term is in the expression 'Jehovah (LORD AV) of hosts' (transliterated as Sabaoth twice in N T, Ro 9 29 and Ja 5 4), which is found a great number of times in the prophets and has been called 'the prophetic title of Jehovah' (Driver). The origin of this expression is obscure. It may have meant originally 'J', the God who leads the armies of Israel,' and have been extended later to express the universal sway of J' (the prophetic idea). It is less likely to have had the wider meaning (J', ruler of the hosts of heaven) from the first (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, Joel and Amos, p. 231 f. and BDB. s.v. צבא, 4). (4) In Lk 2 13 στρατα means the heavenly angelic beings who worship God, while in Ac 7 42 the same word refers to the stars as objects of worship. (5) πανδοχεύς 'innkeeper' (Lk 10 35). (6) ξένος, 'one who shows hospitality' (Ro 16 23).

HOUSE. I. THE TENT OF THE NOMADS. 1. Evidence of the Early Use of the Tent. The 'house' of the nomad is the tent, 'ohel—even to-day called ba'il ('house') by the Bedawin. For a long period the Israelites, as nomads, dwelt in tents, and even many years after the main body of the nation had settled down in permanent abodes individual clans, like the Kenites (I S 15 6; cf. Jg 4 17) and the E. Jordan tribes, continued to use tents, because the nature of the land they occupied compelled them to follow the pastoral mode of life.

2. Construction of the Tent. The Heb. idiom preserved a number of survivals from the nomadic days, e.g., nāṣa', 'to depart,' lit. 'to pull out (the tent-pin)'; hālak l'ohōlō, 'to go home,' lit. 'to return to his tent.'

The tent was either round and partly conical, or long—something after the form of an inverted ship's hull. Usually the tent-coverings, yēri'ōth, were woven from the hair of the black goat (Song 1 5), and stretched over three or five poles, 5 to 6 ft. high. In the roof of the tent were sewed wooden rings, which were connected by tightly drawn cords, mēthār, with the tent-pins, yāthēdh, driven fast into the ground. By this means the tent was held upright. If a cord broke or a pin was pulled up, the tent collapsed (cf. Job 4 21, 30 11). Instead of hair-cloth, however, skins were often used for the tent covering. Somewhere about the middle of the tent a support was placed to hold up the roof. In most cases the tent of a Bedawi is divided into two parts, of which the second, or innermost, hedher, is specifically for the women and children, tho also used as kitchen and storehouse. Entrance to this room, in ordinary cases, is forbidden to men. Only one who is pursued may venture to take refuge here, where the real home is (Jg 4 17 ff.).

The booth, or hut, ṣukkāh, constructed of branches or bushes, was used as a merely temporary abode, e.g., of the field-watcher (Is 1 8; cf. II S 11 11; Jn 4 5 ff.), or for cattle (Gn 33 19).

II. THE HOUSES OF THE MORE CIVILIZED PERIOD.

3. Structure Conditioned by Climate. When the Israelites passed from the nomadic to the agricultural mode of life they came to erect permanent houses (bayith, sing.) in which work the Canaanites were their teachers. In Palestine, as everywhere, the manner in which houses are constructed is dependent on the character of the climate and land. As far as the former is concerned, inasmuch as the houses were not constructed to protect from the cold, but to furnish covering from sun and rain, there are required, on the one hand, cool cellar-like rooms, and, on the other, a light, airy structure, inasmuch as the climate permits constant abode in the open air. The peasants use houses simply to protect them from the cool of the night while sleeping, or in order to enjoy their meals undisturbed by others, or to entertain friends, etc. It is the same with the townsmen. They love the outdoor life much more than Westerners do. In ancient times artizan work was carried on in houses as little as it is at present. It was conducted either on the street or in special booths, which were situated in definitely fixed quarters in the city, where similar crafts were near one another, as is the case with the Oriental bazaars of to-day.

4. Structure Conditioned by the Material at Hand. The character of the land influenced the style of building to the extent at least of limiting the material to that which the land could furnish. High forests never existed in Palestine; consequently, there was no long timber at hand for building purposes, and in ordinary houses the use of wood was greatly limited. For such woodwork as was indispensable the sycamore, shiqmāh, was used (I K 10 27; Is 9 9). For large and costly buildings, where long timbers were needed, resort was had to imported lumber, such as cedar, 'erez (I K 7 2 f.; Jer 22 14); and cypress, ḏ'rōsh (I K 9 11 f.). Olive, zayith, was used but seldom, and then only to a limited extent, e.g., for doors, windows, and similar purposes. In a hilly country like Palestine there is no scarcity of good building stone. The white limestone can be quarried easily, and, as it is not hard, can be worked with no difficulty. In the lowlands houses were constructed of sun-dried brick, l'bhenāh, tho occasionally the bricks were burned.

5. Various Kinds of Houses. As the conditions of life in Palestine have remained practically the same for centuries, the method of building houses was not different in ancient times from what it is at present. The prosperous fellāḥin in the hill-country and in well-situated towns built for themselves vaulted houses of more or less finely hewn stone. Such buildings are either founded upon the native rock, or the foundation is sunk into the earth to a depth about equal to the height of the building. The violent winter rains would soon make an end of a house not well founded (cf. Mt 7 24-29). The dwellings consist of large rooms, with high ceilings, and surrounded by thick walls. The roof arches rest upon strong, massive pillars. In case of inability to procure the material for such a vaulted building, a square structure is erected with walls of small stones held together with mortar or clay. These walls are roofed over with poles, branches, and brush, over which is stamped down a layer of soil about a foot thick. The houses in the lowlands, built of soft clay, are naturally very frail and liable to destruction. Even at the present time it can be noticed how quickly whole villages, when deserted, completely disappear, leaving no trace of their former existence.

6. Details of Structure. (a) On the inner side the walls were often plastered or whitewashed, tāphēl (Ezk 13 10 ff., 22 28). Sometimes they were also painted with vermilion, shāshar (Jer 22 14). More expensive buildings were adorned with artistically carved panelings (I K 7 7; cf. ceiled Jer 22 14; Hag 1 4), decorated with ivory (I K 22 39; Am 3 15), gold, silver, or precious stones (I Ch 29 2 ff.). (b) The floor was simply a layer of clay, or plaster, which, in the more costly houses, was overlaid with boards Larger Lock with Key. The key (A) lifts the wooden pegs which it touches, and thus allows the bar (B) below to be moved.

(I K 6 15), or with marble and other expensive stones (Est 1 6). The floors were covered with rugs, or, in the case of the poor, with mats of straw, on which one might tread only without sandals. (c) The ordinary house of the common people consisted of one large room divided into two parts, of which one was somewhat higher than the other. This served as a living-place for the family, while the other was occupied by the animals, which in a sense were counted as a part of the family of the fellāḥin. In case a man had extensive herds, he had] special stables for them. In the towns also the partition of the dwelling was not usual. (d) The roof of the house, which had to be repaired annually before the beginning of winter, was a favorite resort for purposes of evening recreation (cf. II S 11 2), or for private conversation (I S 9 25), or for lamentation (Is 15 3; Jer 48 38). From such frequent use of the roof we get the reason for the common law in Dt 22 8, that roofs should be provided with a battlement. But in spite of this, one could easily leap from one roof to another, so that it was possible in this manner to go the length of whole streets (cf. Mk 13 15, and Jos. Ant. XIII, 5 3). Houses of the well-to-do were often provided with a superstructure on the roof, 'āhiyyāh, used as a sleeping-, guest-, or sick-chamber (Jg 3 20 ff., parlour AV; I K 17 19; II K 4 10 f.). Here also one went for prayer (II K 23 12; Tob 3 10; Dn 6 11; cf. Ac 10 9). The roof usually had two places of exit, one leading to the lower chamber, the other directly to the street (cf. Mk 2 4). (e) Houses of more than one story were certainly very rare. According to I K 7 2 ff. Solomon's arsenal ('house of the forest of Lebanon'), which rested upon four rows of cedar pillars, was of three stories, as were also the side structures of the Temple (I K 6 5 ff.). (f) In most instances, as is the case to-day, the larger houses were probably four square (Job 1 19), enclosing a roomy court, αὐλή (Lk 22 55, 'hall' AV), hātser (II S 17 18; Neh 8 16), surrounded with cloisters and galleries, paved, provided with a well (II S 17 18), and planted with trees. This court often served as a guest-chamber, or place for social intercourse. It was protected from the sun's rays by awnings (cf. Est 1 5 f., 5 1). (g) Very costly houses were adorned with marble pillars, 'ammūdhīm, not only within the court, but also externally (Song 5 15; cf. I K 7 15 ff.; II K 25 13). Larger houses had also a special fore-court (Jer 32 2), which served as an ante-chamber. At its door a keeper (sometimes a woman; cf. II S 4 6, LXX.; cf. Ac 12 13) had his station. From this fore-court stairs—often of costly wood (II Ch 9 11)—led to the roof and upper chambers. (h) The rear rooms, hedher (used of the temple-chamber I Ch 28 11, parlors AV), of the larger houses were reserved for the women (Jg 15 1; Song 1 4, 3 4). To these no man besides the head of the house had access. Here also were the sleeping-rooms (II S 4 7, 13 10; II K 11 2). Such a room is evidently referred to by the term 'inner chamber' (closet AV), in Mt 6 6. (i) In the more elegant houses there were both summer and winter rooms, the situation of which was determined by the position of the sun. Winter rooms were heated by means of a brazier, 'āh (Jer 36 22), which to-day is made of fire-brick, and is placed in a depression in the middle of the room. In order to conserve the heat after the fire is burned out, a wooden frame is placed over the brazier and covered with a rug. (j) Windows, which were constructed only of lattice-work, designated by such terms as 'eshnābh (Jg 5 28; casement Pr 7 6 AV) or hallōn, 'side openings' (Pr 7 6), also hārakkīm (Song 2 6) and 'arubbāh, 'openings in the roof' (Ec 12 8), served also for chimneys; in houses of to-day they are found almost wholly on the inner or court side, because of the dirt of the street. In ancient time, however, this was not the rule (cf. Jg 5 28; Pr 7 6). (k) Doors were sometimes of stone, as in the buildings in the Hauran, but usually of wood and somewhat low. Occasionally they were plated with bronze or gold (II Ch 4 9, 22). Such doors were provided above and below with bronze hinge-pivots, tsir (Pr 26 14), which fitted into sockets, pōthōth (I K 7 50), in the stone threshold. Large doors had also several folding leaves, ts'ālām g'hilīm (I K 6 34). (l) In the door was fastened an iron ring for a knocker (Lk 12 36, 13 25; Ac 12 13), and a wooden bar, min'āl, man'āl, and beriah, which was pushed back from within. There were also others that by means of a key, likewise of wood, maphteah (Jg 3 25; Is 22 22), could be unfastened and pushed back from without. (m) According to Dt 6 9 (cf. 11 20) the door-post, m'zūzāh, was adorned with inscriptions, as, for example, Dt 6 4 ff., a custom that has spread all over the Mohammedan East. The same practise was also in vogue in ancient Egypt (see Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, etc., vol. ii, pp. 102, 123). (n) From Ezr 3 10 f.; Job 38 6 it is evident that, in the case of a large building, the laying of the corner-stone (always one well selected for this purpose) was a festal occasion. Similarly, when the headstone was put in position (Zech 4 7), and the house was dedicated (I K 8 63; Ezr 6 16), there was a joyous celebration. Possibly I K 16 34 (cf. Jos 6 26) finds its explanation in some such ceremony.

HOZAI, hō'zā-ai (חֹזַי, hōzay): A word taken as a proper noun by RV in II Ch 33 19. Perhaps the true reading is 'his seers' (חֹזִי).

HUKKOK, hok'kok (חֻקֹּק, hukqōq): A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 34), Map I, E 4, tho this identification is not certain.

HUL, hul. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

HULDAH, hul'da (חֻלְדָּה, huldāh): A prophetess of repute (II K 22 14; II Ch 34 22), the wife of Shallum, the keeper of the wardrobe. King Josiah sent Hilkiah, the priest, to her to inquire about the law-book which had been found in the Temple.

C. S. T.

HUMTAH, hum'ta (חֻמְתָּה, humtāh): A city of Judah, near Hebron (Jos 15 54). Site unknown.

HUNTING: The references to hunting are not numerous in the O T. While the Hebrews, in their nomadic period, were doubtless accustomed to the chase (cf. and story of Esau, Gn 25 27, 27 3 ff.), after their settlement in Canaan comparatively less attention was given to hunting, either as a profession or as a pastime. No national hero is spoken of as a hunter. Yet this sport was not entirely unknown. The word tsūdh (from tsūdh, 'to hunt' meaning 'venison' or 'game' in general Gn 27 3), is similar to the term for 'victuals' or 'provision' in general (Jos 9 5, 14; Jg 7 8; Neh 13 15, etc.), but the etymological connection is doubtful. If the second term also is derived from tsūdh, 'to hunt,' it would indicate that tsūdh, 'game,' was once the main supply of food for the early Hebrews (see ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, § 7). The Law provided that animals taken in hunting should be properly killed (Lv 17 13). The wild animals allowed to be eaten in Dt ch. 14, such as the gazel, roebuck, wild goat, etc., could be taken only in the chase, and I K 4 23 shows that wild meat was not unknown on the royal table. The more dangerous pursuits, such as lion-hunting, a favorite pastime of the Assyrian kings, are not mentioned in the O T, tho indirectly the hunting of the hippopotamus may be referred to in Job 41 26-29. The hunter made use not only of ordinary weapons, such as the bow and arrows (Gn 27 3), the sword, spear, and club (Job 41 26 ff.), but of nets, snares, and traps of various kinds, with which to catch both birds and quadrupeds. Several kinds of nets are mentioned, as the hērem (Mic 7 2; Hab 1 15), the mikhmār (large enough to catch an antelope, Is 51 20), and the resheth (the nature of which can be inferred from Job 18 8; Ps 9 15, 10 9, 140 5; Pr 1 17; Ezk 12 13, etc.). The exact meaning of the terms rendered snare and gin is uncertain; mōqēsh perhaps means a noose, while pah refers to bird-traps, probably of various kinds (Ps 124 7; Pr 7 23; Am 3 5, etc.). In Job 18 10 hebhel ('cord'), rendered noose in RV, and malkhōdeth, trap (from lā-khadh, 'to take'), both refer to some kind of snare. Fowler in Heb. is yāqūsh (Ps 91 3, 124 7; Pr 6 5; Hos 9 8; and cf. the foregoing mōqēsh). Animals were often caught also in pits (cf. II S 23 20; Ps 35 7), which was perhaps the method mainly used for the more dangerous animals. Consult Driver in Camb. Bible, Joel and Amos, p. 157, and A. R. S. Kennedy in EB, article Fowl. E. E. N.

HUPHAM, hiū'fəm, HUPHAMITE, hiū'fəm-ait. See HUPPIM.

HUPPAH, hup'a (חַפָּה, huppāh): The ancestral head of the thirteenth course of priests (I Ch 24 13).

HUPPIM, hup'im (חֻפִּים, huppim): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (Gn 46 21; I Ch 7 12, 15), the Huphamites (Nu 26 39, where the name is Hupham).

HUR, hūr (חֹר, hūr), 'noble' (?): 1. An Israelite associated with Aaron in supporting Moses at Rephidim (Ex 17 10, 12) and in the oversight of the people during Moses' absence in the Mount (Ex 24 14). According to Josephus (Ant. III, 2 4, 6, 8 1) he was the husband of Miriam. 2. The father of Caleb (I Ch 2 50; probably I Ch 4 1 refers to the same). 3. A son of Caleb and the grandfather of Bezaleel (Ex 31 2; I Ch 2 19). According to Josephus the same as 1. 4. A king of Midian (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21). 5. An officer under Solomon. See BEN-HUR. (I K 4 8). 6. The father of Rephaiah, prominent in Jerusalem at the restoration (Neh 3 9). A. C. Z.

HURAI, hiū'rā-ai or hiū'rē. See HIDDAI.

HURAM, hiū'rām (חֹרָם, hūrām): 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (I Ch 8 5). For 2 and 3 see HIRAM.

HURI, hiū'roi (חֹרִי, hūrī): A descendant of Gad (I Ch 5 14).

HUSBAND AND WIFE. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 4 f.; and also under MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

HUSBANDMAN: An old English word meaning literally 'master of the house,' and used to translate (1) 'ikkār, 'tiller of the soil' (II Ch 26 10; Jer 31 24, etc.). From Am 5 16 we would infer that such persons were often asked to take the part of professional mourners. (2) 'īsh 'ādāmāh, 'man of the soil' (Gn 9 20). (3) γεωργός, 'cultivator of the ground,' a term of general significance (Mk 12 1; Jn 15 1; II Ti 2 6). In II K 25 12 the text is uncertain and in Zec 13 5 RV gives the correct rendering. E. E. N.

HUSBAND'S BROTHER. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 6.

HUSHAH, hiū'sha (חֻשָּׁה, hūshāh) Probably the name of a place in Judah, whence came Sibbecai (q.v.) the Hushathite, one of David's heroes (I Ch 4 4, 'Shuhah' in ver. 11; II S 21 18, 23 27; I Ch 11 20, etc.).

HUSHAI, hiū'shā-ai or hiū'shē (חֻשַׁי, hūshay): An Archite and loyal friend of David, who used him as a spy in the court of Absalom to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (II S 15 32-17 23; I Ch 27 33). Probably he was the father of Baana (I K 4 16).

C. S. T.

HUSHAM, hiū'shām (חֻשָּׁם, hūshām): A king of Edom (Gn 36 34 f.). See also CUSHAN RISHA-THAIM.

HUSHATHITE, hiū'shāth-ait. See HUSHAH.

HUSHIM, hiū'shim (חֻשִּׁים, hūshim): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Dan (Gn 46 23, called Shuham [and the clan, Shuhamites] in Nu 26 42). 2. A son of Aher (I Ch 7 12). 3. A 'wife' of Shaharaim in a Benjamite genealogy; probably the name of a clan or place (I Ch 8 8, text uncertain).

HUSKS. See FOOD, § 5.

HUZZAB, huz'ab (חֻצָּב, hutstzab): A word (Nah 2 7 [8]) of uncertain derivation and meaning. RV translates 'it is decreed.' Many find here the name or title of an Assyrian queen (RVmg.). C. S. T.

HYACINTH. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 3.

HYENA. See PALESTINE, § 24.

HYMENÆUS, hai'mi-nī'us (Ἰμέναιος): An unknown man (associated in I Ti 1 20 with Alexander and in II Ti 2 17 with Philetus), who without conscience spoke falsely of the sacred truths of the gospel and 'made shipwreck of the faith.' At the time of writing I Ti Paul hoped that excommunication might prove salutary (cf. a similar case in I Co 5 5), but it did not, for at the time of II Ti Hymenæus still represented a deadly error, probably connected with Gnosticism, that was eating insidiously into the life of the Church.

HYMN. See HALLELUJAH; MUSIC, § 7; and PRaise.

HYPOCRITE, HYPOCRISY, HYPOCRITICAL (Gr. terms from ἀποκρίνομαι, lit. 'to answer,' then applied to actors on the stage and thus coming to mean 'dissimulation,' 'hypocrisy'): In the O T the RV everywhere changes these terms to 'profane' or 'godless,' the real meaning of the Heb. hānēph.

In the N T the word is always used in a religious sense, of those who make an outward show of being religious, but at heart are not so. Hence the two meanings practically coincide. Most of the N T occurrences of 'hypocrite' are in the sayings of Jesus, and have reference to groups of Pharisees who were active in opposing him.

HYSSOP (חִיטְוֹן, 'ēzōbh): A plant described in I K 4 33 as one 'that springeth out of the wall.' It was used in the Passover service, a bunch of it being dipped in the blood of the sacrificial animal, and applied to the lintel (Ex 12 22); also in other ceremonials involving purification (Lv 14 6, 49; Nu 19 6; Ps 51 7; He 9 19). The precise species of plant meant has been a matter of extensive debate. Of the proposed identifications, two only are worthy of special mention. Royale and Tristram regard it as the caper plant, a bright-green creeper, to be found plentifully in Bible lands. The main strength of this identification is that it explains Jn 19 29, where 'hyssop' is used apparently as the equivalent of 'reed' in Mt 27 48 and Mk 15 36; for a reed may be secured from the stalk of the caper plant long enough to be used as indicated. The theory, however, is not entirely satisfactory. The caper plant is not suitable for sprinkling. The etymology of the word, too, points to a different source. Hence G. E. Post proposes the Arabic ṣa'tar (Origanum maru, L.), which in other respects suits all the descriptions much better. But if this view be adopted, the hyssop of Jn 19 29 must be regarded as the leaves and fruit mixed in pulverized form with the wine, and not identical with the 'reed' of the Synoptists. A. C. Z.

I

IBHAR, ib'hār (יְבָרִי, yibhār), 'He [J'] chooses': A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 3 6, 14 5).

IBLEAM, ib'lī-ām (יְבִלְאָם, yibhl'ām): An ancient Canaanite town, assigned to either Asher or Issachar, but actually held by Manasseh, tho not in the earliest period of the Conquest (Jos 17 11; Jg 1 27). In or near Ibleam Ahaziah, King of Judah (II K 9 27), and perhaps also Zechariah, King of Israel (II K 15 10 according to LXX.), were slain. It is called Bileam in I Ch 6 70. The identification Map IV, D 8 is wrong. See Bileam on Map III, F 2 for the right location. See also GATH-RIMMON.

E. E. N.

IBNEIAH, ib-nī'ya or ib'nī-ai'a (יְבְנִיָּה, yibhni'yāh), 'J' builds': The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 9 8).

IBNIJAH, ib-nai'ja (יְבְנִיָּה, yibhniyyāh), 'J' builds': The ancestor of the preceding Ibneiah (I Ch 9 8).

IBRI, ib'rai (יְבְרִי, 'ibhrī): A Merarite Levite (I Ch 24 27).

IBSAM, ib'sām (יְבִישָׁם, yibhsām, Jibsam AV): The ancestral head of a family of Issachar (I Ch 7 2).

IBZAN, ib'zān (יְבִזָּן, 'ibhtsān): A minor judge of Israel from Bethlehem (Jg 12 8, 10) of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), a town 7 m. NW. of Nazareth. He was the head of a large family or clan. C. S. T.

ICHABOD, ik'a-bed (יְכָבֹד, 'i khābhōdh), 'no glory' according to popular etymology. The real meaning is unknown. Cf. Driver, HTS, ad loc. The son of the priest Phineas, born on the occasion of the capture of the Ark (I S 4 21, 14 3).

ICONIUM, ai-kō-ni-um (Ἰκόνιον and Εἰκόνιον): Mentioned by Xenophon as a border-town of Phrygia, by Cicero as the capital of Lycaonia, which position it retained under the Diadochi and the Romans. It was situated in what is practically an oasis in the great elevated, waterless plain of Lycaonia (q.v.), surrounded by a country producing excellent crops of wheat and flax. I. owed its importance to its situation at the crossing of trade-routes, and particularly on the highway leading to Ephesus and Rome.

The history of Iconium is the same as that of the kingdom and province of Galatia (see ASIA MINOR, III, 5), in which it was situated until after the times of Paul. By the Christian era it was completely Hellenized; later it became a typical Greco-Roman city. The Zizimmene Mother was the local form of the Cybele-cult. Under Hadrian, I. became a Roman colonia. I., with Lystra, was visited by Paul, who made many converts, but the resident nationalist Jews compelled him to leave (Ac 14 1-6), but he returned later (Ac 16 1-5).

J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

IDALAH, id'a-lā (יְדִלָּה, yidh'ālāh): A town of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), about 2 m. S. of Bethlehem of Zebulun. Map IV, C 7.

IDBASH, id'baśh (יְדִבָּשׁ, yidhbāsh): The name of a small clan of Judah (I Ch 4 3).

IDDO, id'do: The Eng. equivalent of several Heb. names: 1. (יְדֹד, 'iddō). (a) The father of Ahinadab (I K 4 14). (b) A Levite (I Ch 6 21, 'Adaiah' in ver. 41). 2. (יְדִדְיָהּ, ye'dō, and יְדִדְיָהּ, 'iddō). A prophet, or seer, who wrote accounts of the reigns of Rehoboam, Jeroboam, and Abijah (II Ch 9 29, 12 15, 13 22). 3. (יְדִדְיָהּ, 'iddō, and יְדִדְיָהּ, 'iddō). (a) The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 1 1, 7; Ezr 5 1, 6 14). (b) The ancestral head of a postexilic family (Neh 12 4, 16). 4. (יְדִדְיָהּ, 'iddō). The head of a community of Nethinim at Casiphia (Ezr 8 17). 5. (יְדִדְיָהּ, yiddō). (a) Chief of the Manassites in Gilead under David (I Ch 27 21). (b) One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 43; Jadau AV). E. E. N.

IDUMÆA, ai'diu- or id'yu-mī'a. See EDOM.

IEZER, ai-i'zar. See ABIEZER.

IGAL, ai'gal (יְגָל, yigh'al), 'He redeems': 1. A son of Joseph of the tribe of Issachar, one of the twelve spies sent by Moses from Paran to Canaan (Nu 13 7). 2. A son of Nathan, one of the thirty heroes of David (II S 23 36). In I Ch 11 38 Joel, the brother of Nathan. 3. A son of Shemaiah, of the Davidic line (I Ch 3 22; Igeal AV). C. S. T.

IGDALIAH, ig'dā-lai'a (יִגְדַּלְיָהוּ, yighdalyāhū), 'J' is great': The father of Hanan (Jer 35 4).

IGEAL, ig'i-əl or ai'gī-əl. See IGAL.

IIM, ai'im (יִימ, 'iyyīm), 'ruins': A town in Judah near Edom (Jos 15 29). Site uncertain. See also IYE-ABARIM.

IJE-ABARIM, ai'ji-ab'a-rim. See IYE-ABARIM.

IJON, ai'jōn (יִיזֹן, 'iyyōn): A town in the extreme N. of Israel, somewhere near Dan and Abel-beth-maacah (I K 15 20; II K 15 29). It was depopulated by Tiglath-pileser, c. 734 (II K 15 29). Site not certainly known.

IKKESH, ik'kešh (יִקְעֵשׁ, 'iqqēsh): The father of Ira, one of David's heroes (II S 23 26; I Ch 11 28, 27 9).

ILAI, ai'lā-ai or ai'lē (יִלַּי, 'ilay): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 29, called Zalmon in II S 23 28).

ILLYRICUM, il-lir'i-kum (Ἰλλυρικόν): The Roman name of the province on the Adriatic, N. of Macedonia and W. of Thrace. Its southern portion was called Dalmatia, a name which during the Apostolic Age was extended to denote the whole province. The province, inhospitable and mountainous, 'separates, rather than connects, Italy and Greece' (Mommson). At the same time it contained important cities. In Ro 15 19 'Illyricum' very probably means the Roman province, but whether Paul evangelized it can not be determined by this verse, some holding that his statement indicates merely the limit up to which his labors reached. (See ICC, Romans, ad loc.) R. A. F.—E. E. N.

IMAGE. See GREEK AND ROMAN IDOLATRY; SEMITIC RELIGION, § 23; and MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 3.

IMLA, im'lā, IMLAH, im'lā (יִמְלָא, yimlā), 'he fills': The father of the prophet Micah (I K 22 8 f.; II Ch 18 7 f.).

IMMANUEL, i-man'yu-el (יִמְנָעֻל, 'immanū-āl), 'God with us'; also Emmanuel, Mt 1 23 AV: The symbolical name given to the child whose birth was promised as a sign of safety to Ahaz by the prophet Isaiah (7 14), and used again in 8 8, 10, not, however, as the name of an individual, but in its literal sense (in 8 8 the text, 'thy land [יְרֵךְךָ], O Immanuel,' is probably corrupt, the final י standing for יָ, 'because'; so emended, the verse should read: 'And the stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of the land because God is with us').

In Mt 1 23, Is 7 14 is quoted as a foreshadowing of the virgin birth of Jesus. The question has been raised whether this identification of Immanuel with Jesus was in the mind of Isaiah himself, or made by the evangelist either erroneously, or by way of appropriating the words of an ancient oracle as suitable to his purpose, but not with the intention of committing their original author to his interpretation of them. The difficulties in the way of taking it to be the primary intention of Isaiah to foretell the virgin birth of Jesus are insuperable. The meaning of his phraseology is so palpably fulfilled in the circumstances of his own day that as remote a reference as this to the birth of Jesus seems exegetically impossible. On the other hand, all interpretations which find in the reference to Immanuel a double sense, i.e., a first intention to speak of a child that might be born in his own days and a secondary one to predict the virgin birth of Jesus, are artificial and arbitrary. They have the appearance of ingenious devices to escape a difficulty rather than natural explanations of the facts of the case. The only admissible view, as far as the intention of Isaiah is concerned, is that he had in mind a child born in his own days, whose birth would be symbolical of the Divine favor displayed in such manifest power as to assure His people that God was with them. But if this was Isaiah's thought, the use of the passage by Matthew must be either the result of misunderstanding of the prophet's meaning, or the appropriation of his words as a formula in which the virgin birth of the Savior might felicitously be embodied. If the alternative be drawn sharply between these two views, the second would be by far preferable. But it is quite possible to suppose that the evangelist did see in the birth of the Savior the fulfilment of the hopes roused by the promise of God's presence with and among His people, and expressed this thought by applying the old oracle to the event he was narrating. Such an appropriation altho not correct, judged by standards of modern literary and historical usage, would be in perfect harmony with methods of using the O T at the time. A. C. Z.

IMMER, im'er (יִמְעַר, 'immēr): I. 1. The ancestral head of the sixteenth course of priests, which constituted a large priestly family in postexilic days (I Ch 9 12, 24 14; Ezr 2 37, 10 20; Neh 7 40, 11 13). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (Jer 20 1). It is quite possible that 1 and 2 are identical. 3. The father of a certain Zadok (Neh 3 29).

II. The Babylonian home of a priestly family (Ezr 2 59, 7 61). E. E. N.

IMMORTALITY. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 14-22, 37-39, 42 f., 49.

IMNA, im'nā (יִמְנָא, yimnā): The ancestral head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 35).

IMNAH, im'na (יִמְנָה, yimnāh) 'right hand,' i.e., South (?) perhaps an allusion to the location of the clan: 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Asher (Gn 46 17; Jimnah AV; the Imnites, Nu 26 44, Jimnites AV; I Ch 7 30). 2. A Levite (II Ch 31 14). E. E. N.

IMRAH, im'ra (יִמְרָה, yimrāh): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36).

IMRI, im'rai (יִמְרִי, 'imrī): 1. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 9 4). 2. The father of Zaccur (Neh 3 2).

INCARNATION. See JESUS CHRIST, § 19.

INCENSE. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15.

INCEST. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c).

INDIA, in'di-a (יִנְדִּי, hōddū): The only reference to I. in the Bible is in Est 1 1, 8 9, where it figures as one of the extreme limits of the empire over which the Persian king held sway. How much of the modern Indian world was covered by it in this connection is unknown. The term Hōddū was introduced into the Semitic languages by way of the Persian Hindoo. It is highly probable, however, that altho the country was not clearly known, its wares were imported and used among the Hebrews in comparatively early days. A. C. Z.

INDITE: The word rendered 'inditing' in Ps 45 1 AV is rāhash, 'to be agitated,' and the idea is, 'my heart is moved, or stirred, with a good matter' (cf. RV). E. E. N.

INFIDEL: This word occurs twice in AV as a rendering of ἄπιστος, for which RV gives 'unbeliever' (II Co 6 15; I Ti 5 8). The unbelief Paul had in mind was not atheism, but the rejection of, or disbelief in, Christianity. E. E. N.

INFLAMMATION. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (1).

INGATHERING, FEAST OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, §§ 5, 8.

INHERITANCE. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8.

INK, INKHORN. See BOOKS AND WRITING, § 4.

INLAID. A term used in I Ch 29 2 ('glistening' AV) of precious stones. The Heb. קִיץ, pūkh, 'antimony' perhaps refers to color, and hence 'abhnēphūkh' may mean 'stones of the hue of antimony.'

INN: (1) The AV rendering of mālōn in Gn 42 27, 43 21, and Ex 4 24, which is rendered more accurately in RV by 'lodging-place,' since the reference is to a mere stopping-place for the night, not to an extensive or elaborate khān, or caravanserai. Such 'lodging-places,' probably located near springs, and consisting of a rude hut, or shelter of some sort, would be found on the caravan roads through uninhabited regions. (2) κατάλυμα, rendered 'guest-chamber' in Mk 14 14 and Lk 22 11, is rendered 'inn' in Lk 2 7, altho it is by no means certain that a public lodging-house is meant. Joseph may have relied upon the hospitality of some acquaintance to place his 'guest-chamber' at his disposal (cf. Plummer in ICC, ad loc.). (3) πανδοχείον (or πανδοχείον, from πας and δέχεσθαι, 'to receive every one') in Lk 10 34 is properly an 'inn,' corresponding to the modern khān, the innkeeper being called the πανδοχέως. For an extended description of a modern khān see the articles on Inn in HDB and EB. See also HOSPITALITY. E. E. N.

INSTRUCT, INSTRUCTION. See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 6; and EDUCATION, § 5.

INSTRUMENT: The Heb. kēl ('vessel,' 'implement,' etc.) was frequently translated 'instrument' in AV in places where a more specific term might have been chosen. In most of such cases RV has given more appropriate renderings (cf. Gn 49 5; Ex 25 9, etc.). In Ro 6 13 the Gr. ὅπλα means 'weapons.' For musical instruments see MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3. E. E. N.

INSTRUMENTS OF WAR. See ARMS AND ARMOR.

INTERCESSION: In the O T the Heb. פָּגַח, pāgha' (both gal and hiphil), 'to meet,' 'fall in with,' is used in the sense of interceding (Jer 7 18, 27 18, 36 25; Is 53 12, 59 18). In the N T we have the terms ἐντυγχάνειν (Ro 8 27, 34, 11 2 'pleaded' RV; He 7 25) and ὑπερεντυγχάνειν (Ro 8 26), and altho these words are not used in the related passages in the LXX., they correspond exactly to the Heb. pāgha'. 'To meet' some one for the sake of another is to 'intercede' for the latter. E. E. N.

INTERDICT. See DECREE.

INTEREST. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

INTERPRETATION: The necessity for interpretation arises whenever means for the expression of thought either are by nature, or become through lapse of time and through change, clouded and beset by obscurities. The interpreter's task is to remove the obscurity, and let the thought expressed appear as fully and clearly as originally intended. In Biblical usage interpretation is always mentioned in connection with obscurities naturally inherent, and not with those which arise because of changed conditions. Interpretations are needed of utterances in unknown languages (Gn 42 23; II K 18 26, 28; μεθερμηνεύειν, Mt 1 23, etc.; cf. ἐρμηνεία, I Co 12 10, 30, 14 5, 13, 28-29, of 'tongues'); of dreams (Gn 40 5, 8, etc.; Dn 2 4 ff.), of symbolism in visions (Dn 7 16 ff.; cf. 9 20 ff.), and of prophecy (II P 1 20). See also CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 7. A. C. Z.

INWARD PART: The rendering of (1) hedher, 'a secret place or chamber,' used metaphorically of the human motives or feelings (Pr 20 27, 30, 'innermost part' RV). (2) qerebh and ἔσωθεν, expressing the idea of 'being within,' 'in the middle,' or 'in the midst,' hence often used of the heart as the seat of emotion and determination (Ps 5 9, 49 11; Is 16 11; Jer 31 33; Lk 11 39; cf. Ps 62 4; Mt 7 15). The term tūhōth (Job 38 36; Ps 51 6) is of uncertain meaning. E. E. N.

INWARDS. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, §§ 6-10.

IOB, yōb (יֹב, yōbh): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Issachar (Gn 46 13, Job AV), called Jashub in Nu 26 24, and I Ch 7 1.

IPHDEIAH, if-di'ya (יִפְדֵּיָהּ, yiphdēyāh, Iphe-deiah AV), 'J' redeems': A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 26).

IPHTAH, if'ta (יִפְתָּח, yiphtāh, Jiphtah AV), 'he opens': A town of Judah, somewhere near Libnah (Jos 15 43). Site unknown.

IPHTAH-EL, if'ta-el' (יִפְתָּחֵל, yiphtah'el, Jiphtael AV), 'God opens': A valley on the boundary between Zebulun and Asher (Jos 19 14, 27). Probably the valley near Jotapata. See Map IV, C 6.

IR, or (ר'י, 'ir, 'watcher'), IRI, ai'rai (ר'י, 'ir, 'my watcher'): The ancestral head of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 7 7, 12).

IRA, ai'rā (ר'י, 'irā): 1. A chief minister, or priest, in the time of David (II S 20 26). In the parallel list (II S 8 18) two sons of David are named in the place of Ira. 2. An Ithrite, one of David's heroes (II S 23 38; I Ch 11 40). 3. A son of Ikkes, a Tekoite, also one of David's heroes (II S 23 28; I Ch 11 28, 27 9), and captain for the sixth month. It is possible that 1 is identical with 2 or 3. C. S. T.

IRAD, ai'rad (ר'י, 'irādh): The son of Enoch, in the genealogical table of J (Gn 4 18); cf. 'Jared' in the table of P (5 16 f.).

IRAM, ai'ram (ר'י, 'irām): A 'duke' ('clan chieftain') of Edom (Gn 36 43; I Ch 1 54).

IRI, ai'rai. See IR.

IRIJAH, ai-rai'ja (ר'י, 'iriyāh), 'J' sees': The official who arrested Jeremiah at the time of the siege of Jerusalem (Jer 37 13, 14).

IR-NAHASH, ir-nē'hash (ר'י, 'ir nāhash), 'serpent city,' but Nahash may be a pr. n. and 'city of N.' the correct reading: A place referred to in I Ch 4 12. The text may be corrupt. The passage well illustrates the tendency to personify places by the genealogists. Site unknown. E. E. N.

IRON, ai'ren (ר'י, 'ir'ōn): I. A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 38). Map IV, D 5. II. See METALS, § 4.

IR-PEEL, ir-pi-el (ר'י, 'irpēl), 'God heals': A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 27). Site uncertain.

IR-SHEMESH, ir'-shī'mesh (ר'י, 'ir she-mesh), 'city of the sun': A city of Dan (Jos 19 41). See BETH-SHEMESH.

IRU, ai'ru (ר'י, 'irū): A Calebite clan (I Ch 4 15).

ISAAC, ai'zək (ר'י, 'isāq, ר'י, 'isāq), 'he laughs,' so named from the circumstances of his birth (Gn 17 17, 18 12, 21 6) and also, possibly, from two incidents in his life (Gn 21 9, 26 8), where the verb ר'י is translated 'mocking' and 'sporting,' respectively: The only son of Abraham and Sarah and the 'child of promise,' through whom the covenant line was to be continued. His weaning feast was the occasion for the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael (Gn ch. 21). Abraham's faith received its supreme test in the command to sacrifice I. (Gn ch 22). Rebekah was brought from Mesopotamia to be his wife (Gn ch. 24). His family life and the dissensions of his sons are told in Gn 25 19-28 9. He died at the age of 180 years (so P), and was buried by his sons in the cave on the field of Machpelah (Gn 35 28 f.; cf. 49 29-31). His name as a race-father occurs in oft-recurring patriarchal formulas, and by itself in Am 7 9, 18. As if to counterbalance the paucity of the narrative, his character has been highly praised by Jewish and Christian expositors.

An analysis of the chapters relating to him reveals two strata of presentation, one of which might be called personal, the other racial. The tendency to resolve the patriarchs into eponymous heroes, or personified tribes, has been overdone, and shows a lack of perspective as great on one side as the defense of absolute historicity involves on the other. The personal narratives are those concerning his sacrifice and the blessings of his sons. Each is involved with the trials and experiences of greater characters. The former has its dénouement in the triumph of Abraham's faith. The latter explains how Jacob became so great and won the preeminence over his more favored brother. In both instances Isaac is a subsidiary figure.

The racial stories are those which record the struggles of the Hebrew clans with the neighboring races in the SW.; the strife for pasture land, and the dangers which the women of the tribes might undergo are the moving factors in the life of the Hebrews when Esau and Jacob dwelt together, jealous of one another's prerogatives, and held to temporary community of interest by the need of united front when the aborigines shut them out from water rights in the hard-won oases. We see a picture of a land punctuated with wells whose waters are often embittered with strife, and yet a ripple of laughter runs through it all—of tribesmen who could stop in the midst of their bickerings to jest with destiny, or to sport even under the eye of the traditional foe. Isaac occupied but a corner of the land, and vanished from that as his more sturdy sons moved away into the rocky fastnesses of the desert, or seized with prescient faith the fertile plains of Palestine.

ISAIAH, ai-zē'ya or ai-zai'a (ר'י, 'isāh, 'yāhū, 'J' is salvation,' Esaias in AV in the N T: 1. Non-Isaianic Elements in the Book of Isaiah. The Book of Isaiah falls into three divisions (a) chs. 1-35, (b) chs. 36-39, (c) chs. 40-66. The second of these consists, apart from the Song of Hezekiah (38 9-20), of historical narratives derived from II Kings 18 13-20 19, which need not further concern us. The third division is by common consent not the work of Isaiah. For the conditions in which he lived and worked have been replaced by a wholly different situation. Even had he foreseen the Babylonian Exile, he must have spoken of it in the future tense; whereas in this section the Jews are described as in captivity and in many passages their deliverance is said to be at hand. The situation changes indeed within these 27 chapters, but in none of them is it a state of things which I. could have described as existing in his own time. Babylon is the imperial power which has devastated Judah and shown the Jews no mercy (47 6). The Temple has been burnt, the cities of Judah are a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation (64 10-11), Israel has been abandoned to robbers (42 24). The Jews are in exile in Babylon (48 20). But deliverance is at hand. Cyrus has been raised up by God to deliver His people (41 2 f., 25, 44 28, 45 1-7, 46 11). Babylon will be overthrown (43 14, 46 1 f., 47, 48 14). The exiles will be set free (48 20), with J' marching at their head they will be led back to Zion (40 9-11, 41 18-20, 43 19-21, 48 21, 51 11). Cyrus will decree the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the laying of the foundation of the Temple (44 28). Judah's cities shall be rebuilt and her waste places be restored (44 26, 61 4). Moreover, the writer seems to affirm that the advent of Cyrus and his victorious career are the fulfilment of earlier predictions, and to base on this fulfilment an argument for the acceptance of the predictions he is himself making (42 9). But if so, the prophet must be writing after Cyrus had appeared; for he could not point to events which had not yet happened as proofs that the prediction of them had been fulfilled, and as thus warranting belief in new predictions. The argument from the historic conditions is corroborated by the argument from style and vocabulary and the striking differences in theology. But the conclusion that chs. 40-66 can not be the work of I. has important consequences for chs. 1-35. For here too we are confronted with similar phenomena. In ch. 13 we have a prediction of the final overthrow of Babylon by the Medes, which also reflects conditions toward the close of the exile; and the same is probably true of 21 1-10. This demonstrates that even in chs. 1-35 there are non-Isaian elements. We are, then, not entitled to insist that inclusion in this section guarantees Isaian authorship; nor even that this must be assumed unless very convincing evidence can be urged against it. The presence of so much later matter in the book makes it precarious to insist on too rigorous a test. We must ask rather to what historical situation or stage of religious development any particular section is to be assigned. The generally accepted results may be summarized at this point. 13 1-14 23, 21 1-10, chs. 24-27, and 34-35 are non-Isaianic. To this list many scholars would add 11 10-16, and chs. 12, 15-16, 23 and 33. Some scholars go still further. Moreover some oracles which are Isaian in basis are believed to have been expanded by later writers. This has been urged in particular with reference to the happy endings attached to prophecies of judgment and the descriptions of the Messianic King (9 2-7, 11 1-9). Another feature of recent criticism is the tendency of Duhm to relegate considerable sections of this division of the book to the Maccabean period. Marti has carried Duhm's radicalism still further, while Kennett has also argued for the Maccabean origin of the greater part of chs. 40-66. But these extreme positions have found little acceptance, even among 'advanced' critics such as Hölcher and E. Meyer.

2. Life and Times of Isaiah. Since the call of I. to the prophetic office came in early manhood in the death-year of Uzziah (6 1), which occurred about 740, we may assume that his birth took place about 760, probably in Jerusalem where he spent his life. His father's name was Amoz (to be carefully distinguished from Amos the prophet). He seems to have belonged to the upper ranks of society. He was married and his wife may herself have been a prophetess (8 3), altho the title more probably means 'prophet's wife.' He had two sons who, like himself, bore significant names (7 3, 8 3 f., 18). Some would add Immanuel as another son, possibly by a second wife. His own name means 'Salvation of Yah' or 'Yah is Salvation.' Shortly before the date at which he received his call the international situation had decisively changed. In 745 Tiglath-pileser

IV swept away the ineffective Government of Assyria and inaugurated the most splendid period of the Empire. The long and glorious reign of Jeroboam II over Israel came to a close a few years later. Israel and Judah had reached great heights of prosperity, but the social evils which aroused the burning indignation of Amos were still rampant in both. When the strong hand of Jeroboam II was removed, revolution after revolution shook the stability of the Northern Kingdom to its foundations, while civil wars exhausted its resources in wealth and men and introduced a fatal oscillation into its foreign policy. Judah was more fortunate in the possession of a stable dynasty with less exposure to foreign attack and a capital which, altho not impregnable, was exceptionally strong by nature and made stronger still by skilful fortification. The small states in and around Palestine were awaking to the peril from Assyria as in her western movement she strained toward Egypt, and Egypt was alert to use them as her pawns in the unequal contest with her rival. Babylon was restive under the Assyrian yoke. Such then was the political situation in which Isaiah received his call. His earliest prophecies (9 8-10 4, 5 25-29, 17 1-11) seem to have been directed against the internal abuses from which the Northern kingdom was suffering. Possibly 2 6-4 1, 5 1-7 and portions of 5 8-24 may belong to the same period in which case the denunciation and threat of judgment were extended to Judah also. In 735 Syria and Ephraim formed a coalition against Judah (7 1-6). Its object was presumably to force Judah into an alliance against Assyria and to replace Ahaz by the son of Tabeel (7 6). Ahaz in a panic was planning to save his throne by accepting the suzerainty of Assyria (II K 16 7 f.). I. exhorted him to remain quiet and treat the futile attack upon him with the contempt it deserved. He offered to assure him by any sign the king might demand, and when the offer was refused gave him the sign of Immanuel. Ahaz persisted, and committed his country to an entanglement with Assyria which lasted far down in Judah's history, involved the loss of independent action and the burden of heavy taxation, while it was the seed in the future of ruinous revolt. The prophet wrote on a placard the words 'For Maher-shalal-hash-baz' (8 1) which, as chosen witnesses would later attest, expressed his conviction that Damascus and Samaria would be overthrown by Assyria. To a son born within the following year he gave the name Maher-shalal-hash-baz, which embodied his belief that before the child began to talk the overthrow of the coalition would have taken place. Tiglath-pileser captured Damascus in 732 and Syria was incorporated in the Assyrian Empire. Samaria was spared but the northern districts of Israel were annexed and the people carried captive to Assyria (II K. 15 29). Samaria fell in 722. In consequence of the refusal of the king and people to accept his policy, I. seems for a time to have withdrawn from public life, committing his teaching to the circle of disciples he had gathered about him (8 18 f.). Meanwhile he and his sons were by their significant names a silent witness of the truths for which he stood (8 18). His warning to Philistia (14 29-32), that her exultation at the death of an unknown tyrant was premature, may date from 727 when Tiglath-pileser died. 28 1-4 may belong to the time after Hoshea revolted from Assyria (II K 17 4) and before Shalmaneser IV began the siege of Samaria. But it is very striking that on an event so epoch-making as the Fall of Samaria (722) and the downfall of the Northern Kingdom no oracle of I. should have been preserved. He no doubt saw in it the fulfillment of the doom he had long foretold. But many in Judah may have seen in their own preservation a proof of their own superiority and a signal token of the Divine favor, just as the degenerates left in Jerusalem similarly despised the exiles who were deported to Babylon with Jehoiachin. Possibly others saw in the fate of the sister kingdom a warning to repentance addressed to Judah, and this may have issued in Hezekiah's reformation of the cultus (II K 18 4). That such a reformation ever took place has been doubted, but cf. II K 18 22. Whether I. had any share in it is doubtful. See HEZEKIAH. It is certain that no reform of the cultus could satisfy him nor, apart from a radical moral change, would he anticipate that judgment would be averted. But with his hatred of idolatry and his knowledge of the corruptions associated with the local sanctuaries, he may have welcomed the movement as securing the suppression of many serious evils. So far as international politics were concerned he seems to have found no occasion for intervention till 713. Judah along with Moab, Edom, and Ashdod had negotiated with Egypt against Assyria. To protest against so desperate an enterprise I. walked for three years stripped and barefoot to indicate that so too would Egyptians and Ethiopians be led captive by Assyria. Ashdod was captured in 711; Judah perhaps escaped punishment because no rebellion had actually taken place. Sargon died in 705. Judah and Philistia were stirred up by Egypt to revolt. Sennacherib invaded Palestine in 701, he captured all the cities of Judah with the exception of Jerusalem, imposed a fabulous tribute, deported a great number of captives, but did not take the city. I. had, of course, disapproved of the revolt but, true to his long-held convictions, he affirmed in the darkest hour that Jerusalem would not be captured and that the Assyrians would be forced to retreat (37 29, 33-35). Whether a large part of Sennacherib's army was struck down by plague (37 36) or whether he returned in consequence of bad news from Nineveh (37 7), or whether the combination of both causes determined his departure is uncertain. It has been held by some scholars that Sennacherib returned to Palestine in 690, and that accounts of the two expeditions have been blended in the Biblical narrative. But at present this is a precarious hypothesis (see HEZEKIAH). To this period we should probably refer the Isaian elements in chs. 18, 22, 28-31, and parts of ch. 1. Nothing is known of I.'s later history. The legend that he was sawn asunder by Manasseh is late, and if such an enormity had actually been perpetrated it would scarcely have been omitted from the lurid record of II K 21 1-18 (cf. 23 26, 24 3 f.; Jer 15 4).

3. The Theology of Isaiah. Any attempt to reconstruct the theology of I. should start from his vision. He brought to it no doubt a set of theological ideas and a measure of religious experience; but in his vision everything was heightened and transfigured and realized with a new intensity. The dominant element in it was his overwhelming impression of God, which did not so much convey to him new thoughts about God, but brought home to him by direct insight a crushing realization of the Divine holiness and majesty and with it a new sense of his own impurity and that of his people. But such a collision between the holy God and His unclean people is intolerable, hence judgment is inevitable unless the people repent. But from the first he is assured that the message he is sent to proclaim will harden his hearers in their sin; hence he expects a judgment which shall cut off the vast majority of people. According to the original text of ch. 6, the extermination would appear to be complete; yet we have good reason for believing that his conception of the impending judgment was not so drastic as this. For he himself had been cleansed and forgiven, and others might share his experience. Moreover, Zion was the earthly dwelling-place of J', and would therefore not be destroyed. A city implies inhabitants, so I. presumably anticipated that some would be spared. And the fact that very soon after his vision he named his son Shearjashub, 'a remnant shall return' (i.e., to God) proves that a doctrine of the remnant dated back to his earliest period. But how did he believe that the remnant would be constituted? It is possible that at first, viewing Israel as a whole, he expected that the Northern Kingdom, which is specially prominent in various prophecies, would be destroyed and that Judah would be the remnant. It may have been with this conviction that he met the crisis of 735. Israel has allied itself with Syria, but God will bring their purpose to nought, and Judah will emerge triumphant and unharmed. But if Ahaz obstinately clings to his infatuated plan of invoking the aid of Assyria instead of trusting in God, then, altho Syria and Ephraim will perish, disaster will be brought on Judah by Assyria. When accordingly the fatal step was taken, the doctrine of the remnant had to be adjusted to the new situation. Judgment would come on the unbelieving and disobedient people of Judah, but there would still be a remnant, and this remnant would consist of the prophet and those who shared his faith. In the obscurity which hangs over the date of some of the oracles and the identity of those against whom they were directed, it is not clear by precisely what instrument the prophet at first anticipated that judgment would be effected. But he mentions attacks on Ephraim by Syria and the Philistines (9 11 f.) and civil war (ver. 20 f.), and closes this oracle with the description of the advance of an unknown foe, no doubt Assyria (5 26-29). For the greater part of his career he thought of Assyria as the instrument of J''s judgment. If 'the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be carried away before the king of Assyria' (8 4), the flood of Assyrian invasion is also to flow on into Judah and imperil the existence of the nation (8 7 f.). Yet when matters seem to be in extremities J" will intervene and save His city and people. And this for two reasons. On the one hand, I. held that Zion was indestructible and that a remnant of Judah would be saved; on the other hand, he saw in Assyria's blasphemous arrogance a sin which would involve her in utter ruin (10 5-15). For the Assyrian king was but the rod with which God inflicted His chastisement; and when it had served His purpose it would be broken and cast aside. Then the age of blessedness would begin: the Messianic king after smiting his foes in a glorious victory would reign in righteousness and wisdom as a Prince of Peace (9 2-7, 11 1-9). It will be clear that the basis of Isaiah's teaching was his conception of God. To one who had seen the Lord of Nature and History high and lifted up (6 1) all earthly powers shrank into insignificance; not even the king of Assyria could overawe one to whom that insight into the ultimate realities had been vouchsafed. And so he anticipates that J" will execute His judgment on all that exalts itself in arrogance on earth. And His majesty is matched by His awful purity which reacts with terrible penalties against the obstinate sinner but is gracious to the men of penitence and faith. For 'faith' is one of the prophet's chief contributions to religious thought (7 9, 28 16, 30 15). Whoever has once apprehended the might and majesty of God will feel that the greatest human empires are nothing in comparison with Him, and will rest in the assurance of His protection, tho all human forces may combine against Him. Hence I. deprecates all reliance on human alliances, whether with Assyria or with Egypt, or on the clever scheming of the politicians or on material resources and fortifications.

4. Criticism of Isaiah, chs. 40-66. It was natural, when the Seond or Deutero-Isaiah was clearly distinguished from I. of Jerusalem, that he should be regarded as the author of all of the last 27 chapters of the book. Closer inspection revealed evidence that this section was of composite origin, and various analyses were suggested. Since the publication of Duhm's commentary in 1892, critics generally have acquiesced in his view that the work of the Second Isaiah comes to an end with ch. 55. Some indeed have placed its conclusion at ch. 48, but this is most improbable. It should be added, however, that Duhm, in agreement with several scholars, holds that 'the Servant Poems' are not the work of Second Isaiah. He attributes chs. 56-66, apart from later insertions, to a single prophet whom he calls 'Trito-Isaiah.' It is improbable, however, that prophecies on such different levels should all be the work of one man, and it is more likely that this section is itself composite; nor perhaps ought the possibility that some of Deutero-Isaiah's work is to be found in it to be excluded. The date of chs. 40-55 should be fixed toward the close of the Babylonian Exile, certainly so chs. 40-48 and probably chs. 49-55. Chs. 56-66, apart perhaps from 63 7-64 12, may perhaps be most plausibly dated about the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., or possibly somewhat earlier. It is uncertain where the Second Isaiah lived—the most widely accepted view is that he was one of the exiles in Babylon, but some have thought of his home as in Palestine or in Egypt.

5. The Theology of the Second Isaiah. The situation to which the Second Isaiah addressed himself was one of hopelessness on the part of the exiles, as it had been in the days of Ezekiel (Ez 37 11). They were complaining that J" had forgotten them (Is 40 27, 49 14). Confronted with the magnificence of Babylonian idolatry and the apparent demonstration of the inferiority of J" to the gods who had destroyed His city and His Temple and held His people in captivity, they were tempted to abandon their allegiance to Him. Hence his first word to them in their apathetic despair is one of consolation. The dark night is ending, their guilt has been paid off, indeed they have suffered more punishment than their sin deserved (40 1 f.). J" has not forgotten, can not conceivably forget, His people (49 14-16). He is no weak and defeated deity but the mighty unconquerable Creator, the everlasting One unsearchable in understanding, who knows the end from the beginning, and before whom the teeming nations are as a drop which hangs from the bucket, or the dust in the scale of which no account is taken (40 12-31, etc.). He is the Lord of history who disposes of all its forces with infinite ease and unerring wisdom. Nor does the author limit himself to this superb and impressive confession of his monotheistic faith. He demonstrates his conviction by an appeal to the fulfilment of prophecy (41 25-29, 43 10-13, 44 6-9, 45 21, 46 9-11, 48 3-8). Only He who can control the future is able safely to predict it; the fulfilment of the predictions made by His prophets conclusively demonstrates His sole Divinity. Again and again the heathen gods are challenged to give a similar proof (41 21-24, 26, 44 7 f., 45 21). Scornfully he exposes the folly of idolatry (40 19 f., 41 7, 44 9-20, 46 1-7). In the word J" speaks there is an inherent energy which enables the prophetic utterance to achieve its own fulfilment (55 11). Hence as the prophet utters the prediction of Judah's return he releases forces which will tend to bring it about (cf. Ez 37 4-10). While he recognizes the stern side of J"'s character toward His people (51 17-23, 54 8), he dwells far more on His gentleness and graciousness and his constant theme is the deliverance of His people from exile, His personal conduct of them across the desert with all the difficulties and discomforts of the journey supernaturally removed, their joyful arrival at Zion and their perfect happiness and peace in their own land. Of special importance is the conception of the Servant of J". The term is frequently applied to the nation in chs. 40-55, but there are four passages (42 1-4, 49 1-6, 50 4-9, 52 13-53 12), commonly called 'the Servant poems,' which have excited very keen debate. The interpretations fall into two main groups, the individual and the collective. Undeniably in the rest of the prophecy the Servant is Israel and in 49 3 this identification is explicitly made; on the other hand, possibly in the same passage (cf. 49 5 f.), but certainly in the present text of 53 8, there is a distinction between the Servant and Israel.

Moreover the description, especially in the fourth poem, is so personal in its character that many feel that an individual and not the nation must be intended. Numerous suggestions as to the identity of this individual have been made. Sellin, for example, has suggested in turn Zerubbabel, Jehoiachin, and Moses, while Mowinkel has recently argued that the Servant was the prophet himself. On the other hand, the general usage in these chapters and the explicit identification with Israel in one of the poems are important. The difficulty of supposing that any individual should be depicted as in the poems and so lofty a rôle be assigned to him, and that he should be expected to rise from the dead, make an individual interpretation extremely difficult. The personal traits in the description must not be unduly emphasized. Hebrew goes a long way in using such language in reference to groups. Some who adopt the national interpretation suppose that it is of the ideal rather than the actual nation that the prophet is thinking, but this is not the natural explanation of the term; it rather suggests that the historic nation is meant which had died in the exile and is to be raised again at the return. Two functions are attributed to the Servant, he is to reveal the true God to the Gentiles and his sufferings and death have been endured vicariously for the sin of the heathen. If this interpretation is correct, a large part of the Second Isaiah's message is rightly summed up by Wellhausen: 'There is no God but J' and Israel is His prophet.' But the interpretation placed upon the tragic history and the fate of Israel is also one of his most suggestive contributions to religious thought.

6. Isaiah, chs. 56-66. In view of the rather miscellaneous character of chs. 56-66 it is precarious to construct a connected statement. The general situation is disenchanting, the wretched material conditions are traced to the grave sins which are rampant in the community. Most of the social abuses denounced by the older prophets reappear; and there are strong denunciations of idolatry, but this may not have been practised within the community itself. The ethical standard is high, but it is blended with the ceremonial in a manner strange to the older prophets but characteristic of Ezekiel. Of special beauty are the glowing passages devoted to the splendor of the Temple. And here the stress laid upon it as a place of prayer is to be observed. And it is to be for all nations and not simply for the Jews. Yet the nations are subordinate and tributary to the Jews (60 10-14, 61 5 f.). There is a brilliant but ethically repulsive description of J' trampling the Edomites in the wine-press of His wrath till His garments are soaked with their blood (63 1-6).

7. Non-Isaianic Matter in Is. 1-35. Of the non-Isaian sections in chs. 1-35 the most important is chs. 24-27. Here prophecy has taken on a deep eschatological coloring. The main body of the work is an apocalyptic oracle (according to Duhm, ch. 24, 25 6-8, 26 20, and 27 1, 12 f.). It probably dates from the later part of the 4th cent., reflecting the conditions of Alexander's overthrow of the Persian Empire. Its theology is in advance of that in Deutero-Isaiah. Several scholars follow Duhm in the view that a number of lyrical passages have been inserted into the oracle. It may be added that E. Meyer, who also emphatically rejects the view that it or any part of the prophetic literature could have originated later than the middle of the third century, regards the analysis of chs. 24-27 into several fragments as very questionable (Ursprung und Anfänge des Christentums, vol. II, p. 6). Chs. 34 f. are apparently postexilic and both by the same writer. The curious reference to the book of Yahweh (34 16), i.e., the collection of prophecies in which this oracle is included suggests a late date, as does the association of the overthrow of Edom with the judgment of all nations. Ch. 35 seems to depend on chs. 40-66. Chs. 13 1-14 23 probably belong for the most part to the close of the Exile, altho a few scholars suppose that the ode on the downfall of an unnamed tyrant (14 4b-21) was written with reference to an Assyrian monarch. More probably the king of Babylon is intended and 14 1-4a apparently connects the two by an editorial link. Ch. 21 1-10 is of the same period and deals with the same subject. It is specially interesting for the insight it gives into the psychology of the prophetic state. The oracle on Tyre (ch. 23) may be by Isaiah, altho the precise reference would still be uncertain; but more probably it is later. Vs. 15-18 seem to be a postexilic appendix; but the oracle itself, while possibly postexilic, may perhaps, if not by I., most suitably be referred to Nebuchadrezzar's siege of Tyre (585-577). Questions are also raised about other sections of chs. 1-35, the chief being about chs. 15 f., 19, 32 and 33. The oracle on Moab (ch. 15 f.) is probably not by I., but it may be an older prophecy quoted and endorsed by him. If postexilic its date is uncertain, but it may belong to the 5th cent. B.C. The oracle on Egypt (ch. 19) may be I.'s, but more probably it is non-Isaian. But its date is quite uncertain. The appendix (vs. 18-25) is also of uncertain origin, it may refer to the temple of 'Yahu' at Elephantine. Ch. 32 is probably I.'s. Ch. 33 may well be postexilic, but its date is quite uncertain.

LITERATURE: The chief modern landmarks in the exegetical literature are the commentaries by Gesenius (1820-21), Hitzig (1833), Cheyne (1880), Duhm (1892). Duhm's work, altho extreme, inaugurated so important a new departure ~~as to~~ in criticism and interpretation that the earlier literature was largely antiquated by it. The most comprehensive treatise on the criticism of the Book is Cheyne's Introduction to the Book of Isaiah (1894). The most useful complete commentary in English is at present the second edition of Skinner (1915, 1917), which may be supplemented by Whitehouse (1905) and Wade (1911). Only the first volume of the ICC has appeared (1912). It is by G. B. Gray, and covers chs. i-xxvii, with great learning and thoroughness. G. A. Smith's famous volumes in the Expositor's Bible (1888-90) were published before Duhm's commentary appeared, and should be supplemented and corrected by his article in HDB. The chief German commentaries, in addition to those mentioned, are by Dillmann-Kittel (1898), Marti (1910). In French there is a commentary by Condamin (1905). Of other literature there may be mentioned Driver in "Men of the Bible" (1893), Glazebrook, Studies in the Book of Isaiah (1910), Kennett, The Composition of the Book of Isaiah (1910), Gordon, The Faith of Isaiah (n.d.). There are translations by Cheyne in The Sacred Books of the Old Testament (1898), Box (1908), and J. E. McFayden (1918). There is a large literature on Isaiah chs. 40-66, and in particular on the Servant problem. Much valuable material may be found in works on O T Theology or the Religion of Israel, and on the Prophets. See the bibliographies to the articles RELIGION OF ISRAEL and PROPHECY, PROPHET. A. S. F.

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF. 1. Isaianic Apocalypses. The occasion for the use of the name and personality of Isaiah in apocalyptic writings is to be found probably in the fact that he was introduced in his ministry through the means of a vision. How large this use was is not positively known, but the titles of four Isaianic apocalyptic books are mentioned by ancient writers. These are: The Martyrdom of Isaiah (Origen), The Anabaticon (Epiphanius, probably the same as Jerome's Ascension of Isaiah), The Vision of Isaiah, and The Testament of Hezekiah. The only work that has survived to modern times, however, is entitled The Ascension of Isaiah. It consists of two parts, including respectively five and six chapters.

2. Contents, Part I. Part I tells of how in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of Hezekiah, Isaiah prophesied that Manasseh under the influence of Satan, would fall away from the worship of the Lord, and when Hezekiah desired to prevent this by putting Manasseh to death, the prophet forbade him (ch. 1). His prediction was in due time fulfilled, and after having fled into the wilderness he was seized upon the charge of treason against the Holy City and usurpation of authority higher than that of Moses, and brought back before the king (2:1-3:12). The real reason, however, for Satan's hatred of Isaiah was the prediction of the coming of Messiah from the seventh heaven, and of his death, resurrection, ascension, and second coming. The mission of the twelve Apostles, the persecution of the Christians, the coming of Antichrist, and his destruction were also predicted (3:13-4:22); in 3:13b-4:18 Charles claims to have discovered the lost 'Testament of Hezekiah.' Manasseh later caused Isaiah to be sawn asunder (ch. 5).

3. Contents, Part II. Part II gives an account of a vision of the prophet which he saw in the twentieth year of Hezekiah, and told to the king and his counselors (ch. 6). In this vision he was taken up by an angel through the firmament into the seventh heaven, where he saw the patriarchs Adam, Abel, and Enoch, and was ushered into the presence of God Himself. But the chief object of his ascension was to receive the revelation of the Messiah's advent to earth (chs. 7-10). Being now taken back by the angel to the firmament, he saw in detail the circumstances of the birth, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection of Jesus, and His ascension into the seventh heaven. At this point the angel left him and his soul returned into his body. But because he told this vision to Hezekiah, Manasseh put him to death (ch. 11).

4. Composition, Date, Authorship. It is quite clear from the outline here given that the Ascension of Isaiah is a composite book, consisting of at least two principal works, i.e., the Martyrdom and the Vision. Each of these is complete, and has probably been enlarged from a briefer original. The Vision was produced in the 2d cent. of the Christian era. The Martyrdom antedates it by a century or more, being, to all appearances, a reduction into literary form of the old tradition regarding the death of the great prophet.

The Ascension of Isaiah has been edited in the Ethiopic text discovered by Laurence in 1819, and, as revised upon the basis of two additional MSS., by Dillmann (1877). It has been translated into English, and published in the Lutheran Quarterly Review (1878, pp. 513 ff.). See also Kautzsch, Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (1900), and Charles, The Ascension of Isaiah (1900), and in O. T. Apocr. and Pseudepigrapha, vol. II, 1913.

A. C. Z.

ISCAH, iz'ka (יִצְחָק, yishkakh): A daughter of Haran, son of Terah (Gn 11:29). If these verses relate to the amalgamation and relations of tribes instead of individuals, the meaning is that Haran (a tribe) was 'father' of not only Milcah, but also of Iscah (a tribe). E. E. N.

ISCARIOT, See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

ISH- (in compounds): The Heb. יִשְׁ, 'ish, means 'man,' and is used in a few compound proper nouns with this significance. In most proper nouns beginning with 'ish' (Heb. יִשְׁ, yish), this syllable is but a part of the verbal form contained in the name. E. E. N.

ISHBAH, ish'ba (יִשְׁבָּה, yishbah): The clan, apparently, from which Eshtemoa was peopled (I Ch 4:17).

ISHBAK, ish'bak. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ISHBI-BENOB, ish'bai-bi'nob (יִשְׁבִּי בְנוֹב, yishbi bhenob): A name occurring in II S 21:16. The Heb. text of this and the preceding verse is doubtless corrupt. The original reading probably was, 'and David and his servants with him went down and dwelt in Gob and fought with the Philistines,' etc. The name of the gigantic opponent of David has been lost (so Driver, HTS, ad loc. See also Gob). E. E. N.

ISHBOSHETH, ish-bō'sheth (יִשְׁבֹּשֶׁת, yish bōsheth), 'man of shame' (also Eshbaal, 'man of Baal,' in I Ch 8:33, RVmg 'Ishbosheth'): The fourth son of Saul (II S 2:8). After the defeat and death of his father and his three elder brothers at the battle of Mt. Gilboa, I. would naturally have fallen heir to the kingdom, but the victory of the Philistines was so overwhelming that for the time being this was impossible. David soon became king over the tribe of Judah, but not of all Israel. After about five years Abner, in loyalty to his master, Saul, caused I. to be proclaimed king at Mahanaim on the east side of the Jordan. The result was a civil war. An effort to avert this by selecting twelve men on each side and allowing the issue to rest with the result of a combat between them proved unsuccessful, since all the combatants were mortally wounded. A battle was then fought in which the followers of I. suffered a crushing defeat. He continued to hold out, but when Abner transferred his allegiance to David on account of a rebuke which I. administered to him for unlawful intimacy with his father's concubine, Rizpah, his cause became desperate, and he was himself murdered by two of his captains, a crime which David promptly punished.

ISHHOD, ish'hod' (יִשְׁחֹד, yishhōdh, Ishod AV), 'man of glory': The ancestral head of a Manassite clan (I Ch 7 18).

ISHI, ai'shai or ish'ai (יִשִּׁי, yish'i), 'my help':
I. 1 and 2. Descendants of Judah (I Ch 2 31, 4 20).
3. A descendant of Simeon (I Ch 4 42). 4. The head of a family of Manasseh (I Ch 5 24). All are probably clan-names. II. (יִשִּׁי, yish'i) 'my man.' A symbolic term, expressive of the ideal relation between J' and Israel, meaning 'my husband' in a higher sense than ba'ali, 'my master' (Ho 2 16).

ISHIAH, ai-shai'a. See ISSIAH.

ISHIJAH, ai-shai'ja. See ISSIJAH.

ISHMA, ish'ma (יִשְׁמָא, yishmā): The ancestral head of a clan of Judah (I Ch 4 3).

ISHMAEL, ish'ma-el, ish'mē-, or -mē' (יִשְׁמָעֵל, yishmā'ēl), 'God hears': 1. The son of Abraham and Hagar, Sarah's maid (Gn 16 11 ff.). Isaac, son of Sarah, Abraham's full wife, supplanted I. as the heir of Abraham, and through Sarah's jealousy, I. and his mother were expelled from Abraham's home (Gn 17 18 ff., 21 8-21). Nevertheless, I. was circumcised and thus (according to the late theory of P) viewed as having some real connection with the Covenant (Gn 17 23-26). I. is represented as the ancestor of the Ishmaelites, subdivided according to P, Gn 25 12 ff., into 12 tribes. The names represent 'the assumed eponymous ancestors of 12 tribes which are here treated as forming a political confederacy under the name of Ishmael' (Skinner, ICC on Gn 25 12 ff.). They were easily confused with the Midianites (cf. Gn 37 25; Jg 8 24). Their wild, warlike character is indicated by the terms applied to I. himself in Gn 16 12 ('a wild ass of a man') and in 21 20 (an 'archer' who dwelt 'in the wilderness'). Some relationship between the Ishmaelites and the Edomites is implied in Gn 28 9 and ch. 36. 2. A man of Judah in Jehoshaphat's day (II Ch 19 11). 3. A Benjamite, one of Saul's descendants (I Ch 8 38, 9 44). 4. An officer who assisted Jehoiada in deposing Athaliah (II Ch 23 1). 5. The leader of a faction that conspired against and murdered Gedaliah, governor of Judah under Nebuchadrezzar (II K 25 23 ff.; Jer 40 8-41 10). 6. A priest (Ezr 10 22).
E. E. N.

ISHMAELITE(S), ish'ma-el-ait(s) (יִשְׁמָעֵלִי, yishmā'ēl'i): The descendants of Ishmael. In Gn 37 25 ff. and Jg 8 24 they are introduced into a context which otherwise speaks of Midianites. Evidently such passages show different authorship and variant traditions. 'Midianites' and 'Ishmaelites' could easily be confused, as meaning Arab tribes inhabiting the deserts S. and SE. of Israel. See ISHMAEL and MIDIAN.
E. E. N.

ISHMAIAH, ish-mē'ya (יִשְׁמָיָהוּ, yishmā'yāhū) 'J' hears': 1. One of David's heroes (I Ch 12 4, Ismaiah AV). 2. The head of the tribe of Zebulun (I Ch 27 19).

ISHMEELITE, ish'mi-el-ait. See ISHMAELITE.

ISHMERAI, ish'mi-rai or ish'mi-rē (יִשְׁמֵרַי, yishmē'ray): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 18).

ISHOD, ish'ed or ai'shed. See ISHHOD.

ISHPAH, ish'pa (יִשְׁפָּא, yishpāh, Ispah AV): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 16).

ISHPAN, ish'pan (יִשְׁפָּן, yishpān): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 22).

ISH-TOB, ish-teb (יִשְׁתֹּב, yish tōbh): In II S 10 6-8 AV this occurs as a proper name. RV reads, 'men of Tob,' which is probably correct. See ARAM, § 11.

ISHVAH, ish'va, ISHUAH, ish'yu-a (יִשְׁוָה, yishwāh), and ISHVI, ish'vai, ISHUI, ish'yu-ai (יִשְׁוִי, yishwī): 1. Ishvi ('Isui,' also 'Jesui' and 'Ishuai' AV) was ancestral head of one of the clans of Asher, the Ishvites (Jesuites AV) (Gn 46 17; Nu 26 44; I Ch 7 30). 'Ishvah' ('Ishuah' AV) in Gn 46 17 and 'Isuah' in I Ch 7 30 AV (omitted in Nu 26 44) are probably only duplicates of Ishvi. 2. A son of Saul (I S 14 49), probably the one called elsewhere Eshbaal, or Ishbosheth.
E. E. N.

ISLE, ISLAND: These terms render the Heb. 'ē, pl. 'iyyīm—i.e., a place whither one betakes himself for resting, from the standpoint of a mariner (Gr. νῆσος, nēsos). The singular is used (Is 20 6, 23 2, 6) for the 'coastland' RV ('isle' AV) of Philistia and Phoenicia, with the adjacent country; cf. Jer 25 22 RVmg. If Caphtor (Jer 47 4) is Crete, the Heb. word is also used for an island. The plural form (Is 40 15) is used for islands in our sense of the word, and perhaps also in Jer 2 10; Ezk 27 6, if Chittim (Kittim) is Cyprus. Elsewhere the plural designates, in general, lands washed by the sea; in part the seacoasts and islands of Asia Minor (Est 10 1; Dn 11 18), in part the seacoasts and islands of the Mediterranean (Gn 10 5; Ezk 26 15, 18, 27 3, 7, 15, 35; Ps 72 10; Is 11 11, 24 15). Distant lands are so referred to, often including the inhabitants (Is 41 1, 5, 42 4, 10, 12, 49 1, 51 5, 59 18, 60 9, 66 19; Jer 31 10; Ps 97 1; Zeph 2 11). In Is 42 15 'islands' means 'dry land.' In Is 13 22, 34 14; Jer 50 39, 'iyyīm is wrongly translated 'islands.' RV has 'wolves' (margin, 'howling creatures'). In the N T the translation is exact, except perhaps in Rev 6 14, 16 20, where distant lands are meant. C.S.T.

ISMACHIAH, is'ma-kai'a (יִשְׁמַחְיָהוּ, yishmakhyāhū), 'J' supports': A temple overseer under Hezekiah (I Ch 21 12).

ISMAIAH, is-mē'ya. See ISHMAIAH.

ISPAH, is'pa. See ISHPAH.

ISRAEL, HISTORY OF

I. THE HEBREW TRIBES II. THE ISRAELITE MONARCHY III. THE JEWISH CHURCH

I. THE HEBREW TRIBES. 1. In the Desert. The hardy Arabian wanderers that were later called Israel lived meagerly, like the Bedawi Arabs of today, by pasturing their flocks of sheep and goats and by occasional raids into more fertile regions. Hunger and thirst hardened their fiber, tents were their protection against the heat of the day and the cold of the night; war was their avocation and source of ephemeral wealth; the family and the clan the only social organization. Spirits of springs, stones and trees were the objects of their worship. About 1400 B.C. such nomads were plundering the territories of the Egyptian vassals in Southern Palestine, as Hittite conquerors were pouring in from the north. These southern invaders from the desert are named Habiru (Hebrews) in the letters written to the Pharaoh from Jerusalem; and in other letters, likewise found at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt, they are called Sa.Gaz. Some of these Habiru-Sa.Gaz may have been the ancestral clans of Israel; among their exploits may have been the disastrous attempt of Simeon and Levi to conquer Shechem (Gn 34).

2. In Egypt. In the Amarna period (1400 B.C.) some other Hebrew clans sought pasture land in Goshen, on the border of Egypt. Not all of the pressed clans by Moses (his name is Egyptian and means 'son'), who had been called to this mission by J', the God of Sinai. Leading the tribes across a shallow branch of the Red Sea where the pursuing Egyptians perished at the return of the tide, Moses brought the wanderers to the oasis of Kadesh, near the southern border of Judah. It was there that the soul of Israel was born; there Moses imparted to his people instruction (tōrah) and administered justice; there the God of Sinai, who had wrought their deliverance, became the God of Israel. See also ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, §§ 3-8.

3. In Canaan. (a) Canaan. About 1900 B.C. Sinuhe, a fugitive from Egypt, found Canaan divided into a number of petty feudal kingdoms

SEMITIC TRADERS BRINGING THEIR WARES INTO EGYPT.

'12 tribes' migrated to the land of the Pharaohs. The sons of Bilhah (Dan and Naphtali) and of Zilpah (Gad and Asher) dwelt east and west of the Jordan from time unknown. Of the sons of Leah, Judah was living in southern Palestine when his brothers Simeon and Levi, broken by the Shechemites, came down to swell his numbers; Issachar and Zebulon occupied their territories amid the Canaanites from ancient days. Only Joseph son of Rachel (Ephraim and Manasseh), whose southern clans were called Benjamin in Canaan, settled in Goshen and was joined, perhaps at Kadesh, by Reuben son of Leah. Raamses II (1292-1225) when he built Pithom and Raamses subjected the Hebrews of Goshen to forced labor. Under his successor Merneptah (1225-1215) (who made desolate the Israelites in Canaan) deliverance came to the op-rich in produce of the soil. Between 1500 and 1200 Canaan remained under the sway of the Pharaohs, tho their hold on the land was relaxed in the Amarna period (1400) when the country was invaded by Hebrews, Hittites, and Amorites. Two new incursions took place about 1200: the Philistines, repulsed in their attempt to land in Egypt, occupied the southern Palestinian coast; the Israelites came in from the east and the south. The Canaanites, all Semites with the exception of the Hittites and the Philistines, were generally cultivators of fields, orchards, and vineyards. The seacoast, on the highway of commerce, was the seat of a cosmopolitan, if corrupt, civilization. The religion lacked spirituality, altho prophecy in its crudest forms was not unknown: the local Baal worshiped at 'the high place' (seldom in a temple), where a rude stone pillar and wooden post symbolized his presence, was supposed to be the giver of agricultural bounty (Hos 2 5). Hebrew was the language of Canaan from time immemorial, and after 1200 the so called Phœnician alphabet, the prototype of our own script, was in common use. Such was the land of promise which Moses is said to have surveyed from the top of Pisgah without being permitted to enter it.

(b) The Invasion of Canaan. The kingdoms of Edom, Moab, and Ammon may have originated through the settlement of Hābiru clans: this would explain their kinship with Israel. When the Amorites coming down from the north threatened to overwhelm Moab, Reuben and part of Manasseh hastened from Kadesh to the rescue. Defeating two Amorite kings, Sihon and Og, they settled in their territories east of the Jordan, together with proved to be more arduous than the first onslaught.

(c) The Judges. When the nomads became farmers they had to propitiate the local Baals; J' remained the God of war. In His name Deborah (about 1150) called ten tribes of Israel to battle against Sisera, but only six answered the summons (Ephraim, Benjamin, Machir, Zebulun, Naphtali and Issachar): Reuben, Gilead, Dan, and Asher remained at home; Judah, Simeon, and Levi were not yet in the confederation. There was no central government; usually each tribe fought its own battles: Ehud freed Benjamin from the tyranny of Eglon, king of Moab; Jephthah drove the Ammonites out of Gilead; Gideon with his 300 delivered Manasseh from the plundering Midianites. Such heroes ('Judges'), aflame with divine ardor in time of danger, founded no dynasty, save Gideon, whose seventy sons ruled after him until they were

Gad, who was long since dwelling in this region (cf. the Moabite Stone, line 10). Judah, strengthened by Simeon, Levi, and the Kenites, moved northward and occupied the region around Hebron. After the death of Moses, Joshua led the Joseph tribes across the Jordan to Jericho. Of the Canaanites some, like the Gibeonites, submitted without struggle, others were defeated in open battle, as at Beth-horon. At Shechem the newcomers made a compact with the Hebrews who had resided in Canaan since perhaps 1400 (cf. Jos 24): they all pledged themselves to worship J' and to answer His call to war. The first Israelite legislation, based in part on older Palestinian codes, can be traced back to Shechem (Jos 24 25 f.; cf. 8 32). Thus between 1230 and 1200 Joseph entered the land of promise, but the consolidation of the conquest murdered (with the exception of Jotham) by Abimelech their half brother who reigned but three troubled years (about 1100). Israel was not yet ripe for a king: when however the Philistines menaced its hard-won territory and cherished freedom, monarchy became imperative.

II. THE ISRAELITE MONARCHY. 4. The United Kingdom. (a) Saul (about 1028-1013). The first encounter between Philistines and Israelites was disastrous to the latter (I S 4); in a second victory the uncircumcised captured the ark of Jahveh Zebaoth, brought into the battle from Shiloh, and a Philistine governor was stationed in Gibeah. A seer living in Ramah, Samuel, in an accidental meeting with the son of Kish, a Benjamite landowner, recognized in him the man of the hour and secretly anointed him king. Saul's heroic deliverance of Jabesh-gilead resulted in his public proclamation as king. His immediate subjects were the Joseph tribes and Benjamin. Ably assisted by his son Jonathan, with an army of but 3,000 men he undertook to free Israel from the Philistines. Emboldened by his first signal victory at Michmash, for a period he waged successful war against the neighboring nations. But when the Philistines moved against him in full strength, his lack of forces and equipment decided the battle against him on the plain of Jezreel and he took his own life. The Philistines were again masters in Israel. (b) David (about 1013-973). At first a favorite of Saul, the husband of his daughter and the friend of his son, David nevertheless had to flee from the king's presence to save his life. With a band of outlaws the son of Jesse ranged the hills of Judah and became a captain of a Philistine chief. At the death of Saul, when Abner proclaimed Ishbaal king of Israel in Manahaim (across the Jordan), Judah anointed David king in Hebron. The struggle between the two rulers ended in David's favor. The first success of David as king of the nation was the capture of the Jebusite stronghold on Mount Zion. Jerusalem, his new capital, when the ark of Shiloh was brought up to the tent that served as a royal sanctuary, became eventually the center of the worship of J'. After protracted hostilities on a small scale, the power of the Philistines was broken: in this way, and by his campaigns against the Moabites, the Ammonites (with their allies, the Arameans), and the Edomites, David extended and strengthened the national borders, creating the first strong native state that Canaan had ever known. The flaw in the kingdom was the jealousy between Judah and Israel which David himself had fanned by his early policies and which was now beyond cure. For tho the strong arm of Joab quelled the dangerous revolts of Absalom and of Sheba, violent manifestations of this rivalry, the schism was averted only for a time and came to pass upon the death of David's immediate successor. (c) Solomon (about 973-933). Gaining the throne through intrigue, Solomon established his position by the ruthless murder of his opponents (Adonijah, Joab). The Egyptian Pharaoh gave him a daughter for a wife with Gezer as part of her dowry. The Edomites failed to cast off Israel's yoke, but in the north the Arameans, led by Rezon, conquered Damascus and founded a dangerous rival kingdom. With the ambitions of an eastern potentate, Solomon exacted the resources of his subjects to his own glory. The unassimilated Canaanites he made royal serfs; the territory of Israel (exclusive of Judah) was divided into twelve districts, each supporting the court one month of the year through taxation in kind. The Israelites were subjected to forced labor for the construction of fortresses at strategic points, barracks for chariotry and cavalry, store-houses, and especially for the transformation of Jerusalem into a capital worthy of such a king. The royal palace and the Temple, built by Tyrian architects north of the City of David (the intervening valley was filled up and therefore called the Millô or filling), the wall around Jerusalem, wide reaching commercial enterprises with

Tyre, Egypt, and fabulous sites beyond the sea (Tarshish, Ophir), the birth of the arts and the new flowering of religion and literature, the splendor of court life, the size of the harem, the intricate bureaucracy, so impressed the imagination of the Israelites that, in spite of the hardships imposed upon his subjects by this régime, the wisdom and magnificence of Solomon became proverbial and in magnifying retrospect were later recalled as the acme of Israel's worldly glory (I K 4).

5. The Northern Kingdom. (a) Jeroboam I to Zimri (933-887). At the death of Solomon his son Rehoboam refused to grant relief to the northern tribes from their oppressive burdens; the result was a secession of the ten tribes from Dan to Benjamin and the proclamation of Jeroboam the son of Nebat (formerly Solomon's taskmaster and then a rebel) as king of 'Israel.' The leadership passed again to the North; the diplomacy of David and the splendor of Solomon had only temporarily brought Judah to the front. Jeroboam, who chose Shechem for his capital and Dan and Bethel for his sanctuaries, was followed by his son Nadab (912). The reigns of Baasha (911) (who resided in Tirzah) and his son Elah (888) were unimportant. The murderer Zimri (887) ruled only a week. (b) Omri to Joram (887-843). The usurper Omri (887) was considered in Assyria the founder of the Northern Kingdom: he did for the ten tribes what David and Solomon had done on a larger scale for the nation. After overcoming Tibni, he built his capital, Samaria, in a strategic location; he made treaties with Tyre and married his son Ahab to Jezebel, the daughter of its king; he subjected the northern section of Moab and laid heavy tribute upon that country, but was less fortunate in his wars against the Arameans. Samaria was now eclipsing the glory of Jerusalem. Omri's son Ahab (875) had better success against Benhadad II of Damascus, but Mesha King of Moab boasts (in the Moabite Stone) of his victories against Ahab. The weakness of the Arameans was due to the appearance in Syria of Shalmaneser III of Assyria (859-825): he was met at Qarqar (854) by a coalition of Samaria and Damascus backed by Egypt (a vase of Osorkon II, the Egyptian Pharaoh, was found in Ahab's palace). Ahab fell fighting against Ben-hadad II for the possession of Ramoth-gilead. The rapid assimilation of the culture and religion of the Canaanites occasioned a vigorous reaction: Nazirites and Rechabites protested against the adoption of a civilization that threatened to extinguish the genius of Israel, pleading for a return to the life of the desert; the prophet Elijah fighting against the worship of Melkart (the Baal of Tyre), fashionable in the days of Jezebel, proclaimed J' the sole God of Israel, but the implications of his message were perceived only in the field of politics; his successor Elisha played a part in the movement that precipitated the downfall of the dynasty of Omri, whose last kings were Ahaziah (853) and Joram (852). (c) Jehu to Zechariah (843-744). Jehu (843), Joram's commander in the fight for Jabesh-gilead, was proclaimed king by Elisha, through an emissary, and by the army officers, and he forthwith exterminated every member of the royal families of Israel and Judah within reach, as well as the worshipers of the Tyrian Baal in Samaria. This bloodshed, denounced by Hosea (14), tho it marked a decline of Israel's international prestige, probably saved the religion of J' from extinction. Jehu sided with Shalmaneser III of Assyria (to whom he paid tribute; see the Black Obelisk) against Hazael of Damascus (842), little anticipating that the latter would ravage Israel's territory beyond the Jordan. It was not until 773, when Assyria attacked Damascus, that Jeroboam II (785), the successor of Jehoahaz (816) and Joash (800), was able to regain possession of this region. Victory marked the beginning of a reign of remarkable prosperity, not without the moral laxity and social injustice condemned by Amos and Hosea. They perceived that Assyria would yet attain a commanding position: in spite of appearances, Israel was but 'a brand plucked out of the burning,' and the fall of Jehu's dynasty was imminent. Zechariah (744), the son of Jeroboam, was assassinated by Shallum (744). (d) Shallum to Hoshea (744-725). Shallum fell by the sword of Menahem (744). Anarchy and assassination were hastening the doom of the Northern Kingdom, whose erratic policy was swinging now toward Assyria (Menahem, Pekahiah [738]), now toward Damascus (Pekah [737]), and again toward Assyria (Hoshea [733]). This frantic helplessness (cf. Hos 8:8-10) was due to the revival of Assyria under Tiglath-pileser IV (Pul) (745-727) who incorporated in his empire a large section of the Northern Kingdom after exiling its inhabitants; in 732 he captured Damascus. Hoshea, refusing to pay the annual tribute to Shalmaneser V (727-722), was taken prisoner; Samaria was besieged (725) until it fell to Sargon (722-705), who exiled 27,290 Israelites and sent colonists from Babylonia to take their place. Thus in 722, after a brief period of glory, the Kingdom of Israel disappeared, the victim of the international situation, and helpless 'because the children of Israel had sinned against J' their God.'

6. The Southern Kingdom. (a) Rehoboam to Amaziah (933-780).

Rehoboam (933), during whose reign Pharaoh Shishak invaded Judah, and perhaps Abijah (917) fought against North Israel without success. Altho Asa (915) was able to recover Ramah from Baasha, aided by Benhadad I of Damascus, yet with the accession of Omri (887) Israel became decidedly superior to Judah. Jehoshaphat (875) made an alliance with Ahab, marrying his son Jehoram to Athaliah, Jezebel's daughter. Jehosha-phat's fleet for trading with S. Arabia sank when launched (I K 22 48). Edom rebelled during the reign of Jehoram (851). Ahaziah (844) perished, with David, with the exception of Jehoash, who was rescued by his aunt, the wife of the chief priest of Jerusalem. Six years later, when Jehoash was seven, he was proclaimed king by the priests and the soldiers of the guard, and Athaliah was put to death (837). The new king set apart a portion of the Temple's income for the restoration of the sacred edifice and paid tribute to Hazael of Damascus who had invaded Judah. Amaziah (798) fought with success against Edom, but his challenge to Joash of Israel resulted in a disastrous war: the king was captured, the palace was plundered, the walls of Jerusalem were dismantled. (b) Azariah to Zedekiah (780-587). Azariah (Uzziah) (780) reconquered Elath, the gateway to the Red Sea, fortified Jerusalem, and profited from the prosperity of Israel under Jeroboam II. When he was smitten with leprosy, his son Jotham (740) acted as regent. Ahaz (735), a faithful vassal of Assyria, was attacked by Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel, 'two tails of smoking firebrands' (Isaiah 7 4). At Damascus, where he joined in the celebration of the Assyrian victory over these two kings and paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser IV (745-727), he saw an altar of which he set up a copy in Jerusalem. Thus Judah escaped the fate of Samaria in 722. Hezekiah (720) on the contrary made common cause with the enemies of Assyria. He received an embassy of Merodach-baladan, Sargon's Babylonian rival, and openly defied Sennacherib (705-681). But the Assyrian king defeated Judah and its allies at Eltekeh in 701, plundered 46 cities of Hezekiah and, according to his exaggerated account, carried away 200,150 Judeans; Hezekiah was shut up in Jerusalem 'like a bird in a cage' and paid a heavy indemnity. In spite of the deliverance of Jerusalem, which seemed a miraculous confirmation of Isaiah's promises, Manasseh (692) realized the futility of further resistance to Assyria and, in open opposition to the prophets, encouraged the worship of foreign gods. This policy was continued by Amon (639), who was assassinated after a reign of two years leaving the throne to his son Josiah, eight years old (638). In the 18th year of his reign (621) the party of the priests and prophets won over the young king to their reaction the rest of the descendants of Omri, at the hand of Jehu. Athaliah (843), the queen mother, seized the government after exterminating the house of that followed made Judaism, a combination of the prophetic teaching and the Temple worship, the official religion. The way had been cleared for the reformers by the rapid decline of Assyria after the death of Ashurbanipal (625). The Assyrian régime in Syria came to an end, the Scythian hordes threatened Judah (Jer 4 5-29), Egypt shook off the Assyrian rule, Babylonia became again independent. After the fall of Nineveh (612) Necho II of Egypt attempted the conquest of Syria, defeated Josiah at Megiddo (607) and, refusing to recognize Jehoahaz (607), placed Eliakim (whom he named Jehoiakim) on the throne (607). But Nebuchadrezzar defeated Necho at Carchemish (605) and Judah became a Babylonian dependency (604). In 598 Jehoiakim rebelled, but escaped, through sudden death, the impending punishment. His son Jehoiachin (597) surrendered himself to the Chaldean king and was carried to Babylon together with the upper classes of his kingdom, among them Ezekiel. Zedekiah (Mattaniah) (597), the third son of Josiah who occupied the throne, was induced by the pro-Egyptian party, against the counsel of Jeremiah, to defy Nebuchadrezzar: in 586 Jerusalem was taken after a siege of one year and a half and burned to the ground. Many Judeans were exiled. The Davidic Kingdom had come to its doom, but Judaism, born in 621, was destined to survive to the present day.

THE BLACK OBELISK OF SHALMANESER. THE SECOND SERIES

III. THE JEWISH CHURCH. 7. The Babylonian Period (586-538). Gedaliah, the grandson of Josiah's 'scribe,' appointed by Nebuchadrezzar as governor of Judah and residing at Mizpah, was murdered by Ishmael, a fanatical descendant of David, acting in connivance with the king of Ammon (586). After avenging their governor, a group of Judeans fled into Egypt forcing the reluctant Jeremiah to follow them. A third deportation took place in 582, bringing up the total of the exiles to 4,600 men, perhaps 15 per cent. of the population (cf. however the figures in II K 24 14 ff.). Only the poorest of the people remained in the country, truly sheep without a shepherd, pressed between the Edomites (who occupied southern Judah, later known as Idumæa) and the Samaritans. Sacrifices were still offered on the Temple hill, but, amidst the prevailing gloom and poverty, ancient superstitions and crude religious beliefs flourished anew. The Exiles did not continue to sit weeping by the waters of Babylon, their harps hanging upon the willows (Ps 137). Being the leaders of the nation, they prospered in commerce and progressed in religion. Obedient to the law of Deuteronomy, they reared no temple, they offered no sacrifices. Zealous in prayer, keeping the Sabbath and circumcising their children, preserving and increasing their literature, they were building for the future. Ezekiel was planning a new temple with elaborate ritual, Second Isaiah (Is 40-55) was proclaiming a religion of self-sacrifice, a worship in spirit and in truth. The first of these currents developed into Judaism, the second flowed ultimately into Christianity.

8. The Persian Period (538-333). Babylon fell without a struggle to Cyrus the Persian (538), who gave the Near-East the best government these regions had ever known. Tolerant of all gods, he appointed Sheshbazzar governor of Judea and permitted the return of the Exiles. A few accompanied Sheshbazzar to the impoverished homeland, among them perhaps Zerubbabel and Joshua. Conditions in Judea did not improve. Twenty years later the appeals of Haggai and Zechariah and the efforts of Joshua, whose authority as high-priest was not unchallenged, induced the Jews to restore the Temple. It was dedicated in 515. The difficulty of the situation was aggravated by the animosity between the returned Exiles, enlightened and intolerant, and the natives, ignorant and superstitious. Nehemiah was sent to Jerusalem in 445. He rebuilt the walls and won the day for the Exiles by enforcing the prescriptions of the Law (particularly the prohibition of foreign marriages and the keeping of the Sabbath), and by driving out the leaders of the opposition. Thus he precipitated the Samaritan schism.

9. The Hellenistic-Roman Period (333 B.C.-70 A.D.). When Alexander conquered the Persian empire, Jerusalem surrendered but Samaria had to be taken by force (332). After his death (323) Palestine remained, with few interruptions, under the control of the Ptolemies of Egypt, until in 198 it became a part of the Seleucid Kingdom of Syria. The flourishing Jewish colony at Alexandria in Egypt adopted the Greek culture and translated the Scriptures into the vernacular (this Greek version, called the Septuagint, became the Bible of the Christian Church). The progress of Hellenism in Jerusalem was slower and confined to the aristocracy. Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164), irritated by the opposition of the 'pious' (hasidim) to his plan of Hellenization, declared Judaism illegal (168). A rebellion broke out. Judas Maccabeus after a series of heroic victories forced the abrogation of the decree and in 165 rededicated the Temple. His brothers Jonathan (161) and Simon (143) continued the fight, no longer for religious freedom but for political autonomy (achieved in 141). The new state, owing to the weakness and dynastic quarrels of the Seleucids, extended its borders under John Hyrcanus (134), Aristobulus I (104), Alexander Janneus (102) and Alexandra (75-67), until the rivalry between Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II invited Roman intervention. Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 B.C. Herod, then through procurators, but failed to gain the friendship of the subjects. The outcome of Jewish discontent and open rebellion was the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in 70 A.D. Deprived of its Temple, Judaism became henceforth strict Pharisaism, the study and observance of the Law. Rigid exclusivism drove many of the Jews of the Diaspora, and equally their proselytes, into the ranks of the followers of Jesus of Nazareth.

LITERATURE: C. Noyes, The Genius of Israel (1924) is the best treatment of the Preexilic period. The most useful among the recent histories of Israel in English are those of H. P. Smith (1903), Wade (1903), Cornill (4th ed., 1909), I. J. Peritz (1915), Foakes-Jackson (4th ed., 1921). Standard German books are: Wellhausen, Israelitische und Jüdische Geschichte (7th ed., 1914); H. Guthe, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (3rd ed., 1914); R. Kittel, Geschichte des Volkes Israel (2 vols., 5th and 6th ed., 1923).

I. THE ORIGINS OF THE RELIGION.

1. Antecedents of the Religion. Strictly speaking the religion of Israel was, like the nation, the creation of Moses. But it did not make an absolutely new beginning; such new beginnings in religion are unknown. The Hebrews were a Semitic stock and they brought much of their Semitic heritage with them into the religion of Yahweh. Their antecedents indeed are shrouded in a dim obscurity and wide divergence of opinion prevails even on the main issues. According to their own traditions their ancestors came from Mesopotamia; they lived for a time in Palestine, migrated to Egypt and escaped, under the leadership of Moses, from the forced labor exacted of them into the freedom of the desert. Several kinds of influence had accordingly played upon them and molded and enriched the primitive Semitic type which lay behind it all. On these earlier stages it is unnecessary for our purpose to linger in detail. But since Moses himself was conscious that he proclaimed to his people the God of their fathers under a new name, something must be said of the patriarchs and their religion.

2. Patriarchal Religion. The historicity of the patriarchs has been denied by many scholars. But the attempts to prove that they were originally tribes or nations, or deities who have been degraded into men, or that they are to be fitted into an elaborate astral mythology, have failed to account for all the phenomena. That the narratives as they stand often reflect later ideals and conditions or have been shaped by motifs of great antiquity and wide range may perhaps be true. But that the chief figures of the patriarchal history are themselves historical, even if it can not be definitely proved, seems to be the most probable of the rival interpretations. The narratives date from a much later age, but the picture of the patriarchal religion appears to embody authentic elements. In particular it is to be observed how marked a difference there is between the gracious Deity who, while He can inflict severe penalties, is yet mild and benevolent to His worshipers and the terrible and tempestuous character of J'', as He is depicted in the wilderness narratives and not a little of the later history. Whether the name 'Yahweh' was known in the patriarchal period is a question on which our authorities differ. J uses it frequently and represents the name as known almost from the origin of the human race (Gn 4 26). E and P on the contrary avoid it, the latter explicitly stating that it was not known to the patriarchs (Ex 6 3). The solution may be either that J freely carried the name back into a period in which it was not in use, because he identified the God of the patriarchs with J''; or that one section of what was later the composite people of Israel used the name and the other did not. It is probable in any case that it was only from the time of Moses that J'' was definitely recognized as the God of the whole Hebrew people.

3. The Achievement of Moses. Far more important, however, than the problem of the pre-Mosaic religion is that presented by the career and achievement of Moses. For he was the creator of the religion and the nation alike; yet the most varied views are taken even on the crucial questions. Some scholars (e.g., E. Meyer and Hölzner) treat him as a legendary figure. But his historicity is generally admitted and the creative character of his work. Here we must simply assume his historicity and connection with Egypt: the fact that a considerable proportion at least of the Hebrews were in Egypt and escaped under his leadership from forced service to the freedom of the desert; that they were saved from the pursuit of the Egyptians by what seemed to them a Divine deliverance; that Moses welded them into a single people in which kindred tribes who had not been in Egypt may have been incorporated; that he did this in the strength of the conviction that J'' had chosen this people for His own and delivered them first from bondage, and then from impending ruin, by a stupendous display of His might. But it is very difficult to reach any satisfactory conclusion as to the religious beliefs of Moses and the characteristics of the religion he founded. We can not assign any of the Pentateuchal sources to him. But the earlier documents may be used with proper precautions, and the value of the tradition they contain should probably be rated higher than they have been by the dominant critical school. Since he, no doubt, drew on earlier religious and legal developments, our knowledge of surrounding peoples may be of service. But it is not easy to draw the right inferences, and no people made even a distant approach to Israel's achievement. We can not for example safely build on alleged Babylonian monotheism, nor yet on the monotheism of the heretic king of Egypt, Amenhotep IV. Another line of approach is to work back from the religion as we know it in the 8th cent. prophets and the preprophetic literature and ask what it implies. Such scholars as Kuenen, Wellhausen, Stade, and Duhm have been inclined to regard the ethical monotheism of the 8th cent. prophets as marking an immense advance on the earlier religion. But with this depreciation of preprophetic religion the transition to Amos and his successors becomes too abrupt and steep. Only if a higher element than they recognized was present in the religion from the first, does the development in the 8th cent. become explicable. That the religion of Moses was an ethical monotheism it would be very hazardous to assert. But that it was an ethical monolatry, in other words that, while not denying the existence of other deities, it insisted that one alone was to be worshiped and that He was a moral God who demanded morality from His people, may be affirmed with confidence. The problem presented by the history of Israel is to explain why, instead of resting in polytheism or even in monolatry, the Hebrews ultimately attained the belief that there was only one God, and He the God of Israel; and why the great prophets and other outstanding representatives of the higher religion of Israel attached such importance to morality, while ceremonial, so extravagantly valued by priests and people, was treated as trivial in comparison with it and abhorrent to Him when offered by evil-doers.

4. Yahweh and Israel. In investigating this problem we may start from Wellhausen's summary of Mosaic religion: Yahweh is the God of Israel, Israel is the people of Yahweh. This, while repeated by many scholars, has been criticized by E. Meyer as 'an empty phrase'; and with this much justice that the religion of Israel could be expressed in the same formula with the substitution of Moab for Israel and Chemosh for Yahweh. Yet there may have been differentiating qualities between Israel and Moab, between J' and Chemosh, and between the relations of deity and people in the two cases. The formula may accordingly be of real value. When we consider the later development of the religion, we are struck by the apparent paradox of a monotheism in which the Deity was designated by a proper name, and the further paradox of a recognition of the unity of God combined with belief in a national Divinity. There is only one God, but He is Yahweh the God of Israel. That this conviction goes back to Moses is not probable. Indeed it is easier to understand how Israel's belief in God came to be formulated as it was, if on an original monolatry in which the national Deity was indicated by a proper name, a monotheistic belief was subsequently superimposed, the name of the national Divinity being still retained when there was no longer any need to distinguish Him from others of His class. But from the first the potentialities of the later development must have been latent in the religion. It is doubtful whether we can explain the uniqueness of Israel's religion by any unique quality in Israel itself. There is no reason to suppose that the nation was differentiated from kindred peoples by any exceptional religious genius. Indeed the difficulty experienced by its religious leaders in detaching it from lower religious beliefs and observances speaks strongly against such an explanation. Nor is the fact that the Deity is the guardian of right as between man and man an adequate cause. For this was not sufficiently exceptional to originate the uniqueness of the religion. Moreover, the function of the Deity may have been not so much to insist on the punishment of transgressors as to indicate by oracle or lot their identity. Was it then in the conception formed of J'? To this point we must now turn attention.

5. Significance of Yahweh's Name. The first question touches the significance of the name Yahweh. Its original meaning may be entirely lost; but even if it is to be explained from Hebrew or a cognate language several interpretations are possible. It is a third person imperfect and the verb may mean 'to fall,' or 'to breathe,' or 'blow,' or 'to be.' And it may belong either to the Kal conjugation, which expresses the simple idea of the verb, or to the Hiphil, that is the causative. Thus He may be a God who overthrows cities or armies, or a wind-God, or a God who brings His purpose to pass. But the narrative in which the name is revealed to Moses yields us another interpretation, which of course is post-Mosaic but may be true to the interpretation placed on the name by Moses. According to this 'Yahweh' means 'He will be.' The explanation 'I will be what I will be' (Ex 3 14) is not intended to indicate that J' refuses to disclose His name (cf. Gn 32 29; Jg 13 17), for the whole point of the narrative is that the name is revealed. The formula is suggestive just because it is infinite. What He will be is not defined, it is left to the future to disclose: history alone is an adequate commentary on it, filling it with ever new and deeper meaning. We may say, indeed, that not time but eternity alone can draw out the fulness of meaning hidden in it. Nevertheless it must be admitted that the name can not be interpreted with certainty and no confident conclusion as to the conception of J' can be drawn from it.

6. The Decalog and the Book of the Covenant. Positive evidence on this point might be given if we had any literary compositions of Moses embedded in the later documents. Some scholars find such sources in the Decalog (Ex 20 1-17, Dt 5 6-21), or the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 22-23 33). The Decalog, as it exists in its two versions, has probably been expanded from a much briefer original. The problem of its age and origin is very difficult. It is complicated by the alleged presence of another set of ten commandments (J's Decalog) mainly ritual in character which may be disengaged from Ex 34 17-28 (cf. 'the ten commandments' in ver. 28). The existence of this Decalog is disputed and it is quite a mistake to suppose that its ritual character speaks for its priority to the Decalog of Ex 20. But the prohibition of images and of work on the Sabbath do place difficulties in the way of assumption that the latter is of Mosaic origin. For the former is ignored by worshipers of J'', as we should not have anticipated if it had been a fundamental principle of the religion from the outset; while the Sabbath rest is more suited for agriculturists than for nomads. Altho some scholars treat these objections as inconclusive, we can not build with any safety on the Mosaic origin of the Decalog. It ought, however, to be pointed out that the ethical standard of the Decalog is on the whole much more rudimentary than is often recognized; and its prohibitions can be largely paralleled from those found among peoples of the lower culture. Accordingly, even if it were Mosaic, it would not contribute much to the solution of our special problem. The Book of the Covenant incorporates much ancient material, as is shown by a comparison with the Code of Hammurabi, and not a little of it will be far anterior to the time of Moses. But the Book of the Covenant itself seems to have been composed in Palestine as is suggested by the reference to vineyards and olive-yards (Ex 22 5, 23 11).

7. Mosaic Conception of Yahweh. In spite, however, of our inability to point with any confidence to Mosaic documents, we may from the early post-Mosaic sources derive authentic material by which we can reconstruct the Mosaic conception of J''. He is closely associated with terrible elemental phenomena, earthquake, thunderstorm, and fire. These features appear in our earliest literature and are so characteristic that even in late poetry they are prominent in descriptions of a theophany. He is not, however, a mere Nature God. He works mightily in history, causing His people to triumph over their enemies. Indeed He is a God of battles, and war is a sacred vocation. He often pronounces the ban or the decree of extermination which must be carried out to the letter, tho admitting of grades of severity. He is a holy God, by which, in this primitive age, it is not so much His moral purity as His unapproachableness that is intended. He reacts, at times it would seem almost automatically, against wilful or even incautious approach to Him (Ex 19 21 f., 33 20). This self-regarding quality by which He resents and punishes any violation of His holiness is shown also in His jealousy, His refusal to tolerate any rival or companion in the allegiance of His people. He is thought to possess an external form and a local habitation. He dwells on the Mount of God, altho He is not limited to this. His presence with the Hebrews in their wanderings is mediated by the Ark, perhaps because it contained sacred stones from the sacred mountain, in which He was thought to manifest Himself. It is not improbable that even as early as the time of Moses He was thought to dwell in Heaven. He demanded righteousness between man and man and strict administration of justice. The poor, the weak and the defenseless were the objects of His compassion.

8. Religion of Israel a Covenant Religion. It still remains to speak of the nature of the relation between J'' and Israel. It has been argued by some scholars, notably by Budde, that J'' was originally the God of the Kenites. The relation between Deity and people would, like that between Chemosh and Moab, be regarded as a natural necessity grounded in the very nature of things. But J'' freely chose the Hebrews to be His people; hence the relation between them rested not on necessity but on free choice, the choice of Israel by J'', and of J'' by Israel, and in this the uniqueness of the religion is thought by Budde to reside. This theory of Kenite origin is dubious; but it is true and very important that the religion of Israel was a covenant religion; the tie which bound God and people together was freely accepted by both. The relationship was not natural but ethical.

Tradition represents Moses as a law-giver, and the codes in the Pentateuch are ascribed to him. This undoubtedly had a basis in fact. He must have formulated principles of justice, in the discharge of his functions as judge; he must have laid down regulations for the proper worship of J''. In both respects he drew on preexisting law and custom, much of it extremely ancient. (On §§ 3-8 see also ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, § 18.)

II. THE TRANSFORMATION OF THE RELIGION IN CANAAN.

9. Agriculture and the Baalim. After the death of Moses the Hebrews gained a footing in western Palestine. Moses had fused the tribes together by, firing them with the central conviction of their religion. Thus religion and patriotism were inseparably blended, wherein lay the original strength and ultimate limitation of the religion. In Canaan it seemed as if national disintegration would be inevitable, since the settlers in Canaan fell into isolated groups. But an even deadlier peril threatened the religion through contact with the Canaanites and transformation in the mode of life. The religion was in its origin a desert religion; but more and more the people settled down to till the soil. They learnt from the Canaanites, who were far beyond them in civilization, not only right methods of agriculture but the ways in which the Baalim or local deities were to be worshiped, since on the favor of these givers of fertility the success of their harvests depended. This cult was probably not regarded as conflicting with the worship of the national Deity. But it led to gross immorality; and at a later time, when J'', who could be quite harmlessly spoken of by the colorless term 'Baal' (i.e., owner or lord), was regarded as the giver of fertility, His worship was degraded by the intrusion of elements of Canaanite ritual. Inter-marriage with Canaanites also affected the Hebrew religion, especially when the woman was a Canaanite, owing to her influence on the children. It is not surprising that the Rechabites repudiated the agricultural life, as involving disloyalty to J'', and remained nomads (Jer ch. 35). The Nazirites may have been influenced by similar motives. The three agricultural festivals prescribed in the oldest legislation, the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Feast of Weeks, and the Feast of Tabernacles were all probably borrowed from the Canaanites.

10. The Cultus. There was no centralization of the worship. The home of the Ark naturally enjoyed great prestige; but there were numerous high places or local sanctuaries which were recognized as legitimate. The priesthood was not restricted to the Levites; altho when a Levite could be obtained, preference seems to have been given to him (cf. Jg ch. 17). In addition to the custody of the sanctuary and the care of ritual observances and sacrifices, the priests seem to have been charged with the giving of oracles, the pronouncing of judgment, and moral instruction. Sacrifice was a clan feast in which J' and the worshipers feasted together. The animals offered in it were such as were used for food. Tribute in the form of first-fruits and other vegetable offerings was paid to the Deity for the use of the fertile soil. Human sacrifice was not unknown (Jg 11 30-40), but it was probably rare.

11. Politics and Religion. The political development was momentous for the history of the religion. The unification of the nation under Samuel, Saul and David stimulated the national sentiment and reacted on the devotion of the people to the national Deity and their estimate of Him. The breaking of the Philistine yoke, and then the rise of the Hebrew empire as the issue of David's successful wars, followed by the prosperity and splendor of Solomon's reign, greatly enhanced the sentiments created by the establishment of the monarchy. The selection of Jerusalem as the home of the Ark, and the erection of the Temple, gave the capital a religious prestige which was later to find expression in the centralization of the sacrificial worship in the Temple and the exclusive right of its priests to the exercise of priestly functions accorded to them by Ezekiel (Ez 44 10-16). Not only the legislation of Deuteronomy and Ezekiel, but that of the Priestly Code, was the outcome of the policy of David and Solomon. The disruption of the kingdom put an end to imperialist dreams. It saved Israel from a despotism which would have been inimical to its higher religious development. It prevented the Hebrews from becoming the dominant power in Syria and Palestine; and when the Northern Kingdom was destroyed by Assyria, the Southern Kingdom was left sufficiently long to secure that spiritual religion should survive the downfall of the State and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians.

III. HEBREW PROPHECY FROM SAMUEL TO ELISHA.

12. The Early Prophets. It is at the time of the Philistine oppression and the rise of the monarchy that we meet with the prophets. They seem to have been ecstasies who gathered in bands and roamed about the country, their frenzy stimulated by music, their aim national independence and the more zealous worship of J' (I S 10 5 ff.). Samuel, himself a seer, stands in connection with the prophets: and the two classes seem to have coalesced, retaining the name 'prophets' to designate the members of this combination. It is significant that Saul, of whom no one expected such a development, was himself infected with their contagious ecstasy and transformed into a prophet. The continuity of the name which designated also the later illustrious succession of 'men of God,' that opened with Amos, points to some continuity between the primitive and the canonical prophets. But the modern student is struck by the wide gulf which separates them. The ecstatic condition reappears in the later prophets, altho it is questionable whether it was as characteristic as some scholars suppose. In any case the real greatness of the later prophets is not to be found in these psychical experiences so much as in their penetrating insight into religious and moral truth; their clear discernment of the signs of the times; their power to pierce below the deceptive surface and rightly to divine the real forces which were creating history. But it is best to postpone the further discussion of prophecy till we meet it in its loftiest manifestations in its golden age from the 8th cent. to the 6th.

13. Elijah and the Baal of Tyre. In such men as Samuel and Nathan we may see the custodians of the higher type of Hebrew religion standing in the succession of Moses and linking him with those later prophets in whom the religion found its classical expression. But with Elijah we reach a new stage in the development. Even if we grant that legend has been busy with his figure, this testifies to the tremendous impression he made on his contemporaries. Once again it is a political occasion which is responsible for the religious development. Israel had entered into alliance with Tyre and this had been sealed by the marriage of Ahab with Jezebel, a Tyrian princess. And, as was natural in antiquity, the alliance of peoples carried with it the alliance of deities. So Melkart, the Baal of Tyre, was placed by the side of Yahweh as the object of Hebrew worship. This was a new development, for the Baal whom Elijah denied to be the rightful object of Israel's worship was not one of the local Baalim, whose worship might not have seemed to conflict with that of J'. He was himself a national deity, set side by side with J' on equal terms. This violated a fundamental principle of the religion, that J' was a jealous God who would tolerate no companion or rival in the allegiance of His people. Ahab and the court, no doubt, regarded the toleration of the Tyrian cult, and even active participation in it, as a matter of State policy, one might even perhaps say as an obligation of courtesy, not to be omitted without violation of good manners. He did not indeed carry all his subjects with him. We read of the seven thousand who will be spared in J''s terrible judgment because they have done no homage to the foreign god (I K 19 18). We hear of a persecution of the prophets instituted by Jezebel. But Elijah stands as the embodiment of this protest. Whether in his lifetime he achieved a success so signal as our narratives relates has been disputed. But it is not easy to account for his fame unless he had struck the imagination of his people by some unparalleled achievement. While he left his work incomplete, it is to himself that the credit belongs of impressing on his people J''s inflexible demand for its undivided allegiance. He also stood in the line of the higher prophecy in his terrible rebuke to Ahab for the judicial murder of Naboth (I K 21). Indeed the shock given to the popular conscience by this dark deed may, even more than Jezebel's fanaticism for her god, have prepared the way for Jehu's revolution. Whether we can speak of Elijah as a monotheist is uncertain. If Moses was a monotheist, the antecedent probability that Elijah was so would be great. And his mockery of Melkart on Carmel (I K 18 27) suggests that the Phœnician god was for him a nonentity. But the phraseology may be that of the narrator; and even if Elijah's it may not imply denial of Melkart's existence, but simply his contemptuous repudiation of a god who was an intruder in J's domain. His conflict was continued by Elisha, his heir, a figure cast in a far less heroic mold. He set in motion the rebellion of Jehu, his all-too-zealous and unscrupulous tool, which effected the downfall, in torrents of blood, of Ahab's dynasty and the extirpation of the worship of Melkart. Another significant antagonist of Ahab was Micaiah the prophet who announced his doom (I K 22 5-28). He is our earliest example of the true prophet, who speaks without flinching the unpalatable truth as God has revealed it to him, in conflict with the courtier prophets, who speak only what those in authority desire to hear.

IV. THE EIGHTH CENTURY PROPHETS.

14. The Prophets as Preachers. Before we indicate the special contribution of the 8th cent. prophets there are some general questions which call for discussion at this point. The reaction against the traditional view that Old Testament prophecy was mainly prediction and in particular prediction of Christ, went to an extreme, so that the predictive element in prophecy was unduly minimized. It was, of course, important to shift the emphasis from the future to the present and to make it clear that the prophets were primarily concerned with the conditions of their own time. The thought of God and His claim on His own people and their loyalty to Him, of righteousness in the government of the State and in the administration of justice, of honesty in commerce, of tender compassion for the defenseless and the weak, such were the main themes of their message. Hatred and indignation for tyranny and cruelty, loathing for vice and disgust at luxury, repudiation of idolatry with its degradation of the Divine and its religious and moral abominations, were prominent in their message. They had much to say on foreign politics, partly because the entanglement of Israel with foreign states might aggravate those social evils at home which the prophets so deeply deplored; partly because it tended to replace the nation's trust in God by reliance on the help of foreign nations; partly because political might bring with it religious alliance.

15. The Prophets and the Future. But all this preoccupation with contemporary conditions did not render them indifferent to the future. Their preaching was directed in the first instance against the false religion, the vices, and the follies of their own age. But the great canonical prophets of the period before the Exile did not anticipate that their message would prove effective. They were assured that calamity was coming. Not, be it observed, that they believed it to be in the nature of the case inevitable. On the contrary, hoping against hope, they strove, by pleading and by warning, with their stubborn and infatuated countrymen, urging them to amend their ways and proclaiming the certainty of God's judgment, however, long delayed, on an apostate and impenitent people. Yet, knowing their own countrymen so well, they were persuaded that their light-hearted optimism would lure them to their ruin. But for the most part at any rate, they did not believe that judgment would be God's last word with Israel. For after the judgment had been executed the course of history would be reversed, and God would pity and restore His broken people. They would possess their own land, in peace and prosperity, under a righteous king of Davidic stock.

16. Origin of the Prophetic Eschatology. This brings us to the consideration of a topic which has recently attracted much attention. The origin of the prophets' certainty of judgment has often been regarded as a moral postulate. Assured of the inflexible righteousness of God, they realize that a holy God can not permanently tolerate a sinful people. Hence calamity must come unless there is reform. The people believe that their election is a token of J's favor and, altho He may chasten, He will not destroy. The prophets, on the contrary, insist on the supremacy of righteousness to which, if necessary, even the existence of Israel will be sacrificed. Fiat justitia, ruat Israel. Other scholars think rather of a peculiar sensitiveness in the prophets to the drastic intervention of God in history. They enter on their vocation when a crisis is approaching, they are storm-birds giving warning of the tempest which is about to burst. Others again trace their anticipations of the future to a keener insight than their contemporaries possessed into the political situation. But recently another theory has been propounded, that their certainty of disaster followed by restoration was derived from a preexisting eschatological scheme. This scheme, which is believed to have been an integral part of Israel's religion from a very early period and familiar to the people, is thought by some (Gunkel, Gressmann, E. Meyer) to have been borrowed from abroad; while another view (Sellin) is that, altho availing itself of foreign imagery for expression, the actual belief grew out of the native principles of Israel's religion. Accordingly while there has been a tendency on the part of some scholars to regard eschatology, with Wellhausen, as a creation of Ezekiel, and to proceed to even greater extremes than he did in relegating passages of an eschatological character to a date after the Exile, those scholars who hold eschatology itself to be early freely recognize the presence of eschatological passages in preexilic prophecy.

The whole question is still in debate and no decided verdict can be given. But the evidence for an Egyptian scheme, which is really parallel with predictions of the prophets, must be pronounced very dubious; and even if it existed, it is not clear that it was adopted by Israel in its early period. The anticipation of the future which was current in the pagan scheme and adopted in the popular religion of Israel we should have expected to be reproduced by the lower order of prophets. But it is the canonical prophets in whom the scheme of a terrible judgment followed by a time of blessedness, is to be found. It is their antagonists who are the optimists, who say 'Peace' when there is no peace (cf. Mi 35 8 and 11-12; also Jer 23 8 ff.).

17. Foreign Perils and Internal Corruption. We may next consider the situation in which the great prophets of the 8th cent. did their work. Under Jeroboam II the Northern Kingdom had reached the zenith of its fortunes. The pressure from Syria was relieved through its exhaustion by Assyria, then for a time Assyria was itself quiescent and this gave Israel under Joash and Jeroboam II the opportunity to retrieve its disasters. Thus the bounds of the kingdom were extended and wealth enormously increased. But at any time Assyria might resume its movement towards Egypt; and prophecy entered on its great period with the anticipation of Assyria's election to be the instrument of J''s judgment on His faithless people. Amos, the earliest of our canonical prophets, had apparently done his work when Tiglath-pileser came to the throne; but he had anticipated the coming of the Assyrians; and it was with the rise of this new dynasty that a new era opened in which the development of the religion was conditioned by its contact with the great empires, first of Assyria and then of Babylon. (See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 5, (c) and (d).)

But the internal conditions were equally important. In the long and disastrous conflict with Syria or through calamities at home the peasant proprietors had largely disappeared. The rich acquired extensive estates by taking advantage of the owners' necessities. These estates were in great measure worked by slaves. Those who did not become serfs would be driven to swell the indigent population of the towns. The poor fell into more and more desperate poverty. If they were forced to borrow they were charged a ruinous interest which hopelessly enslaved them in the creditor's toils. When heavy tribute was imposed by a foreign state or taxation was required by an oppressive government, the greatest sufferers were the poor. They were enslaved for trifling debts or cheated with false weights and measures. The rapacity of the rich and powerful might take the form of high-handed oppression or effect the barefaced robbery of the defenseless under forms of law. The impecunious had no chance, the long purse could bribe the judges or hire false witnesses or even keep the case out of the courts altogether. This scandalous maladministration of justice is one of the constant themes of the great preexilic prophets. It was the more heartless that its victims were often the most defenseless classes of the community, the widow, the orphan, and the resident alien. It was the more hateful that the money wrung from the needy was wasted on ostentation, luxury, and vice and that the women were parties to the inhumanity and self-indulgence of the men. Moreover, while no regard was paid to mercy or to justice, they were punctilious and lavish in their religious ceremonial.

18. Amos. The date of Amos can not be fixed with certainty: probably it was about 760 B.C. He belonged to Judah but prophesied in the Northern Kingdom, from which he was expelled on the charge of treason (Am 7 10-17). He was the earliest of our literary prophets. Prophecy was still purely oral utterance, but a step of incalculable importance was taken when a written record was made of it. The object of this new departure is uncertain. Amos was silenced and may thus have been led to commit his message to writing; Isaiah seems to have resorted to it that he might vindicate by the event the truth of his predictions which were met with incredulity (Is 8 16 f.). Amos attacked the luxury of the lords and ladies of Israel, but still more the robbery and oppression of the poor by the rich, and the gross maladministration of justice. These sins were the more hateful that they were combined with a splendid worship of J'', a worship itself stained with foul vices. The nations are condemned for outrage on our common humanity especially cruelty and atrocities. Israel is denounced for sins of the same type, perpetrated not on foreigners but on fellow-countrymen. The flaming indignation with which the prophet denounced inhumanity, oppression, and the perversion of justice had its root in his conception of God. He was at one with his people in the conviction that out of all the nations J'' had chosen Israel for His own (3 2). But while the people saw in this election a proof that Israel was J''s favorite and could reckon on His help if only the cultus was maintained, Amos inferred from it a more exacting standard of conduct and more drastic punishment for their crimes. No sacrifices with their banquets and festal music could win the favor of their God or avert the merited judgment. He loathes their offerings and will not revoke their doom. Indeed the judgments from which they have already suffered might have taught them this; but they will have an unexpected climax in the deep gloom of the Day of Yahweh, to which they are looking forward with such misplaced optimism. For J'' is the God of Nature and of history, the forces of Nature are under His control, the destinies of nations are molded by His sovereign will. And altho Israel may seek Him and live, the prophet anticipates no radical reforms and looks forward to the destruction of the nation, of which apparently not even a remnant is to survive.

19. Hosea. Hosea began his work before the downfall of the dynasty of Jehu; but his book reflects the period of disorder which followed, when one adventurer after another seized the reins of government, and when war and impoverishment made the condition of the people more and more wretched. It has been thought by most modern scholars that the specific contribution of Hosea to the religion of Israel grew directly out of his own experience. In spite of the reaction on the part of several recent scholars against this view, it still seems the most acceptable solution of a difficult problem. Hosea, acting on what he later came to recognize as a Divine leading, married Gomer, who bore three children, a son, a daughter and a second son (Hos 1 2-9). The first he named 'Jezreel' as a sign that Jehu's ruthless slaughter of Ahab's family would be visited upon his dynasty. The daughter he named 'Lo-Ruhamah,' a name which expressed J''s ruthlessness toward Israel. The third he named 'Lo-ammi' (not my people) as a sign that J'' repudiated Israel. Apparently at some point between the marriage and the birth of the third child the prophet became aware of his wife's unfaithfulness. The name of the daughter may express this; but against it is the fact that relations between husband and wife seem to have continued. And her name may be simply one expressive of judgment like the name of the elder son. But Lo-ammi does strongly suggest that Hosea meant to record in the name the conviction 'No child of mine!' Gomer seems to have gone from bad to worse, to have sunk more deeply in degradation, and, deserted by her lovers, to have been on the point of being sold into slavery. Then the prophet intervened and purchased her, took her home and trusted that in seclusion she would repent and reform (ch. 3). At first, then, Hosea was a prophet of judgment, like Amos, and embodied his conviction in the names of the children. But, musing on the dark experience through which he had passed, he saw a principle expressed in it which gave him the key to the character of God and His relations to Israel. For if the spring in his own action had been the unquenchable love which would not abandon the sinner, which refused to yield to despair and steadily worked for her restoration, then how much more must this be true of God, who had won Israel for His bride at the Exodus and whose love had been outraged by her unfaithfulness with the Baalim! He, too, would bring His loved one through painful discipline to repentance because His love, since it was Divine love, and thus far outshone the human love of the prophet, could never rest until it had restored the old happy relations (ch. 2). And thus while Amos proclaimed J''s inflexible righteousness, Hosea revealed His patient and unconquerable love.

20. Isaiah. About 740 B.C. Isaiah received his call, and his long ministry of forty years had run nearly half its course when the Northern Kingdom fell. The vision, in which his call came to him, gave him explicitly or implicitly almost all those truths which he applied to internal conditions or foreign relations. The vision of J'' throned in majesty, the song of the seraphim acclaiming His holiness, shatter him to the foundations of his being and bring home to him with crushing intensity of new perception the familiar truths of the Divine purity and majesty and the uncleanness and unworthiness alike of himself and his people. He feels himself, as his guilt is revealed in its true character in the white light of God's awful purity, to be worthy of death. The lips of the deeply penitent man, touched by the living coal from the altar, are cleansed and made fit for the worship of the sanctuary. He overhears J''s inquiry for a messenger and, discerning the challenge within it, offers himself for the service. He receives his commission, but is warned that his message will harden the people rather than bring them to repentance, and that judgment will come on the guilty nation. Thus he takes up his task, knowing that his mission will be a failure and that it will be his own fidelity to it which will insure its failure (Is ch. 6). In his denunciation of the sins of Judah and his exhortations to repentance he followed Amos; but he anticipated that a remnant would be spared to be the nucleus of a new and righteous nation (cf. chs. 2-5). He met the crisis of the Syro-Ephraimitish invasion with unflinching faith in God, a faith which he embodied in the sign of Immanuel (7 14). For this name would be given to a child shortly to be born as an expression of the mother's faith that God would be with His people. Therefore he protests against the king's project of purchasing the aid of Assyria, recognizing that Syria and Ephraim might inflict annoyance on Judah, but had no power for fatal mischief (chs. 7 and 8). But when the step had been taken and Judah grew restive under the Assyrian yoke and, lured by brilliant promises of help from Egypt, meditated rebellion, Isaiah threw all his influence against such folly (30 1-5, etc.). For he was assured that Assyria was the rod to execute J''s anger and that no human power could successfully oppose it. Yet Assyria had failed to recognize that it was but the instrument in J''s hands and had profanely boasted of its unconquerable might, even against J'' Himself; and when it had served His purpose, it would be broken and thrown aside (10 5-34, etc.). And since he was assured that Zion was J''s earthly dwelling he was firm in the faith that it could not be destroyed; and in the darkest hour, when all hope seemed lost, triumphantly predicted the failure of Assyria (Is 14 24 ff, 30 27 ff, 31 5-9, etc.). Had the fate then befallen the Southern Kingdom, which twenty years earlier had brought the Northern to its end, the consequences for Israel's religion would have been momentous. For the Northern tribes, so far as they were taken into exile, seem to have lost their racial identity; and when the religion was torn up from the land in which it was rooted, it was apparently too feeble to survive the shock. The respite, which came to Judah in 701, gave it a longer lease of life; and so the ethical and spiritual monotheism of the prophets had time in which to develop and take root in the national consciousness so that the Exile to Babylon failed to destroy it.

V. THE REFORMATION OF JOSIAH AND THE MINISTRY OF JEREMIAH.

21. Deuteronomy and Josiah's Reformation. The reader is apt to be so impressed with the deliverance of Jerusalem that he may easily fail to recognize the extent of the disaster which had fallen upon Judah. A pillaged and devastated land, prisoners by the hundred thousand, and an almost incredible booty carried to Assyria,—such were the ghastly results of Sennacherib's campaign. It is not wonderful therefore that the prophetic religion seems to have fallen into disrepute and that the mighty gods of Assyria claimed the devotion of Manasseh and his people. The worship of the host of heaven and other forms of heathenism became rampant, and also the gruesome custom of infant sacrifice (II K 21 1-9). In these conditions the representatives of the higher religion, unable to make an effective protest, may have turned their hopes toward the future and prepared the Law Book on which the Reformation of Josiah was based (II K 22 8 ff.). It is, of course, possible that this code was as early as the reign of Hezekiah or as late as the reign of Josiah. For a hundred and twenty years it has been held by practically all critical scholars to be embedded in the Book of Deuteronomy. Some recent scholars, and notably Hölcher, have denied this and seen in Deuteronomy a much later work. In its most consistent form this involves a drastic handling of the story of the Reformation in II K chs. 22 and 23, a very radical criticism of the Book of Jeremiah and, above all and most difficult to accept, the extreme view that the Book of Ezekiel, while containing some portions belonging to that prophet, is as a whole much later than his time. Since the current identification of Josiah's Law Book has been the very pivot on which the arrangement of the Pentateuchal Codes has depended, the critical problem here is momentous for the history of the religion. It ought to be said, however, that Hölcher himself, while skeptical in his handling of the history of Ezra, yet recognizes the truth of the Grafian position that the Priestly Code is later than Deuteronomy and the Book of Ezekiel.

Whether the attempts to relegate the Deuteronomic Code to a later period will secure any extensive support the future must determine. But here the generally accepted critical view must be presupposed. As a Code of laws the Deuteronomic legislation took up and expanded the Book of the Covenant, infusing into the older regulations a warmer humanitarianism. It was directed against heathen elements in the cultus and in this interest gave a monopoly to one sanctuary, the Temple at Jerusalem being apparently intended, altho not explicitly named. All other sanctuaries were regarded as illegitimate. By this drastic remedy the heathen practices at the local sanctuaries were to be extirpated and the unity of J<sup>h</sup> indelibly engraved on the minds of the people. For there was a danger in the multiplicity of sanctuaries that Yahweh would be differentiated into a number of local Yahwehs; and against this Deuteronomy affirms what has, in a very uncouth but expressive term, been described as 'mono-Yahwism': 'Yahweh our God, Yahweh is one.' The problem of what was to be done with the priests of the disestablished sanctuaries was not overlooked by the legislator, who in this, as in other respects, drew some of the more obvious inferences from his fundamental principle of the centralization of worship (cf. Dt 18 6-8). His solution, however, was too idealistic and did not reckon with the probable refusal of the priests at Jerusalem to admit the priests of the high places into the enjoyment of their monopoly (cf. II K 23 9). The problem was solved by Ezekiel, who restricted the priesthood to the clergy at Jerusalem, the sons of Zadok, and deprived the other priests of priestly rights as a penalty for their ministry at the high places, while committing to them the menial duties of the sanctuary. The Priestly Code adopts this in principle, but extends the priesthood to all the descendants of Aaron and carries back the distinction between priests and Levites to the time of Moses, treating the position of the Levites not as a penal degradation from the priesthood but as an elevation from the ranks of the laity. But while Deuteronomy was the outcome of the labors of priests and lawyers, it was also an outgrowth of the prophetic movement. It inculcated a purified religion, an elevated theology, a just and humanitarian ethic. The centralization of the worship reduced the area of corrupt worship and facilitated effective supervision of the legitimate cultus. Faithful obedience to the requirements of the Law would have raised immeasurably the standard of purity in the service of God, and justice and humanity in men's relations with their fellows. But the acceptance of a written law carried with it the germs of the later legalism and casuistry, and tended to check the spontaneity and unconsciousness both of religion and of morality. It might induce a feeling of self-satisfaction and so minister to spiritual pride. It is probable that Jeremiah welcomed, and even advocated, the Reformation; but if so he seems to have become dissatisfied with its effects. It had not been sufficiently penetrating, the hurt of the people had been too lightly healed.

22. Jeremiah. Jeremiah's own contribution to the religion was still more important. This was not so much in the enunciation of new doctrines, but in the deepening of the doctrines already uttered by his predecessors. The fineness and penetration of his psychological analysis went beyond anything which had been attained before. He is far from indifferent to right conduct, to righteous administration in the government and the law courts; to integrity in international relationships. As sternly as his predecessors and even at grave risk of his life, he announces the Divine judgment on the sins of the people. He opposes their infatuated policy of rebellion and obstinate resistance to Babylon. But with all this practical interest and activity, his primary significance lies elsewhere. He put a new emphasis on the inner life. The heart, with all its windings and its mystery, is prominent in his thought. He knew sin and righteousness, as others had not known them, through his prolonged and faithful study of his own heart. And so it was natural that he should become the prophet of the New Covenant. It was in large measure due to the nature of his own experience that his religious genius found this, its loftiest expression. Deprived of a home of his own, excluded from the joys and sorrows of his fellows, the loneliness of spirit to which the rarity of his nature doomed him was an isolation more tragic still. His message was received with scorn and incredulity or with hatred, persecution and peril of imminent death. And since he has no refuge in man he flies for refuge to God. But when from broken cisterns he turns to the fountain of living waters, they seem to fail him and he wonders if God Himself will prove a lying brook and waters that fail (Jer 15 18). He is dismayed at the burden imposed upon him, and instead of the healing pity he expects from God he is sharply rebuked and braced by the warning of still sterner conflicts. 'If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee; then how wilt thou vie with horses? and if in a land of peace thou fleest, then how wilt thou do in the jungle of Jordan?" (Jer 12 5). Yet in his weakness and failure, his sense of discouragement, his sensitive shrinking from pain, his mourning over the wilfulness and waywardness of his people, his immeasurable sorrow at their suffering, even when God shows him scant sympathy there is no one but God to whom he can turn. And in this intimacy of fellowship with God he makes a new discovery: here in personal fellowship with a personal God he finds the deepest experience which religion can offer. And so in this he discovers the inmost reality of religion. Thus he comes to formulate his great doctrine of the New Covenant which is indeed made with the nation but in which religion becomes an individual experience (Jer 31 31 ff.). For the law is written on the heart, it is no longer a code imposed from the outside, it has become one with the personality. Thus God is revealed to all and His will is woven into the inmost texture of man's being. So Jeremiah becomes the prophet of individualism in religion.

VI. THE EXILE. EZEKIEL AND THE SECOND ISAIAH.

23. The Exile and Its Influence on the Religion. The blow Jeremiah had awaited so long fell at last. But the final catastrophe had been foreshadowed in the captivity of Jehoiachin and the flower of the nation in 597 (II K 24 10-16). Since they were encouraged by the optimistic prophets to anticipate speedy restoration (Jer 29 8 f., 24-32) and, in spite of the warnings of Jeremiah and later of Ezekiel, did not contemplate the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple and the downfall of the Jewish State, they looked on their life in Babylon as purely temporary and provisional. They had not accordingly to face the problem of practising their religion with its old supports completely cut from beneath their feet. They were habituated, in the decade which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, to the practise of their religion in such forms as were possible in an unclean land. Hence, when the final catastrophe came, they were much better prepared to meet it than if in its full magnitude it had burst upon them all at once. The perfidy of the weak Zedekiah in breaking his oath of allegiance to Nebuchadrezzar (Ezk 17 13-21) was expiated by the capture of Jerusalem after an obstinate resistance, the execution of a large number of its dignitaries, the blinding of the king after he had seen his sons slain, the burning of the city and the Temple, the captivity of a large proportion of the people. A remnant including Jeremiah was left in the land under Gedaliah. But the Governor was murdered by treachery; and the remnant, fearing that they might be held responsible, fled to Egypt, in spite of Jeremiah's remonstrance, forcing the prophet to go with them. Here they relapsed into idolatry, alleging that nothing but calamity had followed their abandonment of the cult of the Queen of Heaven (Jer chs. 39-44).

No doubt many of the exiles in Babylon argued in the same way and presumably they were quickly lost to their ancestral religion. The gods of Babylon had triumphed over J". But others recognized that the great prophets had been vindicated and that Judah had received at J"'s hands the due reward of her deeds. Thus the exile sifted the people, and a more spiritual remnant emerged, with the promise of the future. Their racial and religious consciousness was intensified, to safeguard them from absorption by their heathen environment. Detached from local limitations and a material structure, religion was set free to take on a more spiritual character. It was forced to devise for itself more spiritual forms of expression. If no place could be sacred in an unclean land, sacred seasons could be observed; and if no sacrifice could be offered on the altar, prayer and sacred song and the reading of the sacred books could take its place. They saved what they could from the wreck. The records of the past were diligently collected and the utterances of the prophets; their laws were brought together and reshaped to meet new conditions. The removal from Palestine broke off the connection with the local sanctuaries and thus made the Deuteronomic institution of a monopolist sanctuary easy to attain when they returned to Palestine. And banishment from their land, whether in Babylonia or in the larger Dispersion, tended to an idealization of Zion which has ever since been characteristic of the Jews.

24. Ezekiel. Two great teachers labored among the exiles, Ezekiel and the Second Isaiah. Ezekiel, like Jeremiah, was a priest, but presumably of the line of Zadok, and attached, before he left Jerusalem in 597, to the Temple. He received his call to Babylonia five years later, in a vision of God which crushed him with the sense of the sovereignty and glory of J" (Ezk ch. 1). His theology was dominated by this experience. It was largely a vindication of God's ways with His people. Israel's whole history from Egypt onward had been one of unrelieved ingratitude and apostasy. J" had again and again been provoked to anger and minded to make Israel a signal example of His wrath. But controlled in all His action by a sensitive tenderness for His own reputation, He had forborne to smite, that He might not be discredited by the heathen as too weak to save His own people. But now the fair fame of J" is suffering from Israel's accumulated sin; so He has resolved to execute the judgment He had so long delayed. But the destruction of the State can not be the end of His relations with Israel. It compromised Him in the sight of the heathen, hence He must restore Israel, not for Israel's own sake but because He had pity for His own holy name. The Temple would be restored and there J" would dwell in the midst of a reunited people, the schism between North and South having been healed. Then, to avenge the insults offered Him by the heathen and to fulfil ancient prophecy, He would lure Gog with his vast hordes from the land of Magog to fall on defenseless Israel, and He would destroy the invaders, Israel needing to strike no blow. Thus He would win renown among the nations and finally demonstrate that not His weakness but Judah's sin had been responsible for the Exile (Ezk chs. 38 f.). Ezekiel's care for J"'s honor was also the root of his individualism. It was an answer to the challenge of his contemporaries that the ways of J" were unfair and that they were themselves suffering for the sins of their fathers. The prophet denies that punishment can be transferred. 'The soul that sinneth it (and no other) shall die.' Each individual bears his own responsibility. The ancient idea of solidarity is abandoned. Indeed the total weight of responsibility is made to rest on the individual's state at the critical hour when the long-promised judgment comes. Long years of righteousness will not save the man who in that critical hour is found in a state of sin: nor will a long career of iniquity be counted against a man who repents before the judgment breaks upon the world. The prophet's duty is thus extended from the State to the individual; he must warn the righteous to maintain his righteousness and the wicked that he should turn and live (Ezk 18, 33 1-20). It will be seen that the individualism of Ezekiel differed from that of Jeremiah. For the older prophet the stress lay on personal religion and the conviction was rooted in experience; for the younger it lay on personal responsibility and was an element in his theodicy. Yet Ezekiel also speaks of the Divine cleansing from impurity and idolatry, and of the new heart and the new spirit (36 25-27).

It would be difficult to overestimate the influence which Ezekiel exerted on the later development. He has not inaptly been called 'the father of Judaism.' The legislation for the returned exiles stands between Deuteronomy and the Priestly Code and to some extent mediates the transition from one to the other. His momentous distinction between priests and Levites and the degradation of the latter from the priesthood has been already mentioned. The ceremonialism and legalism, so characteristic of the later Judaism, were also largely derived from him. It is the more striking since this was the side of religion with which his great predecessors had shown the least sympathy. And that he should have been the junior contemporary of the great prophet of the New Covenant, who had found the essence of religion in the communion of the individual with God, makes his position more remarkable still. He is the most significant factor in what must from the highest standpoint seem the descent from the climax which prophecy reached in Jeremiah to the legalism which dominated the religion after the Return. Yet in no other way, it may be urged, could a community have been created which would have stood so firm under the assault of Antiochus Epiphanes or resisted dissolution under the subtle influence of Hellenism.

25. The Second Isaiah. The work of the Second Isaiah is probably limited to Is chs. 40-55. The prophet points to the rise of Cyrus as the vindication of earlier predictions; and from the fact that J" through His prophets can predict the future he draws the inference that J" controls history. He is also the omnipotent Creator, the one and only God. Therefore His people must not be dismayed by the apparent triumph of Babylon and her idols, for already the decree of their destruction is approaching fulfilment. The prophet lays much stress on the gracious aspects of J"'s nature—His gentleness, His tenderness to the weak, His inexhaustible affection for His people. We might indeed say His favoritism, for other nations are sacrificed for the sake of Israel and are destined to be its bond-servants. Yet there is a brighter side to this picture presented in the Servant poems (Is 42 1-4, 49 1-6, 50 4-9, 52 13-53 12). These poems are still the subject of keen debate. Several scholars believe that they are not the work of the Second Isaiah. Still more important is the question of the interpretation. Undeniably the Second Isaiah himself means Israel when he speaks of the Servant of Yahweh. It is also the significance attached to the figure in the present text of the servant passages: 'I said, Thou art my servant; Israel in whom I will be glorified' (49 3). Those who accept the national interpretation are divided, some believing that the actual Israel is intended; others that the author means the ideal Israel; while others insist that the Servant must be an individual, and several identifications have been proposed. The view here taken is that the Servant is Israel in the strict sense of the term, the Israel who had died in the Exile and is to be raised to life by restoration to its own land. The function of the Servant is to be the revealer of the true God to the world and the vicarious sufferer for the sins of the Gentile nations. This is the solution given by the author for the tormenting problem of the suffering of the righteous.

VII. THE TRIUMPH OF LEGALISM.

26. The Priestly Code and the Birth of Judaism. There has been much dispute as to the Return of the Jews from the Exile. It is not improbable that the figures have been exaggerated; but it still seems to be the most acceptable view that a number of Jews availed themselves of the permission of Cyrus to return in 536. The disenchanting realities chilled their enthusiasm; and it was not merely the hostility of the people of the land which delayed the rebuilding of the Temple. Their energies were roused by Haggai and Zechariah and the Temple was at last completed. These prophets anticipated the speedy downfall of the heathen empire and the inauguration of the Messianic age with Zerubbabel as Messianic king. The next sixty years are almost a blank to us. But according to the current chronology, Ezra came from Babylon in 458 and ruthlessly dissolved the marriages which Jews had contracted with foreigners. In 444 the Law, whether the Pentateuch or the Priestly Code is disputed, was read and accepted by the people, the reform being strongly supported by Nehemiah. Much skepticism has been expressed about these narratives which are nevertheless probably substantially correct. In any case, at some point in this period the Pentateuch was completed and became the controlling element in Jewish life. And in the Pentateuch the Priestly Code was the dominating factor. According to the generally accepted view of modern critics, this Code represents the final stage in the legal development. It included much that was ancient, not a little indeed which could never have originated in a highly developed spiritual religion but which the conservatism of the religious instinct had preserved from a far earlier time. For some features savage religion supplies the best explanation. Yet there are late developments in it, by which its approximate date may be determined. The introduction of the Law and its acceptance by the people marked the birth of Judaism. The Jews were now governed by an elaborate code; but by the activity of the scribes a far more complicated system of laws was gradually built up. The dominance of the Law strangled prophecy of the classical type; apocalyptic more and more took its place. But it is only right to recognize how passionate an enthusiasm the Law was able to evoke and how many martyrs faced torture and death rather than be disloyal to it.

VIII. THE PROBLEM OF SUFFERING.

27. The Problem of Suffering. In a sketch of this compass it is not necessary to linger over the later prophecies, altho at certain points they will engage our attention. But there is one problem that was forced on the Jews by the sufferings which they were compelled to endure. This was the problem why the wicked were rich and triumphant while the godly were doomed to privation and suffering. It was suggested by Jeremiah (12 1), and in the view of many discussed by one of his contemporaries, Habakkuk. But the Book of Habakkuk presents an extremely difficult critical problem and no conclusions can be affirmed with any confidence. The prophet takes comfort in the assurance that tyranny has within it the seed of its own ruin and that pride is a sure passport to destruction; but on the other hand righteous Israel shall live by its fidelity to God.

Ezekiel, we have already seen, denied the existence of the problem; Divine justice meted out exact retribution. The Servant poems express the profound idea that suffering may be vicarious, the suffering of Israel is suffering which the idolatrous Gentiles have deserved. The miseries of the returned exiles, the antagonism of foes at home and the pressure of the foreign yoke, accentuated the problem. Haggai and Zechariah explained their calamities by their failure to put God before their own interests. If the Temple is rebuilt, then J'' will be gracious. After it had been rebuilt, they promised that the Messianic age would supervene on the overthrow of the heathen world. In the scene between J'' and the Satan in Zechariah (ch. 3) the suffering of Israel is traced to its sin; but its present misery does not prove that J'' is still angry. He rebukes the Satan, who infers its guilt from its miseries, and replies that He has plucked Jerusalem as a brand from the burning. But conditions were not alleviated; and in the next century Malachi reports the complaint that the service of God brings no profit but the wicked are happy and prosperous. The author rebukes such impiety, but has no positive solution to offer. He looks forward like his predecessors, to the Day of Yahweh when the godly and the evil-doers will alike receive their deserts. The doubts so widely entertained were in truth almost inevitable when religion was conceived in so national and legalistic a way.

28. The Book of Job. It is in the Book of Job that the problem received the greatest prominence. The book opens with J'''s challenge to the Satan to find any flaw in Job. The Satan admits the fact, but denies the disinterested character of Job's piety. He is permitted accordingly to strip him of all his possessions and his children. Then, when he asserts, unabashed by his failure, that the trial has not touched the sufferer to the quick, J'' permits him to rack his victim with intolerable disease. Job still maintains his integrity and the Satan's cynicism is finally refuted. But now the problem emerges, Why has such overwhelming calamity selected Job for its object? The friends who come to condole with him are compelled by their theology to infer grave sin on his part. And the attitude of the sufferer when he curses the day of his birth, and still more when he arraigns the righteousness of Heaven and rates the friends for their sycophancy to the Almighty, deepens their sense of his guilt. For them Job's suffering was not really a problem; its explanation was only too clear. But for Job himself it was an excruciating problem. He was assured that he had committed no sin which could warrant losses so colossal, bereavement so bitter, torture so agonizing. And it was not only the calamity in itself but what it implied. For it could only mean in the eyes of his fellows that God had stigmatized him as a sinner beyond the common measure of transgressors. This then creates the real interest of the book. For its interest does not lie primarily in the problem of suffering and its solution; it lies in the reaction of Job to his sufferings, especially in his relation to God. For, unaware of the suspicion cast on his integrity by the Satan, he traced his sufferings to God; and since he was convinced they were unjust, he felt that they contradicted the righteousness of God. But his primary concern was not with the problem of suffering, or with the righteous government of the world. It was in the first instance an individual question. But in debate he supports the particular by the general; and the injustice he finds in God's treatment of himself is abundantly illustrated in the prosperity of the wicked and the miseries of the just. On the other hand, his memory of God's earlier goodness comes back to him; and altho, at the height of his bitterness, he sees in it the sinister design of God to lull him into confidence and make his calamity more extreme by contrast with his bliss, yet the other mood, in which he believes in God's earlier friendliness, is that in which he rests. But this does not obliterate his sense of God's present hostility, which, he is assured, will not cease on this side of death. Hence Job must die, not in physical pain alone but in moral ignominy, branded by such exemplary sufferings as one who had sinned far beyond the common measure. It is this prospect which torments him, even more than his disease. But if even his friends refuse to acquit him, his contemporaries will certainly not right him, nor yet posterity, altho for a moment he dreams of this possibility. And so from earth he turns to Heaven, from God who is now his enemy to God who was once his friend and will be his friend again. Even now his witness is in Heaven, and after Job has died in dishonor, his Vindicator will stand upon his grave and from the apathy of Sheol Job will be wakened to see Him and hear Him pronounce his justification. Yet strangely he still criticizes the Divine government of the universe, and at the close of the human debate God brings home to him by merciless questioning his incompetence for criticizing what he does not understand. But it is not here that the significance of the Divine intervention chiefly lies. It is rather in the mystical sense of God which Job wins through the vision of God that leads him to penitent self-abasement. He needs no explanation of his suffering since he has been lifted above the problem into a mystical certainty of God. This is the chief contribution the book makes to religion, it shows how a mystical solution may be reached, when a speculative solution is unattainable.

But while the book gives no positive answer to the problem, it contributes helpful suggestions. It rebukes the dishonest sophistry which in the interests of orthodoxy refuses to face the hard facts of life. It negatives the axiom of the current theology that an inference may be drawn from suffering as an effect to sin as its cause. It shows that suffering may test the reality or improve the quality of a man's piety, and should be accepted as discipline rather than resented as unjust. Man is reminded of the vastness of the universe and of its many mysteries, that he may learn his incompetence to criticize its government. He learns also that the human race is not the sole object of God's concern and still less is any single individual. It must be remembered that when the book was written the higher doctrine of the future life had not been developed. Job suggests the possibility of a return to earth to resume the old happy fellowship with God but sets it aside. There is no return of the shade from Sheol or of the body from the tomb.

29. Psalms 49 and 73. It is, however, to the state after death that the author of Psalm 49 appeals. The fate of the wicked is to be driven down to Sheol, leaving their wealth behind them, while the Psalmist trusts that God will deliver him from Sheol and take him to live with Himself. The author of the seventy-third Psalm was perplexed by the contrast between the prosperity of the wicked and his own sufferings. But he penetrated into God's secrets and there was disclosed to him the lurid fate of the wicked after death. He, on the contrary, enjoys perfect fellowship with God who guides him through life by His counsel and will then receive him into His glory. In God he possesses the only good in heaven or earth, in a fellowship so deep that death itself can not break it, but which will continue for ever.

30. Ecclesiastes. The problem is viewed from another point in the Book of Ecclesiastes. The writer is oppressed by the aimlessness of life which consists of a cycle of recurring experiences, round which humanity has to march with no possibility of escape, with no hope of anything new. Progress thus becomes impossible. The order of the universe, which is luminous to the Creator, is an insoluble puzzle to man; hence he can not adjust himself to it, or fit his deed to the appropriate season. The author's own experience had been disenchanting: exhaustive experiments to find satisfaction had ended in disillusion. He was deeply touched by the misery of his fellows as they groaned under the oppression of tyrants; and he counted it an evil in God's government that the righteous might perish prematurely while the wicked grew old in evil-doing. Resignation was best and the fulfilment of the daily task, and such alleviation of the radical evil of existence as may be given by the simple pleasures of life. Of these man should make the most, especially in his youth; for, as his physical powers wither, his capacity for enjoyment will be gone, and in the gloomy underworld the days of darkness will be many. They will be many and without hope, for men are beasts and from the dreary tedium of Sheol and its inactivity there is no escape.

31. Apocalyptic in the Old Testament. The pessimism of Ecclesiastes stands by itself in the Old Testament. The sense of human, or at least of national, misery was acutely felt by the apocalypticists; but it drove them for refuge to the certainty of Divine intervention. Not by development but by sudden catastrophe, not by the evolution of politics, but by the direct and sudden action of God, deliverance was to be attained. On the basis of earlier prophecies, perhaps in conformity with a traditional scheme, they mapped out the course of future history, studied the times and seasons, and calculated the date of the crisis. A rudimentary apocalyptic is to be found in Ezekiel and Zechariah, in Joel and Is 24-27. But for an apocalypse in the full sense of the term we have to go to the Book of Daniel. This book may incorporate earlier material; but in its present form it is a product of the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. As in Is 24 21, and probably Psalms 58 (ver. 1 cf. RVmg.) and 82, behind the human empires stand the angelic princes of the nations. To their misgovernment or hostility to Israel the present miseries are largely due. And between the rival angels the battle is fought in heaven before the victory is won on earth. Antiochus is moving to his destined end; and altho the saints pass through a great tribulation deliverance is at hand. The Ancient of Days will come to judge, the bestial powers of evil will be overthrown and the kingdom will be delivered to the saints. A resurrection of the righteous and the annihilation of death had been predicted in Is 25 8, 26 19, and the anticipation is taken up in Dn 12 2. But here, while some are raised to everlasting life, others are brought back to earth to endure reproaches and everlasting abhorrence. The author is probably thinking specially of the martyrs and the apostates in the Maccabean period.

IX. PSALMISTS AND SAGES.

32. The Psalter. It is not possible in the limits of this article to speak in any detail of one of the most notable portions of the Old Testament, the Book of Psalms. That it contains preexilic elements is probable; but it is in the main a monument of post-exilic piety. Its limitations ought to be frankly recognized, in particular the vindictive bitterness, with which the writers speak of their enemies, and that not merely in the imprecatory Psalms. Moreover the Psalmists are not simply pioneers in religious thought. They have behind them for the most part the great prophets whose original utterances they have coined into the language of devotion. And in a large measure they have behind them the Law, in whole or in part. They were not without their own originality, but it was in the region of experimental religion. And so Jews and Christians have turned to the Psalter and discovered a classical expression of their deepest religious feelings. Altho we find in the book an enthusiasm for the Law and a passionate attachment to the Temple, the Psalmists do not conceive religion as consisting mainly in external ritual. The deeply spiritual quality of Jewish piety at its best comes to frequent expression in it. And since, unlike the prophets, the Psalmists were concerned less with the circumstances of their own time and more with universal principles and experiences, their language has an immediate appeal and intelligibility to all ages. To present a complete account of its theology would be largely to describe the religion of Judaism.

33. The Book of Proverbs. On the Book of Proverbs it is not necessary to linger. As the Psalms express the religion and theology of the prophets in the language of devotion, the Proverbs express in pithy aphorisms the current ethical principles. No doubt the criticism would not be unjustified that the precepts are the offspring of shrewd and self-regarding common sense, untouched by altruism or idealism. But the nobler and more generous attitude is also represented; and the testimony of the book is unflinching against the evils, moral or economic, which destroy the unity or corrupt the purity of social life. The conception of the Divine wisdom, as presented especially in Pr 8 22-31, was of great importance in pointing the way to the later recognition of distinctions within the Godhead, which found expression in the doctrine of the Logos and the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

X. SUMMARY SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION.

34. Summary. It remains to summarize the development of Hebrew religion in the Old Testament period and indicate the results achieved by the time when the Old Testament was virtually complete. It originated in the selection of a tiny people of crude religion and morality, led by a man of outstanding religious genius, administrative capacity and tremendous force of personality, who inspired them with the conviction that they were the chosen people of J'' who demanded their sole allegiance. He was conceived of as a deity of the wilderness, manifested in hurricane, in thunder and lightning, and in earthquake, congenial expressions of His own stormy temper and that awful Holiness which reacted with swift vengeance against any violation of it, however involuntary. He was implacable to His foes, dooming them often to utter extermination. Yet He was gracious to His obedient people and demanded from them a morality which surpassed the ethical code of their neighbors.

The transition from the wilderness to settled life and agriculture profoundly transformed the religion since it involved the intrusion of Canaanite paganism into Hebrew religion, and the assimilation of J'' to the Canaanite Baalim. But the view that loyalty to J'' involved the rejection of civilization did not finally triumph; the great prophets repudiated the foul accretions of paganism, while recognizing in J'' the giver of bountiful harvests. Meanwhile the broken unity of the nation was slowly reknit, especially under pressure from the Philistines; the monarchy was established, David created an empire to which later ages looked back with pride, and a dynasty from which the Messianic King was expected to spring. The disruption of the kingdom shattered imperialist prospects, but left the religion free to develop. Ahab's marriage with Jezebel and the introduction of the worship of the Tyrian Baal threatened the monopoly of Yahweh in the allegiance of His people; but this was secured by the religious triumph of Elijah and the political triumph of Jehu. The expansion of Israel under Jeroboam II and the menace of Assyria's advance created the political conditions which brought the great prophets into the field. They advance from the earlier monolatry to a real monotheism; they see in J'' the Lord of Nature and the controller of history, who uses the heathen nations, just as He uses Israel, to effect His righteous purpose. And they insist with tremendous emphasis on the righteousness of God. Amos proclaims His inexorable justice, altho it demands the annihilation of Israel; Hosea His inexhaustible love, which will secure Israel's repentance and restoration; Isaiah His holiness and majesty, which will abase the proud and root out the sinful; leaving a righteous remnant, that from it a new nation may spring over which the Messiah will rule. But it must not be forgotten that the spiritual and ethical religion of the prophets found far too scanty understanding among the people and their accepted religious leaders. The formal priestly system went on with unabated vigor.

With the destruction of the Northern Kingdom, the future of the religion was committed to Judah. The preeminence of the Temple gave an opportunity for the centralization of the worship, which was effected by Josiah on the basis of the Deuteronomic Law Book. But matters had gone too far for such palliatives and Jeremiah realized that the destruction of the State and the Temple was inevitable. Taught by his own experience he came to realize that in personal fellowship with a personal God the true secret of religion was to be found, and thus replaced the State by the individual as the unit of religion. The Exile defined the alternatives—either J'' could not or would not save His people and they were thus absolved from their allegiance to Him, or Yahweh is the holy, omnipotent God who is chastening us for our sins. Ezekiel drives home the moral; the Exile is richly deserved punishment but J'' will restore and renew His people, and get Himself glory by destroying the heathen. The prophet is an extreme individualist who puts the stress on personal responsibility; but he realizes the importance of the communal element in religion and makes elaborate provision for the cultus. The Second Isaiah meets the dismay of the exiles at the arrogant triumph of Babylon over J'''s people and its despondency at J'''s neglect, by the assurance of His incomparable might and inscrutable wisdom, His tender love for Israel and its restoration through Cyrus the conqueror of Babylon. Israel is the Servant of Yahweh declaring the true God to the heathen and suffering vicariously for their sin.

The returned exiles were monotheists who had left idolatry behind them. The cultus was centralized at the Temple; confessedly heathen practises had been abandoned, altho much in the ritual had its roots in crude paganism. Sacred seasons, especially the Sabbath, were strictly observed, and after the Law had become complete, legalism gained more and more power. The scribe and the synagog were everywhere, the priest could offer sacrifice only in Jerusalem. Casuistry became more intricate, prophecy waned and passed over into apocalyptic. The Jews became more and more conscious of themselves as a chosen people, separate from the heathen and loathing their abominations. Wild outbursts of hate for the oppressor, savage desire for revenge, are to be found in the Psalms, in some of the prophets, and in the Book of Esther. On the other hand, we have the missionary enthusiasm of the Second Isaiah and still more of the Book of Jonah, the care for the stranger and the command to love him which we find in the Law, and the humanistic temper of the Book of Job. Of incalculable importance was the conception of a Canon of sacred books containing a history of the chosen people, laws for its government, prophecies of the future, a literature of devotion, a discussion of perplexing problems. Naturally the Canon was not finally fixed till some time after the latest book of the O T was written; but even before the Maccabean period the Law and the Prophets were recognized as canonical, and large sections of the other books.

LITERATURE: The best and most comprehensive statement for the English reader is probably E. Kautzsch's article "Religion of Israel" in the Extra Volume of HDB. The German original of this was published after his death by his son K. Kautzsch under the title Biblische Theologie des alten Testaments (1911). Other works are H. P. Smith, The Religion of Israel (1914); J. P. Peters, The Religion of the Hebrews (1914). Of the earlier works which are still of value, mention may be made of Kuenen's Religion of Israel (1874-75); his Hibbert Lectures, National and Universal Religions (1882); C. G. Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures, Origin and Growth of Religion (1892). Smaller works are R. L. Ottley, The Religion of Israel (1905); K. Marti, The Religion of the Old Testament (1907); A. S. Peake, The Religion of Israel (1907); G. A. Barton, The Religion of Israel (1918); H. T. Fowler, The Origin and Growth of the Hebrew Religion (1916); Loisy, The Religion of Israel (1910). There are several comprehensive German works: R. Smend, Alttestamentliche Religionsgeschichte (2d ed., 1899); B. Stade, Biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments (1905), second volume by Bertholet (1911); K. Marti, Geschichte der israelitischen Religion (3d ed., 1907); König, Geschichte des Reiches Gottes bis auf Jesus Christus (1908); Geschichte der Alttestamentlichen Religion (2d ed., 1915); R. Kittel, Die Religion des Volkes Israel (6-1922); G. Hölscher, Geschichte der israelitischen und jüdischen Religion (1922). Of works dealing with a section of the subject, the following may be mentioned: K. Budde, Religion of Israel to the Exile (1899) (3d ed. of the German, Die Altisraelitische Religion, 1912); T. K. Cheyne, Jewish Religious Life after the Exile (1898); Addis, Hebrew Religion to the Establishment of Judaism under Ezra (1906); W. Robertson Smith, The Prophets of Israel (2d ed., 1902); W. H. Bennett, The Religion of the Post-Exilic Prophets (1907); Büttenwieser, The Prophets of Israel (1914); T. H. Robinson, Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel (1923); Welch, Religion of Israel Under the Kingdom (1912).

Works on O T Theology frequently include a history of the religion, altho strictly they are specially concerned with the exposition of individual doctrines, or the theology as a whole. We may mention H. Schultz, Old Testament Theology (1892); E. Riehm, Alttestamentliche Theologie (1889); A. Dillmann, Handbuch der Alttestamentlichen Theologie (1895); A. B. Davidson, The Theology of the Old Testament (1904); H. W. Robinson, The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament (1913).

I. INTRODUCTORY.

1. Scope of the Study. The aim of this article is to exhibit in outline the social institutions, manners, and customs of ancient Israel. This study was formerly known as Biblical Archeology, and this usage is still retained by the recent German works of Benzinger and Nowack; but the name is unfortunate, since the facts that are investigated are not archeological but literary. The modern name Biblical Sociology is also misleading, since it implies that a system of sociology is taught in the Bible.

2. History of the Discipline. The story of Israel's social life was given no attention either in ancient or in medieval times.

With the closing years of the 16th cent., however, there began to be a decided activity in this department. Sigonius treated the subject of sacred antiquities in his De Republica Hebraeorum (1583), and Arias Montanus discussed the same subject in the Apparatus, Tom. iii, of the Antwerp Polyglot (1593). Biblical geography and natural history received a noticeable impulse from Bochart, Reland, Celsius, and others. Most of the writings which appeared before the middle of the 18th cent. are collected in the Thesaurus Antiquitatum Sacrarum of Blasius Ugolinus, 1744-69 (34 vols., folio). But the most of these works lack true historical method. It was impossible for them to secure the right insight into the subject, because of their adoption of the traditional typology, in accordance with which all ceremonies are to be explained preeminently as types and shadows of Christ.

A new impulse, however, was given to archeological science by Spencer (De Legibus Hebraeorum, 1675). To be sure, many of his results are erroneous, his citation of proofs often arbitrary, and his interpretation still under the influence of typology. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that he smoothed the way for historical investigation in this field of study, recognizing and stating the problem of the origin of the legislation, and through his free attitude toward the cultus of the O T making a historical solution of the problem possible.

The rationalism which prevailed in the 18th cent. exerted a stimulating influence on archeological studies. The effort was now made to understand Israel as one of the Semitic peoples.

Under the stimulus of this new conception special attention was given to the study of the private and political life of Israel, and scholars sought to make use of the observations of numerous travelers in the Orient for a better understanding of Israelitic antiquities. Special interest was manifested in the sphere of the geography and topography of Palestine. Men like Hasselquist, Seetzen, Burckhardt, Van der Velde, Robinson and his traveling companion Eli Smith, Tobler, De Luynes, Wetzstein, and others, broke the spell of tradition and cleared the way for an untrammelled investigation in the realm of historical geography and topography. With due regard to the connection between the natural features of the land and its political history, Ritter the renowned geographer, made good use of all the available material on the geography of Palestine. In more recent years, systematic researches in Palestine have been undertaken through accurate measurements, excavations, etc. In these enterprises England (The Palestine Exploration Fund, 1865), America (The Palestine Exploration Society, 1871), and Germany (Deutsche Palaestina-Verein, 1877) have been the principal participants.

The first attempt at a purely systematic organization of the discipline from the historical point of view was undertaken by De Wette. He was, however, surpassed by Ewald, because the latter not only had a truer appreciation of Israel's religious characteristics, but also possessed a deeper insight into the religions of Semitic antiquity.

Against this historico-critical treatment of archeology, a reaction arose in the school of Hengstenberg.

It found its appropriate expression in Keil's Archaeologie. Hengstenberg, Kurz, Keil, and others all assumed that without symbolism and typology it is not possible to reach a full understanding of the religious institutions of Israel.

Through the general acceptance of the modern Pentateuchal criticism, which is associated with the names of Reuss, Graf, and Wellhausen, a powerful impulse was given to archeological research. The altogether different conception of the Priestly Code and its assignment to the postexilic times necessitated an entirely new idea of the ritual development of Israel. In addition, has come the newly awakened interest in the history of religion, with fresh information in the field of Semitics, through the labors of W. R. Smith, Wellhausen, and others, and the material brought to view by the excavations, especially in the Euphrates valley, through which we have secured a clear insight into the collective life of these peoples. We have thus for the first time come to know more accurately the ground from which Israel sprang, and can estimate with approximate correctness the influence which was exercised upon her by other peoples.

3. Method of Study. The old method, which is still followed by Benzinger and Nowack, was topical. Everything relating to occupations, food, dress, clothing, family organization, political organization, or economic conditions, was brought together under a single head. This had the advantage of giving a complete picture of each subject, but it had the disadvantage of losing historical perspective. Just as in 'Biblical Theology' the old topical method lost sight of the evolution of religion; and consequently, has been superseded by the modern 'History of the Religion of Israel'; so also in the investigation of Heb. social life the topical method must be discarded in favor of the genetic study of institutions. In accordance with this method, we shall divide the subject into four periods, Semitic, Nomadic, Agricultural, and Commercial; and shall classify the material under each period topically, after the manner of the older archeologies.

II. THE SEMITIC PERIOD.

4. The Semites. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 5, 8-11; and GENEALOGY.

5. Arabia, the Home of the Semites. There is general agreement that Arabia was the center from which the Semitic peoples radiated: (1) because they were evenly distributed about this center; (2) because the earliest inhabitants of this region in the Bab. and Eg. monuments were Semites; (3) because Arabia, on account of its aridity, is just the region from which numerous migrations must have taken place; (4) because the modern Bedawin of Central Arabia are the best representatives of the primitive Semites.

6. Primitive Semitic Occupations. In early times, when Arabia was better watered, and game was more abundant than at present, many tribes subsisted by hunting. The memory of this fact lingered in later tradition. Nimrod was a mighty hunter before J" (Gn 10 9, see NIMROD), and Esau and his descendants were skin-clad men who lived by the chase (Gn 25 27, 27 3 ff., 39 f.). Some modern Bedawi tribes still depend partly on hunting. The weapons used in the chase were the club, boomerang, sling, bow, knife, and snares and traps of various sorts (see HUNTING; ARMS, §§ 1-4; KNIFE; and FLINT).

Fishing was practised from the earliest times on the coast of Arabia, and the words for fish and fishing are the same in all the Semitic dialects. The implements of the art were hooks, spears, and nets (see FISH, FISHING).

Long before their dispersion the Semites had abandoned for the most part the life of hunters, and had adopted that of pastoral nomads. The native Arab name for such nomads is Bedawi, pl. Bedu. Bedawin (Bedouin) is a regular pl. that is not in common native use. The name is used in contrast to jellāhīn, or 'tillers of the soil.' The most important domestic animal was the one-humped camel, which was indigenous to Central Arabia, and without which life would have been impossible in that region (see CAMEL; and FURNITURE). The ass also was early domesticated (see ASS). From the earliest times the broad-tailed sheep and the black-haired goat have been bred by the inhabitants of Arabia (see GOAT; SHEEP; LAMB; and ROD). Large cattle were not found in Arabia proper, but only on the rim of the peninsula where water was more abundant. They belonged to the half-nomads who were beginning to adopt agricultural life. Horses also were unknown to ancient Arabia, and are found to-day only among tribes who dwell near the Euphrates or other fertile regions (see NOMADIC LIFE).

The only agriculture known was the cultivation of the date-palm in oases.

Among the ancient Semites, as among the modern Bedawin, the arts were all domestic, except that of the smith. The women molded and fired the few pieces of pottery that were necessary, made baskets of twigs, dressed skins, and spun and wove the cloth of hair or wool out of which tents or garments were made. Only the art of working metals was the trade-secret of a clan that wandered from tribe to tribe in pursuit of their craft (see WEAVE and WEB).

Trade in ancient Arabia was of the simplest sort, and consisted mainly in the direct barter of goods. Comparative philology shows, however, that before their separation the Semites had copper, silver, and gold, which they weighed in scales; and also that they had money-changers and money-lenders. These facts indicate that caravan traffic, even with foreign lands, must have been of early origin.

7. Food in Arabia. Water was the first necessity of life. In the desert springs were rare, and their flow was scanty. In a dry season when the fountains failed, long journeys had to be undertaken in search of other sources, or water had to be bought from more fortunate neighbors (see FOOD, § 12; WATER; and WELL).

In the hunting period the ancient Semites lived on wild fruits, particularly dates, insects, particularly locusts, honey, fish, lizards, wild birds and their eggs, and the various wild animals that are indigenous to Arabia, all of which are still eaten by the modern Bedawin. Salt was used as a condiment from the earliest times (see FOOD, §§ 7-9; LOCUSTS; MANNA; and SALT).

Fire was known, and cooking was done on a primitive hearth of three stones (see COAL; FIRE; FIRE-BRAND; FUEL; FURNACE; and HEARTH).

When the camel, the sheep, and the goat were domesticated, milk in its various forms became the principal food of the Semites. The flesh of domestic animals was not eaten, except on sacrificial or festal occasions (see EAT; and FOOD, §§ 6-11). Grain did not grow in the desert, but the early Semites could not live without it, any more than the modern Bedawin. Either by barter or by robbery, they obtained from the neighboring jellāhīn the wheat or the barley out of which they made their bread (see FOOD, §§ 1-2; LEAVEN; and MILL). Coffee and tobacco, which are now found everywhere in the desert, were of course unknown to antiquity.

8. Care of the Body. In regard to primitive nakedness, see NAKED; BAREFOOT; MOURNING, § 1; and BURIAL, § 7). In regard to the treatment of the skin, see PURIFICATION, § 2; NITR; SOAP; OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES; EYE-PAINT; and MARK. In regard to the dressing of the hair, see BEARD; HAIR; and SHAVE. In regard to sickness and its treatment, see DISEASE AND MEDICINE; LEPROSY; MIDWIFE; NURSE; and SWADDLE).

9. Dress. In the hunting period the only garment was a girdle of leaves, or of the skins of captured animals. In the pastoral period a girdle of wool, or hair-cloth was worn; and out of this was developed the kethōneth, or shirt, which was similar to the tōb of the modern Bedawin, over which was worn the simlāh, or coat, which was similar to the modern 'abaya. The head was uncovered, except for a coil of camel's hair rope to keep the hair in place; and the feet were bare, except for sandals that were worn on a journey (see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS; WOOL and BAG).

10. Dwellings. The earliest dwellings of the Semites in the hunting period were caves, or huts of twigs and branches (see CAVE; and BOOTH). In the pastoral period tents of black goat-hair cloth became their habitual abodes (see HOUSE, §§ 1-2; HABITATION; and LAMP). The tents of a clan were grouped together in an encampment (see VIL-LAGE).

11. Family Organization. The earliest form of Semitic society was matriarchal. Marriage was a temporary union, in which a man left his own clan and joined that of his wife. Under these conditions the children belonged to the mother's tribe, and descent was reckoned entirely through the mother. The mother also was the head of the clan, and the leader of her people in peace and in war.

Subsequently society passed into the fraternal polyandrous stage, in which a group of brothers owned a wife in common. In this system the woman joined the men's clan permanently; but out of the group of brothers it was impossible to tell which was the father of the child, so that descent was still reckoned through the mother. The mother's polyandrous husband, who might be either father or uncle, was known by the child as 'amm.

Long before their separation the Semites had reached the patriarchal stage of family organization, in which polygamy took the place of polyandry, the wife became the property of her husband, and the child now knew its father (see FAMILY; and KINDRED).

Marriage with relatives nearer than a cousin was forbidden by custom; but except for this limitation, it was considered desirable to marry the nearest kin possible, in order to keep property in the family (see MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE). Polygamy, concubinage, and prostitution were permitted to the man (see HARLOT; and WHORE); but the strictest chastity was required of the woman. The husband was the ba'al, or 'owner,' of the wife. He might divorce her at will, but she might not divorce him (see WOMAN). The father had absolute power of life and death over his children, and they had no rights over against him, except that of inheritance (see FAMILY, §§ 6, 8). Slavery was a universal Semitic institution, and the position of slaves did not differ greatly from that of children (see SLAVERY; and MASTER).

12. Political Organization. From the earliest times the Semites organized themselves into small clans for defending the oases on which their water-supply depended. These clans were based on real, or assumed kinship; and were bound together by common interest, custom, and religion (see THOUSAND; KINDRED; KINSMAN; and NEIGHBOR). The law of the clan was custom (see LAW, § 1). This guaranteed rights of life, liberty, property, truth, and kindness to all members of the clan, who regarded each other as brothers. The government of the clan was in the hands of elders, who were elected by the free men of the tribe, and who could be deposed at will. There thus existed complete democracy (see ELDER; and CHIEF). Kindred clans often bound themselves together in the larger political unity of the Tribe (see TRIBE). Toward members of alien clans the attitude was uniformly hostile, and warfare was constant. The institution of blood-revenge was the fundamental law of the desert. It required that if a fellow-clansman were killed, his blood must be avenged by his kinsmen by slaying some member of the clan of the murderer (see BLOOD, AVENGER OF). On the other hand, an equally rigorous law required that a stranger or enemy who came as a suppliant to one's tent door should receive entertainment (see HOSPITALITY).

13. Economic Organization. The economic organization of primitive Semitic society, as of the modern Bedawin, was communistic. Land, pasture, water, game, oases of date-palms, and all other 'public utilities,' as we should call them, were owned by the clan in common. Only tents with their furniture, clothing, and cattle were private property. Under these conditions no great individual wealth was possible. One man might have a few more camels, goats or sheep than another; but he lived in the same sort of tent, ate the same food, and wore the same clothes as the man who had fewer animals. Economic equality as well as political equality was thus characteristic of primitive Semitic society.

14. Religion. See SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 1-9.

III. THE HEBREW NOMADIC PERIOD. (Before 1200 B.C.).

15. Sources for the Hebrew Nomadic Period. Our sources for the Nomadic Period of Hebrew history are in the main the documents embedded in the Hexateuch. (See HEXATEUCH). These documents are based on oral traditions, and these traditions are of very diverse origin, namely: (1) traditions which did not arise until after the conquest of Canaan; (2) traditions borrowed from Babylonia; (3) traditions borrowed from Egypt; (4) traditions borrowed from the Amorites who preceded Israel in the land of Canaan, and (5) genuine old Hebrew traditions that have come down from the period prior to the conquest. There is thus only a small portion of the Pentateuchal tradition that can be used as a source for the Hebrew nomadic period. This is supplemented by comparative philology, comparative sociology, and comparative religion, the presumption being that ideas and institutions which later Israel had in common with the other Semites existed already in the nomadic period.

16. The Origin of Israel. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, §§ 1-3; RELIGION OF, §§ 1-3; and HEBREW LANGUAGE.

17. Nomadic Life of Early Israel. Hebrew tradition represents the patriarchs as nomads who bred camels, asses, sheep, goats, and large cattle; who lived in tents, who wandered from place to place in search of water and pasture, and who regarded springs as their most valuable possession (see NOMADIC LIFE, § 2, WATER). When they went into Egypt, they dwelt in the land of Goshen, which was desert; and still continued their nomadic life (Gn 45 10, 46 28, 47 27; Ex 8 22, 9 26). At the time of the Exodus they were able to resume the life of desert Bedawin because they had never really abandoned it. Their life in this period, accordingly, must be regarded as substantially identical with the life that we have sketched in the previous Semitic period. While they were in Egypt they were enslaved by one of the Pharaohs, probably Ramses II (1292-1225 B.C.). From this peril they were delivered by Moses, who brought them out of Egypt, and restored the communism and the economic equality of primitive Semitic times.

18. The Religion of Yahweh. The chief factor in the emancipation of Israel from the bondage of Egypt was the religion of J'. J' was not the ancestral god of Israel (Ex 3 13 f, 6 2). No personal names compounded with J' are found before the time of Moses. J' was the god of Sinai, and of the Midianite Kenites who dwelt around that mountain. Moses first came to know Him at Sinai, and was instructed in His religion by his father-in-law, the priest of Midian. From J' Moses received the commission to bring Israel up out of Egypt, and to bring it into Canaan. This commission involved (1) the moral superiority of J' to all other gods, and (2) the physical superiority of J' to all other gods. From these new conceptions of J' flowed the cardinal doctrines of the Mosaic religion: (1) J' alone must be worshiped by Israel; (2) since He took pity upon Israel's sufferings in Egypt, Israel also should pity all oppressed persons; (3) J' was hostile to the capitalistic, despotic civilizations of Egypt and of Canaan, and favored the communistic, democratic life of the desert. These ideas were of enormous importance in the later social development of Israel. (See also ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, §§ 3-8).

IV. THE AGRICULTURAL PERIOD (1200-1000 B.C.).

19. The Land of Canaan. See PALESTINE, §§ 4-26.

20. Sources for the Agricultural Period. (See HEXATEUCH, § 9; and JUDGES). These ancient sources are supplemented by survivals of primitive agricultural life among the peasantry of modern Palestine.

21. The Conquest of Canaan. The conquest of Canaan by the Hebrews was a gradual process that extended over a period of perhaps 200 years. According to Jg 1, our oldest account of the invasion, the Leah tribes came first, and afterwards the Rachel tribes. Individual tribes pushed in between centers of Canaanite population, and occupied the rural districts; while the walled cities remained for the most part in the hands of the aborigines until the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 3).

22. Adoption of Agriculture. After the conquest some tribes continued to lead the pastoral life for a long time, and cattle-breeding always remained one of the principal industries; the majority of the nation, however, gradually abandoned the nomadic life, and became agriculturists, as the Canaanites had been before them. The old Bedawi ideal of possessing 'a land flowing with milk and honey' now gave place to the fellaḥ ideal of 'sitting every man under his own vine and fig-tree.' The leading men of the period of the Judges and the earliest kings were all farmers (see AGRICULTURE; FIELD; STRAW; VINES AND VINTAGE; FLAX; ALMOND; MATTOCK; YOKE; CART; WHEEL; and BASKET).

23. Food in the Agricultural Period. The adoption of agriculture brought with it a large addition to the diet of the desert (see FOOD, §§ 1-5, 13, 14; CISTERN; VINEGAR; and MEALS).

24. Dress in the Agricultural Period. No change was made in the primitive dress of the desert, except in the addition of a sort of coat over the tunic and under the mantle (see DRESS, § 4).

25. Houses. In this period tents were abandoned, and houses of stone or of clay took their place (see HOUSE, II; LINTEL; BED; BASIN; and POTTERY). These dwellings were crowded together in villages and cities (see VILLAGE). The walled cities still remained Canaanite.

26. Family Organization. The adoption of agriculture brought no change in the tribal organization of Israel. The family retained its patriarchal constitution. Members of the same clan settled in the same village, and the sheiks retained their ancient functions of judges and military leaders, only now they were called 'elders of the town' instead of 'elders of the clan.' Political equality also persisted during the period of the Judges: 'There was no king in Israel in those days, every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (Jg 21 25).

Gideon indignantly declined kingship, when it was offered to him, as unworthy of a free-born Israelite; and Jotham, in the parable of the trees that chose a king, taught that only a worthless Canaanite half-breed like Abimelech would allow himself to be crowned (Jg 8 23, 9 7-21).

27. Economic Organization. The primitive communism and economic equality of the desert also continued in this period. Land, water, pasture, and other public utilities were still owned in common, as they had been before the conquest. According to tradition, Canaan was divided by lot. There was no permanent private ownership, but land was frequently redistributed, as in modern Russian village communities. The word 'lot' continued to be used as the name for a piece of land (see LINE; LOT; LANDMARK; and PORTION). The institution of the sabbatical year seems to have been connected originally with a redistribution of land every seven years. This communal tenure still exists in many villages of modern Palestine. Only houses and their furniture were individual property, as tents had been in the desert. Money was scarce during this period. Micah, the Ephraimite, hired Manasseh, a grandson of Moses, as his priest at a salary of ten silver shekels, or $6.00 a year (Jg 7 10). For seventy shekels, or $42.00, Abimelech hired a band of ruffians who made him king and served as his bodyguard (Jg 9 10). There were no rich men, but only a nation of peasant farmers.

28. Religion of the Agricultural Period. The settlement in Canaan brought about far greater changes in the religion of Israel than in the economic or social life. The baals of Canaan were agricultural deities who presided over the planting of the seed and the reaping of crops. Agriculture could not be learned by the Hebrews without learning at the same time the cult of the indigenous divinities. All our early sources agree that Israel in the period of the Judges 'served the baals' (Jg 2 10, 13, 3 5 f.), and this testimony is confirmed by the later prophets. Even when J" triumphed nominally over the baals, He Himself was regarded as similar to them; and His religion was permeated with elements derived from the baal-cults. Thus the conquest brought with it the practical disappearance of the worship of J", the God of the desert (see ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, §§ 9-11; HIGH PLACES; and SACRIFICES).

V. THE COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL PERIOD (1000-586 B.C.).

29. Sources for the Period. For the times of Samuel, Saul and David the traditions preserved by the J and the E documents in the Books of Samuel have first-class historical value (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF). For the time of the divided monarchy the Judean and the Ephraimite documents, and the tales of the prophets incorporated by the editor of the Books of Kings, were written near to the times that they describe, and possess high historical value (see KINGS, BOOKS OF). For the times of the later monarchy we have the books of the prophets of the Assyrian period, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah and Jeremiah; the law-codes of J, E, D; and the Holiness Code (see HEXATEUCH, §§ 14, 23; and DEUTER-ONOMY); and the oldest parts of the Book of Proverbs (see PROVERBS, §§ 4-5).

30. Founding of the Monarchy. Through the efforts of Samuel and the Sons of the Prophets Saul founded the first Hebrew monarchy, and this constitution lasted down to the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, § 4; KING; and THRONE). The kingdom brought law and order in the land, the conquest of the Canaanite strongholds and of the neighboring nations by David, and control of the trade-routes which hitherto had not belonged to Israel. This was followed by a great development of commerce (see TRADE AND COMMERCE; INN; SHIPS AND NAVIGATION; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES; and MONEY). Commerce led inevitably to a growth of industry. In the days of the kings all the arts of the ancient world became indigenous in Israel. We read of smiths, founders, goldsmiths, silversmiths, stone-cutters, masons, engravers of gems, carpenters, image-makers, potters, painters, weavers, fullers, bakers, cooks, barbers, perfumers, apothecaries, and physicians (see ARTIZAN LIFE; METALS; HAMMER; CROWN; GLASS; STONES; COLORS; and BARBER).

31. Break-up of the Tribal System. The monarchy did not affect the patriarchal constitution of the family, but it led to the disintegration of the clans and tribes. The kings were hostile to the independent tribal authorities and favored centralization of government. The royal standing army gradually displaced the ancient tribal militia. Instead of the tribal elders there now grew up the sārīm, or 'princes,' that is, the bureaucracy of favorites appointed by the king. Trade, industry, and city-life also tended to loosen the tribal bonds. By the time of the literary prophets the social organization of the desert had well-nigh disappeared (see CITY; and CITIZENSHIP).

32. Break-up of the Communistic System. Through conquest, commerce, and industry the wealth of Israel in the period of the monarchy was greatly increased. According to I K 10 27, Solomon 'made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones.' Hosea represents the Northern Kingdom as saying, 'Surely I am become rich, I have found me wealth' (Hos 12 8). Isaiah says, 'Their land is full of silver and gold, neither is there any end of their treasures' (Is 2 7). (See WEALTH.)

Simultaneously with this increase of wealth, communal ownership of property disappeared, and private ownership took its place. 'Jehovah forbid it me that I should sell the inheritance of my fathers unto thee,' said Naboth to Ahab (I K 21 1-4). The earliest law-codes, the prophets, and the earliest wisdom-literature, all assume that private ownership of land is an established fact.

With private ownership came also the struggle to increase one's individual wealth by unjust means, such as (1) robbery (Hos 4 2, 6 9, 7 1; Jer 7 7); (2) false weights and measures (Am 8 5; Hos 12 7; Mic 6 10 f.); (3) lying in trade (Hos 4 1 f.; Mic 6 12; Jer 9 3-6, 23 14); (4) breaking contracts (Hos 4 2, 10 4; Jer 4 2, 7 9); (5) selling inferior goods (Am 8 8 b); (6) corners in grain (Am 8 4 f.; Hos 7 14 b); (7) taking pledges from the poor (Am 2 8 a; Mic 2 8; Ezk 18

7, 12, 33 15); (8) exorbitant interest (Am 2 8 b, 5 11 a; Jer 15 10; Ezk 18 8, 13, 17, 22 12); (9) foreclosing of mortgages (Hos 5 10 f.; Is 5 8 f.; Mic 2 1 f., 9); (10) enslaving of debtors (II K 4 1; Am 2 6, 8 6); (11) unjust legislation (Is 10 1 f.; Jer 8 8); (12) oppressive taxation (I K 4 7-10; IS 8 15, 17; Am 5 11, 7 1; see TAX, TITHE); (13) trade monopolies (I K 9 26-28, 10 11 f., 28 f., 20 34); (14) forced labor (I K 9 20 f., cf. 5 13, 15 f., 12 1-20; IS 8 11-18; see TASKMASTER); (15) perversion of justice (Am 5 7, 6 12; Is 1 23; Mic 3 9 f.; Jer 5 5); (16) taking of bribes (Am 5 12; Is 5 23; Mic 3 12, 7 3; see GIFT); (17) Oppression of the poor (Am 3 10, 4 1, 8 4; Is 3 13-15, 5 7; Mic 3 1-3; Zeph 1 9 b, 3 3; Ezk 34 2-4, 45 8, 46 18); (18) deeds of violence (I S 18 11, 19 1 f., 22 11-23; II S ch. 11; I K ch. 21; Hos 6 9; Is 1 15 b).

33. The Class of the Rich. The result of the unjust acquisition of wealth was the unequal distribution of wealth. Large fortunes were accumulated by a few capitalists, while the mass of the population was impoverished to an extent unknown in earlier times. The rich lived in senseless and enervating luxury (I K 4 22 f., chs. 5-7, 10 4 f., 10, 11 f., 16-21, 11 3, 22 9; Am 3 12b, 15, 5 11b, 6 1-6, 8 10; Hos 2 11, 8 14, 13 15b; Is 5 9, 11, 14, 22 18, 32 13 f.; Zeph 1 8). The wives of the aristocrats were as pleasure-loving and luxurious as their husbands (Am 4 1; Is 3 16-24, 32 9-11). Drunkenness was frightfully prevalent among the upper classes (Am 4 1, 5 11 b, 6 6; Hos 4 11, 7 5, 14; Is 5 11, 12, 28 1, 3, 7-8; Mic 2 11). Sexual licence also prevailed (Am 2 7; Hos 4 2, 10 f., 13 f., 7 4; Jer 5 7 f., 7 9, 9 2, 23 10, 14, 29 23).

34. The Class of the Poor. Over against the small class of the rich stood the large class of the poor. Excessive exportation of grain by the capitalists made famines frequent (II S 21 1, 24 13; I K 8 37, 17 12, 18 2; II K 6 25, 7 4, 8 1). There was a constant rise in the price of food, and a constant decline in the purchasing power of money, due to expansion of the circulating medium. In the period of the Judges the salary of a priest for a year was ten shekels (Jg 17 10); but in the reign of Ahab, in a time of exceptional plenty, a seah of fine flour cost a shekel, and two seahs of barley a shekel (II K 7 1). As a result of these conditions the laboring classes found it increasingly difficult to buy food. In times of war or of famine they were compelled to borrow of the capitalists in order to escape starvation. They were seldom able to repay the principal, then the mortgages on their farms were foreclosed and they themselves were sold into slavery (see POOR, BEGGAR; and HIRELING). Repeated revolutions in the Northern Kingdom were a sign of social unrest (Hos 4 1, 6 8, 7 7, 8 4; Is 3 1-7, 9 18-21). Such were the alarming social conditions that existed in the times of the prophets.

VI. COMMUNISTIC SOLUTIONS OF THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

35. The Kenites. The Kenites were the primitive worshippers of J' at Sinai who accompanied Israel into the land of Canaan. They were characterized by intense loyalty to J', their ancestral god, and hostility to the civilization of Canaan. They would not adopt agriculture or trade, but retained the primitive nomadic life and communistic social organization of the desert. Down to the latest times they stood as a protest against the religion and the capitalism of Canaan that Israel had adopted (see KENITE).

36. The Rechabites. The Rechabites were a branch of the Kenites, who like them were enthusiasts for J', the god of the desert, and for the social life of the desert. They dwelt in tents, and rejected agriculture and wine, because wine belonged to the agricultural civilization of Canaan (see RECHAB).

37. The Nazirites. The Nazirites were a purely Israelite sect, who cherished ideals similar to those of the Kenites and Rechabites. They were devoted to J', and were hostile to the baals of Canaan. They also refused to drink wine, and they wore their hair long, because that was the custom of the desert (see NAZIRITE).

38. The Earliest Prophets. The Heb. prophets who preceded Amos seem to have held theories similar to those of the Kenites, Rechabites and Nazirites. They agreed with them in hostility to the baals of Canaan (II K 10 15-17). Samuel, the founder of the Sons of the Prophets, was himself a Nazirite (I S 1 11). Their battle-cry was 'Down with the baals, and back to J', the god of the desert.' They sympathized with the poor, and denounced the oppressions of the rich and powerful (I S 8 1-16; II S 7 1-11, 12 1-15, 24 1-19; I K 11 26-31, 14 1-6, 12 21-24, 21 1-24). They cherished the nomadic ideal (I K 17 1, 19 1-13; II K 1 8; Zec 13 4 f.). They rejected individual wealth (I K 13 7 f.; II K 5 5, 15 f., 20-27; cf. Mic 3 11; Am 7 12-14), and lived in societies where they seem to have endeavored to restore the primitive communism of the desert (I S 19 13 f., 22 f., 20 1; II K 2 3, 5, 15 f., 4 38-44, 6 1-3, 9 1). They were the prototypes of the Essenes, of John the Baptist, and of Christian Ebionism.

The efforts of all these schools left little impression on Heb. society. Communism was possible in a primitive society where the consciousness of tribal unity was highly developed, but it was impossible in a complex civilization where individualism had come to prevail. These little brotherhoods continued to exist, but the nation as a whole made no attempt to return to the communism of the desert.

VII. NON-COMMUNISTIC SOLUTIONS OF THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

39. The Priests. The priests show no sympathy with nomadic life, and no desire to return to communal ownership of land, or other public utilities. Instead of this, their program is wise legislation which will check the evils of the capitalistic system. (1) They forbid theft of real estate (Dt 19 14a, 23 24, f. 27 17; Ex 22 5 f.); (2) theft of personal property (Ex 20 15; Dt 5 19; Lv 19 11 a, 13 a; Ex 21 33-36, 22 1-4, 10-15; Lv 24 18). (3) They guard the buyer against the rapacity of the seller (Dt 25 13-16; Lv 19 11b, 35 f.). (4) They guard the employee against the injustice of the employer (Dt 24 14 f.; Lv 19 13 b.). (5) They guard the principal against fraud on the part of the agent (Ex 22 7-9). (6) They protect the debtor against the creditor (Ex 22 25 f.; Dt 23 19 f., 24 6, 10-13; Lv 25 35-37; Ex 21 2-11; Dt 15 1-18; Lv 25 39-43, 46-54; Dt 19 14, 27 17; Lv 25 23-28).

(7) They prohibit the abuse of judicial and of executive functions in rulers (Ex 22 22-24, 23 3, 6-8; Dt 1 17, 16 19, 24 17, 28 19, 25; Lv 19 14-16, 32). (8) They condemn the luxury of the rich (Dt 17 16-20). (9) They provide for the relief of poverty (Ex 23 10 f.; Dt 14 29, 24 19-22, 26 11 f.; Lv 19 9 f., 23 22, 25 2-7, 14, 20-22). (See LAW; JUSTICE; and CRIMES AND PUNISHMENT).

40. The Wise Men. The wise men, like the priests, show no sympathy with the nomadic ideal, and propose no return to the communism of the desert. They assume private ownership of property as an established fact, and they regard wealth as a blessing and poverty as a curse (Pr 10 15, 22, 12 9, 13 8, 14 4, 20, 16 26, 18 11, 23, 19 4-7, 22 7, 27 7). Their method of solving the social problem is education. They believe that men are rational beings; and that if they can be got to see the folly of certain kinds of conduct, they will refrain from them. Accordingly, they set themselves to point out the dangers of unethical conduct. (1) They show the peril of overestimating the value of wealth. Rich and poor are alike in the sight of God (Pr 22 2, 29 13). Wealth is easily lost (23 5, 27 24). Righteousness is better than riches (11 4, 28, 13 7, 15 16, 16 8, 19 1, 22, 22 1, 28 6, 11). Love is better than wealth (15 17, 17 1). (2) They show the folly of seeking to get rich quickly (20 21, 23 4 f., 28 20 f., 25), and declare that ill-gotten wealth brings only misery (10 2 f., 27-30, 11 16-21, 12 2 f., 13 11, 23, 14 26 f., 15 8-10, 25-26). (3) They condemn theft (29 24), false weights and measures (11 1, 16 11, 20 10, 23), corners in grain (11 26). They demand truth in business dealings (12 17-22, 20 14, 17, 21 6, 26 23-26, 28), and in matters of trust (13 17, 20 8, 25 13, 19). They condemn the taking of interest, and the foreclosing of mortgages (22 28 = 24 10 f., 28 8), and all exploiting of the poor (14 31, 17 5, 22 16, 22 f., 28 3). (4) They exhort rulers to be just (16 12, 17 7, 15, 26, 18 5, 20 8, 26, 28, 24 24-26, 25 2-7, 28 15 f., 21, 29 4, 12, 14, 25), and not to take bribes (15 27, 17 8, 23, 18 16). (5) They warn against the drunkenness and gluttony of the rich (20 1, 21 17, 25 20 f., 29 f., 23 30-35, 25 16, 28 7). (6) They teach the duty of relieving poverty (11 24 f., 14 21, 19 17, 21 13, 26, 22 9, 24 11 f., 28 29, 29 7).

41. The Prophets. The prophets seem to show more sympathy with the nomadic ideal than do the priests and the wise men. They praise the days of the wandering in the desert as the ideal time in the national history (Hos 2 7 b., 15 b., 9 10; Jer 2 2-3); but this is not because of the communism that then existed, but because then Israel was loyal to J'. They predict a return to nomadic conditions (Hos 2 3, 6, 7, 9-15, 12 9; Is 5 5 f., 9 f., 17; 6 11-13, 7 15, 21-25, 32 13 f.; Mic 1 6, 3 12, 5 10-11); but this is not regarded as a blessing, but as a punishment for national sins. In their picture of the golden age that is coming there is no trace of the communism that characterizes Plato's ideal state and the theories of the Essenes. Private ownership of real and of personal property is to continue, as it has in the past: 'They shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree.' There is no evidence that the writing prophets shared in the nomadic ideals of the earlier prophets. Nor did the prophets agree with the priests in believing in the efficacy of legislation. They saw that good laws require good men to make and to keep them, and that the best of laws are a dead letter, if the moral sense of the community does not approve them. The prophets differ from the wise men in their lack of confidence in the reasonableness of human nature. They see that ethical instruction does good in the case of people whose minds are made up to follow the wise and the right, but that it is worthless in the case of those whose main purpose in life is evil. They perceive that they must go deeper than the intellect, if human nature is to be changed; they must reach the conscience, and work a radical revolution in character.

The prophets' solution of the social problem is individual experience of a holy God. (1) Each of them had an inaugural vision, analogous to the Christian experience of conversion, through which he came to know God as the supreme reality of life (Am 7 1-9, 8 1-9 4; Hos chs. 1-3; Is ch. 6; Mic 3 8; Jer ch. 1; Ezk chs. 1-3). (2) Through these experiences they learned that the essence of J''s nature is righteousness (Am 2 6 f., 3 2, 10-12, 4 1-3, 5 5, 10-12; Is 5 16, 6 3, 5, 7, 10 22, 28 17; Mic 6 5, 7 9; Zeph 3 5a; Jer 9 24b). (3) J'' demands righteousness of men (Am 5 14 f.; Hos 11 12; Mic 6 8). (4) He does not require sacrifices and holy days (Am 4 4 f., 5 21-25; Hos 6 8, 8 13; Is 1 11-17, 22 1-14; Mic 6 6-8; Jer 6 20, 7 21-22). (5) The nation is not bringing J'' the righteousness that He requires, but is full of social injustice (Am 2 6; Hos 4 1, 6 7, 7 1 f., 13, 8 12; Is 9 4 f., 10, 21 f., 3 8 f., 5 2, 4, 7, 18, 20, 6 5; Mic 1 5, 3 8; Jer 2 21 f.). (6) Therefore punishment is inevitable. The rising Assyrian empire shall engulf Israel along with the other little nations of W. Asia (Am 2 6, 13-16, 3 2, 11-15; Hos 1 1-4, 9, 2 9-13, 3 4; Is 1 24-31, 2 10-3 26, 5 5-30, 6 11-13; Mic 1 2-7, 3 12). (7) Out of the catastrophe a remnant shall survive, and it shall repent and become the basis of a new and better nation (Hos 2 7, 14-17, 5 15-6 3; Is 7 3, 10 20 f., 17 7, 33 14). (8) Then the golden age shall come, when oppression, injustice, and strife shall cease, 'for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of J'' as the waters cover the sea' (Is 1 25-27, 9 7, 11 3-5, 28 16 f., 29 18-21, 32 1-8, 16; Jer 31 31-34, 32 39-40; Ezk 11 18-20, 36 25-27). This religious experience the prophets sought to reproduce in others, in the confidence that only thus could the social problem find a radical solution.

VIII. THE POSTEXILIC PERIOD.

42. Loss of National Life. The Babylonian exile (586 B.C.) brought the national life of Israel to an end. The Jews were gradually scattered throughout the ancient world, and became a religion rather than a nation. The feeble remnant that lingered in Palestine was ruled successively by Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome; and never attained independence, except for a short time under the Hasmonean priest-kings. The problem of this period was the return of the exiles and the restoration of nationality, rather than the reformation of inner social conditions.

43. Decline of Ethical Religion. In this period the priests lost their function as ethical lawgivers, and became merely performers of the ritual. The Priestly Code, which was formulated in Babylonia about 500 B.C. and was promulgated a century later in Palestine by Ezra, is lacking in ethical teaching, and concerns itself entirely with the correct ritual. The ancient teaching function of the priests was now assumed by the scribes, whose aims were to gather the traditions of preexilic practise, to observe them, and to teach others to keep them (Ezr 7 10).

The prophets of the postexilic period also lost their ethical message. After the fall of Jerusalem Ezekiel ceased to preach repentance, and concerned himself with the restoration of Judah. In chs. 40-48 he gave a purely ritual code for the use of the restored Temple. Second Isaiah also (Is 40-55) dropped ethical preaching, and proclaimed only the return from exile. Zechariah's and Haggai's message was, 'Build the Temple, and J'' will return to you with favor.' Malachi had one echo of the old ethical message (3 6), but his main interests were the bringing of the right sort of sacrifices, and the prevention of marriages with Gentile women. Third Isaiah (Is chs. 56-66) has a number of ethical passages (56 1, 10-12, 58 6 f., 59 2-8, 61 8, 64 5-7), but these are offset by more numerous passages in which he emphasizes the importance of the Temple, sacrifice, and fasting. Soon after 500 B.C. prophecy died out, because it no longer had an ethical message; and its place was taken by apocalyptic, which concerned itself mainly with the establishment of a Jewish world-empire, and the destruction of Israel's enemies.

The wisdom school survived in this period, and produced the Books of Job, Ecclesiastes, Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon, Pirke Abboth, and the later additions to Proverbs. These throw new light on the problems of suffering and of immortality, but they add nothing to the social ethics of the older parts of Proverbs. The later tendency is to identify Wisdom with the Law, and the wise men with the scribes.

It appears, accordingly, that the postexilic period shows no social progress beyond the preexilic period, and that its literature makes no contributions to the solution of the social problems of preexilic times.

44. John the Baptist and Jesus. John the Baptist and Jesus represent a revival of the ethical message of the preexilic prophets. Both came proclaiming, 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of God is at hand.' Like the prophets, Jesus believed that the world could not be saved by a return to communism, or by any other change in material conditions. Like them, He held that neither legislation nor education could solve the problem, because they could not change human nature. His method of solving the social problem was the prophets' method—a change in human nature through personal experience of God. He brought a revelation of the universal fatherhood of God, and a new power to become sons of God. He believed that, when men through faith in Him had been born anew, then they would act toward God as true children, would treat all men as their brothers, and would strive to realize their own highest possibilities as the children of God. Then the kingdom of God would have come, when God's will was done on earth as it is done in Heaven.

ISUAH, is'yu-a. See ISHVAH.

ISUI, is-yu-ai. See ISHVAH.

ITALIAN BAND. See AUGUSTAN BAND.

ITALY: The classical, as it is the modern, name of the European region of which Rome is the center and capital. It is referred to in four N T passages: (1) In Ac 18 2, as the country from which Aquila had come with his wife Priscilla, because of the edict of Claudius expelling all Jews from Rome (see CLAUDIUS). (2) In Ac 27 1, as the destination of the company of prisoners, sent from Syria, under charge of the centurion Julius, of which prisoners Paul was one (see PATRI. § 16 f.). (3) In He 13 24, as the country where resided the Christian brethren who sent greetings to the readers of the Epistle (for another view, see HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE, § 5). (4) In Ac 10 1, as the country that gave its name to the legion stationed at Cæsarea, of which Cornelius was the centurion (see AUGUSTAN BAND).

ITCH. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5 (9).

ITHAI, iſh'a-ai or ai'ſhē. See ITTAI.

ITHAMAR, iſh'a-mār (יִתְחָמָר, 'ithāmār): The youngest son of Aaron and, in late priestly circles, considered the head of one of the two main priestly lines (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2, 4, 4 28 ff., etc.; I Ch 24 3-6; Ezr 8 2). See also PRIESTHOOD, § 10.

ITHIEL, iſh'i-el (יִתְיֵל, 'ithi'el): 1. A Benjamite (Neh 11 7). 2. A word of uncertain significance in Pr 30 1. The rendering of the RVmg. altho widely adopted, is not certain.

ITHLAH, iſh'la (יִתְלָה, yithlāh, Jethlah AV): A town in the old Danite territory (Jos 19 42). Site unknown.

ITHMAH, iſh'ma (יִתְמָה, yithmāh): A Moabite, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 46).

ITHNAN, iſh'nan (יִתְנָן, yithnān): A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 23). Site unknown.

ITHRA, iſh'ra. See JETHER.

ITHRAN, iſh'ran (יִתְרָן, yithrān), 'eminent': 1. The ancestral head of a Horite clan (Gn 36 26; I Ch 1 41). 2. The head of an Asherite family (I Ch 7 37), probably the same as 'Jether' in ver. 38.

ITHREAM, iſh'rū-ām (יִתְרֵאִם, yithr'ām): A son of David (II S 3 5; I Ch 3 3).

ITHRITE, iſh-raiſ (יִתְרִי, yithrī): 1. The designation of a family of Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 53). 2. Two of David's heroes, Ira and Gareb, are called Ithrites (II S 23 38; I Ch 11 40), perhaps = Jattirites, i.e., from Jattir (q.v.).

ITTAH-KAZIN, it'tā-kē'zin. See ETH-KAZIN.

ITTAI, it'tā-ai, it'ē, or it-tē'ai (יִתָּאי, 'ittai; perhaps from יָתָה, 'ēth, 'with,' 'companionable'): 1. A Philistine of Gath, who shortly before Absalom's rebellion had become one of David's captains, and who remained loyal to David, accompanying him in his flight (II S 15 19 ff.). He was made captain of one-third of David's forces (II S 18 2 ff.). 2. A son of Ribai from Gibeah of Benjamin, one of David's heroes (II S 23 29 = Ithai [I Ch 11 31]). C. S. T.

ITURÆA. ai'tu-rī'a or it'yu- (Ἰτουραία): A district to the NE. of Palestine, beyond the Jordan, in the neighborhood of Jebel Hauran. The name, derived from Itur (Gn 25 15), is thought to mean 'country of the mountaineers.' The Ituræans were reckoned among the 'sons' of Ishmael (Gn 25 15), or desert tribes of N. Arabia; Strabo says they were mixed with Arabs, along with whom they inhabited the mountainous region. In agreement therewith are the inscriptions of the Hauran region, which cover the 1st to the 6th cent. and contain Arabic names of gods and men. The Ituræans were seminomads, warlike border-men, and noted archers. For a long period there was no defined territory called I., the ethnic name (Ituræans) alone being used until the 4th cent. A.D. (In Lk 3 1 the word is an adjective.) I. overlapped Trachonitis, and even shifted beyond Trachonitis to the Beḳā'. An independent kingdom of I. is often mentioned in Maccabean times, after its conquest (105 B.C.) by Aristobulus I, who partially annexed it to Judea. This bordered on, and at one time included, Galilee, and centered in the Anti-Lebanon region (Abilene). Its king, Ptolemæus, resided at Chalcis and harried the whole region until he was crushed by Pompey (66 B.C.), from whom he bought immunity at the price of 1,000 talents. He reigned from about 85 to 40 B.C., and was succeeded by his son Lysanias I, who was executed by Antony, 36 B.C. Antony gave the tetrarchy to Cleopatra (36 B.C.), who leased it to Zenodorus, but as Zenodorus assisted the Arabs in their raids in Trachonitis, the leased tetrarchy was cut up, and part of it (Trachonitis) bestowed on Herod the Great by Augustus (23 B.C.). Zenodorus died in 20 B.C., when Augustus gave the rest of his possessions (tetrarchy of Lysanias I) to Herod. After Herod's death (4 B.C.) it passed to his son Philip, who held it till his death in 34 A.D. In 37 A.D. Caligula gave the two tetrarchies to Agrippa I, with the title of king, and in 40 A.D. added thereto the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas. Agrippa I was confirmed in its possession by Claudius (41 A.D.), who also gave him the whole kingdom of his grandfather Herod. On his death the tetrarchy was incorporated into the Provincia Syria, and administered by procurators. But in 53 A.D. Claudius conferred on Agrippa II the tetrarchy of Philip and that of Lysanias I (Abilene), and they were held by him till his death in 100 A.D. In the reign of Tiberius, as is clear from an inscription found at Abila, Abilene was severed from the kingdom of Chalcis (that of Lysanias I). The tetrarch of this separate Abilene was a Lysanias II, and the name of Lysanias continued to cling to the place (Lk 3 1 is correct). J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

IVAH, ai'va. See IVVAH.

IVORY (יָשָׁן, shenhabbim, 'elephant's tooth,' or simply יָשָׁן, shēn, 'tooth'; ἐλεφαντινός, Rev 18 12): Ivory was brought to Palestine both by ship (I K 10 22) and by caravan (Ezk 27 15). It was a type of richness and beauty (Song 5 14; cf. 7 4). Solomon's throne was of ivory overlaid with gold (I K 10 18), and we read also of benches (Ezk 27 6), beds (Am 6 4), and houses (I K 22 39; Ps 45 8; Am 3 15) which were apparently decorated with ivory inlays. L. G. L.—E. E. N.

IVVAH, iv'va (יִוְוָה, iwwāh, Ivah AV): A city probably in Syria and conquered by Sargon as would be inferred from II K 18 34, 19 13, and Is 37 13. From this city colonists were brought to the conquered cities of Israel in Samaria, if Avvah (יִוְוָה, awwāh, II K 17 24) is the same place.

C. S. T.

IYE-ABARIM, ai''ye-ab'a-rim (יְיֶעֱבָרִים, iyē'ābhārīm, 'iyim of the further regions'—namely the highlands of Moab; Ije-abarim AV): A station of Israel on the E. border of Moab (Nu 21 11, 33 44), the same as Iyim (33 45, Iim AV). It is called Iyim of 'the further regions,' to distinguish it from Iyim in S. Judah. C. S. T.

IYIM, ai'yim (Iim AV). See IYE-ABARIM.

IYYAR, i-yār': The second month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

IZHAR, iz'hār (יִזְחָר, yitshār), 'he shines,' or 'oil': 1. The ancestral head of one of the great subdivisions of the Kohathite Levites, the Izharites (Ex 6 18; Nu 3 19, etc.). 2. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 7, Jezoar AV).

IZLIAH, iz-lai'a (יִזְלִיָּה, yizlī'āh, Jezliah AV): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 18).

IZRAHIAH, iz'ra-hai'a (יִזְרָחִיָּה, yizrahīyāh), 'J' is risen' or 'shines': 1. The ancestral head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 3). 2. A leader of the singers at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12 42, where the form is Jezrahiah).

IZRAHITE, iz'ra-hait, יִזְרָחִי, yizrahī: The gentile of Shamhuth (I Ch 27 8). Perhaps the same as 'Zerahite' (ver. 11), but, possibly, a copyist's mistake. See SHAMHUTH. E. E. N.

IZRI, iz'rai (יִזְרִי, yitsrī): A Levite, the leader of the fourth course of musicians (I Ch 25 11, Zeri in ver. 3).

IZZIAH, iz-zai'a (יִזְזִיָּה, yizzīyāh, Jeziah AV): One of the 'sons of Parosh,' who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 25).

J

JAAKAN, jē'a-kan (יָאָקָן, ya'āqān): An Edomite clan (I Ch 1 42; Akan in Gn 36 27). The 'wells (Beeroth) of the sons of Jaakan' are mentioned in Dt 10 6 as a station on the wilderness journey. Their exact location is unknown. E. E. N.

JAAKOBAB, jē'a-kō'ba (יָאָקֹבָב, ya'āqōbbāh): The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 36).

JAALA, ja-ē'la (יָאָלָא, ya'ālā), JAALAH, ja-ē'la (יָאָלָה, ya'ālāh): The ancestral head of a subdivision of 'sons of Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 56 = Neh 7 58).

JAALAM, ja-ē'lām. See JALAM.

JAANAI, jē'a-nai or nē. See JANAI.

JAARE-OREGIM, jē'a-rī-ēr'e-jim (יָאָרֵי אֲרֵגִים, ya'rē 'ārēghīm): Evidently a textual corruption in II S 21 19 for yā'ir, Jair, which appears in the parallel passage (I Ch 20 5). The small rēsh in ya'rē (see Hebrew text) indicates that there was inaccurate copying, while 'ōrēghīm, 'weavers,' has arisen through a scribe's error in repeating the word at the end of the verse. See ELHANAN. A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

JAARESHIAH, jē'a-re-shai'a (יָאָרֵשִׁיָּה, ya'āresh-yāh, Jaresiah AV): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 27).

JAASIEL, ja-ē'si-el (יָאָסִיֵּל, ya'āsī'ēl) 'God does': One of David's heroes, called a Mezobaite, ('of Zobah?') (I Ch 11 47, Jasiel AV). Perhaps the same person is referred to in I Ch 27 21.

JAASU, jē'a-sū (יָאָסוּ, ya'āsūw, Jaasau AV): One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 37).

JAAZANIAH, jē-az''e-nai'a (יָאָזָנִיָּה, ya'āzanyāh, ya'āzanyāh), 'J' heareth': 1. A Maacathite, captain of some of the guerrillas left in Judah by Nebuchadrezzar (II K 25 23 = Jezaniah, Jer 40 8), who came to give allegiance to Gedaliah the governor. 2. One of the Rechabites whom Jeremiah tempted with wine (Jer 35 3 f.) as an example to Judah. 3. The son of Shaphan, one of seventy elders who were seen in a vision to offer incense (Ezk 8 11) to idols. 4. Son of Azzur, one of the princes against whose counsel Jeremiah was commanded to prophesy (Ezk 11 1). C. S. T.

JAAZER, jē'a-zer. See JAZER.

JAAZIAH, jē'a-zai'a (יֶזְיָהּ, ya'āziyāhū): 'J' strengthens': A Merarite Levite (I Ch 24 26 f.).

JAAZIEL, jā-ē'zī-el (יָאֲזִיֵּל, ya'āzī'ēl): 'God strengthens': A Temple musician (I Ch 15 18; 'Azriel' in ver. 20 and Jeiel in 16 5).

JABAL, jē'bāl (יָבֵל, yābhāl): A son of Lamech (Gn 4 20). With his 'brothers,' Jubal and Tubal, he is counted as one of the originators of early civilization. The Heb. word for 'ram' is very similar to 'Jabal' but this may have nothing to do with the statement that he was the 'father' of tent-dwellers and cattle-owners, i.e., of the nomads. 'Jubal,' also, is similar to yōbhāl, 'ram,' or 'ram's horn,' a musical instrument. The original source of this genealogical list is too remote to determine what it actually signified. E. E. N.

JABOK, jab'bək (יַבֹּק, yabbōq): A river E. of the Jordan, named as the N. limit of the domain of Sihon, King of the Amorites (Nu 21 24; Jos 12 2; Jg 11 22). It also furnished the N. boundary-line of Ammon (Dt 2 37, 3 16). Its sources are in the vicinity of Rabbath Ammon, whence it flows NW. by N., approaching Gerasa and turning W., and emptying into the Jordan about 25 m. N. of the Dead Sea. It was the scene of Jacob's struggle with the angel (Gn 32 22 f.). Its modern name, derived from its clear blue aspect, is Nahr ez-Zerka (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 534 f.). Map I, F, G, 6-8. A. C. Z.

JABESH, jē'bešh (יַבֶּשֶׁת, yābhēsh), 'dry': The father of Shallum (II K 15 10).

JABESH-GILEAD, jē'bešh-gil'i-ad (יַבֶּשֶׁת גִּלְעָד, yābhēsh gil'ād), 'the dry [place] of Gilead' (or Jabesh alone, as in I S 11 1 f., 31 11 f.; I Ch 10 12): A town of Gilead, mentioned in the late midrash in Jg 21 5 f. as destroyed and depopulated by the Israelites, four hundred maidens alone being saved to provide wives for the Benjamites. A more historical notice records the rescue of the town from the Ammonites by Saul and the loyalty of the inhabitants to his memory (I S 11 1 f., 31 11 f.; II S 2 4-7). According to Eusebius, it lay 6 Roman miles S. of Pella, the modern Faḥil. The name survives in the Wādī Yābis, which rises in the mountains of Gilead and enters the Jordan Valley 10 m. below Beth-shean. Merrill rejects Robinson's earlier identification with ed-Deir (Map IV, H 2), and finds Jabesh in the massive ruins at Miryamim, a few miles NW. of ed-Deir (Am. PEFSt, 1877, p. 80 f.). See also F. Buhl, Geographie, 1896, p. 258, with bibliography. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

JABEZ, jē'bez (יָבֵז, ya'bēz): I. The head of a family of Judah, who had large possessions (I Ch 4 9 f.). His name is connected with the Heb. root 'ātsabh, 'sorrow.' Curtis, ICC, ad loc., suggests that Zobeab (I Ch 4 8) should be read Jabez, as otherwise Jabez v. 9 is abruptly introduced. II. A place in Judah inhabited by the scribes (I Ch 2 55). They are represented as descendants of the Calebite Hur, and related to the Kenites and Rechabites. C. S. T.

JABIN, jē'bin (יָבִין, yābhīn), 'intelligent': 1. A king of Hazor, who headed an unsuccessful alliance against the Israelites under Joshua (Jos 11 1). Hazor was captured and Jabin put to death (Jos 11 10). 2. Another king of Hazor, probably of the same dynasty. He oppressed Israel during the period of Judges. His army led by Sisera was defeated by Barak (Jg 4 2 f.). Possibly the two accounts refer to the same person. A. C. Z.

JABNEEL, jab'nī-el (יַבְנֵיֵל, yabhn'ēl), 'a god causeth to build': 1. The westernmost town on the N. border of Judah (Jos 15 11), captured from the Philistines by Uzziah (II Ch 26 6), where it is called Jabneh. It is mentioned in the Apocrypha as Jemnaan (Jth 2 28) and, frequently, as Jamnia (I Mac 4 15; II Mac 12 8, etc.). In the time of the crusades J. had become Ibelin. It is now Yebnah, a village near the left bank of the Nahr Rābīn, on the road from Gaza to Jaffa. The site contains ruins dating from the crusades, while the remains of the ancient harbor lie near the mouth of the river, 5 m. to the N.W. Map I, B 8. Like most border cities, J. suffered severely from the vicissitudes of war. At the beginning of the Christian era, however, the city was large and prosperous. It was especially famous for its rabbinical learning, and, according to Jewish tradition, the Sanhedrin escaped hither before the destruction of Jerusalem. Here the canon of the O T was established, and the official text of the Sopherim adopted (O T TEXT, § 5). J. was later the seat of a Christian bishopric, but was then rapidly declining in wealth and population. See G. A. Smith, HGHL (1898), p. 193 f.; F. Buhl, Geographie (1896), p. 188, with bibliography. 2. A place of uncertain location, mentioned only as a part of the northern boundary of Naphtali (Jos 19 33). It is called Kaphar Yama in the Talmud, and may be the ruin Yemma, between Mt. Tabor and the Sea of Galilee. Map IV, E 7.

JACAN, jē'kən (יָכָן, ya'kān, Jachan AV): The head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 13).

JACHIN, jē'kin (יָכִין, yākhīn), 'He establishes': I. 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Simeon (Gn 46 10; Jarib in I Ch 4 24), the Jachinites (Nu 26 12). 2. The ancestral head of the twenty-first course of priests (I Ch 24 12), whose representatives are referred to in I Ch 9 10; Neh 11 10. II. One of the brazen pillars of the Temple. See TEMPLE, § 14.

JACINTH, jē'sinḡ. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

JACKAL. See PALESTINE, § 24.

JACOB, jē'kəb (יַעֲקֹב, ya'āqōbh), 'he grasps the heel,' a meaning attested by Hos 12 3: It has frequently been suggested that originally the name was Jacob-el; cf. the Babylonian Ya'qub-ēlu, as well as the Egyptian form Y'qb'r (= יַעֲקֹבְרִי), on the name-list of Palestinian towns conquered by Thutmose III, and the scarabs of a Hyksos king with a like name.

1. The Patriarch. The story of Jacob is found in Gn chs. 25-50, tho from ch. 37 on Joseph is the chief figure. In Gn the word, found mostly in passages assigned to JE, refers to the individual, but in the subsequent literature it is generally a synonym for the nation. In Gn the P sections relating to Jacob are very short.

The stream of the patriarchal epos runs turbid and broken where it is concerned with Jacob. The pure and lofty unworldliness of Abraham and the quiet innocence of Isaac are entirely wanting in Jacob. Eddies and shoals, treacherous cross-currents and the deep and mighty movements of a great river, hastening to the sea, such are the varying phases of his life. To many the formal division of the narrative between J and E (see GENESIS, § 4) may seem mechanical and forced; but it should be remembered that whoever the writer and whatever the age of our present document, the material and events come down from a remote age. The author of Gn was but the collector of traditions that must have originated in different localities and have had a varied history. Gunkel, in his commentary on Gn, has discerned several groups of traditions, which he designates as the Jacob-Esau, the Jacob-Laban, and the Canaan stories. Each of these has a somewhat composite structure, and each revolves about certain religious centers. Bethel is preeminent in one, Shechem in another, Penuel in a third. In part, these stories explain the origin of religious symbols and sanctuaries. As originally told, they were more concerned with the successes and exploits of the national ancestor than with the moral elements. It is manifest to all that the cleverness of Jacob is more emphasized than his moral obliquity. The way Esau despised his birthright is more the subject of reprobation than the cold-hearted craft with which Jacob took advantage of him.

The question much discussed at the present day is, How large a part do tribal memories play in the patriarchal narratives? It is evident that tribes often figure as sons of an individual (Gn 25 1 ff.), and amalgamations of clans and migrations might easily be associated with the biography of a great ancestor. It seems, however, too artificial and fanciful to account for everything upon the theory of a personalized tribe. There must be at least a starting-point and a germ in a true historic existence. Yet personification is a frequent figure of speech, and no one could for an instant assume that wherever Jacob is mentioned a man is meant. The beauty of many a prophetic oracle is due to bold personification. When we ask, however, what elements of the story we should connect with the man Jacob, we are at once involved in uncertainty. Probably the picture is so complex that satisfactory division is impossible. The birth of the twins (Gn 25 24 ff.) is told as if it were a genuine family history, but the oracle (Gn 25 23) relates to nations. The bargaining over the mess of pottage is realistic and personal, but Gn 25 30 recalls the red rocks of Esau's territory. Rebekah's incitement of Jacob to impersonate Esau is a very human touch, but the blessing (Gn 27 27 ff.) covers the history of races and the tragedy of supremacy won at the sword's point. The vision at Bethel has all the pathos and intensity of a personal experience; the tender love for Rachel, lasting through the long years of a strenuous life, has little significance as a racial memory; but the names of the sons and the mimetic etymologies appear like the efforts of a later age to account for groupings, antipathies, and characteristics which antedated the historians' memory. So, too, the struggles with Laban and the nomadic movements in Palestine are a bewildering mixture of personal and racial elements.

Originally the stories were doubtless told for the sake of entertainment, but the prophetic purpose was edification. The picturesque element was retained and perhaps even heightened, but the prophetic writer of Gn did not care so much to tell how a shrine became sacred as to magnify the moral or spiritual significance of an event transacted there. We find that the question asked during the celebration of the Passover (Ex 12 26) became the occasion for the recital of the old story of deliverance; undoubtedly the question thus embalmed in that rite was the type of many asked when worshipers gathered at pilgrimage shrines. Curiosity might first have dictated the inquiry, but curiosity became the occasion for teaching and the answer the vehicle for a lesson or a doctrine. So when asked about the pillar at Bethel or the sanctity of Penuel, an answer must be forthcoming. The method at first might have been crude, but in the form we now possess the product is unrivaled.

Archeologically it is of intense interest to trace the long past movements of the Jacob-clans and their struggle for a foothold in Canaan, to see them seizing upon advantage whenever a foe was off guard, to observe their appropriation of spots where they first caught glimpses of desirable pasture-lands, or when by a vigil they prepared themselves for a critical encounter; but religiously it is of greater value to see these events as they are interpreted in their bearing upon individual human life. Jacob is preeminently the eponymous patriarch; in him his children's strength and weakness are mirrored. His name is theirs and each can receive reproof and take courage from his experience. Hosea, in words which run off into obscurity, discerns this microcosmic analogy (Hos 12 4, 12). In Is chs. 40-66 the name is used in tones of tenderness, recognizing the constancy of a relation founded on a covenant.

Not all the bitter fruits of deceit and trickery are described in Jacob's history, but we are told how a lonely man on a barren hillside found God, how in a strange struggle on the borders of the wilderness he discerned dimly the possibilities of greater rewards. He won them at the cost of pain and deformity, yet through the struggle he gained a strength and majesty which make his figure loom up great to human in every line. The story tells of a man whose aspirations and successes were along the low plane of the material, but who gained step by step a larger outlook and came into a fuller life, whose triumph in the dark hour before the dawn at Penuel was real and lasting.

The modern tendency is to see in the two names Jacob and Israel two distinct national elements, the reminiscence of a time when a foreign wave of immigration swept into Palestine and was amalgamated with earlier indigenous inhabitants. It may well be that the distant memory of such events survives in the dual name, but it is far from the purpose of the writer of Gn to tell such a story. The man who wrestled at Peniel went into the contest as Jacob—'he who grasps the heel'—seeking a material victory; when he comes out he is Israel—'he who perseveres with God'—and has won by his persistence and his steady courage where before his work had been underhanded and ignoble.

Outside of Gn the name is usually national. The locality to which it seems originally to have been confined was the central region—the mountains of Ephraim. This is confirmed by the occurrence of 'Jacob-el' in the Thutmose list, where it is associated with other towns in this geographical area, and also by the fact of the strong centralization of the people's life in the territory of the Northern Kingdom. Bethel and Shechem were the spots around which religious memories clustered most tenaciously. The father and the best-loved son, with little Benjamin lying to the S., were the great eponyms of the richest portion of the land. It was in the Exile that the deep consciousness of race unity asserted itself and the men of Judah, who were longing for the homeland, could be addressed as 'Jacob my servant,' whom a career of suffering and trial was to fit for a mission to the world and the inheritance of long-deferred promises.

JACOB'S WELL: A well mentioned only in Jn 4 5-12, the general locality of which, however, is easily determined by Gn 33 19 and Jos 24 32 as near Shechem. A constant tradition has identified it with the well near Mt. Gerizim, where the fruitful plain of Mukhnah turns into the Shechem valley. To the Samaritans, who considered themselves the true descendants of Jacob, the whole region about Shechem was full of sacred associations, all more or less clearly reflected in the woman's conversation

The Mouth of Jacob's Well (Present Condition).

(cf. Gn 33 19, 48 22 [cf. RVmg.]; Dt 27 4, 12 f.; Jos 8 30 ff., 24 32). On the SW. of the well rises Mt. Gerizim, the sacred mountain of the Samaritans (4 20), on which were the ruins of their Temple, destroyed by the Jews 128 B.C., and across the valley is Mt. Ebal, on the outer slope of which lies

'Askar, the Sychar (q.v.) of the gospel story, a little over half a mile N. of the well. At the well the main road from the S. forks, one branch going W. to Shechem, 2 m. distant, and then to Galilee by way of Samaria and Jenin, the other N. past 'Askar.

Jacob's Well (Sectional View).

The existence of Jacob's well in this finely watered region has occasioned difficulty. It was dug probably by the patriarch for his household and cattle, in order to prevent trouble with his neighbors already in possession of other sources of supply. The well, tho choked with rubbish, is still over 75 ft. deep. It is really a cistern 7½ ft. in diameter, walled in toward the mouth, which was below the surface, and supplied evidently by infiltration from the rainfall. So it was different from the 'living water' of a perennial spring, which the woman understood Jesus to be speaking of. At present the well is usually dry from about the end of May until the autumn rains. The quality of the water is particularly good, being much superior to that of the brooks and springs from the limestone hills. The Greek Church, which now owns the surrounding plot of ground, has built a chapel over the well.

JADA, jē'də (יָדָא, yādhā'), 'He knows': A Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 28, 32).

JADAU, jā-dē'u or jē'dō. See IDDO

JADDUA, jad-diū'a (יָדְדֻא, yaddūa'), 'known': 1. A chief of the postexilic community (Neh 10 21). 2. Chief priest c. 350-300 B.C. The list in Neh 12 11, 22 shows that he belonged to the third generation after Nehemiah. He is, therefore, to be identified with the Jaddua of Josephus (Ant. XI, 7 2, 8 4-7), the contemporary of Alexander the Great. The story in Josephus about the means taken by Jaddua to appease the wrath of Alexander as he was marching against Jerusalem is improbable, conflicting with other data of Alexander's campaign. Its historical kernel may be only this, that Alexander was, on the whole, favorably disposed toward the Jews.

JADON, jē'den (יָדֹן, yādhōn): A man from Meronoth (site unknown), who assisted at the building of the wall (Neh 3 7).

JAEL, jē'el (יָעֵל, yā'ēl), 'mountain-goat': The wife of Heber, the Kenite. According to Jg 4 20 f., when Sisera was defeated at the battle of Esdraelon and his army scattered, he fled to the tent of Heber, trusting in the peace existing between him and his own master Jabin. Jael received him with the appearance of the most cordial kindness, but when such suspicions as he might have had as to her possible attitude had been disarmed, and he had fallen asleep, she put him to death in a most revolting manner by driving a tent-pin through his temple. In the Song of Deborah (Jg 5 24-27) she is represented as striking Sisera down with a 'workman's hammer' (probably the hammer used in driving the tent-pins), in the very act of drinking the sour milk she had given him ('At her feet he bowed, he fell: Where he bowed, there he fell down dead'). Of the two versions the poetical is probably the more accurate. Sisera could not have claimed the rights of hospitality from Heber, the Kenite, who was in alliance with the Israelites. It is, moreover, easier to understand Jael's renown for courage if she struck down a man, as the poem has it, than if she took advantage of him when asleep.

JAGUR, jē'gūr (יָגוּר, yāghūr): A town in the extreme S. of Judah near Edom (Jos 15 21). Site unknown.

JAH, jā (יָה, yāh): A shortened form for 'Jehovah' (Yahweh), sometimes used alone, especially in poetry (Ex 15 2, mg.), and sometimes in compound proper names. See JEHOVAH.

JAHATH, jē'haṭh (יָהָת, yāhath): 1. A clan of Judah, living near Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 4 2; cf. 2 52-54). 2. The ancestral head of a subdivision of the Gershonite Levites (I Ch 6 20, 43, 23 10, 11). 3. A Kohathite Levite (I Ch 24 22). 4. A Merarite Levite (II Ch 34 12).

JAHAZ, jē'haz, JAHAZA, jā-hē'zə or jē'ha-zə, JAHAZAH, jā-hē'za or jē'ha-za, JAHAZAH, jā'za (יָחָז יָחָז, yahats, yahtsāh): A city of the Amorite kingdom of Sihon, where Sihon was slain by Israel (Nu 21 23; Dt 2 32; Jg 11 20 f.). It was S. of Hesbon, on the main road along the table-land (Jer 48 21). It belonged to Reuben (Jos 13 18) and was given to the Levites, children of Merari (Jos 21 36; I Ch 6 78 [63]). The Mesha inscription states that it was fortified by Israel, but captured by Mesha and added to Dibon. Not identified.

JAHAZIAH, jē'ha-zai'a. See JAHAZIAH.

JAHAZIEL, jā-hē'zi-el (יָחָזִיֵּל, yahāzī'el), 'El sees': 1. One of the thirty heroes who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 4). 2. A priest and trumpeter for service before the Ark (I Ch 16 6). 3. A son of Hebron, a Kohathite (I Ch 23 19, 24 23). 4. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, who encouraged Jehoshaphat and Judah against Moab (II Ch 20 14 f.). 5. A Jew in Babylon, whose son returned with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezr 8 5).

C. S. T.

JAHDAL, jā'dai or jā'dē (יָהְדַּל, yāhday): A Calebite (I Ch 2 47).

JAHDIEL, jā'di-el (יָהְדִּיֵּל, yahdī'el), 'God gives joy': The ancestral head of a Manassite clan E. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 24).

JAHDOL, jā'do (יָהְדֹל, yahdō): A Gadite (I Ch 5 14).

JAHEEL, jā'li-el (יָהֵלֵל, yahlē'el): The ancestral head of a clan of Zebulun (Gn 46 14), the Jahleelites (Nu 26 26).

JAHEMAI, jā-mā-ai or jā'mē (יָהֵמַי, yahmay): A clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2).

JAHAZAH, jā'za. See JAHAZ.

JAHEEL, jā'zi-el (יָהֵזֵל, yahts'el), 'God divides': The ancestral head of a clan of Naphtali (Gn 46 24; Jahziel in I Ch 7 13), the Jahzeelites (Nu 26 48).

JAHEZIAH, jā-zī'ya (יָהֵזִיָּה, yahzī'yāh), 'J' sees.' AV Jahaziah (Ezr 10 15): Son of Tikvah; according to RV, one of four to oppose Ezra in removing the Jews to put away their foreign wives. RVmg. and AV represent him as one who helped Ezra.

C. S. T.

JAHERAH, jā'zi-ra (יָהֵרָה, yahzērāh): A priest (I Ch 9 12), also called Ahzai (Neh 11 13, Ahasai AV).

JAHEZIEL, jā'zi-el. See JAHEEL.

JAIR, jē'ir (יָיִר, yā'ir), 'he enlightens' (cf. Jairus, Mk 5 22; Lk 8 41): 1. A descendant of Manasseh, whom the dominant tradition made the conqueror of Amorite territory N. of the Jabbok, and the eponymous hero of the Havvoth-jair ('tent-villages of Jair'), whose number varies in the different accounts from 23 to 60 (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14; Jos 13 30; I K 4 13; I Ch 2 22). The date of this conquest is quite uncertain; recent commentators make it post-Mosaic, from the similarity of the narrative to Jg ch. 1, and because of the probable identity with the Gileadite judge Jair (Jg 10 3-5), who is said to have given his name to a group of tent-villages. I Ch 2 22 makes Jair a Machirite on his mother's side and a Judahite on his father's, which suggests that a clan of mixed lineage from the west established itself by conquest in Gilead. Ira, the Jairite (II S 20 26), was probably a descendant of Jair. 2. The father of Mordecai (Est 2 5). 3. (יָאִיר, yā'ir), 'he arouses': The father of Elhanan, the Bethlehemite (I Ch 20 5). A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

JAIRITE jē'ir-ait. See JAIR.

JAIRUS, jā-ai'rus (Ἰαίριος, according to Nestle Heb. yā'ir, 'he will awaken'): A synagog ruler (μαρτυρ Mt 9 18) who besought Jesus to come and restore his daughter to health. There are slight variations in the Gospel traditions. In the Mt version no name is given. In Mk 5 22 D omits the name. Its insertion in most MSS. of Mk may be due to effort to give vividness to the narrative. Cf. the somewhat similar case of Bartimæus (q.v.). J. M. T.

JAKEH, jē'ke (יָכֵחַ, yāqeh): The father of Agur (Pr 30 1). See AGUR.

JAKIM, jē'kim (יָכִים, yāqim), 'He raises': 1. The ancestral head of the twelfth course of priests (I Ch 24 12). 2. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 19).

JALAM, jē'lām (יָלָם, yā'lām, Jaalam AV): The ancestral head of a clan of Edom (Gn 36 5, 14, 18; I Ch 1 35).

JALON, jē'lān (יָלֹן, yālōn): A descendant of Caleb (I Ch 4 17). Probably a place-name.

JAMBRES, jam'briz. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAMES (Ἰάκωβος): The name of three prominent N T persons. 1. The son of Zebedee (Mk 1 19) and Salome (cf. Mt 27 56 with Mk 15 40), and the elder brother of John (before whom he is always named in the Gospels, excepting Lk 9 28; cf. Ac 1 13), and, with him, one of the Apostles (Mk 3 17; Mt 10 2; Lk 6 14), sometimes called 'the greater' to distinguish him from 'James the less.' On the supposition that Salome was a sister of Mary (cf. the names given in Mk 15 40 and Mt 27 56 with the statement of Jn 19 25; but see SALOME), these brothers were the cousins of Jesus. It would thus be due possibly to this relationship that Salome requested of Jesus special honors for them in the expected Messianic kingdom (Mt 20 20 f. See JOHN THE APOSTLE). His home was probably in Capernaum, and from the reference to hired servants in the employ of Zebedee (Mk 1 20) and the mention of the fact that Salome was one of the women who ministered of their substance to Jesus and His company (cf. Mk 15 41 with Lk 8 3), the family was in all likelihood one of means. The passage Jn 1 35-46 leaves it uncertain whether J. was a disciple of the Baptist. He is first mentioned in the call of the four fishermen at the Sea of Galilee (Mk 1 16-20 and ||s). From his prominent position in the Apostolic lists (Mk 3 16 f.; Mt 10 2; Lk 6 14; Ac 1 13) and his place in the group of Jesus' three intimate disciples (Mk 5 37, 9 2, 14 33; cf. also 13 3), he was with his brother evidently one of the foremost of those chosen to the Master's service. The name 'Boanerges' (q.v.), referred to in the list of Apostles in Mk as given the brothers by Jesus (Mk 3 17), does not need to be understood as given at the time of their appointment as Apostles; it is likely rather to have been the result of later events, such as that recorded in Lk 9 52-54.

Tho no mention is made of J. in the life of the Church until the record of his martyrdom at the hands of Herod Agrippa (44 A.D., Ac 12 2), the fact that in order to curry favor with the Pharisaic party he was selected along with Peter (who was cast into prison, ver. 3) as the first object of official cruelty shows, probably, that he had not ceased to be prominent among the Apostles and that, beyond his brother, he had retained his bold aggressiveness of character. In this he evidently shared with Peter and it marked them both for attack. The statements in the Hypotyposes of Clement of Alexandria and the Apostolica Historia of the Psuedo-Abdias regarding his death and those regarding his patron sainthood in the Church of Spain are wholly apocryphal.

2. The son of Alphæus, one of the Apostles (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 15; Ac 1 13), possibly a brother of Matthew (cf. Mk 3 18 with 2 14). Beyond this, nothing certain is told us about him in the N T. If Alphæus=Clopas (Jn 19 25), then he was 'James the less,' his mother was Mary, and his brother Josès (Mk 15 40); but the identity of these names is most questionable (but see ALPHÆUS). The further supposition (on the basis of Jn 19 25) that his mother was a sister of Mary and that he was thus the cousin of Jesus is not warranted, in view of Mk 15 40 and Mt 27 56. (See above, under 1.)

3. The brother of the Lord (Gal 1 19), a later son of Joseph and Mary (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD), in patristic literature called 'the Just.' The brothers of Jesus did not believe in Him throughout His ministry (Jn 7 5), J.'s conversion being due apparently to a special appearance of Jesus to him after the Resurrection (I Co 15 7). The N T references to him are thus practically confined to the period after the Ascension. He is first mentioned as remaining with his brothers in Jerusalem, in company with his mother, the faithful women, and the Apostles, awaiting the promised gift of the Spirit (Ac 1 13 f.). At the time of Paul's first visit to Jerusalem, he was already of prominence in the Church (Gal 1 19); at the time of Peter's imprisonment, his importance had not decreased (Ac 12 17); while at the time of Jerusalem Council he is referred to, with Peter and John, as one of the 'pillars' of the Jewish Christian discipleship in general (Gal 2 9). In fact, the Acts account of the Council shows him to have been the authoritative head of the Jerusalem community (15 13, 19), his appointment to this position being due to his relationship to Jesus, of Whom, as younger brother, he would, according to Hebrew custom, be the natural representative (Harnack, Constitution and Law of the Church, pp. 31-34). This explains the statement in Gal 2 12, where James is referred to, not as the reason for the influence upon Peter of these representatives of the conservative element in Jerusalem, but as the official source of their mission. This also explains his prominence in the closing incident of Paul's active mission life (Ac 21 17-26) as well as the reference to him in Gal 1 19 as one of the Apostles (see APOSTLE). From I Co 9 5 it has been inferred that J. was married. As to his authorship of the Epistle which bears his name, see the following article.

It is clear from J.'s utterances at the Council (Ac 15 13-21) and on the occasion of Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (Ac 21 18-25) that J.'s position regarding the observance of the Law as conditioned by the admission to the Church of uncircumcised Gentile converts is to be identified with that of the party of piety (the οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς, Ac 11 2; Gal 2 12) rather than with that of the party of bigotry (the τινες τῶν ἀπὸ τῆς αἰρέσεως τῶν Φαρισαίων οἱ περιτευκότες, Ac 15 5). The latter held salvation through Christ to be impossible apart from the full observance of the Mosaic Law; so that they were opposed to the admission of Gentile converts without circumcision (Ac 15 1). The former were willing to accept these converts into all the privileges of the spiritual covenant people of God without submission to Jewish rites, but felt that the Jewish Christians should continue piously to observe the Law for themselves, even tho (inconsistently) this made impossible full fraternization with the Gentile element in the Church. From this point of view the recognition of Paul and Barnabas as fellow workers with the Jerusalem Apostles (Gal 2 9 f.) was for James a perfectly sincere act. On this basis also the pressure exerted at Antioch by the representatives of this piety party on Peter (Gal 2 12), as the acknowledged leader of this element in the Church, was easy to understand and not without justification. Its unfortunate results were due to the spirit in which Peter yielded to it, rather than to its character as a demand. (See GALATIANS EPISTLE TO THE, § 3.)

According to Josephus (Ant. XX, 9 1), the Sadducees took advantage of the interval between the death of Festus and the coming of Albinus, in the year 62 A.D., through the high priest Annas, to summon J. before the Sanhedrin on the charge of breaking the sacred laws. Tho J. was found guilty and stoned, the indignation of the better class of the Jews at the high-handed action of the high priest was such that, on their complaint to Agrippa and Albinus, Annas was deposed from his position. This account may be accepted as in general representing the facts in the case, tho there is no reason to believe that the Pharisees did not unite with the Sadducees in the action, or that the protest to the king and the governor was motivated by any personal sympathy or regard for J. The account of his death given by Hegesippus (Eus. HE, II, 23) is legendary—possibly derived from the apocryphal Ascents of James; while the tradition of his election to be first bishop of Jerusalem (Clem. Alex. in Eus. HE, II, 1) and his exalted position of rulership over the Church at large (Clementine Recognitions, 1 68) are to be resolved into the N T statements of his leadership in the early Church given above.

To James has been assigned the apocryphal Protevangelium Jacobi, as well as the Jerusalem (or Antioch) Liturgy—the earliest service of the Eastern Church—and the Ascents of James, unknown except through description by Epiphanius (Panarion, 30, 16, 25).

JAMES, EPISTLE OF. One of the N T writings assigned to the group of the so called Catholic Epistles (q.v.).

1. Form and Contents. It is peculiar in its form, lacking all closing salutations and having the briefest greeting of any N T Epistle; while its material is not developed argumentatively, but arranged as separate topics in a sequence whose connections it is not always easy to discover. In its contents, tho not possessing the literary quality of Hebrews, it is, like that Epistle, of a distinctively homiletic character, being composed almost wholly of exhortations and warnings bearing upon practical religious living.

It begins with a treatment of the testings involved in the Christian life (1 2-27), urging a joyful view of them, based on their influence in proving and perfecting character (1 2-4) adding an exhortation to prayer, if need is felt of spiritual wisdom in their enduring (1 5-8), and to a cheerful acceptance of the changes of fortune which they may involve, because of the blessings to character which must result (1 9-12). This is followed by a warning as to a right view of the sources of temptation as distinct from testing (1 13-15). The readers are then exhorted to a proper hearing and a practical doing of the word, based on the essential principles involved in their spiritual attitude toward it (1 16-27).

What follows to the close of the Epistle (2 1-5 20) may possibly be considered in general a treatment of the relationships involved in the Christian life, tho the thought which leads from one exhortation and warning to the other is not always clearly discernible. There is, first, a warning against a partiality toward the rich, based on God's honoring of the poor, their oppression by the rich, and the fundamental law of neighborly love (2 1-13). Possibly because of the dead orthodoxy involved in such a tendency to be influenced by the externals of life, the author is led to an instruction as to the true relation of faith and works (2 14-26), and possibly because of the element of doctrine involved in this instruction, he is brought to a warning against the multiplication of mere doctrine teachers (3 1), the peculiar danger of whose vocation lies in the fact that the teacher's work is especially open to the abuse of speech (3 2), this being followed naturally by a general presentation of the importance, depravity, and untamableness of the tongue, which is illustrated by various examples (3 3-12). Over against such possibilities the author exhorts his readers to meekness and peaceableness (3 13-18). To this he adds a reminder that the source of factions and wrangings among themselves is their own unspiritual living (4 1-6), against which he enters a strong and urgent plea (4 7-10). There then follows an exhortation against the evidently related fault of uncharitable judgment, usurping, as it does, the place of God, as Judge and Interpreter of the Law (4 11-13). Possibly because of the idea of haughtiness in their thinking, the author proceeds to a condemnation of those presumptuous plans for the future which ignore the uncertainty of life (4 13-17). As such plans seem to be made largely by the self-complacent rich, this judgment upon them leads him to a pronouncement of wo upon this class of the Church's people, because of their miserly oppression of the poor and their self-indulgent luxury (5 1-6). This brings him to the general thought of patience, which is presented from various points of view through the remainder of the Epistle (5 7-20). There is, first, an exhortation to the patient endurance needed under such oppression, to which endurance the sufferers are encouraged by the nearness of the coming of the Lord, having an inspiring example in the O T prophets and patriarchs (5 7-11); then there is a warning against that mark of impatience which is given by swearing (5 12), in contrast with which the readers are urged to turn to prayer in trouble (suggesting possibly the grace of praise in joy and the wisdom of availing themselves of the healing help of the Church in sickness), 5 13-15; in general, they are urged to enter into the fellowship of the Christian brotherhood in all their spiritual experience, from which habit of fellowship comes the possibility of large service and rich blessing to one another (5 16-20).

2. Relation of Epistle to Apostolic Age. From this review of the contents of the Epistle the question naturally arises as to the conditions in the Church of which it is the product. Are they the conditions of an early or of a later period in the Apostolic Age, or of a period before or after that age? It is on this question that the chief debate regarding the Epistle has centered.

Obviously, the general topics of the spiritual significance of trials, the obligations of religious living, the temptations which come upon, and the help which is open to, the poor oppressed by the rich belong to every age of the Church, and nothing can be determined from a cursory reading of the Epistle as to when it was written. It is only from a more detailed study of the contents that any definite conclusions can be drawn.

2a. Readers. First, then, as to the readers of the Epistle: The letter was sent to Jewish Christians. The claim that it was originally a pre-Christian writing intended only for Jews (Spitta, Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur des Urchristentums, ii, 1896: (1) ignores the fact that the readers are not termed in the address (1 1) the twelve tribes of Israel (as in Mt 19 28; Lk 22 30; Rev 21 12; cf. also Ac 26 7 and the Protevangelium Jacobi, § 1) which in the Dispersion of foreign lands looked to Palestine as their native country and to Jerusalem as their Holy City. The absence of this distinctive national term shows that they are considered rather as the twelve tribes which in the Dispersion of an earthly sojourn looked for an abiding country and city above—a favorite N T designation of Christians from the Jewish point of view (cf. He 11 13, 13 14; I P 1 1, 17, 2 11). (2) It fails also to recognize not only that the purpose of the letter is to urge its readers against such faults as those to which distinctively Jewish converts would naturally be tempted—for, after all, such faults might belong to Jews outside the Church—but that its Jewish message is cast in a specifically Christian mold (e.g., the idea of a Divine birth, through the word of truth, 1 18, 21 [cf. Jn. 1 13; I P 1 23]; a perfect moral law which is a law of liberty, 1 25, 2 12 [cf. Jn 8 32, 36; Gal 2 4]; an heirship in the kingdom of God through faith, 2 5 [cf. He 11 13, 39 f.]; the contemplation of suffering and trial as a source of exultant joy, 1 2, 9-12 [cf. Mt 5 10-12; I P 4 14]).

2b. Date. A letter, however, addressed to Jewish Christians covering such an extent of country as is implied in this idea of the Dispersion necessitates an early period in the Apostolic Age, when the Christian Church was exclusively Jewish and communities of this exclusively Jewish character had spread beyond Palestine, as far as Damascus (Ac 9 2, 26 10-12), and Antioch (Ac 11 20-23), and Phenicia (Ac 15 3). In this letter there is no allusion to the presence of Gentiles in the Church; there is no reference to sins of idolatry, or mention of the relation of masters and slaves. The readers' surroundings within as well as without the Christian brotherhood are Jewish (cf. 2 2, 6 f., 8 f.). This inference as to the early date of the letter is confirmed by the reference to the Parousia in 5 7-9, where the situation obviously is not one in which the coming of the Lord has been so long delayed that the expectation of it has been given up or questioned (as in II P 3 3-9), but one in which it is still a vital hope to be summoned to one's aid in the midst of trial and suffering (as in II Th 1 4-10; cf. also Mt 24 33). It is further strengthened by the unorganized condition of the church life disclosed in 3 1, where the instruction referred to is not carried on by special persons appointed to this function (as the διδάσκαλοι of I Co 12 28 and Eph 4 11), but indiscriminately by individual members of the community (more as the διδάσκαλοι of Ac 13 1 and Ro 12 7). The elders referred to in 5 14 correspond to the πρεσβύτεροι of the primitive communities, whose functions were general and who were the natural officials (cf. the Churches of Paul's first mission, Ac 14 23; cf. also I Th 5 12 and see ELDERS). In fact, the healing with oil which they accomplished is mentioned but once elsewhere in the N T (Mk 6 13), and is more of a forerunner of the later Charismata than a sequence from them.

2c. Situation. It is clear, however, that the religious condition to which the letter was addressed, while in agreement with an undeveloped period of the Church's life, at the same time discloses a falling away from the religious enthusiasm of the first years of the Church's living, due not so much to oppressive measures from outside (2 6 f.) as to the loss of vital conceptions of religious duty and privilege on the part of the readers themselves (1 26 f., 2 1, 12, etc.) (a) There was a tendency to underestimate the spiritual value of the changes of fortune which came to them (1 9-11) and so not only to yield to the influences of the world in their attitude toward the rich (2 1-4, 9), but to adopt the spirit of the world in their own business (4 2-4, 13-17, 5 1-6) and to lose the sense of brotherly relations among themselves (1 27, 2 8-12, 4 1, 11 f., 5 9). (b) There was, deeper than this, a tendency to forget the vital connection between creed and conduct—to think that faith was enough without its realization in life (15-8, 214-26, 316 f.)—in fact, to revert to their old Jewish confession of monotheism (2 19) and hearing of the Scriptures (1 22-25), as all that was required of them, or to concentrate religion along certain agreeable lines, ignoring those which were not to their liking (2 8-13). In consequence of this lifeless orthodoxy they were possessed with an inordinate zeal to go about as teachers, imposing upon one another their own ideas (3 1), falling into a spirit of dogmatism and proselytism ruinous to peace among themselves (1 19 f., 3 2-16). (c) These tendencies were accompanied naturally by a loss of the sense of their spiritual privileges as Children of God (1 5, 12, 17 f., 2 5, 4 6-8a, 10, 5 7 f., 13-17, 19 f.). In brief, their religious life had lost its spiritual fervor and was becoming hardened into the spirit of the world around them. That such a condition could have developed soon in the Jewish Christian communities is evident from the experience of the Jerusalem Church itself (Ac 5 1-11, 6 1). The enthusiasm of Pentecost did not become a permanent grace. The new religion was young; it did not have behind it the steadying force of accumulated habit, and the same human nature was present that in these early days manifested itself with such greed of gold in the Church of Samaria (Ac 8 9-24) and later with such bitterness of faction in the Church of Corinth (I Co 1 10 ff.). To meet such a situation this letter might have been written even before the conversion of Saul (35 A.D.). At all events, the treatment of faith and works in 2 14-26 makes clear that it must have been written before the great discussion aroused by Paul's first mission journey—i.e., before 49 A.D. For this treatment presupposes no such controversy. And if it be claimed that deadening of faith resulted later from the abuse of Paul's Gospel and this letter simply misunderstands Paul's position, it must be remembered that no letter written to Jewish Christian churches after the Council in Jerusalem could have treated the relation of faith and works this way; for on the basis of the issue before this Council the argument which would have been directed against the Jewish Christian was not that faith but works was overemphasized. As a matter of fact, the discussion in this second chapter is in no discord with the position of Paul, while the argument it presents is against that fossilizing of faith which came from a reversion to Jewish formalism and not against that distortion of it which came from an abuse of Gentile liberty. James is not talking about faith as the act of entrance upon the Christian life, but as the habit of grace within the Christian life. It is the perfecting rather than the beginning of Christian experience which is before his mind (cf. 2 22 and with this cf. such references to faith as in 1 3, 6, 21, 5, which lead up to this passage). This is a situation, then, earlier than that brought about by Paul, and assigns the Epistle to a date as early at least as 48 A.D.

3. Author. With the Jewish Christian character of the readers determined, and the early date of the Epistle assured, the problem of authorship practically solves itself. The James of the address designates himself not as an apostle, but 'a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' He can not be, therefore, the son of Zebedee, nor the son of Alphaeus, but must be the son of Joseph, the brother of the Lord. Notice the familiarity with Jesus' teachings in (a) the condemnation of 'hearers only' (1 22, 25; Mt 7 26; Jn 13 17), of critics (4 11; Mt 7 1-5), of worldliness (1 10, 2 5 f., etc.; Mt 6 19, 24; Lk 6 24), the attitude toward prayer (1 5, etc.; Mt 7 7; Mk 11 23), poverty (2 6; Lk 6 20), humility (4 10; Mt 23 12), the idea of the tree and its fruits (3 11; M 7 18)—see Salmond, N T Introd.<sup>3</sup>, p. 455—a familiarity that would agree with a personal knowledge of Jesus' ideas, even without a formal discipleship during his Ministry. Also note the resemblance to the speech and the circular letter attributed to James in Ac 15. As head of the Jerusalem Church he would not need to assert, either in the address or the text of the letter, his relationship to the Lord, while it would be well within his rights and privileges to send a pastoral letter to the Jewish Christian communities of Syria and Phenicia, and it would be but natural that he should endeavor to meet their failing spiritual life with such exhortations and warnings as this Epistle presents. To claim that the address is the work of a 2d-cent. forger is to underestimate the temptation which must have come to one who desired to pose as this revered authority in the early Church so to describe himself in the address or so to refer to himself in the body of the letter as to leave no possible doubt regarding his identity. It is of no significance that the James of the Protevangelium does not clearly distinguish himself. That document was a gospel and the N T Gospels bear no names. Our document was an epistle and, as a rule, the N T Epistles are clearly identified in the authority of their authorships. Obviously in a 2d-cent. forged epistle the assuming of an authorship from Apostolic times was solely for the sake of its authority and called for an unmistakableness of identity. The theory that the Epistle is a tract by an obscure or unknown James in the 2d, or even in the 1st cent., hardly comports with its being addressed to such an extensive circle of readers.

4. Relation to Other N T Writings. The determination of the Epistle's early date makes clear that being thus the earliest N T writing it is in no literary dependence upon any of the writings in the Canon. As to the dependence of the other writings upon it, it is questionable whether a letter sent to Jewish Christian communities in Syria and Phenicia and dealing, not with a propaganda of the works of the Law, but with the danger of making faith merely formal, would present itself to Paul (cf. Smith in JBLE) as in any way affecting the great debate into which his Gospel had brought him, if indeed he knew of the existence of the letter. If it came before him at all, it would be in his later controversy with the hyper-Gentile movement, dealt with especially in Romans (q.v.), in which freedom from the ceremonial law was exaggerated into irresponsibility to the moral law, and in this debate Paul would have had to show his agreement with James and not his opposition to him, or his modification of his views. The Judaizers, as Mayor contends (Epistle of St. James, pp. xc ff.), may have misinterpreted James's views in support of their own position, but if Paul had been acquainted with his letter, he would have pointed out the misinterpretation, as well as combated the false views. This he nowhere does. It is barely possible that James may have been used in other Epistles, tho such use would be confined to I Peter (cf. Mayor, pp. xcvi-ciii).

5. Canonicity. It belongs to the group of the Antilegomena, being recognized by Eusebius as one of the disputed books, tho accepted by himself. It is omitted from some of the early lists (e.g., the Muratorian Canon), but included in others (e.g., the Peshitto). It is fully quoted as Scripture first by Origen. Its brief form, its unassertive authorship, and the fact that it was originally sent to an exclusive Jewish circle in the East may largely account for its tardy recognition as part of the literature of the Apostolic Age.

JAMIN, jē'min (יָמִין, yāmīn), 'the right hand (or side)': 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Simeon (Gn 46 10, etc.), the Jaminites (Nu 26 12). 2. The ancestral head of a family of Judah (I Ch 2 27). 3. A priest (Neh 8 7).

JAMLECH, jam'lek (יָמֶלֶךְ, yamlēkh), 'He grants dominion': The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 34).

JANAI, jē'nā-ai or jē'nē (יָנַי, ya'nay, Jaanai AV): The head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 12).

JANIM, jan'im (יָנִים, yānīm, Janum AV): A city of Judah (Jos 15 53). Site uncertain, but see Map II, E 2.

JANNAI, jan'nā-ai (יָנַאי, Janna AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 24).

JANNES, Jan'niz, AND JAMBRES, jam'briz: Names given in II Ti 3 8 to the Egyptian miracle-workers who 'withstood Moses' (Ex 7 11 f.). They are probably of Egyptian etymology. The Targum of Jonathan inserts them in Ex 7 11. An apocryphal document under the title of Jannes and Mambres (variant form for Jambres also found in the Targumic literature), is mentioned by Origen (in Matt. Comm. 117), and by other early Church writers (Abroisiasier, Hilary, etc.). But it is doubtful whether this apocryphal work is the one upon which II Ti 3 8 is based. All efforts to reach further into the origin of these names, or to reduce them into some sort of mythical emblems, are for the present to be regarded as mere guesses. A. C. Z.

JANOAH, ja-nō'a (יָנוֹחַ, yānōah): 1. A town of Naphtali, depopulated by Tiglath-pileser in 734 B.C. (II K 15 29). Map IV, C 4. This site, however, seems too far W. 2. A town on the border of Ephraim (Jos 16 6, 7, Janohah AV). Map III, G 4.

JANUM, jē-num. See JANIM.

JAPHETH, jē'feth. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 12, 13.

JAPHIA, ja-fai'a (יָפְיָא, yāphīa): I. 1. A king of Lachish, conquered and slain by Joshua (Jos 10 3). 2. A son of David (II S 5 16; I Ch 3 1, 14). II. A town on the border of Zebulun (Jos 19 12). Map IV, C 7.

JAPHLET, jaf'let (יָפֶלֶט, yaphlēt), 'He delivers': I. The ancestral head of a clan of Asher (I Ch 7 32 f.). II. A town on the SW. border of Ephraim, the home of the Japhletites (Jos 16 3, Japhleti AV). Site unknown.

JAPHO, jē'fo. See JOPPA.

JAR: The ARV rendering of (1) kadh (I K 17 12-16, 18 33, 'barrel' AV). See BARREL. (2) nēbhēl, ARV mg., Jer 13 12, 48 12. See BOTTLE.

JARAH, jē'ra (יָרָא, ya'rāh): One of Saul's descendants (I Ch 9 42), called Jehoaddah in I Ch 8 36.

JAREB, jē'reb or jar'eb (יָרֵב, yārēbh): A king of Assyria (Hos 5 13, 10 6). As this name does not occur in cuneiform literature, the identity of the monarch to whom it refers is in dispute. Sayce's conjecture, which makes it the natal name of Sargon, has met with no favor. The Heb. yārēbh is commonly connected with the root rīb = 'to strive,' and variously translated, 'the warlike king,' 'King Combat,' etc. The Heb. with a different division of consonants may also be rendered 'the great king.' Most scholars identify Jareb with Tiglath-pileser III. J. A. K.

JARED, jē'red or jar'ed (יָרֵד, yeredh): The father of Enoch (Gn 5 15, etc.); cf. 'Irad' in the parallel list in 4 18.

JAREZIAH, jar'ī-soi'a. See JAARESHIAH.

JARHA, jār'hā (יָרְחָא, yarhā): An Egyptian slave, who married into the Jerahmeelite family of Sheshan, and became the head of a long line of descendants (I Ch 2 34 f.). It is probable that unions of clans, not individuals, are referred to; possibly a N. Arabian, mulsrī (not mitsrī, 'Egyptian'), clan with a Jerahmeelite one. E. E. N.

JARIB, jē'rib or jar'ib (יָרִיב, yārīb), 'He strives': 1. See JACHIN, I, 1. 2. A teacher in Ezra's company (Ezr 8 16). 3. A priest (Ezr 10 18).

JARMUTH, jār'muth (יָרְמוּת, yarmūth): 1. A Canaanite royal city assigned to Judah (Jos 10 3 f., 15 35). Jerome (Onom. 266, 132) locates a Jermucha 10 Rom. m. from Eleutheropolis, on the way to Jerusalem, and as this corresponds with the modern Khirbet el Yarmūk on the one side, and the Biblical location of Jarmuth on the other, the identification is regarded as satisfactory. Map II, D 1. 2. A Levitical city in Issachar (Jos 21 29; in Jos 19 21 called Remeth, and in I Ch 6 73 Ramoth), probably the modern Er-Rāme. Map III, F 2. A. C. Z.

JAROA, ja-rō'a (יָרֹא, yārōah): A Gadite (I Ch 5 14).

JASHAR, jash'ar, BOOK OF (סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר, šēpher hayyāshār), 'book of the upright,' Book of Jasher AV: An ancient collection of poetical compositions celebrating the earlier heroes and conquests of Israel. It is twice expressly quoted in the O T (Jos 10 13; II S 1 18). A third quotation is probably to be found in I K 8 12 f. This passage is not given as a quotation in the Heb. text, but in the LXX. it appears as ver. 53b, with the addition: 'Is this not written in the Book of the Song?' which appears to be the rendering of an original Heb. text šēpher hashshūr, easily detected as a corruption of šēpher hayyāshār. The book was put together after the time of David, and before the 8th cent. B.C., and Jashar, 'the upright,' may be an ideal name for Israel. A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

JASHEN, jē'shen or jash'en (יָשֵׁן, yāshēn): The 'sons of Jashen,' in the list of David's heroes (II S 23 32), stand immediately after 'Elihaba the Shaalbonite.' The parallel text (I Ch 11 34) reads 'sons of Hashem the Gizonite.' The Heb. word for 'sons of' is similar to the ending '-bonite,' and it was probably by a scribal error that 'sons of' crept into the text of II S in the place of the 'Gizonite' of Ch. The text of Ch is probably correct, except that 'Gizonite' should be emended to 'Gunite' (see Gr. of Lucian's text of LXX. and cf. Nu 26 48).

E. E. N.

JASHOBEAM, jā-shō'bī-əm or jā-shōb'ī-əm (יָשׁוֹבֵעַם, yāshobh'ām), 'the people will return': The son of Zabdiel the Hachmonite, the chief of David's thirty mighty men (I Ch 11 11, 12 6, 27 2), the correct reading for Josheb-basshebeth (II S 23 8 RV), who lifted up his spear against 300 (800) at one time, and was commander of that division (24,000 men) of the army which was on duty the first month of the year. The Gr. versions seem to have read Ishbosheth (= Eshbaal). C. S. T.

JASHUB, jā'shub or jāsh'ub (יָשׁוּב, yāshūbh), 'he returns': 1. The ancestral head of one of the great clans of Issachar, the Jashubites (Nu 26 24; I Ch 7 1; called Iob [Job AV] in Gn 46 13). 2. One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 29).

JASHUBI-LEHEM, jā-shū'bai or jāsh'yu bai-lī'-hem (יָשׁוּבִי לֶחֶם, yāshūbhī lehem): A word of very irregular formation and therefore probably not a proper name (I Ch 4 22). It may be the survival of 'and they returned to Bethlehem.' E. E. N.

JASON, jā'sən ('Ιάσον): A common Gr. name used by the Jews as an equivalent for Joshua or Jesus. 1. Jason of Cyrene, who wrote, not earlier than 160 B.C., a history in five books of the wars for Jewish freedom under the Maccabees, of which an epitome is given in II Macc. It is less reliable than I Mac. 2. Jason, second son of Simon II, and brother of Onias III. About 175 B.C. Jason secured the high-priesthood by bribery from Antiochus Epiphanes, with whom he cooperated eagerly in his endeavor to Hellenize the Jewish nation, introducing Greek practises, which were an abomination to the patriotic party. Being supplanted three years later by Menelaus, he escaped after many adventures to Sparta and 'perished in a strange land.' See II Mac 3 7-5 10. 3. Jason of Thessalonica (Ac 17 5-9), Paul's host, and for that reason attacked by the Jews—possibly the same as the Jason of Ro 16 21, a kinsman of Paul, i.e., a fellow Jew.

R. A. F.—E. E. N.

JASPER. See STONES, PRECIOUS, §§ 2, 3.

JATHNIEL, jāth'ni-el (יָתִנְיֵל, yathnī'el): A son of Meshelemiah (I Ch 26 2).

JATTIR, jā'tēr (יָתִיר, yattir): A city in Judah (Jos 15 48, 21 14; I S 30 27; I Ch 6 57). Map II, E 3.

JAVAN, jā'vən or jāv'an. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 3.

JAVELIN. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 1.

JAW-BONE. See LEHI.

JAZER, JAAZER, jā'zer (יָזֶר, ya'zēr): A town of the Amorites near the border of Ammon, taken by Israel (Nu 21 32) and given to Gad (Jos 13 25; II S 24 5; I Ch 26 31), who fortified it (Nu 32 35). Later it became a Levitical city (Jos 21 39; I Ch 6 81). It was in a country suited for grazing (Nu 32 1, 3) and for producing wine (Is 16 8 f.; Jer 48 32). It came into the possession of Moab (Is 16 8 f.), and was a city of the Ammonites in the time of Judas Maccabeus (I Mac 5 8). Eus. and Jer.

in the Onomasticon place it 15 m. N. of Heshbon and 8 m. W. of Philadelphia. The ruins of Khurbet Sar would correspond to this. For another identification see Map I, G 8. 'The Sea of Jazer' (Jer 48 32) seems to be a corruption of the text. C. S. T.

JAZIZ, jā'ziz ('יָזִיז, yāzīz): David's chief shepherd (I Ch 27 30).

JEALOUS. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b); DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7 (12); SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12; and God, § 1.

JEARIM, MT., jā'a-rim. Identified with Chesalon (q.v.) in Jos 15 10.

JEATHERAI, jā-ath'ī-rai (יְעָתֵרַי, y'athray, Je-aterai AV): A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 6 21; Ethni in ver. 41).

JEBERECHIAH, jā-ber'ī-kai'a (יְבֵרֶכְיָהוּ, y'bherekhyāhū), 'J' blesses': A son of Zechariah (Is 8 2).

JEBUS, jā'bus. See JERUSALEM, § 19.

JEBUSITE, jeb'u-sait (יְבוּסִי, y'bhūsī): For the Jebusites of Canaan see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. In Zech 9 7 'Jebusite' seems to mean 'Jerusalemite.' The prophecy looks forward to a time when the Philistine remnant shall be incorporated into the purified Jewish commonwealth. See JERUSALEM, § 19. E. E. N.

JECAMIAH, jek'a-mai'a. See JEKAMIAH.

JECHILIAH, jek'ī-lai'a (יְכִילְיָהוּ, y'khilyāhū), 'J' is able': The mother of King Uzziah (II Ch 26 3; Jecholia in II K 15 2).

JECHONIAS, jek'o-nai'as, JECONIAH, jek'o-nai'a. See JEHOIACHIN.

JECOLIAH, jek'o-lai'a. See JECHILIAH.

JECONIAH. See JEHOIACHIN.

JEDIAH, jā-dē'ya or jā-dai'a, the transliteration of two Heb. names: 1. (יְדִיָּה, y'dhāyāh). 'J' praises': a. A Simeonite chieftain (I Ch 4 37). b. One who helped rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 10). 2. (יְדִיָּה, y'dhā'yāh). 'J' knows': a. The ancestral head of the second course of priests (I Ch 9 10, 24 7; Ezr 2 36; Neh 7 39, 11 10, 12 6, 7, 19). b. A priest (Neh 12 21). c. A returned exile (Zech 6 10, 14).

JEDIAEL, jā-dai'a-el (יְדִיָּהֵל, y'dhā'ā'el), 'known of God': 1. The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin (I Ch 7 6 ff.). 2. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 45, 12 20). 3. A Korahite doorkeeper (I Ch 26 2).

JEDIDAH, jā-dai'da (יְדִידָה, y'dhīdāh), 'beloved': The mother of Josiah, King of Judah (II K 22 1).

JEDIDIAH, jed'ī-dai'a. See SOLOMON, § 1.

JEDUTHUN, jā-dū'thun (יְדֻתָּן, y'dhūthūn, K'thūbh of Pss 39, 62, 77 (titles); Neh 11 17; I Ch 16 33, y'dhūthūn): According to the Chronicler, the name of one of the three chief singers in the service of the Sanctuary at the time of David (I Ch 9 16, 16 38 f., 25 1 f.; II Ch 5 12, 29 14, 35 15), the same as Ethan (I Ch 6 44, 15 17, 19). It is rather the name of a postexilic musical guild (Neh 11 7) which was connected by the Chronicler with the Levites. In the titles of Pss 39 ('for' is a mistake for 'after the manner of'), 62, 77 the RV translates correctly 'after the manner of (the choir of) y'dhūthūn.'

JEEZER, jī-i'zer, JEEZERITE, jī-i'zer-ait. See ABIEZER.

JEGAR-SAHADUTHA, jī'gar-sē'hā-dū'thā (גַּרְשָׁאדּוּתָא, y'ghar sāhādūthā): The Aramaic equivalent of the Heb. gal'edh, 'heap of witness' (Gn 31 47).

JEHALLELEL, jī-hal'i-lel (יְהַלְלֵל, y'hallel'el, Jehaleleel AV), 'God praises': 1. A Calebite (I Ch 4 16). 2. A Levite (II Ch 29 12).

JEHDEIAH, je-dī'ya or jī-dai'a (יְהִדְיָהּ, yehdē-yāhū), 'J' is glad': 1. The overseer of David's asses (I Ch 27 30). 2. A Levite (I Ch 24 20).

JEHEZKEL, jī-hez'kel (יְהֵזְקֵל, y'hezqē'l, Jehezekel AV), 'God strengthens' (cf. EZEKIEL): The ancestral head of the twentieth course of priests (I Ch 24 16).

JEHIAH, jī-hai'a (יְהִיָּה, y'hīyāh), 'J' lives': A Levite doorkeeper (I Ch 15 24).

JEHIEL, jī-hai'el (יְהִיֵּל, y'hī'el), 'God lives': 1. A member of David's court (I Ch 27 32). 2. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 21 2). 3. A priest (II Ch 35 8). 4. The ancestor of a family of Gershonite Levites (I Ch 23 8, 26 21 f., here called Jehieli; 29 8). 5. The father of Obadiah (Ezr 8 9). 6. One of the 'sons of Elam' (Ezr 10 2, 26). On II Ch 29 14 see JEHUEL. 7. A priest (Ezr 10 21). 8. The name of two Levites: (1) I Ch 15 18, 20, 16 5; (2) II Ch 31 13.

JEHIELI, jī-hai'i-lai or jī'hai-i'li. See JEHIEL, 4.

JEHIZKIAH, jī'hiz-kai'a (יְהִיזְכִּיָּהּ, y'hizqīyāhū), 'J' strengthens': A chief of Ephraim under Pekah (II Ch 28 12).

JEHOADDAH, jī-hō'ad-da (Jehoadah AV). See JARAH.

JEHOADDAN, jī'ho-ad'an (יְהוֹאָדָן, y'hō'addān), and JEHOADDIN, jī'ho-ad'din, 'J' gives delight': The mother of Joash, King of Judah (II K 14 2; II Ch 25 1).

JEHOAHAZ, jī-hō'a-haz (יְהוֹאָחָז, y'hō'āhāz), 'J' lays hold': 1. The son and successor of Jehu as king of Israel (II K 10 35, 13 1-9; called Joahaz in II K 14 1) involved in unsuccessful wars with Ben-hadad II of Syria. He reigned 16 to 18 years (815-799 B.C.). 2. The third son and immediate successor of Josiah at Jerusalem (II K 23 30-34; called Joahaz in II Ch 36 2-4; apparently also called Shallum, Jer 22 11; cf. I Ch 3 15). He was raised to the throne by the people, possibly as the one among the king's sons who was identified with the anti-Egyptian policy. When Pharaoh Necho, after the battle of Megiddo (608 B.C.), became master of the kingdom of Judah, Jehoahaz was seized and carried to Riblah and thence to Egypt, where he was detained until his death. 3. The same as Ahaziah, King of Judah (II Ch 21 17, 25 23). A. C. Z.

JEHOASH, jī-hō'ash (יְהוֹאָשָׁה, y'hō'āsh, also called Joash), 'J' gives,' or 'J' is strong': 1. The son of Ahaziah, and king of Judah (II K ch. 11 f., etc.) (837-798 B.C.). He was rescued as an infant by his aunt, the wife of Jehoiaada, the chief priest of the Temple, from Athaliah's effort to annihilate the royal family. At the age of seven Jehoiaada had him proclaimed king, Athaliah being put to death. He is said to have reigned forty years, but the six years of Athaliah's usurpation may be included in this reckoning. He undertook to raise funds for the repairing of the Temple at Jerusalem, and, after some difficulty with the Temple priesthood, he succeeded. Being threatened with an invasion by Hazael, he stripped the Temple of its gold and sent it to the king of Syria as a bribe. Soon afterward, he was assassinated by a band of conspirators. 2. See JOASH, 5. 3. A son of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 4. The keeper of the oil-cellars of David (I Ch 27 28). 5. The father of Gideon (Jg 6 11). 6. A son of Ahab (I K 22 28). 7. A Judahite, son of Shelah (I Ch 4 22). 8. One of the mighty men of David (I Ch 12 3).

A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

JEHOHANAN, jī'ho-hē'nān (יְהוֹחָנָן, y'hōhānān), 'J' is gracious': 1. One of the gatekeepers of the Tabernacle in the reign of David (I Ch 26 3). 2. A captain appointed by Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 15; cf. 23 1). 3. One of the 'sons of Bebai,' who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 28). 4. A priest of the time of Jehoiaakim (Neh 12 13). 5. A priest of the time of Nehemiah (Neh 12 42). 6. A son of Eliashib (Ezr 10 6, Johanan AV). 7. A son of Tobiah (Neh 6 18, Johanan AV). A. C. Z.

JEHOIACHIN, jī-hoi'a-kin (יְהוֹיָכִן, y'hō-yākhīn, and יְיָכִין, yōyākhīn; also, by transposition of the two parts of the name, Jeconiah [Jer 24 1, 27 20; I Ch 3 16, 17] and Jechoniah [Mt 1 11, 12], (Jechonias AV), also Coniah [Jer 22 24, 28, 27 1]), 'J' appoints': The son and successor of Jehoiaakim, King of Judah. He was called to the throne at the age of eighteen (598 B.C.), and reigned three months. It was during his reign that Nebuchadrezzar, in his campaign against 'the Westland,' reached Jerusalem, besieged and captured it, took all the treasures stored up in the Temple and the king's palace, deposed J., and, together with a large retinue of leading men and artisans numbering over 10,000 carried him to Babylon. The gate of the Court of the Priests, through which Jehoiachin was led out of the Temple on this occasion, was, according to the Mishna, called the 'Gate of Jeconiah' (Middoth 2).

This deportation became commonly known as 'the captivity of Jehoiachin' (II K 25 27; Jer 52 31; Ezk 1 2), and included, besides the great number above alluded to, the mother and wives of the king. While the majority of the other captives lived in comparative freedom in the land, J. was kept in prison in Babylon during the entire reign of Nebuchadrezzar. At the end of that period, he was released by Evil-merodach (561 B.C.), restored to his royal rank, tho not returned to his kingdom in Jerusalem, and supported at the expense of the king of Babylon in royal state. According to a tradition (incorporated in Targ. Sheni, near the beginning), many prominent Jews imprisoned by Nebuchadrezzar were also liberated at the same time for the sake of J. How long after this date J. survived, the records do not state (cf. Jer 52 31-33).

A. C. Z.

JEHOIADA, jī-hei'a-dā (יְהוֹיָדָה, y'hōyādāh), 'J' knoweth': 1. The father of Benaiah, an officer of David (II S 8 18; I K 1 8 and often; I Ch 11 22 and often). He resided in Kabzeel (II S 23 20), and may have been a priest (I Ch 27 5, cf. 12 27, probably refers to the same man, unless with RVmg. we read 'chief minister' and refer it to Benaiah). In I Ch 27 34 we should probably read 'Benaiah son of Jehoiada.' 2. The high priest during the reigns of Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash (II K 12 10 [11]). Jehosheba, a sister of Ahaziah, was his wife (II Ch 22 11). He cared for Joash, the son of Ahaziah (II K 11 2; II Ch 22 11), who had been rescued from the king's mother, and after six years placed him on the throne, having brought about the death of Athaliah (II K 11 4 ff.; II Ch 23 1 ff.). He led the people to make a covenant with J' (II K 11 17), and caused the destruction of the temple of Baal (II K 11 18). J. is said (II K 12 9 f. [10 f.]) to have set up a chest beside the altar, into which was put the money that was brought into the house of J'. For the AV Jehoiada of Neh 3 6, see JOIADA. C. S. T.

JEHOIAKIM, jī-hei'a-kim (יְהוֹיָכִים, y'hōyāqīm), 'J' raises up': A son of Josiah, and king of Judah (609-597 B.C.), called before his accession Eliakim, which name Pharaoh Necho changed to Jehoiakim (II K 23 34). When his father, Josiah, died in battle against Necho; he would naturally have succeeded him, but the populace enthroned his brother Jehoahaz, possibly because he sympathized with, or even headed, the anti-Egyptian party in Judah, while Eliakim, the elder brother, favored submission to Pharaoh. Necho deposed Jehoahaz, and made Jehoiakim king. By a systematic taxation, J. now succeeded in raising the tribute imposed by the conqueror. But the peace he thus purchased from the Egyptians did not prove of long duration. Three years after this victory Nebuchadnezzar overwhelmed Necho at Carchemish, and took from Egyptian control all the territory 'from the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt' (II K 24 7). Jehoiakim was thus reduced to the condition of a tributary to Babylonia. In his internal administration, he evidently wielded a strong hand. He was selfish, unjust, forcing workmen to build for him, but not paying them their wages,—all of which brought upon him the severe denunciation of Jeremiah (cf. Jer 22 13-19). He took offense at the stern rebukes of the prophet, burned a MS. containing prophecies which had come into his possession, and attempted to seize and punish the prophet himself, but was foiled by Jeremiah's hiding himself (Jer ch. 36). In the 6th or 7th year of his reign, after three years of submission to Babylon, he rebelled. It was some years before Nebuchadnezzar undertook to march in force against him and other rebellious vassals. How he came to his end is uncertain. According to II K 24 6 he died at Jerusalem (in peace? cf. Jer 22 18 f., 36 30), but according to II Ch 36 8 f. he was deported to Babylon. A. C. Z.

JEHOIARIB, jī-hei'a-rib (יְהוֹיָרִיב, y'hōyārīb), I Ch 9 10, 24 7; יְהוֹיָרִיב, yōyārīb, Neh 11 10, 12 6, 19), 'J' contendeth': The name of one of the twenty-four classes of priests. It was counted the first in the time of David (I Ch 24 7), and the seventeenth in the time of Zerubbabel (Neh 12 6). They dwelt in Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (cf. Neh 11, 10 which should read as I Ch 9 10. See also JOIARIB. C. S. T.

JEHONADAB, jī-hen'a-dab (יְהוֹנָדָב, y'hōnādhābh, also called Jonadab), 'J' is noble': 1. A nephew of David, who planned for Ammon the sin against Tamar (II S 13 3-6). 2. The son of Rechab (II K 10 15 ff.), who organized his family into a clan characterized by their nomadic type of life and by total abstinence from wine. The strictness with which this feature of clan life was preserved was used by Jeremiah (ch. 35) as a ground of rebuke to the Israelites for their own failure to keep the commandments of J'. See RECHAB. A. C. Z.

JEHONATHAN, jī-hen'a-ṭhan. See JONATHAN.

JEHORAM, jī-hō'rām (יְהוֹרָם, y'hōrām; also called Joram), 'J' is exalted': 1. A king of Israel (851-842). He was the son of Ahab, and succeeded his brother Ahaziah (I K 1 17). His reign was noteworthy for the revolt of Mesha, King of Moab. To bring Moab back into subjection to Israel Jehoram appealed for aid to his father's old ally, Jehoshaphat, and assisted by troops furnished by Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom attacked Moab on the southern border. The allies were at first successful, but Mesha's desperate resort to the sacrifice of his first-born appears to have struck terror into the allied army (II K ch. 3, esp. ver. 27). Mesha at last succeeded in gaining his independence (see MESHA). J., assisted by Ahaziah of Judah, was also engaged in war with Hazael of Damascus. While defending Ramoth-gilead against Hazael's attack J. was wounded and, leaving the army at Ramoth-gilead, returned to Jezreel for healing. While here his nephew Ahaziah made him a visit, and both kings were surprised and slain by Jehu (q.v.). 2. A son of Jehoshaphat, King of Judah (850-843 B.C.). For the sake of cementing the alliance entered into by his father with Ahab, Jehoram married the latter's daughter Athaliah and under her influence favored the introduction of Baal-worship into Judah (II K 8 18). According to II Ch 21 4 when he succeeded his father and found himself in a strong position he slew his brothers. During his reign (849-841) Edom and Libnah revolted, the former establishing itself into a separate kingdom (II Ch 21 10). The mention of a letter written to Jehoram by Elijah (II Ch 21 12 ff.) can be regarded only as an anachronism (see ELIJAH). 3. A priest (II Ch 17 8). A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

JEHOSHABEATH, jī'ho-shab'a-ṭh (יְהוֹשָׁבֶעֱת, y'hōshabh'ath), 'J' is an oath': The daughter of King Jehoram and wife of Jehoiada the priest (II Ch 22 11), who rescued and concealed her nephew, Joash, the young son and heir of Ahaziah. In II K 11 2 she is called Jehosheba. C. S. T.

JEHOSHAPHAT, jī-hesh'a-fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, y'hōshaphāt; called also Josaphat in Mt 1 8 AV), 'J' has judged': 1. The son of Asa, King of Judah, and Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi (I K 15 24, 22 passim; II Ch 20 31). He succeeded his father on the throne and reigned twenty-five years (873-849 B.C.). He at once adopted a conciliatory policy toward the Northern Kingdom, entering into a contract with Ahab, whose daughter Athaliah he secured as the wife of his son Jehoram. He also aided Ahab in his campaign against Ben-hadad II, of Damascus (I K 22 1 ff.; II Ch 18 3 ff.). He further took part in the war of Jehoram against Mesha (q.v.) of Moab (II K 3 4), undertook an expedition into Ophir, and had a vessel (or, as in some texts, vessels, or ten vessels) built for this purpose. But as the expedition was wrecked in the neighborhood of Ezion-geber, he took this as an omen that Judah's glory should be limited to land, and abstained from further enterprises to build up the navy (I K 22 48). His attitude toward the religion of J' was one of enthusiastic adherence. According to Chronicles, both personally and through his officials, he undertook to instruct the people in the requirements of the true service of J', and did much to put an end to Asherah-worship and the high places within his territory. But his success in this regard was evidently not complete (II Ch ch. 19; cf. I K 22 43; II Ch 20 33). 2. The son of Nimshi and father of Jehu (II K 9 14). 3. The son of Ahilud and recorder under David and Solomon (II S 8 16; I K 4 3). 4. The son of Paruah and prefect in Issachar under Solomon (I K 4 17). See also JOSHAPHAT. A. C. Z.

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF. See JERUSALEM, § 5.

JEHOSHEBA, jī-hešh'ī-bə. See JEHOSEBATH.

JEHOSHUA, jī-hešh'yu-ə, JEHOSHUAH, jī-hešh'yu-ā. See JOSHUA.

JEHOVAH, jī-hō'vā (יהוה, yehōwāh, but properly יהוה, yahweh): The form 'Jehovah' is impossible, according to the strict principles of Heb. vocalization. It is due to the arbitrary transference of the vowels of 'ādōnāy, 'lord,' to the sacred name יהוה after the Jews became over-scrupulous as to the pronunciation of the Name. See NAMES, § 6. In compound personal names J', like 'El ('God'), was frequently used as a component part, nearly always as the subject to which the other part of the name forms the predicate. In such names the shortened form yō (yehō) was used at the beginning, and yāh (yāhū) at the end (y=j). In the Eng. transliteration the final syllable is often written hah. The use of the name of J' appears prominently first in the Davidic period and ultimately became very popular. See also God, § 2. E. E. N.

JEHOVAH-JIREH, -jāi're (יהוה יראה, yahweh yir'eh), 'J' will see': The name of the place where Isaac was brought to be sacrificed (Gn 22 14). In the light of the latter half of the verse it may be that the original reading was 'J' will be seen,' i.e., 'will reveal Himself.' The verse is a late addition to the earlier narrative, connecting the scene directly with the Temple mount in Jerusalem, and the proverbial expression quoted probably had reference originally to Mt. Zion. E. E. N.

JEHOVAH-NISSI, -nis'sai (יהוה ניסִי, yahweh nissi), 'J' my banner': The name of the altar erected by Moses to commemorate his victory over the Amalekites (Ex 17 15) indicative of confidence in J' as the giver of the victory.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM, shē'lem (יהוה שלום, yahweh shālōm), 'J' is peace,' i.e., 'well-disposed' (Burney): The name given to the altar erected by Gideon after receiving the encouraging message 'peace be unto thee' from the angel (Jg 6 24). This altar was probably still standing when the narrative was written.

JEHOZABAB, jī-hez'a-bad (יהוזאבאב, yehōzābābādh), 'J' gives': 1. One of the conspirators who slew Joash, King of Judah (II K 12 21). His mother was a Moabitess (II Ch 24 26). He was executed by Amaziah, son of Joash (II K 14 5), who, however, refrained from visiting the sins of father upon his children (II K 14 6). 2. A son of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 4). 3. An officer under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 18). E. E. N.

JEHOZADAK, jī-hez'a-dak (יהוזאדק, yehōzādādhāq; also called Jozadak and Josedech), 'J' is righteous': A priest of the line of Zadok. He was the son of Seraiah and father of the high priest Jeshua, who accompanied Zerubbabel at the return from the Captivity (I Ch 6 14 f.; Ezr 3 2, 8, etc.; Hag 1 1; Zech 6 11, etc.; I Es 5 5, 48, 56, 6 2, 9 19; Sir 49 12). A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

JEHU, jī'hiū (יהוה, yehū), probably 'J' is He': 1. The son of Hanani, a prophet who denounced Baasha, King of Israel (I K 16 1, 7, 12). He also wrote a history, including among other things an account of the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 20 34). 2. The son of Jehoshaphat, son of Nimshi, and the founder of the fifth dynasty in Israel (II K ch. 9 f.). He was holding the post of general in the Israelite army when Jehoram, the son of Ahab, retired to Jezreel to recover from the wounds received in the siege of Ramoth. The denunciations of the house of Ahab, based on the wicked character of Jezebel, by the prophets Elijah and Elisha had prepared the people for the overthrow of the dynasty and the transfer of the reins of government into new hands. Jehu was designated as the man best qualified to bring the change about, and at the same time succeed to the throne (I K 19 16). In accomplishing the task given him by the prophet, he boldly assumed the royal title and, being accepted by his fellow officers, through a rapid movement surprised Jehoram at Jezreel, and without hesitation slew him with his own hand. He also mortally wounded Ahaziah, King of Judah, who was at the time visiting his kinsman. He then undertook to exterminate the house of Ahab, which he accomplished by the aid of the local governors of cities and districts. He next laid a plot to entrap and destroy the priests of Baal. His motive in this course, however, was as much the selfish and political one of rendering it impossible for the adherents of the former régime to regain power as that of simple-hearted 'zeal for J'' (cf. II K 10 16). To what extent Elisha approved of all this bloodshed is not clear. A century later Hosea felt that the House of Jehu was still to be punished by J' for 'the blood of Jezreel' (Hos 1 4). Still, the House of Jehu stood for J' vs. Baal and, in general, during the century of its rule there was great external 'zeal for J'' (cf. Amos and Hosea), but without corresponding righteousness of conduct. During the later half of his reign, war again broke out between Syria and Israel, and J. was not able to prevent the King of Syria from inflicting considerable damage upon the Israelite domain, E. of the Jordan. Hazael wrested from Israel large tracts of land within the borders of Manasseh and Gad. But these operations did not lead to any decisive results within J.'s lifetime. J. is mentioned on the black obelisk of Shalmanezar III (860-824) as paying tribute to Assyria in the year 842 (see illustration on page 380). He doubtless put himself under the suzerainty of Assyria with the hope of aid against the encroachments of Damascus. He died at the end of a reign of twenty-eight years (circa 842-815), leaving behind him a good reputation for intrepidity and strategy. 3. An Anathothite, one of David's heroes (I Ch 12 3). 4. A son of Obed, a Judahite of the family of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 38). 5. A son of Josibiah, a Simeonite (I Ch 4 35). A. C. Z.

JEHUBBAH, jī-hub'ba (יְהוּבָה, yēhubbāh): An Asherite (I Ch 7 34).

JEHUCAL, jī-hiū'ka. (יְהוֹכָאֵל, yēhūkhal, Jehukal AV), 'J' is able': An officer under King Zedekiah, and one of Jeremiah's enemies (Jer 37 3; called Jucal in 38 1).

JEHUD, jī'hud (יְהוּדָה, yēhūdāh): A city of Dan (Jos 19 45). Map III, D 4.

JEHUDI, jī-hiū'dai (יְהוּדִי, yēhūdī), 'Jew': An officer in the service of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 14 ff.), possibly of foreign origin and naturalized as a 'Jew' (i.e., 'man of Judah').

JEHUDIJAH, jī'hu-dai'ja. See JEWESS.

JEHUEL, jī-hiū'el (יְהוּאֵל, yēhū'el, Jehiel AV): A Levite (II Ch 29 14).

JEKAMEAM, jek'ā-mī'am (יְקָמָאֵם, yēqam'ām), 'may the Kinsman (God?) establish': The ancestral head of a family of Kohathite Levites (I Ch 23 19, 24 23).

JEKAMIAH, jek'ā-mai'a (יְקָמִיָּה, yēqamyāh), 'J' establishes': 1. A descendant of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 41). 2. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 18, Jecamiah AV).

JEKUTHIEL, jī-kiū'θi-el (יְקֻתִּיֵּל, yēqūthī'el): The head of a Calebite family (I Ch 4 18).

JEMIMAH, jī-mai'ma (יְמִימָה, yēmīmāh), 'dove': The eldest of Job's daughters (Job 42 14).

JEMUEL, jī-miū'el or jem'iu-el. See NEMUEL.

JEPHTHAH, jef'ṭha (יִפְתָּח, yiphtāh; also called Jephthae in He 11 32 AV), 'He [God] opens': One of the major judges of Israel (Jg 11 1-12 7). He was a Gileadite, and became prominent, first as the head of a company of irresponsible men ('vain fellows'), and afterward undertook successfully the championship of Israel against the Ammonites. The most interesting feature of the story of J. is his vow (Jg 11 31). The text leaves no room for doubt that in fulfilment of it he sacrificed his daughter. Efforts to evade this conclusion have proved futile. Either J. was ignorant of the law against human sacrifices, or he flagrantly violated it. The story of the yearly commemoration of the sacrifice of J.'s daughter (11 40) is probably an attempt to explain a pagan rite by referring it to a fact of tradition (cf. Burney, Judges, pp. 312 ff.). The last undertaking of J. was his successful war with the Ephraimites, who attacked him because they said he had not invited them to go with him against Ammon (Jg 12 1 ff.). Criticism has busied itself with the tracing of the account in Jg to its sources, but has not achieved a consensus. The story is by some (Wellhausen, Moore) assigned to one source, into which an interpolation has been incorporated (11 12-28). Moore, however (ICC, ad loc.), believes in the preservation of genuine history through this source. Others (Budde and Cheyne, and, more recently, Burney) assign it to two sources. Budde finds these preserved respectively in 11 1-11 and 11 34-40. Cheyne (EB) finds that one of these originally was concerned with Jair, and either by textual corruption or otherwise was transferred to J. Burney finds one narrative in 10 17, 11 12-28, 30, 31, 33 (in part), 34-40, and the other in 11 1-11 (except vs. 1b, 2, 5a), 29, 32b, 33 (in part), 12 1-6. Cf. Moore, ICC; Budde, Handkommentar; Frankenberg, Composition d. Deuteron. und Richterbücher (1895), pp. 35-38; and C. F. Burney, Judges (1918). A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

JEPHUNNEH, jī-fun'e (יִפְחִנִּי, yēphunneh): 1. The father of Caleb (Nu 13 6, etc.). 2. The head of an Asherite family (I Ch 7 38).

JERAH, jī'ra. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

JERAHMEEL, jī-rā'mī-el (יְרָחְמֵאֵל, yērahmē'el), 'God has mercy': 1. The eponymous ancestor of the clan, or tribe, of Jerahmeelites living in the 'South' of Judah (I S 27 10, 30 29) and afterward absorbed into the tribe of Judah, so that J. was reckoned genealogically as one of the grandsons of Judah and the brother of Caleb (I Ch 2 9, 25-27, 33, 42). 2. A Levite (I Ch 24 29). 3. A son of Jehoiakim, King of Judah (Jer 36 26).

JERED, jī'rad (יֶרֶד, yeredh): The 'father of Gedor' (I Ch 4 18), probably the name of the clan, or family, which inhabited Gedor.

JEREMAI, jer'ī-mē'ai or jer'ī-mē (יֶרֶמְיָה, yērēmay, a shortened form of 'Jeremiah'): One of the 'sons of Hashum' (Ezr 10 33).

JEREMIAH, jer'ī-mai'a (יֵרֵמְיָהּ, yirmēyāhū, יֵרֵמְיָהּ, yirmēyāh), 'J' casts' (or 'looseneth,' so Oxf. Heb. Lex.), i.e., from the womb: 1. A man of Libnah, father of Hamutal, wife of Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz (II K 23 31) and Zedekiah (II K 24 18; Jer 52 1). 2. The head of a family of Manasseh, E. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 24). 3. A Benjamite who used sling and bow, and who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 4). 4, 5. Two Gadites (I Ch 12 10, 13), users of shield and spear, who joined David at the 'stronghold in the wilderness.' 6. A priest who went up to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 1), sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 2 [3]), and also joined in the procession in dedication of the wall (Neh 12 34), unless the J. in this passage is another man. 7. A Rechabite (Jer 35 3). 8. The prophet Jeremiah. See next article. C. S. T.

JEREMIAH. 1. Life and Times of the Prophet. Jeremiah (on the name see foregoing article) was a prophet of the decline and fall of the Hebrew monarchy (called Jeremy in Mt 2 17, 27 9 AV, and Jeremias in Mt 16 14 AV). He was of priestly descent, being one of a little community of priests settled at Anathoth (I K 2 26), 3 m. N. of Jerusalem, where his family owned land (32 8). As a 'youth,' of perhaps twenty, he received his prophetic call (1 2, 25 3) in the 13th year of Josiah (626 B.C.). His early predictions of judgment to be inflicted on apostate Judah by the foe from the north, were presumably connected with the peril from the Scythians, who were, about 625 B.C., overrunning Western Asia. Judah seems to have escaped serious damage, and thus J. had his first experience of J''s apparent failure to fulfil the predictions He had inspired, an experience more than once repeated, with momentous results for the prophet himself. Possibly for a time he remained silent; but when Josiah, on the basis of the newly-discovered law-book (i.e., probably the Deuteronomic Code) imposed on Judah the reformation of the cultus and the suppression of the local sanctuaries (II K chs. 22 f.), J. seems (11 1-8) to have advocated in the cities of Judah obedience to the law. If he was a descendant of Abiathar this conduct may well have seemed treason to his family. For the reformation involved the suppression of the shrine at Anathoth, whither Abiathar was banished (I K 2 26 f.), in favor of that served by the sons of Zadok, who had supplanted Abiathar in the priesthood of the royal sanctuary at Jerusalem. It is not then surprising that his kinsfolk and fellow townsmen formed treacherous plots against his life (11 18-23, 12 6). Of his personal life during the rest of Josiah's reign no particulars are known. The Assyrian empire was moving swiftly to its ruin; Nineveh fell in 612, the State survived the fall of the capital for but a few years. Josiah lost his life at Megiddo in an ill-fated attempt to oppose the northward march of Egypt in 609, and was mourned by J. who had a deep respect for him (22 15 f.). Jehoiakim was placed on the throne by Pharaoh-necho. Early in his reign J. was in serious danger of death for blasphemy since he threatened that the Temple would suffer the fate of Shiloh unless the people amended their ways (7 1-8 3, ch. 26). In the fourth year of Jehoiakim (605) the defeat of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish proved politically the turning point of the age. J. at once grasped the situation.

He saw that Nebuchadnezzar was destined to achieve further successes; he greeted him with an ode of triumph (46 3-12), promised him the conquest of Egypt (46 14-26), and declared that the whole of Western Asia would fall under his sway (ch. 25), implying thereby, what he afterward taught explicitly, that the safety of Judah lay in yielding to the inevitable, and accepting the condition of dependence upon Babylon. Jehoiakim had to accept the suzerainty of Nebuchadnezzar. In 604 J. bade Baruch, his amanuensis, read a roll to the people in which the prophecies of his whole ministry up to that point were collected. The matter was reported to the king who read and burned the roll, and would have seized J. and Baruch but for their timely escape (ch. 36). The roll was written out again and numerous additions were made. The narrative is important as giving some insight into the origins of the book. When he had been the vassal of Nebuchadnezzar for three years Jehoiakim rebelled. After some delay Nebuchadnezzar moved against Judah. Death delivered the rebel from the vengeance of his suzerain; but Jerusalem was captured, and Jehoiachin, with the flower of the nation, was deported to Babylon in 597 (II K 24 10-16). To this period (c. 598) the episode of the Rechabites (ch. 35) probably belongs. Zedekiah swore a solemn oath of allegiance and was made king over those who remained in Jerusalem, a people much inferior in character to the exiles (ch. 24) and led by inexperienced, vicious and incompetent upstarts. Zedekiah meant well, and was personally friendly to J.; but he was too weak to rule his ministers (38 5, 24-27). He was approached in his fourth year by neighboring peoples to secure his participation in a revolt, and the prophets supported the enterprise. J. opposed it and came into collision with Hananiah (ch. 28). Nothing came of it; but the visit of Zedekiah to Babylon in that year may have been connected with it (51 59). In 589 Pharaoh Hophra became king of Egypt, and Zedekiah entered into treasonable negotiations with him. In the following year the second siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans began. Jeremiah now (21 1-10) declared unambiguously that the besiegers would prevail, adding as a piece of practical advice to the people generally that desertion to the Chaldeans was the sole guaranty of personal safety (21 9). His counsel did not proceed from any unpatriotic motive, tho it is easy to see that it might be so interpreted; it was simply a corollary from the position adopted by him in 605 (ch. 25). On the ground that he was discouraging the defenders of the city he was kept in custody, sometimes mild and relatively honorable, sometimes rigorous. Once he was lowered into a disused cistern, there to perish by starvation, but was rescued by Ebed-melech, an Ethiopian (38 1-13). When the city was captured in 586, Jeremiah was treated with consideration by the Chaldeans (39 11-14, 40 1-5) who offered him honorable residence in Babylonia, or to remain in Palestine. He threw in his lot with the remnant left behind under the governorship of Gedaliah (40 6). After the treacherous murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael (40 13-41 3), the survivors asked

J. to ascertain the will of God as to their future, promising implicit obedience. In ten days he received the Divine answer. If they remained in Palestine all would be well; but disaster on disaster would overwhelm them if they persisted in the plan of taking refuge in Egypt. They went to Egypt nevertheless, forcing J. and Baruch to accompany them (42:1-43:7). Here J. predicted the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadrezzar (43:8-13). The last scene (ch. 44) shows us the prophet, now presumably over sixty years of age, protesting against the relapse of the women to the worship of the Queen of Heaven, i.e., the planet Venus. His entreaties were met with a flat refusal on the ground that all their misfortunes were due to the abandonment of her worship. He replied with predictions of the utmost calamities. His fate is unknown to us; possibly he may, as a late tradition asserts, have been stoned to death by his infuriated countrymen.

2. General Character of the Book. The Book of Jeremiah consists partly of prophecies, partly of narratives of events in the life of the prophet and the history of the nation. Its remarkable lack of chronological arrangement is due, no doubt, to the fact that it reached its present form by stages. Its nucleus seems to have consisted of the prophecies dictated to Baruch in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605). After the roll had been burnt by the king in the following year, it was rewritten with many additions (36:32). This last statement is important, for it shows that even the prophecies dictated to Baruch by J. himself, which must have formed the nucleus of the present book, were not verbal reproductions of the discourses as they were originally delivered. The original collection comprised in all probability (not counting later additions) chs. 1-9, 10:17-25, 26, 46-49:33, perhaps also parts of chs. 11-20. This was afterward gradually enlarged by the insertion or addition, partly of prophecies of later date than 605 (including some, as 10:1-16, not by J. himself), partly of biographical and historical notices, till the book assumed its present form. The narratives in the third person about J. are generally supposed to be from the hand of Baruch.

3. Contents. Chs. 1-8 describe the call of J. His prophetic utterance is to release the forces which will determine the fate of nations; J. will fulfil His servant's word, let no opposition dismay him! Chs. 2-6 contain J.'s earliest prophecies (626-610 B.C.); in ch. 2:1-4 he passes his verdict upon Israel's history; censuring its declension from its original ideal and its inveterate idolatry, but promising, on its penitence, a return of J.'s favor; in 4:8-6:26, in strains of deep feeling and remarkable poetical power, he announces the coming judgment to be inflicted by a formidable foe from the North, presumably the Scythian hordes. Chs. 7-10 (excluding 10:1-16) form a second group, belonging probably to the early part of Jehoiakim's reign (cf. ch. 7 with ch. 26). In the striking utterance of 7:1-28 J. rebukes the belief of the people that the Temple was a fetish guaranteeing security; this can be assured only by moral amendment. A series of plaintive elegies follows, bewailing the corruption of the people and describing their despair when the foe shall fall upon them. Ch. 10:1-16 (against dread of idols) is a much later insertion. In 11:1-8 J. exhorts the people to obey the Deuteronomical law; but in 11:9-17 he is warned that Judah, for its disobedience, is doomed to disaster, and that he must not intercede on its behalf. In 11:18-12:6 he describes a plot of his townsmen against his life and the moral perplexities suggested by the impunity of the conspirators. Ch. 12:7-17 threatens exile to some of Judah's unfriendly neighbors, but promises them restoration if they afterward embrace from the heart Israel's religion. Ch. 13 emphasizes the corruption of the people and the certainty of exile; ver. 18:1 (cf. II K 24:3) belongs to the reign of Jehoiachin. Chs. 14 and 15 contain a dialog between the prophet and J., arising out of a drought (interpreted as a sign of J.'s anger). J. intercedes for his people, pleading that their prophets have deluded them; but J. refuses to hear him. He bewails his hard fate which forces him to predict his country's ruin; but is taught that his success and happiness depend upon his abandoning the false path of distrust and despair. In 16:1-17:18 the coming disaster, with its cause, the people's sin, is set forth in even plainer terms than before. 17:19-27, an exhortation to observe the Sabbath, is apparently not by J. In ch. 18, by observation of the methods of a potter, J. is taught that prophecy is conditional and thus that, predictions of judgment notwithstanding, Judah might, but for its obstinacy, still repent. His words provoke another plot against his life (ver. 18), and the chapter ends with vehement imprecations against its authors. Chs. 19 and 20 describe how J. was thrown into the stocks for having declared by the symbolism of a broken cruse the irretrievable nature of the disaster impending upon the nation. After his release he breaks out into a passionate complaint of the misery of his lot (20:1-14); he could not resist the impulse to prophesy, but it had brought him nothing but hostility and detraction. Ch. 21:1-18 places us at the end of Zedekiah's reign (588 B.C.); the siege has begun; Zedekiah sends to inquire of the prophet respecting its issue; he replies that the city will inevitably fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. Chs. 21:19-23:33 contains J.'s judgments on the contemporary kings of Judah; the exile of Jehoiachin (608) is pathetically foretold (22:10-12); the exactions of Jehoiakim (608-597) are contrasted bitterly with the justice exercised by his father, Josiah (22:13-18); rejection and banishment are to be the fate of Jehoiachin (22:24-30); and in 23:1-4, in contrast to the imperfect rulers, there is drawn a picture of the rule of the future ideal king, and of the happiness which he will secure for his people. Next, 23:5-40, we have a polemic against the false prophets who misled the people by deceptive promises of security, and made no effort to reclaim them from their sin. Ch. 24 was written shortly after the exile of Jehoiachin (597); by the two baskets of figs the superiority of the exiles to those left in Judah is signified; on the former the hope of the future depends. Ch. 25 contains the prophecy (605) that Nebuchadrezzar is to have the rule of the entire known world. Ch. 26 tells how J. nearly lost his life for threatening that, if the people did not amend their ways, Jerusalem would share the fate of Shiloh (cf. ch. 7). Chs. 27-29 (beginning of Zedekiah's reign) describe how J. exposed the futility of revolt from Babylon and of hoping that its domination would speedily cease, and how he exhorted the exiles to settle down contentedly in Babylonia. Chs. 30-33 (so far as they are J.'s) contain promises to Israel as well as Judah, of a brighter future; in ch. 32 J. by redeeming a plot of the family estate demonstrates his conviction that Judah will once more own her native soil; in 31:31-34 J. reaches, with his prophecy of the New Covenant, his most wonderful insight into the inmost nature of religion. Chs. 34-45 are largely historical; ch. 34 (end of Zedekiah's reign), after a prediction of Zedekiah's exile, contains a denunciation of the treacherous reenslavement of the liberated Hebrew slaves; in ch. 35 the fidelity of the Rechabites to their ancestors' prohibition of the settled agricultural life, points the moral for disobedient Judah; ch. 36 records the writing, public reading, and burning of the roll; chs. 37-44 narrate J.'s history during the siege and after the fall of Jerusalem (see § 1); ch. 45 contains mingled encouragement and rebuke to Baruch. Chs. 46-51 are prophecies on foreign nations, declaring successively, with much variety of imaginative form, the doom impending upon Egypt, the Philistines, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Elam, and Babylon. On their origin see below. Ch. 52 is excerpted in the main from II K 24:18-25:10.

4. Personal Characteristics. J. possessed a susceptible, deeply emotional nature. The adverse course of events impresses him profoundly, and he utters without reserve the emotions which it stirs within him. The trials in which his vocation involved him, the persecution and detraction which rewarded his unwelcome words (11:18-23, 20:7-10, 26:11 ff., 37:15 ff.), the disappointment which was the only fruit of his efforts to convince his people of their sin, and the ruin to which, as he saw too truly, his country was hastening, overpowered his sensitive, highly-strung organism. He breaks out into bitter lamentations and complaints; he bewails pathetically his nation's doom (4 19-21, 6 26, 7 29, 8 18-22 9 1, 13 17, and elsewhere); he calls for vengeance on his persecutors; he reproaches the Almighty with having misled him (20 7) and forsaking him (15 18); he wishes himself unborn (20 14-18; cf. 15 10). His mental struggle is intense; he would gladly relinquish the thankless office imposed upon him; but ever and again the higher voice within him bids him be trustful and courageous (1 7 f., 17, 19, 12 5 f., 15 19-21, 20 11, 13), and his human wishes and human weakness are overcome. Love for his country is powerful within him, tho he knows it to be in vain (7 16); through two long chapters (14-15) he pleads on behalf of his erring nation. The aim of his life is to lead his people, if only it will be led, to better things.

J.'s poetry is exquisite. It has not indeed the majesty of Isaiah or the brilliance of Job; but sweet and tender elegies, beautiful in diction and instinct with pathos, flow without art or effort from his lips. He has been well called by Cornill the 'poet of the heart.' The deep springs of human feeling toward his neighbor, toward his people, and toward his God, are revealed by him more clearly than by any other writer of the O T, more clearly even than by Hosea.

5. Significance of His Work. In the history of religion J. marks an epoch in that he brings out, more distinctly than had been brought out before, the significance and reality of personal religion, of a direct relationship of the individual soul to God. A lonely man without domestic or social joys (16 2, 8, 15 17), full of unrequited affection for his people, mocked and misunderstood by those whom he loved, he casts himself upon God, and finds a refuge and a solace in communion with Him. As a prophet to his contemporaries, his labor was in vain; but his life was not spent in vain, either for himself or for the future. 'Through sorrow and wo there arose within him the certainty of personal fellowship with God, the truest essence of piety' (Wellhausen). J. opens out his whole soul to God: he unfolds before Him his thoughts and feelings and emotions, and looks to Him for a response. It is in accordance with this sense of the religious significance of the individual that he emphasizes (31 30) the truth of individual responsibility; and that in his great prophecy of the New Covenant the essence of religion is identified by him with a personal knowledge of God implanted in the heart (31 33 f.; cf. 3 16, where an external symbol of religion, as the Ark, is to be no more needed in the ideal future). When he had passed away, men began to realize the greatness and beauty of his character. 'The oppressed people saw in his sufferings a type of itself, and drew from his constancy courage to endure and be true. Imagery from the scenes of his life and echoes of his words fill many of the Psalms, the authors of which were like him in his sorrows, and strove to be like him in his faith' (Davidson). See further RELIGION OF ISRAEL, § 22.

6. The Text of the Book of Jeremiah. The LXX text of Jer differs more widely from the Heb. than is the case in any other book of the O T. The omissions are numerous (about 2,700 words of the Heb. text, one-eighth of the whole). These are often unimportant; there are a few additions, variations of expression, and transpositions (the foreign prophecies, chs. 46-51, stand in the LXX after 25 13). Tho some of these differences may have originated with the translators, many must have existed in the Heb. MSS. used by them, and they combine with the unchronological arrangement of the Heb. to show that in early times many hands worked at the 'redaction' of the book, and that it must have assumed two forms in the process. Each individual case must be judged on its own merits. On the whole, the Heb. text is undoubtedly superior; but there are certainly many particular cases in which the text of the LXX. is to be preferred.

7. Recent Criticism. Until recently it was commonly held that the Book of Jer contained but few additions from later hands, the oracle on Babylon (50 1-51 58) being the most notable, tho Graf argued for the Jeremianic origin even of this. Giesebrecht (1894) occupied a more critical position. Stade and Smend denied the New Covenant passage to J. Schwally and Wellhausen rejected the oracles on the foreign nations (chs. 46-51). Duhm accepted these results but went far beyond them in his view that J. himself was exclusively a poet, and that his genuine literary remains consist of not more than about 270 couplets—each line of the couplet being written in the meter of the Heb. elegy. In two respects N. Schmidt's article in the EB. went beyond Duhm—in the rejection of the historicity of some previously unchallenged narratives, and his rejection of the sections in which J. reveals his inner conflicts and deepest emotions (the 'Confessions of Jeremiah'). Duhm's position has not been generally accepted; Cornill's masterly work supplied the best corrective for its extravagance, and perhaps best represents the critical average of opinion. Hölcher in his Die Profeten (1914) and his revolutionary volume Geschichte der israelitischen und jüdischen Religion (1922) recalls the radicalism of N. Schmidt. Volz is akin to Cornill, but treats Chs. 49-51 with 25 15-38 as the work of a single author who wrote about 560, soon after the death of Nebuchadrezzar in 562.

LITERATURE: Of the older commentaries Hitzig (1866), Graf (1862) are the most noteworthy. The best of the recent German commentaries are those of Cornill (1905) and Volz (1909), but Cornill's (1905) is more important. Orelli (1905) is an excellent student's book, and H. Schmidt (1915) represents the newer tendencies specially associated with the names of Gunkel and Gressmann. There is a good conservative French commentary by Condamin (1920). The modern English commentaries are Peake (1910-12), Streane (1913), and Bins (1919). Two works of special value are Skinner, Prophecy and Religion (1922), and G. A. Smith, Jeremiah (1923). To these may be added Cheyne, Jeremiah, His Life and Times (1888); Gillies, Jeremiah the Man and His Message (1907); W. R. Thomson, The Burden of the Lord (1919). There are translations by Driver, The Book of the Prophet Jeremiah (1906) and J. E. McFadyen, Jeremiah in Modern Speech (1919). In German Wellhausen's masterly chapter in his Israelitische und Jüdische Geschichte is of outstanding importance and has influenced all later discussion. Ert's Jeremia und seine Zeit (1902) is a stimulating, if too original, monograph. Of articles in dictionaries, A. B. Davidson in Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible; Buhl in Herzog-Hauck, Realencyclopädie; and Haller in Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart may be specially mentioned. A. S. P.

JEREMIAH, EPISTLE OF: A writing extant in a Gr. text (also in Syriac and Latin translations) which purports to be the letter referred to in Jer 29 1, where the prophet is said to have sent a letter 'unto the residue of the elders of the Captivity, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people, whom Nebuchadrezzar had carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon.' In this apocryphal writing Jeremiah is represented as foretelling that the Captivity of the Jews should last for seven generations, and end in their peaceful return (ver. 1 f.); but in Babylon they should see gods of gold and silver and wood (ver. 3). They are warned not to be led astray by the common feeling of the Gentiles regarding these idols (vs. 4 f.); for they are creatures of men's hands, and have no power either to help or to harm any one (vs. 6-7); therefore a righteous man without regard for idols is stronger, for he will suffer no reproach (ver. 72).

The production bears marks of having been originally written in Gr. A point of departure for the date of the composition is given in II Mac 2 2, where it is alleged that Jeremiah 'gave the captives the law, that they should not forget the commandments of the Lord, and that they should not be led astray in thir minds, seeing images of gold and silver and the adornment about them.' But whether the Epistle of Jeremiah is an expansion and an explanation of this passage, or the author of II Mac alludes to an already extant Epistle is an open question. Nevertheless, the dates of these two Apocrypha can not be very far apart. (Cf. C. J. Ball, in Charles, Apocryph. and Pseudepigr. of the O T, vol. I, pp. 596-611). A. C. Z.

JEREMOTH, jer'i-meth (יֵרֵמוֹת, yērēmōth): 1. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 7 8). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 14). 3. The head of a Levite family (I Ch 23 23, 24 30, here called Jerimoth). 4. The head of Naphtali under David (I Ch 27 19). 5, 6, 7. Three persons who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 26, 27, 29, Ramoth AV). 1, 3, and 4 are given as Jerimoth in AV. See also Jerimoth, 4.

JEREMY, jer'i-mi. See JEREMIAH, 1.

JERIAH, ji-rai'ā (יֵרֵיָא, yērīyāh), 'J' sees': The ancestral head of one of the courses of Levites (I Ch 23 19, 24 23); Jerijah in I Ch 26 31.

JERIBAI, jer'i-bai or jer'i-bē (יֵרֵיבַי, yērībhay): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 46).

JERICOH, jer'i-kō (יֵרִיחוֹ, yērīhō), 'place of fragrance' (?), also called several times the 'city of palm-trees' (Dt 34 3; cf. Jg 1 16, 3 13): A fortified city in the lower Jordan valley 820 ft. below the Mediterranean, Map III, G 5. The climate is subtropical, the natural capabilities of soil and situation are great, and as a defensible locality the site offers many points of vantage.

Inhabited from very early days, the position of J. made it the key of W. Palestine (from E. of the Jordan). But the enervating heat took the stamina from its people and, instead of being the fortress of Jerusalem, it was, as G. A. Smith says, only its pantry (HGHL, p. 268). When Israel crossed the Jordan it seemed a formidable citadel, demanding the most careful preparations on the part of the besiegers. At Gilgal, accordingly, the reproach of Egypt was rolled away (Jos 5 9), and by special rites the people became a consecrated host. The capture of Jericho was to be no wild scene of unrestrained license and plunder, but as first-fruits of conquest it was devoted to J'. The graphic description of the seven days' circuit and the falling of the walls (Jos ch. 6) is now thought to rest on a severe earthquake which laid the city open to the invaders. Recent excavation and research by Sellin has shown that the entire city was not destroyed but that some of it had continuous existence from the earliest historic times. The walls, set on a hill some 40 feet above the plain, were better constructed even than those of Megiddo. In the city were found many pieces of pottery, decorative figures, bronze vessels and 22 blank writing tablets. It is not certain that Hiel the Bethelite (I K 16 34) built on the Amorite mound. But the rich plain of the Jordan at the base of the mountain land was too attractive to remain unused. In Elisha's day prophets dwelt there (II K 2 5, 15). At the Return, 345 men of Jericho are reckoned in Nehemiah's census (Neh 7 36), and this city also furnished workmen who helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3 2). These later towns were for the most part S. of the old Jericho, and the plain up to the entrance of the Wady el-Kelt is dotted with ruins. Cleopatra's concession, taken by Herod, was here, and Roman ruins are visible, including plaster still bright with the red so dear to Roman eyes. In one of these structures Herod the Great died.

Christ's feet trod this region more than once, and the scene of the Temptation may well have been in the forbidding mountains above. To reach the reputed place of the Baptism He must have passed through the streets and villas of the town. The road that leads to Jericho He made the background for a parable (Lk 10 30). His last journey to Jerusalem led Him into Jericho, where He healed Bartimæus (Mk 10 46) and met Zacchæus (Lk 19 1 f.). One does not wonder, then, at the numerous monasteries once to be found here. But the Moslem's touch has blighted the palm-groves, and er-Riha, the present village, with its few hundred dark-visaged, Egyptian-like inhabitants, is but a travesty of past magnificence. Cf. Sellin und Watzinger, Jericho (1913); G. A. Barton, Archaeology and the Bible (1916), pp. 98 f., 117, 123 ff.

JERIEL, jer'i-el or jī'ri-el (יֵרֵיֵל, yērī'el), 'God sees': The ancestor of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2).

JERIJAH, ji-rai'ja. See JERIAH.

JERIMOTH, jer'i-meth (יֵרֵמוֹת, yērēmōth): 1. The ancestor of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 7 7). 2. One of David's warriors (I Ch 12 5). 3. A son of David (II Ch 11 18). 4. A Hemanite musician (I Ch 25 4; Jeremoth in v. 22). 5. A Temple overseer in Hezekiah's day (II Ch 31 13). See also JEREMOTH.

JERIOTH, jer'i eth or jī'ri-eth (יֵרֵיֹת, yērī'ōth): Azubah ('forsaken') the 'wife' of Caleb was the 'daughter' of Jerioth ('tents') (I Ch 2 18). Perhaps a symbolic way of describing the abandonment by nomadic people of one abode for another (cf. ICC, ad loc.). E. E. N.

JEROBOAM, jer''o-bō'am (יֶרֹבָם, yārobh'am), probably 'the people increases': 1. The son of Nebat of the tribe of Ephraim, and a resident of Zereda (I K 11 26). He was the leader of the ten tribes in their revolt against Rehoboam, and became the first king of the Northern Kingdom (931-915). It is difficult to gain a perfectly clear account of J.'s part in the revolt of the northern tribes against Rehoboam. The text of some MSS. of the LXX. gives a quite different account from that of our present Heb. text, which also is not altogether clear or self-consistent. J. appears to have attracted Solomon's notice as a man of energy and ability, and was appointed by the king as overseer of the contingent from the house of Joseph engaged in work upon the fortifications of Jerusalem and similar undertakings in other places. But, instigated by the prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, he rebelled against his master, and was compelled to flee to Egypt, where he took refuge with Shishak. As soon as Solomon died, according to one account, J. returned and put himself at the head of the people, now fully determined no longer to endure the yoke of heavy taxation imposed upon them during the reign just closed. When the overtures made to Rehoboam had been flatly rejected, the northern tribes seceded and Jeroboam was made their king. According to another account J. was not at the public assembly that delivered the ultimatum to Rehoboam but was sent for after the revolt took place (cf. I K 12 3 with ver. 20). He first fixed his capital at Shechem, but probably changed it to Tirzah. J. had before him a difficult task, for the northern tribes were not easily disposed to act in unison. We know practically nothing of how he undertook the work of organizing his new kingdom. Very little is known of his conflict with Judah. Perhaps both kingdoms soon became engaged in a more absorbing warfare with Shishak. For the purpose of preventing the people of the Northern Kingdom from gravitating back to the house of David, Jeroboam revived two old shrines at Bethel and Dan, setting up golden calves as images of J'. By the prophets of J' this was denounced as a capital sin, and the words 'like Jeroboam who made Israel to sin' constantly recur as the refrain in the story of all but three of the subsequent kings of Israel. 2. Jeroboam II (784-744), the son of Jehoash, of the dynasty of Jehu (II K 13 13). Under his government Israel reached the summit of her power, extending her control over nearly the whole territory ruled by David (except Judah). This was rendered possible by the weakening of the countries E. of the Jordan through repeated Assyrian invasions, a condition of things predicted by Jonah, the son of Amittai (II K 14 25). At the same time the religious, social, and moral conditions of the people reached a low ebb, against which the prophets Amos and Hosea, contemporaries of this king, entered a vigorous protest in the name of J'.

JEROHAM, jī-rō'ham (יֶרֹחַם, y'rōhām), 'may he have compassion': 1. An ancestor of Samuel (I S 1 1). 2. The father of Joelah and Zebadiah (I Ch 12 7). 3. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 27, 9 8). 4. A Danite (I Ch 27 22). 5. The father of Azariah (II Ch 23 1). 6. A priest (I Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12).

JERUBBAAL, jer''ub-bē'al or jī-rub'bā-al. See GIDEON.

JERUBBESHETH, jer''ub-bī'sheṭh or jī-rub'bī-sheṭh. The element 'besheth' in this name (in II S 11 21) is a substitution for the original 'baal.' For the reason see BAAL.

JERUEL, jī-rū'el or jer'iu-el (יְרוּעַל, y'rū'el): A portion of the wilderness of Judah (II Ch 20 16). Map II, F 2.

INTRODUCTORY.

Jerusalem (יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, y'rūshā'aim; Amarna letters, Urusalim; Assy. Ursalimmu; Syr. Urishlem; Gr. Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ἱεροσόλυμα; Lat. Hierosolyma; Arab. El-Kuds, 'The Holy').

1. Historical and Religious Importance. An ancient royal city of the Canaanites, captured by David about 1000 B.C., and the capital, first of the united Hebrew monarchy, and then of the kingdom of Judah. It was the site of the Temple of Solomon, and as such became the 'Holy City' of Judaism. It was the scene of the activity of all the writing prophets except Amos and Hosea, and in it most of the books of the O T were written. It was destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar in 586 B.C.; but was rebuilt after the Exile, and was invested with ever-increasing sanctity by the Jews during the Persian, Greek, and Roman periods. It was the scene of a considerable part of the ministry of Jesus and of His death, resurrection, and ascension, thus gaining new holiness in the eyes of the Christian Church. It was destroyed by Titus in 70 A.D., but was rebuilt by Hadrian in 136. In 637 A.D. it was conquered by the Calif Omar, was connected with the tradition of the Prophet Mohammed, and soon became the most important holy place of the Moslem world after Mecca and Medina. In 1099 A.D. it was taken by the Crusaders, and in 1517 by the Turks, in whose hands it remained until its occupation in 1917 by the Allied Forces under command of Gen. Allenby. It is now administered by Great Britain under a mandate from the League of Nations.

2. Location and Climate. Descriptions in ancient writers and numerous archeological remains leave no doubt that modern J. stands on substantially the same site as the ancient city. It is situated 33 m. E. of the Mediterranean, 14 m. W. of the Dead Sea, 133 m. SW. of Damascus, on the high central ridge of Judea, at an altitude in its highest parts of 2,500 ft. above the sea. The hills consist of bare white rocks of Eocene limestone and chalk. The lower slopes and the bottoms of the valleys are covered with a stony but fertile soil, in which olives, walnuts, and various fruit-trees, barley, wheat, and vegetables flourish. The climate is similar to that of northern Italy. The winters are cold and considerable snow falls, which, however, does not lie long. The temperature drops as low as 35° Fahr. and palms, oranges, and lemons can not be cultivated. The heat of the summer is tempered by the altitude of the city, and the average maximum temperature is not over 86°. The hottest months are May and October, when the sirocco blows. Rain falls only between the months of November and March, with an annual average of 22 in.—about the same as that of London.

I. THE TOPOGRAPHY OF JERUSALEM.

3. Method of Study. The problem of the topography of the ancient city is much complicated by the scantiness of records, the repeated destructions and rebuildings, the absence of inscriptions, and the misleading testimony of Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan tradition. In a scientific study of the topography of J. legend must be disregarded, and one must go back to the evidence of the Bible and of other ancient writings. The testimony must be arranged in chronological order, and the greatest importance must be attached to the earliest statements. Under no conditions should we start with tradition and work backward, endeavoring to twist ancient statements into conformity with it; and where ancient evidence is lacking tradition may be used only with extreme caution. So much for the method in general. In particular, the investigation should proceed from the more certain to the less certain. The most certain thing in the topography of ancient Jerusalem is the location of the Temple. This, therefore, should be the starting-point of our study. Next to this the valleys, springs, and pools of antiquity are most easily identified, and after these the hills and city quarters. These main physical features that remain unchanged down to the present time having been determined, we may then proceed to study in chronological order the buildings, such as palaces, walls, gates, etc., that from time to time have been erected in the city. We take up, then, first the location of the Temple.

4. The Location of the Temple. The Temple is one of the few fixed spots in the topography of ancient Jerusalem. Solomon's sanctuary remained undisturbed until its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. During the brief period of the Exile its site was not forgotten (cf. Jer 41 5; Hag 2 3; Ezr 3 12). It was rebuilt by Zerubbabel in the old place in 516 B.C. (Ezr 6 15). Herod's Temple, according to Josephus (Ant. XV, 11 2; BJ, V, 5 1), was merely an enlargement and beautification of its predecessor. An unbroken tradition of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans places it on the site of the Haram esh-Sherif, the 'Noble Sanctuary,' or Mosque of Omar. The correctness of this tradition is confirmed at every point by archeology (see TEMPLE). From this fixed point we must set out in our study of the ancient city.

1. The Valleys of Jerusalem.

5. The Kidron. The one most often named is the nahal, or 'brook' Kidron (qīdhrōn, Gr. Κεδρών). Frequently 'Kidron' is omitted and it is called simply 'the brook' (II Ch 32 4). This designation suggests that it is to be identified with Wādy Sitti Maryam, the deep gorge on the E. of Jerusalem, since this is the only one of the valleys that has a perennial flow of water. This identification is confirmed by all the Biblical references. From II S 15 23, I K 2 37 (cf. II S 16 5) it appears that the Kidron lay E. of the city; from I K 15 13=II Ch 15 16; II K 23 4, 6, 12; Jer 31 40; II Ch 29 16, that it was adjacent to the Temple. II Ch 32 4 describes it as flowing through the midst of the land, and as containing much water. Nehemiah on his night-ride around the wall rode down the valley on the W. and S. of the city and then (Neh 2 15) up 'the brook.' According to Jn 18 1, Mk 14 26 Jesus crossed the Kidron (Cedron AV) in going from the city to the Mount of Olives, but the location of the Mount of Olives on the E. side of the city is established (cf. Jos. Wars, V, 2 3, 6 1, 12 2; VI, 3 2). The Valley of Jehoshaphat ('Yahweh judges') in Jl 3 12 f. is probably a place invented as a scene for the final judgment. Its identification with Wādy Sitti Maryam (the Kidron) is not found before the 4th cent. A.D. and is destitute of authority.

6. Hinnom. The valley of the 'Son (Sons) of Hinnom' (hinnōm), or simply 'valley of Hinnom,' is always called the gay, or 'broad, open valley,' in contrast to the nahal, or 'brook,' of Kidron. This name suggests that it is to be identified with the modern Wādy er-Rabābi, the broad valley that encloses Jerusalem on the W. and S. All the O T references favor this identification. According to Jos 15 8, 18 16 Hinnom was the boundary-line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin; but Jerusalem lay wholly in the tribe of Benjamin (cf. Jer 6 1 and the frequent phrase 'Judah and Jerusalem'), hence Hinnom can not be identified either with Wādy Sitti Maryam or with El-Wād, the valley that runs through the heart of the city. The valley gate of Neh 2 13 must have opened upon the Valley of Hinnom, but the excavations of Bliss seem to have proved that this gate was situated near the SW. corner of the modern city. The Arabian geographer Idrisi (1154 A.D.) applies the name Jehennām, that is, Gē-hinnōm, or Valley of Hinnom, to Wādy er-Rabābi, and in 1838 Robinson found this name still attached to it. This identification is generally accepted by modern topographers, but W. Robertson Smith, followed by a few others, identifies Hinnom with the modern El-Wād. Hinnom was the place where children were sacrificed to the god Melek (Molech) (q.v.), according to II K 23 10; Jer 2 23, 7 31 f., 19 2, 6, 32 35. Later Jewish abhorrence of this practise caused the name Gehēnna, or Valley of Hinnom, to be used as a name for Hell.

7. Rephaim. According to Jos 15 8, 18 16, the 'vale of Rephaim' lay W. of Hinnom, and formed part of the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin. It is to be identified with the modern Wādy el-Werd through which the railway runs from Jaffa to Jerusalem.

8. The Vale of Shaveh. In Gn 14 17 f. it is stated that Melchizedek, King of Salem, met Abram in the 'ēmeq, or 'enclosed plain,' of Shaveh (the same is the King's Vale). If Salem be J. (§ 19, below), then Shaveh may be one of the plains near J. In II S 18 18 Absalom is said to have built himself a monument in the 'king's dale.' According to Jos., Ant., VII, 10 3, this monument was two stadia distant from J. It has been conjectured that the Vale of Sheveh is the broad, open head of Wādy er-Rabābi (the Hinnom) W. of the city. This is now known as Wādy el-Mēs. Through it Abram might naturally have passed in coming from Damascus to Hebron.

9. The Tyropæon. The valley called the Tyropæon (ἡ τῶν τυροποιῶν φάραγξ, 'the valley of the cheesemakers') is mentioned by Josephus, BJ, V, 4 1. He says that it divided the Upper City from the Lower City, and that it came out at the Pool of Siloam. Siloam is known to be identical with the modern 'Ain Silwān, and consequently the Tyropæon must be identified with some part of El-Wād, the valley that runs through the heart of the city. The only dispute is, which of the branches of El-Wād is to be identified with the upper course of the Tyropæon. The common view is that it is the N. branch, which runs under the Damascus Gate. This is most likely, since this is the deeper depression, and since it is the one which the people of modern J. regard as the main valley. A rival theory, first suggested by Robinson, is that the upper course of the Tyropæon is to be found in the W. branch of El-Wād, that comes down from the Jaffa Gate under the modern David Street. Still another theory, advocated by Tobler and Mommert, is that the Tyropæon is the slight depression that runs from the SW. corner of the city and joins El-Wād at a point a little way above Siloam. Both of these theories identify the Tyropæon with small branches of the city valley such as Josephus would never have selected as a main division between the two hills, and neither of these identifications would ever have been thought of but for erroneous ideas concerning the location of the Lower City. The Tyropæon is perhaps identical with 'the Maktesh' (Zeph 1 11 'mortar' mg.; cf. § 36).

II. The Springs of Jerusalem.

10. En-rogel. Closely connected with the question of the valleys is the question of the springs and pools. Two springs, En-rogel and Gihon, are mentioned as near Jerusalem. These can not be identical, because in I K ch. 1 the coronation of Adonijah takes place at En-rogel, while that of Solomon takes place at Gihon. There are only two springs in the neighborhood of the modern city: 'Ain Um ed-Deraǵ, 'Spring of the Mother of Steps,' as it is called by the Moslems, or 'Ain Sitti Maryam, 'Spring of the Lady Mary,' as it is called by the Christians, which lies in the Wady Sitti Maryam, a short distance from the SW. corner of the city; and Bir 'Eiyūb, 'Job's Well,' which lies in the same valley a short distance below its junction with Wady er-Rabābi. With these springs En-rogel and Gihon must be identical. The evidence is clear that En-rogel is Bir 'Eiyūb. According to Jos 15 7, 18 16, it was reached by going down the Valley of Hinnom. According to II S 17 17 and I K 1 9, it was out of sight of the city, but not very remote from it. The name may mean 'Spy's Spring,' certainly not 'Fuller's Spring.' Apparently it is the same as the Dragon's (jackal's RV) Well of Neh 2 13.

11. Gihon. If En-rogel is Bir 'Eiyūb, then Gihon must be the other spring of Jerusalem: namely, 'Ain Sitti Maryam, the Virgin's Fountain. This is an intermittent spring to which the name of Gihon or 'gusher,' is peculiarly appropriate. According to I K 1 33, it was close to Jerusalem and within hearing distance of En-rogel. II Ch 33 14 states that it lay in the naḥal or Kidron valley, and II Ch 32 30 connects it with the rock-hewn conduit which still leads from the Virgin's Fountain under the E. hill to 'Ain Silwān. Other theories which identify Gihon with one or other of the pools on the W. side of the city ignore the fact that it was a spring (cf. Jos., Ant., VII, 14 5). The sanctity of these two springs which led them to be selected as places of sacrifice and anointing, is noteworthy. Near Gihon, where there was plenty of water, was the fuller's field (II K 18 17; Is 7 3, 36 2).

III. The Pools of Jerusalem.

12. Bethesda. Bethesda (Bethsaida, or Beth-zatha; cf. RVmg.) is mentioned in Jn ch. 5 as the scene of the healing of a lame man by Jesus. Our only clues to the location of this pool are that it was near to something connected with sheep, that it had five porches large enough to hold a multitude of sick people, that its waters flowed intermittently, and that it lay outside of the city, so that Jesus violated the Jewish Sabbath law in telling the man to carry his mat to his home. On the hypothesis that the προβατικὴ was the Sheep Gate in the N. wall of the Temple, Bethesda has been traditionally identified with Birket Isra'el, a large pool N. of the Haram. The excavations of the White Friars near the Church of St. Anne have disclosed a vaulted cistern, which the Crusaders believed to be the Pool of Bethesda. Neither of these sites, however, fulfils all the conditions of the narrative of John. The Gihon, or Virgin's Fountain, is the only intermittent spring in the vicinity of Jerusalem (see § 8, above) and, therefore, this is probably the site of Bethesda, where the waters were periodically troubled. It is true that no remains of porches are to be seen here, but no excavations have been undertaken at this point. In all other respects this identification fulfils the requirements of the Gospel narrative. See Masterman, PEFQ., liii (1921), pp. 91 ff.

13. Siloam. The names Shiloah (Shelah, Neh 3 15, Siloah AV) and Siloam are the exact equivalent in Heb. and Gr., respectively, of Silwān, in the modern Arabic name ('Ain Silwān) of the pool at the mouth of El-Wād. All the ancient references agree with this identification (cf. Neh 3 15; Jos., BJ, V, 4 1, 2, 6 1, 9 4, 12 2; II, 16 2; VI, 7 2, 8 5). In spite of its modern designation as an 'ain ('spring'), Siloam is not a spring, but is fed by a tunnel cut through the rock from the Gihon, or Virgin's Fountain. Before this tunnel was constructed a channel on the surface of the ground, perhaps constructed by the Jebusites early in the history of the city, and discovered by Schick in 1886, led the water of Gihon to the Old Pool, or Lower Pool, which is identical with the modern Birket el-Hamra, below 'Ain Silwān, at the mouth of El-Wād. Is 8 6 (reign of Ahaz) probably refers to this when it speaks of 'the waters of Shiloah that go softly.' According to II K 20 20; Is 22 9, 11; II Ch 32 4, 30, Hezekiah, in anticipation of the coming of Sennacherib, stopped up the channel on the surface of the ground and diverted the water of Gihon from the Old, or Lower Pool, through a subterranean conduit to the New, or Upper Pool, which lay within the fortifications (see § 34, below). This conduit to the Upper Pool is referred to in II K 18 17=Is 36 2, and in Is 7 3. In Neh 2 14 it is called the King's Pool, either because it was built by King Hezekiah or because it was adjacent to the King's Garden (see § 38, below).

IV. The Hills of Jerusalem.

14. Topographical Arrangement. The two main valleys of Jerusalem, the Kidron and the Hinnom, form a V-shaped plateau that is connected with the table-land of Judea only on the N. This plateau is divided by the Tyropœon, or [central valley, into two unequal divisions, which we may call the W. hill and the E. hill. The W. hill is three times as large as the E. hill, and at its highest point near the SW. corner of the city rises to a height of 2,550 ft. above sea level, so that it overlooks the Temple mount (about 100 ft. lower). By the arms of the Tyropœon this hill is subdivided into four smaller hills, which we may designate for convenience as JW, N, SW, and C (Central). The E. hill, on which the Temple stood, is subdivided by branches of the Kidron into three summits, which we may designate as NE, E, and SE. The task now before us is the identification of the hills and city quarters of antiquity with the seven summits of the modern city.

15. The City of David. The term 'city of David' occurs first in II S 5 6-8 = I Ch 11 5 f. as the name which David gave to the stronghold that he took out of the hand of the Jebusites. This fortress must have been near a water-supply, and the Gihon, or Virgin's Fountain, is the only spring close to J. This suggests that the City of David lay on SE. II S 15 23 and I K 1 33 both suggest its nearness to the Kidron and to Gihon. Nowhere is one said to go up to the City of David; but, on the other hand, one goes up from it to the Temple and to the palace which adjoined the Temple (cf. I K 8 1, 9 24). This language is explainable only if it lay on SE, which is considerably lower than the Temple hill. Is 29 1, 2, 7 connects the City of David with the Temple in such a way as to show that it must have lain on the E. ridge. Ezk 43 7 accuses the kings of Judah of defiling the Temple by putting their sepulchers close to it, but according to I K 11 43, 14 31, etc., these were in the city of David. NE. was not built upon until a much later date, consequently the City of David must have lain on SE. Neh 3 15 shows that the City of David lay close to the Pool of Siloam (cf. Neh 12 37). II Ch 32 30 shows that it lay between Gihon and Siloam; II Ch 33 14, that it lay due west of Gihon. According to I Mac 1 33, 7 32 f., 14 36, it was identical with the Akra of the Syrians and was in immediate proximity to the Temple. Jos (Ant. VIII, 3 1-2) also equates the City of David with the Akra of the Syrians.

In BJ, I, 1 4; V, 4 1, 6 1, he identifies it with the Lower City, and says that it was separated from the Upper City by a deep valley. There is universal agreement that the Upper City of Josephus is SW, but in regard to the identification of the Lower City there has been a great variety of opinions. Brocardus, Robinson, Conder, Fergusson, De Saulcy, Pierotti place it on NW; Fallmerayer, Williams, Lewin, De Vogüé, Warren, Merrill, Schick place it on N; Schultz, Kraft, Schafer on NE; Tobler and Mommert on C; von Alten and Thrupp on E; Olshausen, Caspari, Menke, Riess, Furrer, von Klaiber, Wilson, Benzinger, Buhl, Guthe, W. R. Smith, G. A. Smith, and most recent authorities on SE. The last theory is the only one that does justice to all the statements of Josephus in BJ, V, 4 1. SE is lower than SW, the Upper City; it is separated from it by a deep valley, the Tyropœon; it is lower than the Temple hill; and there is no valley at present between it and the Temple, altho the excavations of Guthe and Macalister show that such a valley once existed (cf. Ant. XIV, 16 2; BJ, II, 17 5; IV, 19 2; VI, 6 3, 7 2). The controversy has recently been settled in favor of SE. by the excavations of Parker, Weill, and Macalister on this hill (see LITERATURE). The discovery of scarabs of the XIIth Eg. dynasty and of old Amorite pottery proves that this is the most ancient part of Jerusalem. The excavations now in process are revealing many interesting facts regarding the old Jebusite city and its fortifications, its capture and the strengthening of its northern wall by David and other details of the past history of this very important site; see especially PEFQ for 1924). After the destruction of J. the thread of authentic tradition was broken, and the City of David was supposed to have lain on SW., where to-day the tomb of David is shown by the Moslems; but of this tradition there is no trace before the 4th cent. A.D., and it is worthless over against the unanimous ancient testimony in favor of SE.

16. Zion. In regard to the location of the hill Zion (tsiyyōn, Gr. Σιών), theories have been as

JERUSALEM FROM SCOPUS (N.E. OF THE CITY)

 The breach in the wall made by David when he captured Jerusalem (IIS. 5 6-6). The replacing of this breach by a new structure diverse as they have been in regard to the City of David. The tradition of the Greek and Latin Churches since the 4th cent., followed by Brocardus, Robinson, Williams, and Lewin, places Zion on SW. Aben Ezra, De Lyra, Lightfoot, Fergusson, and Thrupp identify it with NW; Clark, Buckingham, and Ritter, with the Hill of 'Evil Counsel' S. of the city; Caspari, Birch, Weikert, Socin, Guthe, Benzinger, Buhl, G. A. Smith, and most modern investigators, with the entire E. ridge. The arguments in support of this last view are as follows: (1) All the early references identify the City of David with Zion in such a way as to show that both must have lain on the same ridge (cf. II S 5 7=I Ch 11 5; I K 8 1=II Ch 5 2). (2) The preexilic prophets speak of Zion as in a peculiar sense the abode of J'. This shows that it was the hill on which the Temple stood (cf. Am 1 2; Is 2 3, 4 5, 8 18, 14 32, 18 7, 29 1, 7, 8, 31 4, 9, 33 20; Mic 3 12, 4 7; Jer 8 19, 31 6, 12). (3) The early prophets mention Zion as the residence of the king and the nobility, but Solomon's palace is known to have stood on the E. hill near the Temple (cf. Am 6 1; Is 3 16 f., 16 1, 28 16; Mic 4 8; Song 3 11). (4) The exilic writings connect Zion with the Temple as frequently as do the preexilic writings (cf. La 1 4, 2 6 f., 4 11; Ob ver 17; Is 52 7 f., 60 14, 64 10 f.; Jer 50 5, 28, 51 10). (5) The postexilic prophets in like manner speak of Zion as the dwelling-place of J' (cf. Zech 2 10, 8 2 f.; Jl 2 1, 15, 3 16, 17, 21; Is 24 23). (6) In the Psalter, Zion is scarcely ever mentioned except in connection with the Temple and its worship (cf. Ps 20 2, 78 68 f., 87 2, 5, 48 2, 74 2, 76 2, 99 2, 132 13, 146 10, 9 11, 14, 2 6, 53 6, 87 2, 14 7, 50 2, 110 2, 128 5, 133 3, 134 3, 51 18 f., 65 1, 84 7, 137 1, 3, 102 21, 147 12, 125 1). (7) In the Apocrypha, Zion is identified with the Temple mount in the same manner as in the earlier literature (cf. I Mac 4 37 f., 5 54, 7 32, 14 27; Sir 24 10; I Es 8 81). (8) Josephus never uses the name Zion, but in Ant. I, 13 2 he states that David's tent for the Ark (on Zion, according to II S 6 12) was pitched on the same mountain on which the Temple afterward stood. We thus find an unbroken tradition from the earliest times down to about 100 A.D. identifying Zion with the E. hill. In certain poetical passages Zion is used in parallelism with J., as tho it were a name for the whole city, but this is evidently a case of synecdoche. In prose Zion is never anything else than the Temple hill. The modern tradition which identifies Zion with SW is probably derived from the old 'Zion' Church that stood in this quarter (see § 42, below).

17. Ophel. The hill of Ophel ('ōphēl') is first mentioned in Mic 4 8 as 'the hill [ōphēl mg.] of the daughter of Zion.' Since Zion was the E. ridge, Ophel must have lain on the same ridge. From Neh 3 26 f., 11 21; II Ch 27 3, 33 14; Jos., BJ, V, 4 2, 6 1, it is certain that Ophel was the part of the E. hill immediately S. of the Temple.

18. Moriah. The use of the name 'Moriah' for the Temple mount is peculiar to II Ch 3 1. Gn 22 2, 14 (editorial) seems also to know it, since it explains it as meaning the place where men ought to appear before J'; that is, the Temple. In all early writings Zion is the name for the Temple mount. Moriah is apparently a late Jewish designation that has arisen from the conjecture that the altar on Zion was the scene of Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac (in Gn 22 2 it is described as one of the mountains of the land of Moriah). If this is a real name, it must be supposed to refer to one of the smaller peaks of the E. ridge, or Zion. Moriah will then be the northern summit, Ophel the central, and City of David the southern.

II. HISTORY OF JERUSALEM.

I. The Canaanite Period.

19. Jebusite Jerusalem. Concerning the origin of the city of Jerusalem we have no information. Even the etymology of the name is uncertain. Ezk 16 3 says of the city: 'Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of the Canaanite; the Amorite was thy father, and thy mother was a Hittite.' In Gn 14 18 it is uncertain whether Salem, the residence of Melchizedek, has anything to do with Jerusalem (see SALEM). The identification first appears in Ps 76 2 and is followed by Jos. Ant. I, 10 2; VII, 3 2. Even if Salem be Jerusalem, the story of Melchizedek is of such uncertain origin that it throws no light upon the early history of the city (see MELCHIZEDEK).

In the Tell-el-Amarna tablets (1400 B.C.) the city appears as Urusalim (Winckler, Tell el-Amarna Letters, Nos. 179-185; Knudtzon, Die El-Amarna Tafeln, Nos. 285-290). Its king Abd-hiba appeals to the Pharaoh Amenhotep IV for help against an invading people called the Habiru (Hebrews). J. next appears at the time of the Israelite conquest about 1200 B.C. According to Jos 1 10, its king joined with the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon in a confederacy against the Israelites. He was defeated by Joshua, but his city was not taken (cf. Jg 1 1-7). According to Jos 15 63; Jg 1 21, 19 12, the city remained in the hands of Jebusites. The Jebusites appear in lists of the tribes of Canaan in JE (Gn 10 16, 15 21; Ex 3 8, 17, 33 2, 34 11; Nu 13 29), in D (Ex 13 5, 23 23; Dt 7 1, 20 17), also in Jos 3 10, 9 1, 11 3, 12 8, 24 11; Jg 3 5; I K 9 20=II Ch 8 7; Ezr 9 1; Neh 9 8. They were doubtless of the same Semitic stock as the other Canaanites. In the light of Urusalim in the Amarna letters it seems likely that Jebus, as a name for the city, is a late formation out of Jebusite. The stronghold of the Jebusites was subsequently called the City of David. It must, therefore, have lain on the S. end of the E. hill, near the spring of Gihon. Whether settlements had also been made on the W. hill we have no means of determining. The possibility that this was the case is suggested by Jg 19 11 f.; Jos 15 8; Jos. Ant. VII, 3 2; BJ, V, 4 1.

II. Davidic Period.

20. Millo. According to II S 5 6 f.=I Ch 11 4 f., David captured the stronghold of Zion, made it his residence, and called it the City of David. Here he undertook the following operations: A structure called 'Millo' is mentioned in II S 5 9; I K 9 15, 24, 11 27; II Ch 32 5. From these passages we gather that it was a fortification of some sort, which was already in existence when David took the city, and it could be successively enlarged by David, Solomon, and Hezekiah; that it lay in the City of David; and that it defended this city on its weakest side. Apparently it was a rampart, which protected the N. end of the SE. hill. The LXX. identifies it with the Akra, a citadel S. of the Temple. The name millō, 'filling,' like Assy. mulā, or tamlā, suggests that it was a double wall filled in with earth, such as the excavations have disclosed in the contemporary city of Gezer. (Cf. Macalister's report in PEFQ., April, 1924).

21. David's Wall. In II S 5 9 it is stated that 'David built round about from Millo.' This can only refer to a wall enclosing the City of David. It began at the Millo, or embankment, which crossed the S. portion of the E. hill, followed the Kidron at some distance above its bed, encircled the rocky cliff at the S. end of the hill above Siloam, and then ran up the E. side of the Trypæon valley to join the Millo once more. Traces of this wall and of the rock scarps that formed its foundation were discovered by Bliss on the E. and S. sides of the SE. hill. In this wall perhaps was the Tower of David (Song 4 4). The tower near the Jaffa Gate, known to-day as the Tower of David, is really the tower Phasaëlus, built by Herod as a part of his palace.

22. David's Palace. In II S 5 9 (LXX.), 5 11 it is recorded that David built him a house in the City of David. Neh 12 37 indicates that it stood at the N. end of the city. According to II S 5 11, it was erected by Tyrian workmen sent by Hiram. The walls were of stone, and it was roofed with cedar beams from Lebanon (cf. II S 7 2, 11 8, 9, 27, 15 16, 19 11, 30, 20 3).

23. The Guard-House. Neh 3 16 mentions, as situated in the City of David, the 'house of the mighty men.' This seems to have been a dwelling for the men of the body-guard, whose names are recorded in II S 23 8-39.

24. David's Sepulcher. I K 2 10 tells us that 'David slept with his fathers and was buried in the City of David.' All the other kings of Judah down to Ahaz were buried in this tomb, according to the Book of Kings. Ezk 43 7 speaks of it as adjoining the wall of the Temple. Neh 3 16 mentions it as lying between the Pool of Siloam and the Water Gate on the E. side of the city. These statements are inconsistent with the traditional location of the Tomb of David on the S. end of the W. hill (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII, 8 4; XVI, 7 1; Ac 2 29).

iii. Solomon's Period.

25. The Temple. With Solomon a new building era began in Jerusalem. The following structures are ascribed to him by the Book of Kings: The 'house,' or sanctuary proper, stood on the summit of the E. hill a little W. of the ṣakhra, or 'Rock' under the Dome of the Rock, which marks the site of the altar of burnt offering. The name d'bhār ('oracle') for the Holy of Holies means properly 'west,' and shows that it lay at the W. end of the Temple (cf. Ezk 8 16). The Temple proper was surrounded with a court, which in I K 6 36 is called the inner court, to distinguish it from the great, or outer court, that enclosed all Solomon's buildings. In Jer 36 10 it is called the upper court, because it stood on a higher level. Unlike the later Temples of Zerubbabel and of Herod, Solomon's Temple had only one court (see TEMPLE, §§ 6, 24, 27, 31 f.).

26. The King's House. According to I K 3 1, 7 1, 9 1, 10, 15, 10 4, 5, 12, Solomon built a palace for himself at the same time that he reared the house of J'. This is frequently mentioned in the later history under the name of the 'king's house.' From many passages it is clear that it adjoined the Temple (cf. I K 6 36, 7 8, 12; Is 1 26 ff.; Ps 2 6; II K 12 18, 14 14, 16 8, 18 15, 24 13, 25 9; Jer 36 12 ff.). It can not have adjoined it on the N., because that quarter was not yet enclosed, nor on the E. or W., because there was no room. It must accordingly have lain S. of the Temple. With this agree numerous passages which speak of the palace as higher than the City of David and lower than the Temple (cf. I K 8 1, 9 24, 10 5; II K 11 19; Jer 22 1, 26 10; Mic 4 8).

27. The House of Pharaoh's Daughter. Adjacent to Solomon's palace, probably on the W., was the house of Pharaoh's daughter, or the Harem (I K 7 8, 9 24). These two buildings were surrounded with a court spoken of as 'another court' (I K 7 8), or the middle court (II K 20 4 mg.), or the court of the guard (Jer 32 2; II K 11 5, 19; II Ch 23 5; Neh 12 39, 3 25). The N. wall of this court was identical with the S. wall of the inner, or Temple court.

28. The Porch of Judgment. According to I K 7 7, S. of the middle, or palace court, stood the 'porch of judgment.' It served as the royal audience-chamber, and contained Solomon's throne of ivory and gold (I K 10 18-20).

29. The Porch of Pillars. A little S. of the porch of Judgment stood the 'porch of pillars' (I K 7 6), which measured 50 by 30 cubits. Apparently, it served as an anteroom to the throne-room in which Solomon held audience.

30. The House of the Forest of Lebanon. The most southerly of the buildings on the Temple hill was the 'house of the forest of Lebanon' (I K 7 2). Its dimensions were 100 by 50 cubits. Its roof was supported by forty-five pillars of cedar wood in three rows. According to I K 10 16 f., Is 22 8 (cf. 39 2=II K 20 13), it was used as a royal armory. Its name was derived from the cedar trunks that formed its pillars. Its proximity to the palace is shown not only by the narrative of I K ch. 7, but also by I K 10 16 f., which states that the shields were kept in it that were borne before the king on festal occasions. The last three buildings, as well as the inner and the middle court, were included in the outer, or great court, which surrounded all Solomon's edifices (I K 7 12). See LEBANON.

31. Solomon's Wall. According to II S 5 9, David built the wall of the City of David. According to I K 3 1, 9 15, Solomon built the wall of J. round about. Jerusalem must be a larger idea than the City of David, and this new wall must have enclosed part at least of the W. hill, which before this time had been undefended. In I K 8 1=II Ch 5 2; II K 9 28, 14 20; Is 10 12, 32, 22 10, 30 19; Jer 51 35; Zec 1 14; Neh 3 15, 12 37 the City of David, or Zion, is distinguished from J. as a part from the whole. This indicates that even in preexilic times the city had spread to the W. hill. On the N. Solomon's wall probably coincided with the first, or inner, wall described by Jos. BJ, V, 4 2, which ran from the Tower of Hippicus, near the modern Jaffa gate, straight E. to the W. wall of the Temple. On the S. it probably followed the inner line of fortification discovered by Bliss around the S. summit of the W. hill. Not until a later time was it found necessary to enclose the lower S. slopes of the W. hill (see § 35, below).

32. Gates in Solomon's Wall. The upper gate, or gate of Benjamin, is described in I K 15 35=I Ch 27 3; II Ch 23 20; Jer 20 2, 37 13; Ezk 8 3, 14, 9 2; Zec 14 10 as lying in the N. wall of the Temple court, which was at the same time the N. wall of Solomon's city. The gate of Ephraim, according to II K 14 13=II Ch 25 23; Neh 8 10, 12 39, was situated in the N. wall on the W. hill, 400 cubits from the NW. corner of the city. The corner gate, according to II K 14 13=II Ch 25 23, 26 9; Jer 31 38, lay at the NW. corner of Solomon's city, substantially on the site of the modern Jaffa gate. The valley gate, according to II Ch 26 9, Neh 2 13-15, 3 13, opened upon the Valley of Hinnom, and is to be identified with the ancient gate which Bliss excavated on the SW. slope of the W. hill. It was probably the same as the gate Harsith of Jer 19 2. Just beyond this lay the 'turning of the wall' (II Ch 26 9), which corresponds with the bending northward of the inner wall discovered by Bliss. The horse gate, according to II K 11 16=II Ch 23 15; Jer 31 40; Neh 3 28; Jos. Ant. IX, 7 3, lay in the E. wall near the SE. corner of the Temple enclosure.

IV. Period of Hezekiah and Manasseh.

33. The Interval between Solomon and Hezekiah. After the death of Solomon J. does not seem to have received any enlargement for nearly 200 years. It was not until the Northern Kingdom began to decline after the death of Jeroboam II in 744 B.C. that the fortunes of Judah revived. Uzziah is the first king of whom extensive building operations are recorded (cf. II Ch. ch. 26; Jos. Ant. IX, 11 2). His son Jotham, according to II Ch 27 3, 'built the upper gate of the house of Jehovah, and on the wall of Ophel he built much' (cf. Jos. Ant. IX, 11 2). Under Hezekiah (719-691 B.C.) still more extensive public works were undertaken.

34. Hezekiah's Conduit. II K 20 20, 18 17=Is 36 2; II Ch 32 4, 30; Is 7 3, 22 9, 11 speak of a new conduit, constructed by Hezekiah in anticipation of Sennacherib's invasion, to bring the waters of Gihon down to the W. side of the City of David. This can only be the rock-hewn tunnel under the E. hill, which leads the waters of the Virgin's Fountain to the upper pool of Siloam. In this an ancient Heb. inscription has been found, the so called Siloam Inscription, which reads as follows: 'The tunnel. And this was the history of the tunnel. While still . . . the picks were each over against one another, and while three cubits still [remained to be excavated there was heard] the voice of one calling to the other, for there was a zdh in the rock, toward the south and toward the north. And on the day of the tunnel the quarrymen struck pick against pick, one over against the other. And the waters flowed from the source to the pool, one thousand two hundred cubits. And a hundred cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the quarrymen.' This was doubtless erected by Hezekiah's workmen, and is the oldest Israelite inscription of any length that has come down to us. The word mōtsā which this inscription uses for 'source' is the same one that II Ch 32 30 uses for the 'spring' of Gihon (see §§ 11 and 12, above).

35. Hezekiah's Wall. From II Ch 32 5; Is 22 10 f. it appears that Hezekiah built a new outer wall. Two outer walls are known to archeology, one on the N., the other on the S. From the expression 'between the two walls,' which Is 22 10 f. (701 B.C.) uses of the upper pool of Siloam, it appears that Hezekiah's wall must have been the outer wall on the S., since the two walls can only have been the wall on the W. side of the E. hill, and the wall on the E. side of the W. hill. This is the wall described by Nehemiah in 3 13-15, 12 31-37; Jos BJ, V, 4 2, and it is the outer line of fortification on the S. excavated by Bliss. It ran in a long loop around the extreme S. end of the W. hill, crossed the Tyropœon above Siloam, and there joined the wall of the City of David.

36. Manasseh's Wall. According to II Ch 33 14, Manasseh 'built an outer wall to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entrance at the fish gate.' The mention of the fish gate shows that Manasseh's construction was the second wall on the N., in which the fish gate is known to have been situated (Neh 3 3, 12 39). The mishneh, or second quarter, college AV (II K 22 14=II Ch 34 22; Zeph 1 10), which lay near the fish gate, is not mentioned before Manasseh. Manasseh and his successors are the first kings who are said to have been buried in J., but not in the City of David (II K 21 18; II Ch 33 20; II K 21 26, 23 30=II Ch 35 24). Apparently, therefore, the mishneh was the new quarter enclosed by Manasseh's second wall on the N., and in this quarter were the tombs of Manasseh and his successors. Here also was the makhtēsh (Maktesh Zeph 1 11), or 'the mortar' (mg.), a region inhabited by Canaanites='traders.' This outer wall was the one rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh 3 1-8, 12 39) and described by Jos BJ, V, 4 2. From neither of these descriptions can the course of this wall be traced with certainty, and the evidence of archeology is equally obscure. Only one fact is certain, namely that an ancient wall followed the line of the present N. wall from the Jaffa gate to the Damascus gate. Whether this was the second or the third wall described by Josephus (BJ, V, 4 2) is one of the most difficult problems of Jerusalem archeology, in regard to which there is as yet no consensus of opinion. The theory which identifies the present wall with the third wall appeals to the location of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher inside of this wall. Christ was crucified outside of the second wall; hence it is claimed that the present N. wall can not be the second. Unfortunately the genuineness of the Sepulcher rests upon too slender historical evidence for its location to be a decisive argument in the case. It is also claimed that remains of the second wall are found inside of the Church of the Sepulcher; but a careful examination of the stones makes it doubtful whether any of them ever belonged to a city wall. The wall as laid down by Schick inside of the Sepulcher follows an inconceivably bad course, running on low ground all the way, and making three rectangular bends without reason. It does not correspond with Josephus's description of it as 'circling about,' and it does not do justice to his statements in regard to the distance between the second and the third wall, the size of the city, and the distance of the third wall from the monument of Helena and from Scopus. We must conclude, accordingly, that the remains along the line of the present N. wall are to be identified with Manasseh's wall, the second wall of Josephus; and that the third wall built by Agrippa in 43 A.D. is to be sought still further N. in the remains described by Robinson in 1838.

V. Persian, Greek, Maccabean, and Herodian Periods.

37. Nehemiah's Wall. Nehemiah rebuilt on the old lines and included all that had been added by the early kings. On the E. and W. his line coincided with that of David and Solomon, on the S. with that of Hezekiah, and on the N. with that of Manasseh. His account of it is found in Neh 2-15, ch. 3, 12-27-40. This was identical with the wall of Josephus (BJ, V, 4 2), exclusive of the third, or outer wall on the N.

38. Gates, etc., in Nehemiah's Wall. From Neh 3 1, 32, 12 39, it appears that the sheep gate was identical with the upper gate, or gate of Benjamin (see § 32, above), and lay on the N. side of the Temple enclosure. A little NW. of this lay the tower of Ham-meah, Meah AV (Neh 3 1, 12 39). This is identical with the birāh, or castle, which Neh 2 8 describes as 'the castle which appertaineth to the house (of Jehovah)' (cf. Neh 7 2). The word is the Assyrian birtu, 'fortress,' and is not found in the O T before the Persian period. The castle was the residence of the Persian governor and later of the Hasmonean (Maccabean) priest-kings. Josephus (Ant. XV, 11 4; XVIII, 4 3; BJ, I, 21 1) calls it Baris. It was rebuilt by Herod the Great and was named Antonia in honor of Mark Antony. Josephus gives a detailed description of it in BJ, V, 4 2, 5 8. From this it appears that it lay on the side of the modern Turkish barracks, on a cliff near the NW. corner of the Temple court. According to BJ, V, 5 8, it was connected with the Temple by a portico. It was garrisoned with a strong force of Roman soldiers, and was used as a stronghold, if there should be any commotion in the Temple (cf. Ac 21 30-40, 23 10, 16, 32). This castle should be carefully distinguished from the Akra, or 'citadel,' which lay S. of the Temple (see § 15, above).

Still further NW. was the tower of Hananei, Hananeel AV (Neh 3 1, 12 39; Jer 31 38; Zec 14 10), on the cliff near the present Damascus gate, at the N. corner of the city. Just beyond this was the fish gate (Neh 3 3, 12 39; II Ch 33 14; Zeph 1 10), which is to be identified with the modern Damascus gate. Apparently it was the same as the middle gate (Jr 39 1-3). The old gate (Neh 3 6, 12 39; Zec 14 10, read שן, 'old,' instead of שןא, 'first') is identified by Zec 14 10 and by the order in Neh with the corner gate that stood in the NW corner of Solomon's wall (see § 32, above). The broad wall (Neh 3 8, 12 39) corresponds with the present W. wall of the city S. of the Jaffa gate. The tower of the furnaces (Neh 3 11, 12 38) corresponds with the rock-cut foundations of a tower known as Maudslay's Scarp in the grounds of Bishop Gobat's School. The valley gate (Neh 2 13, 3 13, 12 31) we have met already at the SW. corner of Solomon's wall (see § 32, above). The dung gate (Neh 2 13, 3 13, 12 31) is the ancient gate excavated by Bliss at the extreme S. corner of the city. The fountain gate (Neh 2 14, 3 15, 12 37), as its name implies, lay close to the fountain of Siloam at the point where the wall crossed the Tyropæon valley. It is the same as 'the gate between the two walls' (II K 25 4; Jer 39 4, 52 7). Next came the pool of Siloam (Neh 2 14, 3 15; see § 13, above). The king's garden (II K 25 4; Jer 39 4, 52 7; Neh 3 15) was the fertile tract in the mouth of the Tyropæon that was watered by the overflow from Siloam. Here apparently were situated the king's wine-presses (Zec 14 10). The stairs of the City of David (Neh 3 15, 12 37) correspond with rock-hewn steps that may still be seen at the S. end of the E. hill. The wall described in Neh 3 16-26 followed the line of the one excavated by Bliss and Guthe on the E. side of the E. hill. The 'tower standing out' is the tower excavated by Warren S. of the Haram. The water gate (Neh 3 26, 12 37, 8 1) lay near this tower and gave access to the spring of Gihon. The horse gate (Neh 3 28) we have met already in Solomon's wall by the SE. corner of the Temple court (see § 32, above). The gate of Hammiphkad, 'the mustering' (Neh 3 31), was identical with the old east gate of the Temple (see TEMPLE, § 8).

39. Between Nehemiah and N T Times. During this interval J. had come to be the religious center of world-wide Judaism. Under the Maccabees and, to a still greater degree, under Herod the Great, its population increased rapidly. The Maccabean princes paid much attention to buildings and fortifications. On the W. hill they erected their palace. On the same hill Herod the Great erected his most magnificent palace (Jos. BJ, V, 4 4). Herod greatly strengthened the fortifications of the city, notably by the erection of the three imposing towers, Hippicus, Phasaëlus, and Mariamme, all in the W. wall. A hippodrome, a gymnasium, and a theater were also features of the J. of Herod. It was under the construction (see TEMPLE, §§ 29-34), involving extensive alterations in the walls and fortifications of the Temple hill. In fact, the J. of the N T times was practically a new city.

VI. New Testament Period.

40. Extent of the City. Nehemiah's wall was the outermost wall in the time of Christ, and there was probably a large extramural population. The third wall on the N. was not built by Agrippa until several years after the Crucifixion.

41. Jesus' Visits to Jerusalem. Christ's relation to J. was only that of an occasional visitor. His first three appearances are connected with the Temple (Lk 2 22-39, 41-50; Jn 2 13-22); His fourth, with the Pool of Bethesda (Jn ch. 5; see § 12, above); His fifth, with the Temple (Jn ch. 7 f.); His sixth, with Siloam (Jn ch. 9; see § 13, above). On His seventh and last visit He made His triumphal entry into the Temple and taught there on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday of Passion Week (Mk chs. 11-16, and ||s).

42. The Upper Room. On Thursday Jesus ate the Last Supper with His disciples. The scene of this meal was a large upper room (Mk 14 15), probably in the home of Mary, the mother of Mark. This same upper room seems to have been the meeting-place of the infant Church after the Ascension. Epiphanius records (Weights and Measures, ch. 14) that Hadrian, on his visit to J. (135 A.D.), found this building still standing in spite of the destruction of the city in 70 A.D. This testimony is confirmed by other early evidence, and there seems, accordingly, good reason to believe that the traditional Cenaculum on the S. end of the W. hill (now the Moslem Tomb of David) is the real scene of the Last Supper, of the descent of the Holy Spirit, and of the founding of the first church of Christendom. Adjoining the Cenaculum a building known as the 'Church of Zion,' or 'Church of the Apostles,' existed as early as the 4th cent.

43. Palace of Caiaphas. From the Last Supper Christ went to the Garden of Gethsemane on the W. slope of the Mount of Olives (Mk 14 26; Jn 18 1). Here He was apprehended by the officers and taken to the High Priest Annas, and by him sent to Caiaphas (Jn 18 12, 24). A tradition which goes back to the Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 A.D.) places the priestly palace on the W. hill near the Cenaculum. This is probably correct, since this was the quarter in which the Jewish priestly aristocracy dwelt.

44. The Pretorium and Pavement. From the palace of Caiaphas He was taken to the Pretorium (Gr. πραιτώριον, judgment-hall AV) of Pilate (Jn 18 28). Tradition identifies this with the Castle of Antonia at the NW. corner of the Temple area, on the site of the modern Turkish barracks (see § 38, above); but it is unlikely that the governor made his residence with the common soldiers in the fortress, and the best recent authorities are agreed that by Pretorium is meant the palace of Herod the Great, on the site of the modern Citadel, near the Jaffa gate. The Jews were unwilling to enter the Pretorium for fear of ceremonial defilement, so Pilate went out to them to a place called Gabbatha, or Pavement (Jn 19 13), which was probably the large open court in the center of Herod's palace, corresponding with the court in the center of the modern Citadel. Pilate sent Jesus to Herod Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee, who was probably residing at the old palace of the Hasmonians on the E. side of the W. hill opposite the Temple, on the site of the modern Ashkenazi Synagog (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV, 1 2, 4 2, 13 3 f.; XVIII, 4 3; XX, 8 11; BJ, I, 6 1, 13 3 f.; II, 16 3, 17 6), and Herod returned him to Pilate. Pilate then sentenced Jesus to death, and He was led out to be crucified.

45. Golgotha, Calvary. The traditional scene of the Crucifixion and entombment is the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in the NW. quarter of the modern city. If the second wall on the N. ran inside of this site, it may be genuine; but if, as is probable (see § 36, above), the second wall corresponds with the present N. wall, from the Jaffa gate to the Damascus gate, then the traditional Sepulcher can not be genuine, for all our authorities agree that Jesus was crucified and buried outside the city wall (Mt 27 32; Mk 15 20; Jn 19 17, 21, 41; He 13 12). Where the real place of crucifixion was must remain a matter of conjecture. Our only clue for its identification is its Aram. name Golgotha, skull (Lat. Calvaria, Eng. Calvary), which can hardly have been given because it was a place of execution, or because of a tradition connecting it with the skull of Adam, but must have referred to its shape. There is a knoll just outside of the Damascus gate which bears a singular resemblance to a skull, and many modern travelers have conjectured that this is the real Golgotha.

46. Akeldama, Potter's Field. 'Akeldama' (from the Aram. ܐܟܠܕܡܐ, hāqaldmā, 'field of blood') was the name of a piece of land near J. that was used for the burial of strangers. According to Mt 27 3-9, it was originally a potter's field, and received the name Akeldama from the fact that it was bought with the money paid Judas to betray Jesus, and subsequently returned by him to the chief priests. According to Ac 1 18 f. it was called the 'field of blood' because Judas here committed suicide. Harmonistic commentators have supposed that Judas bought the field with the price of his treachery, killed himself there, and that then the field was bought by the priests with the money that he had returned. More probably Akeldama is an old name for which Christian tradition has given two independent interpretations. Since the 7th cent. a place known as Hakk ed-Damm, 'price of blood,' on a cliff S. of the Wādī er-Rabābī, SW. of Siloam, has been regarded as Akeldama, and its possession as a holy place has been keenly contested by the Christian sects. Whether there is any authority for this identification we do not know. The absence of clay in the neighborhood makes it an unlikely location for a potter's field.

47. The Synagog of Theodotos. In 1914 remains of a synagog of the early Christian era were discovered on the E. hill south of the site of the Temple with an inscription stating that it was erected by Theodotos, son of Vettanos, for the use of strangers coming from outside. This is an interesting monument of the Jews of the Diaspora. See PEFQ, LIII (1921), 2 ff., 175 ff.

JERUSAH, ji-ru'sa (יְרוּשָׁה, yērūshā') and JERUSAH, ji-ru'sha (יְרוּשָׁה, yērūshāh): The mother of Jotham, King of Judah (II K 15 33; II Ch 27 1).

JESAJAH, ji-se'ya (יְשַׁעְיָה, yēsha'yāh), and JESHAIH, ji-shē'ya (יְשַׁעְיָה, yēsha'yāhū), 'J' saves': 1. A descendant of Moses (I Ch 26 25). 2. The ancestral head of one of the courses of musicians (I Ch 25 3, 15). 3. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 24). 4. One of the leaders of Ezra's company (Ezr 8 7). 5. A Merarite Levite (Ezr 8 10). 6. A descendant of Benjamin (Neh 11 7).

JESHANAH, jesh'a-na or ji-shē'na (יְשָׁנָה, yēshā-nāh): A town of Ephraim, near Bethel, captured by Ahijah, King of Judah (II Ch 13 19). It has recently been located at Burj el Isāneh, a hill about 3,100 ft. high, 5½ m. N. of Bethel (see Bul. ASOR., Feb., 1923). See also SHEN. E. E. N.

JESHARELAH, jesh''e-rī'la (יְשָׁרְיָה, yēshar-ēlāh): The ancestral head of the seventh course of musicians (I Ch 25 14). See also ASHARELAH.

JESHEBEAB, ji-sheb'i-āb or ji-shī'bī-āb (יְשִׁעְבֶּעֲבָא, yēshebb'ābh): The ancestral head of the fourteenth course of priests (I Ch 24 13).

JESHER, ji'shūr (יֶשֶׁר, yēsher): The 'son' of Jerioth, 'wife' of Caleb (I Ch 2 18). Probably a place-name.

JESHIMON, jesh'i-men or ji-shai'men (יְשִׁמֹן, yēshimōn): A desert. In a few instances the word is regarded as a geographical term. In Nu 21 20 Pisgah is said to look down upon Jeshimon. Some scholars locate the place here referred to in the Jordan Valley, NE. of the Dead Sea. At the same time, however, it is the name of the desert into which David retired before Saul. It was near Ziph and Maon, which lay to the SE. of Hebron, and, consequently, designates the E. section of the Judean hills, which stretch toward the Dead Sea. This is an absolutely barren region with many natural fastnesses, and has ever been the home of the outlaw (I S 23 19, 24, 26 1, 3). J. A. K.

JESHISHAI, ji-shai'shai or ji-shai'shē (יֶשִׁישַׁי, yēshīshay): A Gadite (I Ch 5 14).

JESHOAHIAH, ji'sho-hē'ya or jesh''o-hē'ya (יֶשְׁוֵהְיָה, yēshōhāyāh): A Simeonite (I Ch 4 36).

JESHUA, jesh'u-a (יֵשׁוּעַ, yēshūa'), 'J' is salvation'; another form of 'Joshua': I. 1. A name used once for Joshua, the son of Nun (q.v.) (Neh 8 17). 2. The name of the 9th of the twenty-four classes of priests (I Ch 24 11, Jeshuah AV). 3. The name of a family of Pahath-moab, which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 6; Neh 7 11). 4. One of the Levites in charge of the distribution of the tithes (II Ch 31 15). 5. The high priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, called 'Joshua' in Hag 1 1, and Zec 3 1 ff.). He helped in rebuilding the altar (Ezr 3 2, 8) and the house of God (Ezr 4 3, 5 2; cf. Ezr 10 18; Neh 12 1, 7, 10, 26). 6. A Levitical family, or its heads, who assisted in rebuilding the Temple (Ezr 3 9), in expounding the Law (Neh 8 7), and in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 9 [10]; cf. Ezr 2 40, 8 33; Neh 3 19, 7 43, 9 4, 5, 12 8, 24).

II. A postexilic town in the S. of Judah (Neh 11 26). Conder identifies it with Khirbet Sa'wi, Map II, D 4. Perhaps it is the same as the Shema of Jos 15 26 (Sheba in Jos 19 2). C. S. T.

JESHURUN, jesh'u-run (יֵשׁוּרֻן, yēshūrūn), 'upright one': A poetical name of Israel designating it under its ideal character. In Dt 32 15 it is used in reproach of Israel, which had departed from its ideal; elsewhere it is a title of honor (Dt 33 5, 26; Is 44 2). C. S. T.

JESIAH, ji-sai'a. See ISSIAH.

JESIMIEL, ji-sim'i-el (יְשִׁמְיֵאל, yēsimī'ēl), 'God places': A Simeonite (I Ch 4 36).

JESSE, jes'i (יֵשָׁע, yēshay): The grandson of Boaz (Ru 4 22; Mt 1 6), and, apparently, a prominent inhabitant of Bethlehem. From his descent we should assume that he was the chief man of the village. He is almost always mentioned in connection with his youngest son David (I S 16 1 ff., etc.). David, during his pursuit by Saul, sent his parents, who must have been aged, to the king of Moab (I S 22 3 ff.). So to treat with a neighboring prince indicates the prominence of David and his family. J.'s name appears also in Is 11 1, 10, where the contrast is between small beginnings and future glory, as in Mic 5 2.

A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

JESUI, jes'iu-ai. See ISHVAH.

JESUS (Ἰησοῦς): The Gr. form of 'Joshua,' or 'Jeshua.' See JOSHUA. 1. For Joshua (so RV), the son of Nun, in AV (Ac 7 45; He 4 8). 2. A Jew in Rome called Justus, a fellow worker and comforter of Paul (Col 4 11). 3. An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 29, Jose, AV). 4. Jesus, the Christ, Son of Mary (see next article).

I. INTRODUCTORY.

1. Sources. The only sources for the life of Christ which need to be considered are the four Gospels. The reference in Tacitus (Ann. XV, 44) merely alludes to Christ as the originator of an exitiabilis superstitio, which in spite of His execution under Pilate succeeded in reaching Rome; that in Josephus (Ant. XVIII, 33) is a Christian interpolation. The later calumnies of the Talmud and the Toledoth Jesu show the relation of Jews to Christians, but have nothing to do with the life of Jesus (cf. Herford's Christianity in Talmud and Midrash). Even the other writings of the N T add nothing to speak of. In Ac 20 35 we have the one word of Jesus outside of the Gospels which is indubitably authentic; there may be another concealed in I Th 4 15. The ἑγέρων, or unwritten sayings of Jesus, have been collected by Resch and sifted by Ropes (Texte u. Untersuchungen, V, 4; XIV, 2), but they do not add to our knowledge of Him; and the same must be said of the apocryphal gospels, not excepting the Gospel of Peter, a large fragment of which was discovered in 1892, and of the Λόγια Ἰησοῦ (1897), and New Sayings of Jesus (1904), published by Grenfell and Hunt. The interest of religion and of history in Jesus must be satisfied from the canonical Gospels, or not at all. The indubitable Pauline epistles, of course, establish the fact that He lived, and that He made an extraordinary impression on His followers; but they hardly yield any picture of His life. It is important, therefore, to indicate the nature and value of our Gospels.

Taking together Mk, Mt, and Lk, there are some points on which scholars are practically agreed. (1) The common framework of the narrative—that is, the general order of the events—is originally due to Mk. Hence in questions of order, Mk, Mt, and Lk, as against John, are not three witnesses, but one. Mk's narrative, according to the unanimous tradition of the Church, represents the teaching of Peter; but the oldest tradition (Papias' elder in Euseb. HE, III, 39) does not claim for it the merit of chronological order. (2) The great mass of words of Jesus, common to Mt and Lk, but not found in Mk, probably came from a document used in a somewhat different form by the first and third Evangelists; this document in its original form was older than Mk (tho Wellhausen, Einleitung, S. 73 ff., denies this), and was the work of the Apostle Matthew. (3) Taking into account the space between the baptism and the death of Jesus, the matter peculiar to Mt belongs to what is historically of least value in his Gospel, that peculiar to Lk to what is of most value in his. (4) The use which a historian can make of John has been and is much disputed. The extremes are represented by Loisy (Le quatrième Évangile) or Wrede (Charakter und Tendenz des Johannesevangeliums) on the one hand, who do not regard it as historical at all in comparison with the Synoptics, and by Westcott or Godet on the other. Sanday's Criticism of the Fourth Gospel (1905) gives a fair survey of the whole question, as also Stanton's The Gospels as Historical Documents, Part III (1920), The Fourth Gospel. The difficulty arises from the juxtaposition in the Fourth Gospel of what seem irreconcilable things; on the one hand, an element that is either irreducibly historical or, which is an impossible alternative, gratuitous fiction—notes of time, place, personal names, and characters, more vivid and precise than anything in the Synoptics; and on the other, especially in the discourses ascribed to Jesus, something at once systematic and elusive, a mingling in uncertain proportions of tradition, symbol, and doctrine, which makes the page waver as we read, as the colors waver in watered silk, and suggests that what we hear is not so much the voice of Jesus, as He spoke in the fields of Galilee or the streets of Jerusalem, as the voice of the Risen Lord, speaking through His Spirit in the soul of an aged, deeply experienced, and profoundly reflective disciple. This state of the case has simply to be recognized. The notes of time and place in John are of the highest value, especially where they seem intentionally to correct the Synoptic tradition (e.g., Jn 3 24, compared with Mt 4 12); but for the historical form of the teaching of Jesus we must depend mainly on the Synoptics. Garvie in his book, The Beloved Disciple (1922), has sought to discriminate more exactly what is historical testimony and what is theological interpretation in the Fourth Gospel. He distinguishes the Synoptic element (the appendix and other passages dealing with the Galilean disciples), the Ephesian element (the Prolog, and other theological explanations), and the contribution of an eyewitness, consisting of his reminiscences after a lapse of many years, and his reflexions on these reminiscences, for him not distinguishable, but the truth into which the Spirit had guided him in the interpretation of the facts. A new line of investigation has been opened by C. J. Burney in his book The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel (1922). He regards the Gospel as a Greek translation of an Aramaic original composed in Antioch about A.D. 75-80. His view has not found general acceptance, and the data on which he relies seem to be equally explicable by the assumption that the Greek original was written by one whose mother-tongue was Aramaic. Foakes-Jackson and Kirsopp Lake, in The Beginnings of Christianity, part I, vol. i, set aside the Fourth Gospel entirely, and use only Mark, supplemented by Matthew and Luke; and even as regards these sources exercise a radical criticism, which reduces the historical reality of Jesus to that of a puppet, who proclaimed the coming of the Kingdom of God, and called the people to repentance. At many parts their criticism appears to be arbitrary, and does not command confidence. See also GOSPELS and THE SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.

2. Chronology. The life of Jesus, so far as it is covered by the apostolic testimony—in other words, so far as we have strictly historical evidence for it—extends from the baptism of John to the Ascension (Ac 1 21). To know the length of this period is more important than to be able to date either its beginning which is elaborately done in Lk 3 1) or its end. The Synoptics mention only one passover, that at which Jesus died, and leave a prima facie impression that His ministry lasted a year or rather less (Lk 4 19 was interpreted thus by many of the Fathers and perhaps by the Evangelist); but John corrects this. He mentions at least three passovers (2 13, 6 4—this is shown to be a passover by the 'much grass' in ver. 10, even if the words τὸ πᾶσχα were not originally in the text—and 12 1); that is, he extends the ministry of Jesus to somewhat over two years. References in the Synoptics yield undesigned and, therefore, strong support to this. Thus the 'green grass' in Mk 6 39 suggests the spring season, as in Jn 6 10, and, tho the incident may be misplaced, the same holds of the plucking the ears of corn Mk 2 23. Earlier visits of Jesus to Jerusalem, tho not mentioned by the Synoptics, are suggested not only by Mt 23 37 ('how often would I have gathered thy children together'), but by Lk 10 38 (the village is Bethany, close by Jerusalem), and by the friends and acquaintances whom Jesus evidently had in the capital (Mk 14 13 ff., 15 43. Probably 'the hundred and twenty' of Ac 1 15 were not all Galileans). Hence we adopt the chronological, which carries with it the geographical, framework of John; and hold that the public life of Jesus extends over two years and some months, and was carried on in Jerusalem and Judea and, even on occasion, in Samaria, as well as in Galilee and Perea. As Jesus comes to fulfil the promises of God in the Old Testament Scriptures concerning the Messiah, it seems not only probable, but even certain that He would offer Himself to the faith of the Jewish people at the very center of its religious life—Jerusalem—on the occasions—the feasts—when the largest numbers of Jews could be reached. The presence of a multitude of Galileans at these feasts would afford Him some protection against the hostility of the Jewish rulers, very soon made evident (Jn 2 18; Mk 14 2). It is true that the almost total absence of chronological data within the Synoptics, and the unquestionable fact that incidents are narrated in them (e.g., in Mk 2 1-3 6) in an order determined not by time, but by some inward affinity, make it impossible to distribute the matter of the Synoptics with any certainty over the time assumed by John; but this does not affect the truth either of his chronology or of their facts. It only means that we can not draw up a calendar of the life of Jesus. If we look at the date, as opposed to the duration of the ministry, our starting-point must be Lk 3 1. The fifteenth year of Tiberius is from 28-29 A.D., counting from the death of Augustus in 14 A.D. But as Tiberius had been associated in the government from the end of 11 or the beginning of 12 A.D., Jesus might have appeared as early as 26. Allowing for uncertainties in the counting of parts of years, Luke's date synchronizes fairly well with that of Jn 2 20. The building of the Temple began in 20-19 B.C., and forty-six years brings us to 26 or 27 A.D. The most probable result of careful investigation is that the three passovers in the ministry of Jesus were those of 27, 28, and 29 A.D. On the whole of this intricate subject cf. C. H. Turner, Chronology of the N T, in HDB, also Andrews, Life of Our Lord, and Stevens and Burton, Harmony of the Gospels for Historical Study.

3. Environment. When Jesus was born Herod the Great ruled all Palestine under the suzerainty of Rome. On his death his kingdom was divided, and Jesus became politically the subject of his son Herod Antipas—the person who is always meant when Herod is mentioned in the Gospels without any addition (Mk 6 14 ff.; Lk 13 31, 23 8). When He visited Jerusalem, He passed from Herod's jurisdiction and came directly under that of Rome; for Judea on the death of Archelaus (Mt 2 22), 6 A.D., had been incorporated in the Roman province of Syria, and was governed by a procurator (ἐπίτροπος, ἡγεμὼν, Lk 3 1; Mt 27 2), who resided at Caesarea and alone had the power of life and death. In internal affairs much was left to the Sanhedrin, or council of elders, chief priests, and scribes, and especially to the high priest. During the whole public life of Jesus, Herod Antipas was tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, Pontius Pilate procurator of Judea, and (Joseph) Caiaphas high priest in Jerusalem. By this political environment we can not say that Jesus was influenced at all. The one thing He resolutely excluded from His conception of the Kingdom of God was the political and national hope of Jewish patriotism.

We might almost say as much of His relations to the religious parties, the characteristics of which are known to us from the Gospels and Josephus. He had attended none of their schools (Jn 7 15). The Sadducees had the center of their power in Jerusalem. He can have been little in contact with them, and their worldly, rationalizing, unspiritual temper must have been extremely antipathetic to Him. The Pharisees were to be found everywhere. They represented the popular conception of religion. Having a zeal for God, tho it was not according to knowledge, they might have been expected to command a certain amount of sympathy from Jesus, and indications have been sought in the Gospels that He tried to form some kind of connection with them (Lk 7 36, 11 37, 14 1; cf. Mt 23 2 f.), but without success. It is not improbable, however, that at the beginning of the ministry the Pharisees sought some understanding with Him. Nicodemus (Jn 3 1-10) does not appear as a solitary, anxious enquirer, but rather as representing the class, and Jesus' treatment of him does correspond with his attitude to this religious type. Jesus never appears in the Gospels except as the critic and eventually the judge of Pharisaism (Mt chs. 5-7, 15, 23). Of the Essenes of Josephus (Bell. Jud. II, 8) there is no trace in the Gospels, not even in connection with John the Baptist.

The religious environment of Jesus in His early years was that which we see in Lk chs. 1 and 2. He was brought up among lowly people, dutifully observant of the commandments and ordinances of God, and devoted to the hope of Israel. The religion of obedience and of hope could degenerate, and no doubt it had degenerated in multitudes, and especially in the Pharisaic party, into what may be called legalism and apocalyptic (cf. Holtzmann, Neut. Theol., I, 30)—a religion which affected in its own strength to fulfil punctiliously all God's requirements, to put God by doing so under obligation to it, and then to claim from Him, as of right, the fulfilment in a blankly supernatural fashion of the wildest national ambitions. But it could also be saved from degeneration, and doubtless was, in people like Zacharias and Elizabeth, Joseph and Mary, Simeon and Anna, and 'the poor' or 'the meek,' in the land generally. It was among them that Jesus was brought up, and the purest tradition of Jewish piety was continued in Him. Apart from this the Gospels allow us to see only two forces which counted for much in His life, the O T and John the Baptist.

Of the O T Books he makes most frequent reference to Deuteronomy, the Psalms, the second part of Isaiah, and Daniel, but is evidently familiar also with the historical books. To John, as the one contemporary spiritual influence the power of which He amply acknowledged, it is necessary to pay more attention.

II. EVENTS PRELIMINARY TO THE MINISTRY.

4. The Forerunner. The relation of John to Jesus, as Jesus Himself understood it (Mt 11 10; Lk 7 27), was that of one who prepared the way for a greater to follow (Mal 3 1). It is Jesus who makes the quotation; observe the change from 'my face' in Mal to 'thy face' in the Gospels, in order to apply the prophecy to Jesus instead of God). It does not follow that John understood this. Jesus knew the Baptist's significance better than he did himself. When the Jews asked John, 'Art thou Elijah?' (Jn 1 21), he said, 'I am not.' But Jesus said of him to the people: 'If ye are willing to receive it, this is Elijah, that is to come' (Mt 11 14). This may partly explain the difference between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel in their representation of this subject. In the Synoptics, tho John baptizes Jesus, he bears no express testimony to Him; the one greater than himself, who comes after him and is to baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire, is never in so many words identified with Jesus. What John does, as Jesus represents it, is to initiate a powerful moral movement associated with Messianic expectations (Mt 11 12), which, so far as it does not come to nothing through moral relapse (Mt 12 43-45; Jn 5 35), finds its goal and satisfaction in Jesus. The one moral peril the Baptist has to encounter is the possibility of being 'offended' in Jesus (Mt 11 6); i.e., of failing to see that in Jesus the hopes which inspired and had been inspired by his own work were finding their true fulfilment, and, therefore, of turning from Him in unbelief. This is unquestionably the strictly historical view. The rôle of forerunner was one which John filled to a large extent unconsciously; when, therefore, the Fourth Gospel represents his functions as summed up in bearing witness to Jesus (Jn 1 6-8, 3 26, 5 35), and includes in his testimony the sublimest doctrines of the Christian faith (1 15, 1 29-34, 3 31), it is putting explicitly into his lips something which was in a way involved in his relation to Jesus, but which he could not have so expressed. The description of Jesus as the Lamb of God in Jn 1 29-34 may, however, be authentic, if at this time Jesus already thought of Himself as fulfilling the part of the Suffering Servant, if before His baptism He had some conversation with John, in which He confessed His hopes and aims, and if for the moment at least, the Baptist was raised above his own conception of the Messiah. Jesus realized it as the truth of John's relation to Himself, but John could not. The depth of the impression John made on Jesus is seen by Jesus' frequent references to him, His extraordinary appreciation of his greatness, and the recurrence in His own utterances of impassioned phrases of the Baptist (Mt 11 7-10, and || in Lk; Mt 17 10-13, 21 23-32; 7 19; cf. 3 10; 23 33, cf. 3 7). Jesus recognized unequivocally the Divine mission of John, and regarded acceptance of his baptism as included in the fulfilment of all righteousness (Mt 3 15; also Jn 3 5). Accordingly He came from Galilee to Jordan to be baptized with the rest.

5. The Baptism of Jesus. The baptism of Jesus was a crisis in His life, and the occasion of a great spiritual experience. The narrative in Mk may be read as tho no one were concerned but Jesus. It is He who sees the heavens rent asunder and the Spirit as a dove descending; it is to Him that the voice comes out of the heavens, 'Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased' (Mk 1 9-11). In Jn on the other hand, the occasion is one on which the Baptist receives this same revelation; and the third person ('This is my son') in Mt 3 17 and [the 'bodily form' in Lk 3 22 suggest that these evangelists also conceived that others as well as Jesus heard and saw. However the literary and historical questions thus raised are to be settled, they do not affect the intention of Jesus nor His experience. The great difficulty in the baptism has always been to understand how one whom the Evangelists, like all N T writers, regarded as sinless could submit to a baptism of repentance having remission of sins in view. The difficulty was felt by John himself, no doubt after some intercourse with Jesus (Mt 3 14 f.), and it was felt by the author of the Gospel of the Hebrews (cf. Nestle's N T Graec supplementum, p. 76). There is no answer to it unless we can say that Jesus in pure love identified Himself with His people, made common cause with them as a sinful people, mourning over their sin and repelling it as they did, only with a far deeper sense of what it meant. In doing this He 'fulfilled all righteousness,' i.e., He did justice to all the moral interests of God and man involved in the situation. He exhibited the grace of God to the sinful in an act which showed Him inexorable to sin. It was not a chance that He heard in that hour, and not another, the heavenly voice which declared Him Son of God. The heavenly voice spoke in O T words, since the Divine assurance of what He was and was called to be was mediated to Jesus through Ps 2 7 and Is 42 1. He was to unite in His own person and work the victorious Messianic King of the Psalm, and the Servant of the Lord, 'graced with meekness and constancy,' whom we see in the prophet. This is the revelation of the baptism for us. It shows that Jesus, in His own consciousness, from the very beginning of His ministry, united these two characters which His people had never been able to relate to each other. How two ideals, apparently so disparate, came to coalesce in His mind, we can not tell. We know nothing of a growth of the Messianic consciousness, at least not within the period of the public ministry. No doubt it had psychological antecedents and conditions, which prepared for it and made it possible, but we can only conjecture vaguely upon them. (Garvie, in his Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus (1907), has attempted as far as the data allow to explore the self-consciousness of Jesus in its development.) How the seemingly inconsistent elements in it were to be fused only His future life would show. But see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6.

Can we tell, then, what is meant by the Spirit descending and abiding on Him? The Spirit in the O T means God in act, God putting forth His power, and the nearest synonym for spirit here would be one suggesting this. Compare Ac 10 38 and Lk 4 14, and the fact that Jesus did no mighty work till after this time, and referred such works to the Spirit (Mt 12 28). Jesus was from this time on divinely empowered for the work He had to do. Without such 'accesses' of Divine excitement as are elsewhere referred to the Spirit (Ac 4 31, 13 9), He had God always with Him in the power His work required—to heal (Lk 5 17), to preach the glad tidings (Lk 4 18), to be gentle and constant till He had achieved victory for God (Mt 12 18), to read men with superhuman insight (Jn 2 24 f.). No question can be raised here about the personality of the Spirit, or the similarity of the experience of Jesus to that of Christians who received the Spirit after Pentecost (on this last subject, cf. O. Holtzmann, Was Jesus Ekstatischer?). Thus divinely assured of His calling and divinely empowered for it, Jesus was prepared to face His life's work. He never returned to Nazareth to resume the old family and business relations. As the end of an old life and the beginning of a new, baptism was to Jesus what it was to all who heard John's summons, but in one important respect it differed. For the others baptism with water and baptism with the Spirit were contrasted, for Him they coincided. Their normal coincidence was to be the rule in the Church (Jn 3 5), and in this sense the baptism of Jesus is the type of Christian baptism.

6. The Temptations. Jesus was now empowered for His work, but He was not to enter on it at random. It was His task, in the Messianic consciousness revealed in the heavenly voice, to bring in the Kingdom of God among men; but how? What paths were open to one who was called to win or to exercise ascendancy among men for God? This is the problem we see Jesus confronting in the Temptation. The same spirit with which He was anointed drove Him into the desert to face it alone. It was a terrible experience, and in the narratives we find in Mt and Lk He gave His disciples some idea of it. The occasion was probably the remonstrance of Peter at Caesarea Philippi, and the story was told to justify the severity of the rebuke of Peter as Satan (Mt 16 22-23). The ideal of Jesus was opposed to the popular expectations, as shared by the disciples, which rested on prophetic predictions of the Messianic Age, taken with prosaic literalness. The form is largely poetic and imaginative, the essence is spiritual. The temptations, if we may use such a distinction, are not personal, but official; or rather they are the temptations of Jesus, not in a private capacity (e.g., as a carpenter of Nazareth), but in His new Divine calling as the Son of God and Servant of the Lord. They are temptations all of which throw light on the Kingdom of God, rather than on the moral trials of common life. Jesus has in His mind the heavenly voice and the calling which is involved in it, and as He looks on the actual world in which that calling has to be realized, what are the paths which lie open and inviting to Him? (1) The first is that which suggests that an easy way to win ascendancy over men for God is to supply their bodily wants, turn the stones to bread, base the Kingdom on material comfort. This was a real temptation, which Jesus encountered in His work. When He fed the five thousand, they wanted to take Him by force and make Him (Messianic) King (Jn 6 15). But He resisted it from the beginning, and in spite of His compassion for the destitute, which makes humanity the principle of the last judgment (Mt 25 35-42), He insists on giving a primacy to the spiritual. He says here to Himself what He says to all in Mt 6 33. (2) As the first temptation deals with the nature of the Kingdom, so the second deals with the methods to be used in its establishment. To cast Himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple, and, upheld by angels, to alight unhurt, was to appeal to men by a miracle of ostentation; it was to take leave of piety and of moral sanity, and to try by dazzling [men's] senses or dumfounding their understandings to win them for God. This temptation also often came to Jesus. We see it in the characteristic temper of the Jews (1 Co 1 22), as again and again they ask a sign from heaven (Mt 12 38, 16 1; Jn 6 30). Jesus steadily declined it. He always acted within the limits of piety and sanity. His miracles were works of mercy, wrought in and for faith. He was no thaumaturge. He decided from the beginning that, as the Kingdom was spiritual in its nature, only spiritual methods were open to Him in introducing it. He would 'speak the word' unto them—that was all. (3) The third Temptation deals with the power at His disposal in founding the Kingdom. Any one born to rule, as Jesus was, sees at a glance what enormous power in the world is wielded by evil. It has vast resources at its command, great bribes to offer. Lk 4 6 is a temptation, only because it is true. But can any one who is to carry out the vocation of the Son of God and the Servant of the Lord consent to take help from evil? Can he for the sake of some supposed advantage, present or remote, allow, so to speak, its right to exist? Can he compromise with it, only for the moment of course, till by its help he gets into a position where he can repudiate it? For a man who is in dead earnest to accomplish something in this present evil world, this is the most importunate of temptations, but Jesus discerns and repels it from the first. He repels it with passion (Mt 4 10), as seeing in it the utmost malignity of the Tempter. He can make no compromise with evil; His only resource must be God. And here again He says to Himself what He says later to all: 'What doth it profit a man to gain the whole world and forfeit his life (i.e., himself)?' (Mk 8 36). In this spiritual conflict, in which He was sustained by heavenly help (Mk 1 13), Jesus overcame in principle all the kinds of temptations which He encountered in His calling. They recurred continually (Lk 22 28), but once decisively vanquished (Mk 3 27 and ||s), the prince of this world had nothing in Him (Jn 14 30).

III. THE MINISTRY.

I. Chronological Arrangement.

7. Opening Events. The ministry of Jesus begins after the Temptation, and in some special sense after the arrest of John (Mk 1 14; Lk 4 14, cf. 3 19 f.; Mt 4 12). How it was related to the last, except chronologically, is not apparent. Even the chronology was not clear to the synoptists; for Jn 3 24 consciously corrects them, and so makes room for a Judæan ministry, including at least the events of Jn 1 19-4 45, before the Galilean ministry, as recorded by the synoptists, begins (cf. Tischendorf, Synopsis Evangelica, §§ 14 ff.). The two returns of Jesus from Judea to Galilee, mentioned in Jn 1 43 and in 4 1-3, had somehow ceased to be distinguished in the primitive oral tradition, and with this confusion of perspective the ministry in the Synoptics is shortened by nearly a year (cf. Godet on Jn 3 24). During this period, the work of Jesus is of a preliminary character; as Godet puts it, He had to act as His own forerunner. After receiving testimony from the Baptist, He attracts His first followers from the Baptist's circle (Jn 1 29-51), impressing them by the superhuman penetration with which He reads their characters, and wakening from the first the highest hopes in their minds. The miracle at Cana, as the frontispiece to John's Gospel, represents for him the significance of Jesus, just as Lk 4 16 ff. does for the earlier Evangelist, altho what it meant has to be inferred as it is not explicitly stated. Jesus is for John the person who raises religion from a lower to a higher power, transforming the cold baptism of His forerunner into the glowing baptism of the Spirit. How the brief visit to Capernaum (Jn 2 12) is related to the settlement there which made Capernaum His own city (Mt 4 13) we do not know.

8. Early Judean Period. It was followed by the journey to Jerusalem for the first passover in the ministry (27 A.D.) Here John puts the cleansing of the Temple (2 13 ff.). It is generally maintained that two cleansings of the Temple are inconceivable, and that we must choose between John and the Synoptics. Nevertheless, might not the second be a deliberate repetition at the close of the ministry of the spontaneous act under the impulse of the Spirit at the beginning? Why could not such an appeal to the Jewish rulers be made twice? If, however, only one cleansing is to be assumed, it is probable that John has placed it rightly. The tradition, preserved in the Synoptics, according to which Jesus visited Jerusalem only once, had really no choice in placing this incident if it was to be recorded at all. Its spontaneity does not deprive it of the character of an appeal to all whose hearts were right with God to rally round Jesus as representing His Father (ver. 16), and the words about the destruction of the Temple and the rebuilding of it in three days have the originality of Jesus in them, and explain, as nothing else does, the charges of the false witnesses in Mt 26 61 and ||. For the rest, John tells little of a ministry which probably extended over three-fourths of a year. The passover was in the spring; the 'yet' in Jn 4 35 probably implies December or the January following. It was a ministry including miracles (Jn 2 24), and begetting a kind of faith. Men believed in Jesus, but He did not believe in them (2 25). The chief persons to whom it introduces us are Nicodemus and the woman of Samaria. What we learn from the first is the gulf which had to be bridged before a Jew could comprehend Christianity as the Evangelist had come to comprehend it, and as it was enshrined in the sacrament of the new birth. While in the intention of the evangelist the reference in 3 5 to Christian baptism is indisputable, yet if the saying itself is at all authentic, as Jesus used these words, or words similar, the reference would be to John's baptism and the baptism of the Spirit, as He Himself had experienced both. The Spirit which regenerates is that which is normally coincident with baptism in the name of Jesus, uplifted on the cross, in a death of atonement for sin (Jn 3 14 f., 1 29). In the woman of Samaria we see the thirst of the soul for God in the most unexpected quarter, and the incredible grace and joy with which it is satisfied by Jesus. That the woman who had had five husbands may to some extent represent the Samaritan people, so that in this or that trait the narrative has a symbolic rather than a literal value, is, in view of many features in John, not improbable (cf. Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar), altho the assumption that the narrative is substantially historical can not be ruled out altogether. Nevertheless, the work of Jesus in Samaria is not a reflection into His lifetime of what only took place later; it is a preparation for and anticipation of Ac 8 5.

9. Galilean Period. The ministry of Jesus in Jerusalem secured for Him a welcome when He returned to Galilee. The Galileans received Him gladly, having seen all that He did at the feast (Jn 4 45). From this point on, we have to dispose of the whole material of the Synoptics (Mk 1 14 ff.; Mt 4 12 ff.; Lk 4 14 ff.) as well as the few incidents selected for interpretative comment by John. Any arrangement of the synoptic manner in the Johannean framework is precarious, for reasons already stated (see § 7, above). The order of events in Mk is often topical, rather than chronological. In Mt the teaching of Jesus is arranged in long discourses (chs. 5-7, 10, 13, 18, 23-25), which, as compositions, are the work of the Evangelist, and unite matter of various dates. Lk also, in the long insertaion (9 51-18 14), connects with the last journey of Jesus to Jerusalem practically everything which Mk had not located in Galilee, while the topography of this journey itself is in Lk very hard to make out. It is scarcely exaggerating to say that the synoptists have no chronology; they have a certain plan and structure which exhibit their conception of the work of Jesus, and enable us to get a grasp of it as a whole; but there is scarcely another note of time to set beside Mk 9 2, till we come to Passion week. The clearest indication, if not of a precise sequence of events, yet of a certain movement in the life of Jesus, is given in the Gospel of Mt. The whole is broken into two periods marked by the identical phrase, 'from that time Jesus began' in 4 17, 16 21. The first was mainly occupied with preaching, the second with teaching; the first was more public, and if the word may be used, evangelistic; the second more private, and devoted to the instruction of the Twelve; the first presents Jesus proclaiming the Kingdom of God, interpreting its laws, and calling men into it; in the second we see Him preoccupied with His own Person and death in their relation to the Kingdom. The healing ministry, as dependent in some way upon the people, is more conspicuous in the first period than in the second; altho Mt, when Jesus toward the close of His life comes again into contact with multitudes, notes that this side of His activity was renewed (19 2, 20 29 ff., 21 14). Besides this broad distinction it is possible to trace a gradual change within the first period. From 4 17 to 11 1 we have hardly the sense of a check in the story, tho Pharisaic opposition appears in 9 1-17 (9 34 is probably an anticipation of 12 24). The Evangelist evidently means to suggest that the course of Jesus began with a great and growing promise of success. This is the import of 4 23-25 and of 9 35-38; this is the force, too, of such remarks as 7 28 f., 8 27, 9 33. His work increased upon His hands till He had to share it with the Twelve (Mt 10 1), whom He had chosen that they might be with Him, and that He might send them forth to preach and to heal (Mk 3 14 ff.). The sending forth of the Twelve on a kind of apprentice mission marks the culminating point of the hopeful activity of Jesus. From this time forward untoward events multiply, and from 11 2 to 16 20 almost every section in Mt might be headed σκανδαλον, or 'offense.' For one reason or another, Jesus proved unacceptable to His own people. Superficially attracted as they almost always were, they came at last on something in Him to which they could not be reconciled. Thus in 11 2 we hear how the Forerunner hesitated. Jesus was not the Messiah he anticipated, the awful Judge with the ax and the fan. The hostility of the Pharisees was probably stimulated by emissaries from Jerusalem (Mk 7 1). In 12 1-14 we have two of the Sabbath controversies, and words of Jesus in connection with them which so angered the Pharisees that they conspired to kill Him. Later in the same chapter we see Pharisaic antipathy culminate in blasphemy against the Spirit of God at work in Jesus to redeem men from the tyranny of the devil, and even His own kinsfolk fail to appreciate Him (Mt 12 46 ff.; Mk 3 21, 31 ff.). In the beginning of ch. 13 the parable of the sower is spoken in the mood of despondency, or pathetic irony, as we see from the quotation of Is 6 9 f. (Mt 13 13 ff.), and at the end Jesus is rejected in Nazareth. In ch. 14, when Jesus on the return of the Twelve feeds the 5,000, they want to 'take him by force and make him a king' (Jn 6 15), and He has to compel His disciples (Mt 14 22), who are susceptible to the same politically Messianic hopes, to enter the boat and face a storm, while He gets rid of the crowds. It was inevitable that multitudes who found their hopes so inexorably treated should turn away, as the Fourth Gospel tells us (Jn 6 66).

10. North Galilean Period. Finally, in Mt ch. 15 (|| Mk ch. 7) we have a decisive breach between Jesus and the religious authorities of His nation on the subject of tradition—a breach so violent that it led to His retreat into the northern lands beyond Palestine, and the practical close of His ministry in Galilee. It is not possible to say more of the course of events in the first part of Jesus's life than that it had this general character. When it culminated in the conclusive falling away of the people from Him, He turned to devote Himself in private to the education of the men who had become sure in spite of everything that He was the Christ, and that He had 'words of eternal life' (Jn 6 68). To trace the sequence of events after Jesus withdrew to the parts of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7 24) is all the more difficult, as at this point in the synoptic story there is possibly a series of traditions (Mk 8 27-7 or being in antithesis parallel to, and perhaps another tradition of, Mk 8 1-26). But the confession at Caesarea Philippi marks a decisive moment in the history, and so does the Transfiguration a week later. With it Jerusalem enters the horizon of the synoptists, and tho Jesus seems to bid a kind of farewell visit to His own city (Mk 9 33 f.), He does not wish any one to know of His passing through the country (9 30). His work in Galilee is done.

11. Later Perean and Judean Period. He goes up to Jerusalem via Perea and Jericho. It is only in the Fourth Gospel that the program of these last months can be more fully traced. From this source we see that Jesus went to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles 28 A.D. (Jn 7 2), having also paid a brief visit at Pentecost (5 1, 'a feast of the Jews,' since ch. 5 should probably follow ch. 6), remaining there apparently till the Feast of Dedication in December of the same year (10 22); that He then retired to Perea (10 40), to the district with which He had been familiar in the days of the Baptist, returning thence after about three months on hearing of the illness of Lazarus; and that after this last event He withdrew once more to a city called Ephraim, only coming back, about a fortnight later, for the last passover (29 A.D.) and what followed. (For an arrangement of the events lying within the second great period of Jesus' ministry, see Stevens and Burton's Harmony, part vi, f.; Gilbert's Student's Life of Jesus, pp. 140 ff.).

II. The Work of Jesus.

Without pursuing the purely historical question further, we may now attempt to give some idea of the teaching of Jesus. We may trace a progress in His teaching, but hardly in His mind; it is for pedagogic reasons that subjects emerge in one order rather than another. Speaking broadly, He may be said to teach, first, about the Kingdom of God; then about Himself, and especially His death; while in all the Gospels this is followed by what may be called prophetic, or eschatological teaching, dealing either with a spiritual and immediate future, as in Jn (the coming of the Holy Spirit), or with a transcendent and to some extent indefinite future, as in the Synoptics (the coming of the Son of Man). This is the outline we shall follow, but as the ministry included healing as well as teaching it will be convenient here to refer to the miracles.

12. The Miracles of Jesus. All our sources speak of wonderful or mighty works done by Jesus. The usual name for them in the Synoptics is δυνάμεις, 'deeds of power,' and in Jn σημεῖα, 'signs,' or ἔργα, 'works.' The Evangelists do not think of defining them, as theologians have sometimes done, by relation to laws of nature, of which they had no conception, and for the religious appreciation of them it is not necessary that we should do so either. The NT interpretation of them is entirely personal and ethical. The wonderful works of Jesus show what God can do and is minded to do through Him for those who need and seek His help, and they show to some extent the conditions on which His help is given. The great mass of them consisted of works of healing. Among diseases specially mentioned are leprosy, fever, paralysis, blindness, deafness and dumbness, epilepsy, and insanity. In addition to disease in its more ordinary or manageable forms there is what is known as 'possession' by a demon, or demons (not by 'the devil'). But besides individual healings narrated in the Gospels, Mk, Mt, and Lk all refer in general terms to the healing ministry of Jesus as a great and characteristic part of His work (Mt 4 23 f., 9 35, cf. 10 1, where He extends His power to the Twelve, 19 2, 21 14; Mk 1 32 ff. Lk 9 11). Indeed, it has been held that in Mk we have the argument from miracle, as in Mt that from prophecy, that Jesus is the Christ. The healings worked by Jesus were personal, not scientific, achievements. He did not use any of the resources of medical science; He had no treatment, no regimen, no arts of any description. What we read of in Mk 7 32 ff., 8 23 ff.; Jn 9 6 has symbolic or educational significance for the sufferers (whose infirmities made it difficult to communicate with them), but not medical value. The great word in all the wonderful healings is faith (πίστις). The healer must have faith, i.e., such a dependence on God and such an assurance of God's will and power to help as conducts the Divine power to the case before him. While Jesus never failed in this respect (Jn 11 41 f.) His disciples sometimes did (Mt 17 19 f.). But those who were to be healed also required faith, i.e., such an attitude of the soul to God as recognized and took hold of His saving power present in Christ and operative through Him. Faith in this sense establishes a sympathetic personal relation between Jesus and those who seek His help, and it is on such a relation that His power to heal ordinarily depends (Mk 6 5 f.). The miracles of healing, therefore, have an essentially spiritual side. They imply a relation to Jesus which has no precise counterpart in the relation of his patients to a modern scientific practitioner (altho here also confidence in the physician favors a cure). Much of the interest of the miracle narratives in the Synoptics lies in the picture they present of the struggle of faith to come to birth in the soul, and to maintain itself through trial to triumph. This is so whether the faith is that of the person requiring help, or the 'vicarious' faith of friends who seek it for those who are physically or mentally incapable of it (cf. especially Mk 2 5, 5 38, 9 19-24; Mt 9 28 f., 15 21-28). The many memorable words of Jesus about faith—almost all spoken in connection with His miracles and intelligible only in their context—are the strongest evidence that the miracles were actually performed (cf. Bruce, Miraculous Element in the Gospels, p. 104). Among the mighty works of Jesus, those on which the Apostles (Ac 10 38) and He Himself (Mt 12 28; Lk 11 20) laid greatest stress were the cures of demoniacs. Possession by demons was the theory of the time for the explanation of many morbid conditions of the mind and body, but no science, either medical or psychological, has accepted it as a working hypothesis in modern times. As Jesus did not come to teach medicine or psychology, but to reveal the Father in delivering men from all that disabled and ruined life, it does not matter that on the cause of such illnesses He shared the opinions of those around him. What matters is the fact that by the power of God bestowed upon Him He actually delivered men from them. It is hardly possible to argue that out of the many instances of possession recorded in the Gospels those are to be distinguished as truly such in which the possessed recognize Jesus as the Messiah (cf. Gilbert, Student's Life of Jesus, p. 192; Alexander, Demonic Possession; Weiss, Leben Jesu, I, 436 ff.). Matthew Arnold (Literature and Dogma pp. 143-144, explained the healing miracles by moral therapeutics. Harnack, (Das Wesen des Christentums, p. 18), asserts that the influence of a personality such as Jesus is adequate to account for the cure of certain diseases. Dr. Ryle, ("The Neurotic Theory of the Miracles of Healing," Hibbert Journal, V, p. 585), has endeavored to prove that many of the diseases recorded in the Gospels are not in the present state of medical science amenable to such treatment. More recent experience, however (Baudouin's Suggestion and Auto-Suggestion, 1923), makes it more difficult to draw a sharp distinction between functional and organic diseases, and to limit the efficacy of psycho-therapy to the one class. The matter is still sub judice. Even if it should, however, be proved that the cure of all the diseases recorded in the Gospels is in this way explicable, altho that need not at present be conceded, yet what remains certain is that Jesus Himself wrought His miracles in confident reliance on the exercise of Divine power through Him, and that His certainty evoked that assurance of faith in others which was the condition of cure. Neither the Healer nor the healed were consciously relying on a recognized method of medical treatment. If He and they anticipated by their faith in God what medical science is only now discovering, it was not by accident, but of God's grace, nor must we assume that God is not active as Healer, even when medical science is consciously employed. As this explanation, however, can not be applied to the 'nature miracles'—the feeding of the multitude, the stilling of the storm, the walking on the sea, and the raisings of the dead—these have to be peremptorily excluded, and accordingly in regard to them the trustworthiness of the Gospels can not be maintained (Harnack's aim in advancing this theory). It can only be said here that these things can not be judged alone. All of them are represented in the oldest stratum of apostolic tradition in Mk, and the first in particular is connected, as an event which made an overwhelming impression on the multitudes, with a crisis in the life of Jesus (Jn 6 15 and ||). When the supreme miracle of the resurrection of Jesus Himself is admitted, there is no a priori reason for questioning these. In the Fourth Gospel the miracles are the same in kind as in the others, with the exception that no case of possession is mentioned. But the mode in which they are conceived of is different. The motive of Jesus in them is not represented as compassion (as in Mk 1 41 and often), but as the manifestation of His own or the Father's glory (Jn 2 11, 11 4). Where faith is spoken of, it is not so much as the condition of healing, but as a consequence of it (2 11, 4 53, 11 45). Altho faith which had only this basis did not command the confidence or approbation of Jesus (2 23 f., 4 48, 20 29), yet not to be moved to faith by the wonderful works of Jesus is a sin (12 37 ff., 14 11, 6 26; cf. Mt 11 20 f.). Another peculiarity in John is that the miracles are all treated as symbols and made texts for discourses of Jesus (ch. 5, on Life and Judgment; ch. 6, on the Bread of Life; chs. 8 and 9, on the Light of the World; ch. 11, on the Resurrection and the Life).

Without attempting any chronological outline, we may now try to present the main features of the teaching of Jesus on the basis indicated above.

13. Teaching Regarding the Kingdom of God—General. The Synoptics represent Jesus as beginning His ministry with an announcement of the Kingdom of God (Mk 1 15; Mt 4 17; Lk 4 43). He is sent to preach it as glad tidings, and its near approach (ἤγγικεν) is made the ground of appeal for repentance and faith. What is meant by the 'Kingdom of God'? The expression does not occur in the O T, tho the idea is common enough there that God is King and exercises sovereignty. The phrase 'the Kingdom of Heaven' does not occur in the Apocalypses, except III Bar 11 2, which may possibly be a Christian passage. (See Charles's index to Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, vol. II, p. 856.) The conception itself, however, was current among Jesus' contemporaries, and was related in some way both to their history and to the promises of God. It is from the idea of sovereignty, or reign, rather than from that of kingdom that we must start in attempting to grasp the teaching of Jesus. The exercise of royal power by God is primary, not the sphere within which it is exercised, nor the community subject to it, nor the blessings attendant on its establishment. All these are involved, but the main thing is that God takes to Himself His great power and reigns. In starting from this point Jesus started with the O T behind Him and could hope to be understood. Micah (I K 22 19) and Isaiah (Is ch. 6) had seen God as a King on His throne surrounded by ministering spirits. In many of the Psalms He is celebrated in this character (97 1, 103 19, 145 13). There are O T passages which present this as Israel's ideal: God its King, and no other (e.g., I S 8 7 ff.). Of all O T passages, however, the most important for the N T idea of the Kingdom is Dn ch. 7. The sovereignty had belonged to a succession of brutal powers (Dn 7 1-8), but is at last to be transferred by God to humanity. 'One like unto a son of man'—that is, a human form—is brought before the Ancient of Days, and 'there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed' (7 14). It is the explanation of this when we read (7 27): 'and the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High [i.e., to the faithful Jews]: his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all nations shall serve and obey him.' From this time forth, ideas connected with this passage entered into all Jewish thoughts about the Kingdom. It was a Kingdom which in some sense came from heaven; it was set up by the direct interposition and act of God. It was a Kingdom which was at once universal and everlasting. What the precise relation is between this Kingdom and the existing Jewish people is not made manifest. We are not told how the sovereignty of God is to be wielded over Israel, or through it, and in dealing with conceptions so vast and undefined there is nothing of which the human mind is so capable as inconsistency. Men did not believe in a political, or an eschatological, or a spiritual, Kingdom of God. In various moods, or at various times, they believed in varying proportions in all three. If instead of political we say historical, it may even be said that Jesus believed in all three. He was 'a minister of the circumcision,' in the interest of God's truth, to confirm the promises made to the fathers (Ro 15 8). Tho He utterly renounced the zealot's idea of a national Kingdom of God, loyalty to which required the repudiation of allegiance to Cæsar (Mk 12 13 ff. and ||), it was no part of His purpose to deny Israel's prerogative. The choice of Twelve as apostles, and the striking promise of Mt 19 28; Lk 22 30 preclude the thought. If Israel actually excluded itself, it was not He who questioned its historical preeminence (Mt 10 5 ff., 23, 15 24-26). Excellent illustrations of the ideas which went to constitute 'the Kingdom of God' in the popular religious mind are seen in the Benedictus (Lk 1 68-79) and in the famous prophecy Is 2 2-4; Mic 4 1-5. In the last, especially, we see the mingling of what might seem inconsistent elements. There is something national, for Jerusalem and Zion are represented as the city of the Great King, to which all nations go on pilgrimage; there is something eschatological, or apocalyptic, in the supernatural elevation of the Temple hill to overtop the highest mountains in the world; but the essential thing is the universal diffusion of the true religion, and the universal peace and felicity consequent upon it. When Jesus speaks of the Kingdom, His range of utterance is not narrower. Sometimes we have the day of judgment in O T colors, the future sovereignty coming gloriously to view; sometimes the thought is that of an inner coming of the Kingdom which is already in process, and takes its start from the message of Jesus (cf. Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 34). The relation of the different views is undetermined. Just because His teaching is always practical, never abstract, Jesus speaks in all tones; in one moment possibly meeting hearers, whose minds are not open to us, half-way, using their language, and partly accepting, partly ignoring, partly enlarging or correcting their thoughts; at another giving expression intentionally to what is characteristically new and original in His own view of the Kingdom. This must be remembered in any attempt to systematize His words.

14. Teaching Regarding the Kingdom of God—

Specific. The essential truth about the Kingdom is that it is the Kingdom of God; its nature is determined by Him. The various ideas of it have the unity which belongs to the personality and life of Jesus, in whom God is revealed. Jesus did not preach a new God, but He embodied a new revelation of God, and the Kingdom which He preached is specifically the Kingdom of the Father (Mt 6 10, 13 43, 26 29). It is the Father's good pleasure to give it to His children (Lk 12 32). Those who inherit it at its consummation are the blessed of the Father (Mt 25 34). The fullest idea of what is essential to it may be derived from the study of the Beatitudes, which show the rare and difficult virtues on which its citizens are felicitated; from the Lord's Prayer, or, as it should rather be called, the disciples' prayer, which shows the spiritual aspirations of those who are to possess it; and from the healing miracles, as Jesus interprets them in words like Mt 11 5, 12 28, in which its redemptive character is declared. Proceeding empirically, we notice the following points:

(a) Jesus is sure of its coming. When anything is urgently needed and longed for, assurance, expressed in terms of time, becomes imminence. The Kingdom has drawn near. When Jesus speaks of it, He speaks, like all the prophets and like the seer in the Apocalypse, of things which must shortly come to pass (Rev 1 1, 22 6). The much-discussed question whether the Kingdom is present or future is another form of the question whether it is spiritual or eschatological (transcendent). The answer is that it is both, and that in the perspective of Jesus (cf. Holtzmann, Neut. Theol. I, 215) the difference tends to disappear. The end is near, the dawn is part of the morning, the present time part of the last time. It is perhaps not fanciful to say that on this question the Gospels reflect to some extent the mood of different periods in the life of Jesus. At first, there is confident hope, the Kingdom has drawn near (ἤγγικεν, Mt 4 17). This rises into assurance that the Kingdom is actually present, as in His victories over Satan Jesus realizes that the redeeming love of the Father is here and now overturning the tyranny of the devil and establishing its own sovereignty on earth (Mt 12 28; ἐφάρσαεν ἐφ' ὧν αὐτὸς ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ). At a later stage, when the shadow of the Cross fell on His path, the final coming of the Kingdom withdraws into a future beyond death. The two conceptions of it as present and future, spiritual and eschatological, seem to be combined and indeed organically connected in Mk 10 15 ff., 'Whosoever shall not receive the [present] Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein [in its future glory]'. For a consistent but paradoxical argument in favor of the exclusively eschatological view of the Kingdom, cf. Johannes Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes. This view has also been maintained by Schweitzer, (The Quest of the Historical Jesus) who asserts that the only alternative is thoroughgoing scepticism or thoroughgoing eschatology. A brilliant exposition of the idea is given by Loisy, L'Évangile et l'Église, the classic of Roman Catholic Modernism; Father Tyrrell in his posthumous work, Christianity at the Cross Roads, accepts the position. Jackson and Lake, however, maintain that Jesus taught that the Kingdom was both present and future. 'The preaching of Jesus was directed to impress men with the importance of recognizing the present Sovereignty of God in order that they might live in the Age to Come,' op. cit., p. 282.

(b) It is the supreme good, the sum of all possible blessings. Jesus shows this in various ways. Everything else is to be made secondary to it ('Seek first the Kingdom,' Mt 6 33; Lk 12 31). No price is too high to pay for it (Mt 13 44-46). Tho it is God's gift, we have to count the cost of accepting it, and not only to count but to pay (Lk 14 25 ff.). The salvation of the Kingdom is not only a gift, but a high calling, and the ethically indispensable condition of accepting the calling may be the most painful sacrifice of nature and of natural affections (Mk 9 47; cf. vs. 43 and 45, where ζῶν is synonymous with the Kingdom of God). The Kingdom is not bought with such sacrifices, as if the paying of them gave men a claim upon God; it is rather a sphere of reality of such a kind that a man must remain permanently alien to it, if he allows any natural good to rival this supernatural and Divine one. It is in this connection that we should have to appreciate the vehement words Jesus speaks about money (Mk 10 23 ff. and ||, and many more). As a permanent possibility of all kinds of power and enjoyment money is infinitely fascinating, and whether as possessed or coveted it is the great foe of the supreme good. The worth of the Kingdom is further shown by the incomparable greatness which belongs to its members. The least in it—the least who has got from God that which Jesus was conscious of possessing—is greater than the greatest outside. In some sense he is nearer and dearer to God (Mt 18 10, 11 11). The 'little ones' in Mt 18 11 are the children of the Kingdom; see ver. 6).

(c) The conditions of membership in the Kingdom, or perhaps we should say the ideal of citizenship, are illustrated in all the teaching of Jesus, but especially in the Beatitudes, in such discourses as the Sermon on the Mount (Mt chs. 5-7), the teachings on humility, forgiveness, and self-denial with a view to avoiding 'offense,' either in self or in others (Mt ch. 18), and, by contrast, in the criticism and denunciation of spurious piety (Mt ch. 23), or of pride, ambition, and similar faults in disciples (Mt 20 25 ff.). But the great lesson is that which is given in the spirit and life of Jesus Himself. The Kingdom is here in Him, and He is not only its founder, but its ideal citizen. Hence the final importance in His teaching of words like Mt 11 29; Jn 13 15. To be a genuine citizen or member of the Kingdom is to be in Him (Jn ch. 15).

(d) There are ranks, or degrees, in the Kingdom, tho the principles on which they are assigned are not those that prevail in the kingdoms of this world (cf. Mt 5 19, 18 1-4, and especially 20 21 ff.). No one can enter at all except in the uncalculating spirit of the child, who, when Jesus says 'Come,' goes to Him with no reserve. No one can be great in it except by service. Even the Son of Man, who sits on its throne, is subject to this law. He attains to the dignity of the throne by a career of unexampled service, not stopping short of the surrender of His life for others (Mk 10 45).

(e) The mysteries of the Kingdom (i.e., the laws of God's working in it)—once hidden but now an open secret—are revealed in the parables of Jesus, and in the interpretation of them to His disciples (Mt 13 11 ff.). Thus it is like a seed, the fortune of which depends on the soil into which it is cast (Mt 13 3 ff., and ||). Like a seed, it has in it an incalculable vitality and power of expansion (Mt 13 31 ff., and ||). Further, like a seed, it has an internal law of development—'first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear'—which can not be precipitated or reversed by any effort of man (Mk 4 26 ff.). It is another mystery of the Kingdom that Jesus anticipates for it in the world a mixed and disappointing history (Mt 13 24 ff., 36 ff., 47 ff.). This, of course, is denied by those who hold an exclusively eschatological view of the Kingdom, and they accordingly assign to the Evangelist, not to Jesus, the heading of such parables as the Tares and the Drag-net. But it is impossible to carry the eschatological view of the Kingdom consistently through the Gospels; and tho the Kingdom is properly an ideal state in which there are no σκάνδαλα ('things that cause stumbling,' Mt 13 41), no person that works ἁνομία ('iniquity,' ibid.), nothing σαρπρόν ('bad,' Mt 13 48), it does not exist as such in history. Even the institutions and persons by whom God is actually represented in this world represent Him very imperfectly and ineffectually, and they get inextricably interwoven with persons and interests which do not represent Him at all. What both the parables teach is that this is not final, but that it lasts as long as time.

(f) In the consummated Kingdom Jesus anticipates reunion with His own, and the fulfilment of all longings unsatisfied here (Mt 26 29; Lk 22 16). It is in this connection that life (Mt 7 14, 18 8 f., 19 17), or eternal life (Mt 19 16, 29, 25 46; cf. Mk 10 30, 'in the world to come, eternal life'), is used as a synonym for the Kingdom of God. The life of the world, or age, to come, or the life of the consummated Kingdom of God, is life in a new mode or order. It is not the restoration of nature with all the natural relations—a conception which is quite unrealizable. To assume that it is would be to discredit the idea of immortality altogether, as the Sadducees tried to do by this very plan (Mt 22 23 ff.). As Jesus argues against them, 'the power of God' (Mt 22 29) is not exhausted in the natural order with which we are familiar. God can sustain being in other modes—in an order, e.g., in which men neither marry nor are given in marriage—in which all relations are spiritual, not physical, and in which the problems raised by the Sadducees simply lapse. It is into such a world that the resurrection of Jesus gives us a glimpse; and the children of God, or the children of the Kingdom, can be ultimately described as children of the resurrection (Lk 20 36).

15. Teaching Regarding Himself. It is assumed in all Jesus' teaching about the Kingdom of God that He Himself has a relation to the Kingdom and its coming which can be shared by no other. The great cause of God is in some way identified with His personality, and men's relation to it is determined by their relation to Him. This may be said to be quite explicitly the burden of the Fourth Gospel: 'If ye believe not that I am'—that is, that I am the great decisive Personality on whom everything in the relations of God and man turns—'ye shall die in your sins' (Jn 8 24); but it is implied throughout the Synoptics. (Jackson and Lake, op. cit., pp. 345-418, subject the Christology of the Synoptics to a learned and searching criticism, and treat most of the utterances about Himself ascribed to Jesus as later developments of the faith of the Church, leaving us but a common prophet, conscious of inspiration, but not a historical reality adequate to be the object of the Christian faith, the founder of the Christian Church, or the explanation of the Christian experience and history. Their criticism, however, rests on an assumption so remote from the standpoint of Christian scholarship generally, that it is impossible to take account of their conclusions in detail.) Jesus' consciousness of what He is in relation to God and His Kingdom comes out, indeed, more impressively for us in words like 'for my sake' (Mt 5 11), or 'Many shall say unto me in that day' (Mt 7 22)—the voice of Jesus at the day of Judgment being that on which eternal destiny depends—or 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me' (Mt 10 37), than in any of the titles used to describe Him, either by Himself or others. What we overhear is more weighty even than what we hear. Yet it is necessary to pass these titles in review, and to apprehend their meaning as far as we can.

(a) All the Evangelists call Jesus the Christ (Mt 1 1; Mk 1 1; Lk 2 11; Jn 20 31). 'Jesus is the Christ' was the earliest Christian confession (Ac 2 36, 17 3), and in a sense it is the Evangelist's business to prove that He is. He may appeal to prophecy, as Matthew does, or to miracles, as Mark virtually does, or he may conduct the argument in a higher sphere like John, but in any case this is his faith. But did Jesus share it? Did He claim to be the Christ, or ask men to accept Him in this character; and if so, what did the term mean for Him? It is quite true to say that Jesus was made the Christ only by His exaltation (Ac 2 36), and that, therefore, while He was on earth He was not so much the Christ as the person who was destined for that dignity; but it does not follow that He did not claim the dignity, or that it was not recognized by the disciples as inherent in Him. It is not fancy which recognizes in the day at Cæsarea Philippi a great crisis in the relation of Jesus and His disciples (Mt 16 13 ff., and ||); and whether we say, with interpreters generally, that here the Twelve first became convinced of and confessed the Messianic dignity of Jesus, or, with Weiss, that here the Twelve persevered in their belief in His Messianic character, when the mass of His followers gave up the hopes they once had cherished that this was the great deliverer (Jn 6 66) in either case the Messianic consciousness is revealed as present in the mind of Jesus. Not only to others, but to Himself, He bore this character. He was the Christ, the Anointed of the Lord. If the historicity of this could be regarded as doubtful, it would be quite impossible to make any use of the Gospels as historical documents. (For an elaborate attack on it see Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimniss in den Evangelien, 1902. Jackson and Lake also deny this. 'This was the belief of the disciples: it may have been, but probably was not, the belief of Jesus; it was not part of his 'gospel' tho it was the center of theirs' (op. cit., p. 283.) But it is raised beyond doubt by its association with such an unquestionable fact as Mt 16 22, by the triumphal entry in which Jesus deliberately acts in the Messianic rôle (Mk 11 9 f.), by the accusation before Pilate (Mk 15 2), by the title on the cross (Mk 15 26), and by the consent of all existing evidence. When 'the Christ' became a technical or proper name for the expected deliverer of Israel we do not know. It seems to occur first in Psalms of Solomon, 17 36. The essential element in the meaning is that the person so designated is God's King. He has a place in the Kingdom and in relation to its establishment into which no other can intrude. To call Jesus the Christ is to recognize His unique and incomparable significance in religion. It is to declare that through Him God's sovereignty is to be realized, and all God's promises fulfilled (II Co 1 20). No doubt men might have wrong conceptions of the Kingdom and of the King. They might try to take Jesus by force and make Him a king after their own ideas (Jn 6 15), compelling Him to enlist under their banner, instead of enlisting under His. Such possibilities constrained Jesus to reserve in the use of this title. He did not go about proclaiming Himself the promised King. He silenced the possessed whom Mk represents as knowing Him to be the Christ (1 34, 3 12). He straitly charged the disciples, even after the confession at Cæsarea Philippi, to tell no one of Him (8 30). The sense in which He is the Christ is apprehended only when God reveals it (Mt 16 17) or—which is the same thing—when it is experimentally discovered through intercourse with Jesus. It only leads to confusion to snatch at the word, and suppose that we can fill it with the proper meaning from prejudices or hopes of our own, or even from the letter of the O.T. It was to prevent such misconceptions and interruptions of His work by false hopes that Jesus, till close upon the end of His life, avoided Messianic claims. It does not follow, of course, that He was not conscious of His Messianic Kingship from the first. The very reverse was the case (see § 5, above). It was for pedagogic reasons that He revealed the nature of the Kingdom before He explicitly put Himself forward as King.

(b) Closely connected with the title Christ is that of Son of God. Here it is necessary to distinguish between the direct use of this title by others and the virtual use of it by Jesus. It throws no light on His mind to observe that He is spoken of as Son of God by the demoniacs (Mk 3 11, 5 7; Mt 8 29), or by the men in the boat when He stilled the storm (Mt 14 33), or by the centurion who saw Him die (27 54). In this last passage, where the speaker may be a pagan, the meaning is indeterminate; in the first, 'Son of God' is probably equivalent to 'Messiah,' as in Mt 26 63; Jn 1 49. In Mk 1 1, 'Son of God'—if the reading is correct—may be used in this Messianic or, as it is sometimes called, 'official' sense, or it may be used in the full Pauline sense; in Mt and Lk (cf. Mt 1 22 f. and Lk 1 34 f.) the Divine sonship is regarded by the Evangelists as dependent on the supernatural birth. But what Jesus meant by the Divine sonship which was attested at His baptism, and in the consciousness of which He lived and died, is another matter. That it included the Messianic vocation is certain from the baptism narrative, but is that all? The present writer can not think so. There are various ways in which Jesus brings out what is involved in His relation to God, and they all point to something more profound, and, if it may be so expressed, more essential. (1) There is the parable in Mt 21 33-46, and ||. Here, all God's previous messengers to Israel are represented as δούλοι ('servants'), while Jesus is υἱός ('Son') and κληρονόμος ('heir'). This generalizes, so to speak, the earlier saying, 'A greater than Jonah, than Solomon, than the Temple, is here' (Mt 12 6, 41 f.). As Son—i.e., as one whose relation to God was distinct from that of all others—Jesus was greater than all. (2) There is the striking saying, 'Of that day and that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son but the Father' (Mk 13 32; Mt 24 36). The limit here put on the knowledge of Jesus shows that this is a genuine word. A later generation would rather have expunged than invented it. It gives Jesus a place above both men and angels, a place in which 'the Father' and 'the Son' are used in absolute correspondence with each other. We see that there could no more be another who was 'the Son' than another who was 'the Father.' This is the truth which is covered and secured in the Fourth Gospel, when it calls Jesus the 'only begotten Son' (Jn 1 14, 18, 3 16, 18; cf. 1 Jn 4 9). (3) There is the passage Mt 11 25 ff., with the || in Lk 10 21 ff. (The authenticity of this passage is challenged by Jackson and Lake. See op. cit., p. 331). Here an important light is thrown on the contents of the relation of the Son to the Father. According to Harnack, what this passage teaches is that the Sonship of Jesus consists in His knowledge of the Father. It is as the person who perfectly knows the Father that He is the Son (What is Christianity? p. 128). But there is more than this. First, there is the idea that sonship implies absolute dependence. 'All things have been delivered to me of my Father.' This is the idea which pervades the Fourth Gospel: 'The Son can do nothing of Himself,' 'My teaching is not mine,' etc. (Jn 5 19, 7 16, etc.). Further, there is the idea that as Son Jesus has absolute competence in His vocation, the power to make all men His debtors for the knowledge of God. The 'all things' which have been delivered to Him must, in agreement with the context, refer to the whole contents and administering of God's revelation; in this work of self-revelation the Father has no organ but Jesus, and in Jesus He has an adequate organ. This is an anticipation of Jn 14 6; but even when we have grasped it, a mystery remains. For Jesus goes on to declare that in His own relation to God there is something which has no parallel elsewhere: 'No one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' He is so far from standing on a level with all men as a son or child of God—an expression never applied to Him—that as 'the Son' He stands between God and all others, and they can not know God as Father without coming under obligations to Him. (4) One other passage is of importance for the light it casts on the consciousness of Jesus as Son of God, Mt 17 24-27. Here we see that to know God as Father is to be emancipated from the obligations of the ritual law: the Son is not bound to pay a Temple tax. The filial spirit is in such things a law to itself. The Pauline conception of Christianity is here traced to its source in the mind of the Son, and the Pauline idea that liberty is to be used only in accordance with a law of love is in harmony with the fact that out of consideration for others ('Lest we cause them to stumble,' ver. 27) Jesus did not exercise the liberty which He claimed.

For the connection of sonship and liberty in His thoughts, see also Jn 8 32-36. If we take these passages together, we conclude that, in the mind of Jesus, to be the Christ and to be the Son of God were not identical. The Divine Sonship was His nature; it was primary and essential; the consciousness of it stirred in Him (Lk 2 49) long before He entered on His public work; it was the basis on which His unique vocation to be the Christ—i.e., to be the Son of God in the historical sense suggested by Ps 2 7, 89 26; II S 7 14—rested; but it was not exhausted in this. Messiahship was the form which Divine sonship naturally took in the historical situation; but both in Himself and for us Jesus is something more and greater than the Messiah. It should be noted that the Synoptics give no instance in which Jesus expressly calls Himself Son of God (yet see Mt 27 43, and the narratives of the Baptism, Temptation, and Transfiguration). He, however, speaks of God as the Father, where the correlative is not sons, but the Son; He says 'my' Father and 'your' Father, but never unites with others (not even in the Lord's Prayer, which is indeed rather the disciples' prayer) to say 'our' Father; and He speaks of Himself as 'the Son,' simpliciter. This last use—which is found in Mt 11 27, 24 36; Mk 13 32—becomes predominant in Jn.

(c) To judge from the Gospel record, the mind of Christ about Himself is expressed most characteristically in the title the Son of Man (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου). This is found in all the Gospels, and practically from beginning to end (Mt 8 20, 26 64; Mk 2 10, 14 62; Lk 5 24, 22 69; Jn 1 51, 13 31). In all, it is used by Jesus alone. (Here Jackson and Lake also oppose the common opinion, and deny that Jesus openly identified Himself with the Son of Man, op. cit., p. 283). Except in Ac 7 56, it is not found elsewhere in the N T. In Rev 1 13, 14 14 the reference is not to the Gospels, but to Dn 7 13. Obviously, in the Gospels it is a technical or proper name, and a Greek reader could not without guidance discover what it meant. The catechists, or Evangelists, who coined the Gr. phrase ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου and gave it currency must at the same time have explained the sense in which they used it. No doubt it represented something in Aramaic, but the fact that Aramaic scholars find it difficult or impossible to conjecture what the Aramaic original can have been is not a sufficient reason for concluding that Jesus did not and could not have used any such title at all. For this paradoxical view, see Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn (1896); Wellhausen, Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, VI, 187. Against it, Fiebig, Der Menschensohn (1901); Dalman, The Words of Jesus (1902), pp. 234 ff.; Driver, 'Son of Man' in HBD. Assuming that Jesus did use, as a designation of Himself in the third person, Aramaic words which were represented in Gr. by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the question remains: What did He mean by this title, and how did it originate? It is natural to think of O T antecedents for this as well as for 'Son of God' or 'the Anointed'; and three O T sources have been suggested for it. First, there is the frequent use of 'son of man' in Ezk (2 1, 3, 8, etc.; ninety times in all), where it contrasts the prophet as a frail human creature with God. But there is no indication in the Gospels that Ezekiel was ever in the Speaker's mind in His use of the term. Second, there is the notable passage in Ps 8 4, 'What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him?' This passage is messianically interpreted in He 2 6, and the application of words from Ps 8 to Christ in I Co 15 27 is evidence that Paul knew of this interpretation, and probably therefore, of 'the Son of Man' as a designation of Jesus. While there is no explicit reference in the Gospels to the Psalm, yet the combination in the sayings about the Son of Man of dignity and humility show a marked correspondence of thought. The third possible source has already been referred to in speaking of the Kingdom of God (see above, § 6). It is Dn 7 13 f.: 'There came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a son of man . . . and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom.' There is undoubtedly an allusion to this in passages like Mk 14 62; Mt 16 28, 24 30. The difference is that the indefinite 'one like unto a son of man'—that is, 'a human form,' as contrasted with the brute forms in the earlier visions—has become definite. The description has become a title, the significant common noun—to use the grammatical distinction—has become a meaningless proper noun, and we are left to discover its import as we can. In Dn, the 'human form' represents the people of the saints of the most high; it is a symbol of the faithful Jews, God's people, as the beasts are of the pagan empires; but in the mind of Jesus it is individualized and definitely identified with Himself. Probably the individualizing interpretation had become current in the interval between the writing of Dn and the ministry of Jesus; at all events in that part of the apocalyptic Book of Enoch called 'The Book of Similitudes,' which most scholars allow to be pre-Christian, this change has been effected. There we find a Son of Man, a person existing with God, a person who sits on the throne of glory and has the sum of judgment committed to him. If the Jude who wrote the Ep. of Jude is the same as the Lord's brother of that name (Mk 6 3), then Jesus may have known the Book of Enoch, for Jude quotes it (ver. 14 f.; see JUDE, EPISTLE OF, § 2). But whether or not, it is clear that He individualized the human form to which the everlasting Kingdom is to be given, and that He identified Himself with it (cf. Charles, The Book of Enoch, 1893).

In this sense, 'The Son of Man' may be said to be a Messianic title. When Jesus used it, He meant to convey the idea that in spite of appearances He was the person who was yet to come in that heavenly glory. It is to be defined by relation to 'the Kingdom of God' just as clearly as 'the Son' alone is to be defined by relation to 'the Father.' It is natural to argue that, if it is a Messianic title, Jesus could use it only after He had been acknowledged as Messiah—i.e., after the day at Caesarea Philippi—and among those whom He allowed to speak of Him in this character—i.e., among the Twelve. This, of course, is not what the Gospels represent. He seems to use it all along, and in any audience. How is this to be explained? We may say either (1) that the term is not so unambiguously Messianic as has been suggested, and that Jesus, using it to veil as well as to reveal His thought, might employ it freely under any circumstances. This may be regarded as a possible explanation. Or (2) we may say that some of the passages have been chronologically displaced, and, tho they come early in our Gospels, are really late in the life of Jesus—e.g., Mt 10 23. Or (3) we may say that in some passages Jesus has been misunderstood by a translator from the Aramaic, and is represented as saying the 'Son of Man,' and speaking of Himself, when He really said 'man' and meant something of universal application. This last explanation has been given of the two passages Mk 2 10, 28, where it is said logic requires 'man' generically, not the individual 'the Son of Man'; and it is pointed out that when these two are disposed of, there are no others in Mk till after Caesarea Philippi. For the application of (2) and (3) with a view to getting rid of all the passages in which the Gospels present the title prematurely, see Wellhausen, as above. To investigate the literary question here is impossible, but the elements of meaning associated with the title must be indicated. (1) It always includes the idea of ultimate triumph. The Son of Man, as reminiscent of Dn 7 13, is never anything less than the destined King in the coming Kingdom of God. It is this which gives the power and pathos to words like Mt 8 20, 20 28. (2) In the express teaching of Jesus, it always includes the idea of the path of suffering which leads to triumph. After the confession at Caesarea Philippi Jesus began to teach the Twelve that the Son of Man must suffer many things (Mk 8 31 and ||, 9 31, 10 33, 14 21, 41). To represent His sufferings and death as those of the Son of Man is to bring them within His vocation as founder of the Kingdom of God, and to give them an essential place in His work. It is to carry through in His mind and life the fusion of the ideals of Ps 2 and Is chs. 42 and 53—the Messianic King and the suffering Servant of the Lord—announced at His baptism: the suffering of the Son of Man, so repellent and unintelligible to the disciples, is a summary formula for this fusion. (3) In the title 'Son of Man,' as used in the Synoptics, we may fairly emphasize the idea of humanity, as it is emphasized in Dn 7 13. It is humanity, however, in the ethical, not metaphysical sense—humanity, not as contrasted with divinity, but as opposed to brutality. The Kingdom which comes with the triumph of Jesus is at the same time the Kingdom in which humanity attains its rights. The reign of inhumanity, of violence and wrong, comes to an end. Hence everything in the work of Jesus which is congruous with this—all that is human, sympathetic, redemptive, emancipating—is ascribed to Him as the 'Son of Man.' See especially Lk 19 10; Mk 10 45; Mt 8 20, and even Mt 11 19 f., where Jesus contrasts Himself with the less human Baptist, who had in a way renounced the society of his kind. But the supreme proof of this is Mt 25 31 f. When the Son of Man sits on the throne of His glory to judge all nations, the principle of His judgment is humanity. It is by this men stand or fall before Him. Inhumanity is to Him the unpardonable sin. 'I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat' is the damning accusation. There seems some echo of this in Jn 5 27, but the peculiarity of the Fourth Gospel is that it associates the title with the pre-existence of Jesus in a way to which we have no analogy in the other three (Jn 3 13, 6 27, 62). Apart from this, John throws no further light on Jesus' consciousness of Himself as thus expressed. But it is clear from all that has been said that Jesus is not merely a son of man, a human being simpliciter, any more than He is only a child of God, a creature with our common relation to the Father. Just as in relation to God He calls himself absolutely the Son, so in relation to the Kingdom of God, which is at the same time the Kingdom of humanity, He is not merely one of our race, but the Son of Man who has the unique vocation of establishing the Kingdom of God through His ministry, His sufferings, and His glory. Both titles, the 'Son of God' and the 'Son of Man,' have this incomparable character. If we think of Jesus as Jesus thought of Himself, we can not think of anybody else in His place, or fulfilling His function. The titles, however, are not to be contrasted, nor interpreted of a human and a Divine nature. There is no suggestion of such a contrast in the Gospels, not even where some have found it, in Mt 16 13, 16 ('the Son of Man . . . the Son of the living God'). To say that He gives us the knowledge of the Father and makes us sons of God, and to say that He makes us men and partakers in the triumph of humanity in His everlasting Kingdom, is not to say two things, but one and the same. On the Incarnation cf. § 19, below.

(d) In comparison with the 'Christ,' the 'Son of God,' and the 'Son of Man,' small importance attaches to the title the 'Son of David.' It was a designation for the Messiah as at once descendant and representative of the great King. The Evangelists and the scribes agreed in regarding Davidic descent as a mark of the Christ (Mt 1 1, 22 42 f.; Ro 1 4; II Ti 2 8), and Jesus was hailed as Messiah under this title at the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21 9, 15), and by various persons who sought His help, or saw it rendered (Mt 9 27, 12 23, 15 22, 20 30 f.). It has been argued that in Mt 22 42 f. and || He disclaims Davidic descent, but this is more than doubtful. Probably His descent from David was taken for granted by Himself, as it is throughout the N T, and the aim of His appeal to the Scribes is to show that it is not a relation to David—a relation no doubt shared with others—which is the essential thing in Messiahship, but a relation to God. Not any son of David is Messiah, but only that greater than David to whom the Lord has said, 'Sit on my right hand.' The Davidic title, as the one which most easily attracted those political associations of Messiahship which Jesus utterly rejected, would inevitably be attractive to the people, and as inevitably appeal less to Him than 'Son of God' or 'Son of Man.'

(e) The only other title of Jesus found in the Gospels is Savior, and this is not in His own words.

It occurs in the angelic annunciation of His birth to the shepherds (Lk 2 11), where the meaning is undetermined, and it is implied in Mt 1 21, 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for it is he that shall save his people from their sins.' The phrase 'his people' here probably means Israel, and the salvation is probably conceived of in that half-spiritual, half-national fashion which is so vividly illustrated in Lk 1 68-79. Throughout the ministry of Jesus σῶσαι ('to save') is mostly used of miracles of healing, or deliverance from bodily danger (eg., Mt 9 21 f., 8 25, 14 30); but, as these were conditioned by faith, which involved a personal and spiritual relation to Jesus, blessings of a higher order were involved, and these are no doubt often included in such expressions as, 'Thy faith hath saved thee.' When we read that the Son of Man came 'to save that which was lost' (Lk 19 10), it is the profounder spiritual sense which is in view, and in the Fourth Gospel this preponderates to the practical exclusion of the other (Jn 3 17, 5 34, 10 9, 12 47). Here also Jesus is expressly characterized as 'the Savior of the world' (Jn 4 42). It is His vocation to bring eternal life to all men.

(f) In close connection with the revelation of the self-consciousness of Jesus stands His teaching on His death. All the Evangelists represent Him as devoting much attention to this—indeed, making it the main subject on which He instructed the Twelve—during the last period of His life (Mk 8 31, 9 31, 10 33 f., and ||s). It does not follow that He Himself first thought of it or realized it then. The allusion to the suffering Servant of the Lord in the voice at the Baptism, the spiritual conflict in the Temptation in which He renounced all compromise and defied evil to do its worst, beatitudes like Mt 5 10 f., the fate of the prophets and the forerunner and the sense of antagonism in the world around Him, must have suggested the actual issue of His career; and the beautiful and ominous word in Mk 2 19 f., which evidently belongs to the earlier and more radiant period of the ministry, proves that it was habitually latent in His thoughts long before He spoke of it. The one idea on which stress is laid in the reiterated teaching referred to is the necessity of His death. That it was historically necessary was apparent, if Jesus remained true to God and to Himself; He had irreconcilable enemies who would stop at nothing to put Him out of the way; the forces were actually at work around Him which could and would kill Him. The problem, humanly speaking, presented to Him was to discern in this historical necessity a Divine necessity; to see that what came upon Him as an inevitable fate was also the will of the Father, to which it was indispensable that He should submit in order to the fulfilment of His vocation. If His death was to be interpreted as a part of His work, it must be not merely endured, but accepted; His passion must become a great action, in which something infinitely important is done for the establishment of the Kingdom of God. That this was the conviction of Jesus, the whole Christian faith of the N T is the proof, and it is fair to infer from all the evidence at our disposal that He was assisted in giving shape to it by the prophecies of the O T and especially of Is ch. 53 (cf. Lk 22 37; Mk 10 45, where the peculiar expression 'for many,' in connection with the idea of 'giving the life' or 'the soul,' is an illusion to Is 53 10-12, where both ideas occur in combination). The two notable sayings of Jesus on the significance of His death (Mk 10 45, and ||, 14 22 ff., and ||) can not be fully discussed here. Briefly, it may be said that, according to the first saying, His death is conceived of as having a liberative power; it is at the cost of it that many are set free; He could not render them the service essential to them at a lesser cost. How the figure here is to be reduced to terms of thought is not expressly said; the circle of ideas in which the mind of Jesus moves is the same which is represented in Ps 49 7-9; Job 33 22-24; Mk 8 35 f. In the second saying, His death is represented as the basis of a new covenant, i.e., a new religious relation between God and man. In virtue of that death, somehow, men can enter into this new relation—the new relation, undoubtedly, which is predicted in Jer 31 31-34—a relation in which the law is written on the heart, and all men know God, because He has forgiven their iniquities and remembers their sins no more. Here, again, it may be said, problems are stated rather than solved; but it is important to notice that the connection of the death of Christ with the forgiveness of sins, which is central in apostolic teaching, is explicitly covered by the word of Jesus, in which He describes His blood as covenant blood. In no single utterance is the unique self-consciousness of Jesus more amazingly revealed than in that in which He bases on His own death the establishment for sinful men of the perfect and final relation to God. Within the covenant, God and men form one community; they have a common life and common aims; God enters into the life of men, men are partakers in the eternal life of God, and all this has been made possible through the death of Jesus. For fuller examination of this see Denney's Death of Christ (1902), pp. 36-60.

16. Prophetic Teaching of Jesus. By this we understand the teaching of Jesus about what lay beyond His death. It is impossible to be certain here that in no respect has the teaching of Jesus been misapprehended by those who reported it, or unconsciously colored by hopes which they did not directly owe to Him, or by ideas and expectations to which His teaching only indirectly gave birth in their minds. But the following points may be regarded as certain: (1) Jesus foretold His own resurrection. All the three predictions of the passion (see foregoing) end with 'and after three days'—or 'on the third day'—'rise again.' 'After three days' and 'on the third day' are in meaning exactly the same (cf. Mt 27 53, 64). Jesus' prediction of His resurrection was as special as that of His death. Any Jew then could predict His own death and resurrection, as any Christian can now; but it was the resurrection not at the last day (Jn 11 24), but after so brief an interval, that was as incomprehensible to the disciples as the death (Mk 9 10). (2) Jesus taught that the prophecy of Dn 7 13 would be fulfilled in Him; i.e., He would come again in glory, bringing in the perfected Kingdom of God and humanity

(see §§ 13-15, above, on Kingdom of God and on Son of Man). The N T Church certainly held this coming to be one in visible splendor, in the clouds of heaven, and quite distinct from the resurrection. (3) Of the time of this coming Jesus expressly declared Himself ignorant (Mt 24 36; Mk 13 32) yet He is often represented as speaking of it as certain to occur within the lifetime of those He addressed (Mt 10 23, 16 28; Mk 9 1). This is not open to question, even if we admit that passages like Mk 13 30 refer not to the Advent but to the destruction of Jerusalem, and it has caused much difficulty. Jesus has not come as the N T Church believed He had promised to do. Was He mistaken, or was He misunderstood?

In answering these questions we must remember that almost all the language of Jesus which has given rise to them is apocalyptic, and that it is not quite plain how much in such language is literal, and how much has to be spiritualized. If no one takes the four great beasts and the sea literally in Dn ch. 7, is it certain that 'coming on [or with] the clouds of heaven' is to be taken literally? Peter saw at Pentecost (Ac 2 18-21) the fulfillment of Jl 2 30, tho at Pentecost there was no 'blood and fire and vapor of smoke.' Is it not possible that the Early Church took Jesus' words too prosaically, and cherished and transmitted hopes not really to be traced to Him? We are more led to ask such questions because in Mt 26 64 and || the final word of Jesus to His accusers represents the exaltation of the Son of Man and His coming on the clouds of heaven as something of which they could be conscious from the moment of His condemnation on. He did come in Divine power, and fill Jerusalem with His presence as it had never been filled while He lived. This, too, in spite of occasional references to 'the last day' (Jn 6 39, 44, 64, 11 24, 12 48), and to the Judgment (5 28), seems to have been the ultimate deposit of truth and meaning which the prophetic teaching of Jesus left with the Apostle John. In his Gospel there is no reference whatever to the coming of the Son of Man on the clouds of heaven; the place of this is taken by the coming of the Spirit, which is the same as the coming of Jesus in the Spirit, to dwell with His people and to be in them forever (Jn chs. 14-16). The tension of perpetual watchfulness (Mt 24 42, 25 13) finds a moral equivalent in the sense of the perpetual presence of Jesus. The idea of a final Parousia and a spectacular consummation of all things is not excluded by Mt 18 20, 28 20; Jn 14 23; but it is in some sense held in abeyance while yet its motive power is not lost. It is in this way also that we must appreciate much of what is said in pictorial forms about the Judgment accompanying the Parousia (Mt 16 27, 25 31 ff.) Wherever Christ is, men are judged by Him, (Jn 3 17-19, 9 39); they gather to His side or are repelled from Him, and a day is coming in which it will be apparent that this is so, and that it is final. All the most solemn and inexorable words about judgment and its finality are from the lips of Jesus; it is almost as tho no lips but those of love incarnate were at liberty to say things so tremendous.

III. Closing Scenes.

17. The Last Days. Reverting from the teaching of Jesus to the outline of His life (cf. § 7 ff., above), we come now to the closing scenes—the Passion week. For all the Evangelists, this begins with the processional entry into Jerusalem, in which Jesus deliberately acts in the Messianic character. We can not be sure that the controversies and parables with which the week is filled in the Gospels all belong to this visit to Jerusalem, or even to this environment. The important events are the Last Supper, the prophetic discourses of Jesus as recorded in the Synoptics and John respectively, the Agony in the Garden, the Betrayal, Trial, Crucifixion, and Resurrection.

All Gospel Harmonies and Lives of Jesus show a distribution of the events according to days from Palm Sunday to Easter Sunday. For an examination of the chronological difficulties see Sanday in HDB, II, 633 ff.; Gilbert, Student's Life, 311 ff.; Andrews, Life of Our Lord, 447 ff. The chief difficulty is that arising out of the fact that Mk, Mt, and Lk clearly regard the Last Supper of Jesus with the Twelve as a passover, while in John the passover as obviously is not celebrated till the next day; cf. Mk 14 14; Lk 22 15; Jn 13 29, 18 28. In other words, John puts the Last Supper and the Crucifixion a day earlier in the month than the synoptists. Yet all four agree in putting the Crucifixion on the same day of the week—Friday (Mk 15 42; Mt 27 42; Lk 23 44; Jn 19 14, 31, 42; 'preparation' [παρασκευή]—Friday). Of these perplexing phenomena, which may be due conceivably either to some confusion in the synoptic tradition—which is virtually only one witness—or to some modification of the history in Jn under the influence of a theological motive (e.g., to make Jesus, as our Paschal Lamb, die at the very hour when the Passover was slain), no satisfying, harmonizing explanation has ever been offered. The best, as resting on the fullest knowledge of Jewish customs and possibilities at the time, is that of Chwolson in Das letzte Passahmahl Christi, 1892; see also § 11, above.

When Jesus left the upper room, He went to the Mount of Olives and there, in Gethsemane, after the Agony, He was betrayed to His enemies by Judas. According to Jn (18 12) 'the (Roman) cohort and the tribune' took part with 'the servants of the Jews' in the arrest; but this can hardly be historical. What follows, on to the sentence of Pilate, is usually described as the Trial of Jesus. It has been minutely scrutinized in the light of legal and historical knowledge. For a critical examination of it, see, besides the Lives of Jesus, and Commentaries on the Gospels, Brandt, Kritik der evangelischen Geschichte (1893); Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ (1899); Rosadi, Trial and Death of Jesus Christ (1903; 1908). Jesus was taken first before Annas, the ex-high priest, who retained great influence, and there in the early hours of morning subjected to some formal questioning (Jn 18 19) and insult (ver. 22). A little later He was passed on to the legal high priest, Caiaphas. So John records, while the other evangelists bring Him straight from Gethsemane to the high priest's (Caiaphas', Mt 26 57) house. As John connects Peter's denial with both scenes (18 17 is in Annas' house, 18 25—after ver. 24—in Caiaphas'; it is probable that there has been some displacement here), it would seem that the two residences were contiguous, and had a court in common. What took place before Caiaphas and such members of the Sanhedrin as could be gathered together so early (Mk 14 53; Mt 26 57) is usually called the Jewish Trial. It ended in the condemnation of Jesus to death for blasphemy (Mk 14 63 f.; Mt 26 65 f.). But what was the blasphemy? According to Mk and Mt, it was the claim to be the Christ, and especially to be the Son of Man who should come in the clouds of heaven. This also is all that is alluded to by Luke, tho he does not call it blasphemy (22 66-71). Many authorities hold that it was not blasphemy, and that the real blasphemy for which Jesus could be and was condemned was that of saying He would destroy the Temple and replace it in three days (Mk 14 58; Mt 26 61; cf. Ac 6 11-14). This is the view, e.g., of Wellhausen. But it is impossible to set aside the direct evidence of the synoptic tradition (Mt 26 64 and ||). There were many ways in which the memorable words of Jesus to the high priest could become known to Christians, and there is no difficulty in believing that it was some assertion of His personal claims which His unscrupulous enemies construed as blasphemy (cf. Mt 9 3 and ||). A claim to Messiahship is not in itself blasphemy, for there must be one true claim; but such a claim by such a person as Jesus was constructively blasphemy to all whose Messianic hopes were irreconcilable with calling Him King. But those who condemned Him as worthy of death could not carry out their sentence. The Roman governor had the power of life and death in his own hands, and there had to be a further consultation or conspiracy (Mk 15 1; Mt 27 1) to secure his support. This leads to the Roman trial. The charge of threatening to destroy and rebuild the Temple would have been vain here, and it is certain that in substance the charge made was political. This is apparent from the title on the cross, and from Pilate's question, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?' which appears in all the Evangelists (Mk 15 2; Mt 27 11; Lk 23 3; Jn 18 33). In a sense it was the same charge—that of claiming to be Messiah—on which they themselves had condemned Him, but with a difference. In reality, Jesus was rejected by His nation and condemned by the Sanhedrin because, tho avowing Himself Messiah in some sublime sense, He refused to do anything for the national and political ideals which they called Messianic; whereas Pilate was asked to condemn Him on the ground that, as a claimant of the Messianic dignity, He was inevitably a public danger (Lk 23 2; Jn 19 12). Nothing could have been more unscrupulous or insincere, and Pilate saw through it all; but he dreaded an accusation at Rome, and after repeated attempts to get rid of Jesus—by sending Him to Herod (Lk 23 7), by trying to shame the mob into accepting Him, instead of Barabbas, as the subject of amnesty at the feast (Mt 27 15 f. and ||), by emphatically asserting His innocence (Lk 23 22), and even, after the scourging and the mockery by the soldiers, appealing to their compassion (Jn 19 5)—he finally gave way, and delivered Jesus up to their will (Lk 23 25). The execution followed immediately upon the sentence of Pilate. It is told with most tragic simplicity in Mk, which has only one word uttered on the cross (15 34=Ps 22 1), no accompanying marvel but the three hours' darkness (ver. 33), and no incident of purely spiritual meaning except the rending of the Temple veil (ver. 38). In Mt the desire to see prophecy fulfilled has modified a historical detail (cf. 27 34; Ps 69 21, with the fact in Mk 15 23), and it is difficult to believe that in 27 52 ff. we are not in the domain of legend. Luke's Gospel, as usual, has preserved all that was touching and pathetic in the tradition: the daughters of Jerusalem (23 27 ff.), the penitent robber and the royal promise of Jesus to him (ver. 39 ff.), and the prayers of Jesus Himself (vs. 34, 46), not to mention the impression made on the multitude (ver. 48). John claims for one incident connected with the death of Jesus, to which he attached great importance (cf. I Jn 5 6), the authority of an eye-witness (19 35), and possibly this extends to his whole narrative here. He seems to have attached special significance to fulfillments of prophecy at the cross (19 23 f., 28, 36, 37), and perhaps to correspondences between the death of Jesus and that of the Paschal Lamb; so that 19 36 = Ex 12 46, rather than Ps 34 20. All the Evangelists record the burial of Jesus by Joseph of Arimathea, a member of the Sanhedrin, who had not shared in the responsibility for His death. With him John associates Nicodemus (19 39), combining at the same time embalming and entombment (ver. 40).

IV. The Resurrection.

18. The Resurrection. On the third day after He was buried—on the Sunday after the Friday—Jesus appeared to His own, and the Christian Church was born in faith in His Resurrection. The Evangelists are not the oldest nor the most important witnesses for the Resurrection, nor is the evidence for it sensibly affected by the difficulty of combining their accounts. An older and fuller tradition than they yield is preserved in I Co 15 3-8, and the essential evidence for the Resurrection must always consist of this, and of that which is pointed to by Peter in Ac 33; 'He hath poured forth this, which ye see and hear.' On the one hand, the historical testimony of the Apostles—whose function was to be witnesses to the Resurrection (Ac 1 22), as their qualification was to have seen the Lord (I Co 9 1)—and, on the other hand, the new life, Spirit-quickened, both of which are still with us in the NT as a whole and in the specifically Christian life of the Church, are our assurance that Christ has risen. This assurance is quite independent of any perplexities which may arise from the study of the Gospel narratives.

These narratives were composed at a time when it was no longer possible to recover exactly the notes of place or sequences of time which would have enabled the writers to present a story concordant in all its details; and it may not have been their intention to present such a story at all. Their literary or practical purpose may have been quite different. The following points should be noted: (1) All the evangelists represent Jesus as foretelling His Resurrection (see § 16 (1), above). (2) Mk and Mt agree verbally (Mk 14 27 f.; Mt 26 31 f.) in what is virtually a program of the Passion and its sequel: 'All ye shall be offended in me [this night]; for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered abroad. Howbeit [but], after

I am raised up I will go before you (προαγω ὑμᾶς, as the shepherd goes before his flock) into Galilee.' (3) In Mt this program is carried out. The risen Jesus does not appear to His disciples in Jerusalem; on the contrary, first the angel at the tomb (28 7) and then Jesus Himself (28 10) intimates to them through the women that Galilee is the rendezvous. There eventually they do see Him and receive the great commission (28 16). Appearance to the Eleven in Jerusalem is clearly and intentionally excluded. (4) Mk also, it can hardly be doubted, carried out, like Mt, the program announced in 14 28. It is expressly referred to in 16 7, and it is to the present writer inconceivable that Mk 16 7 was not—in the original conclusion of the Gospel—carried out as in Mt ch. 28. The present conclusion of Mk (16 9-20) is secondary, and is based on various passages in Mt ch. 28, Lk ch. 24, Jn ch. 20, and Ac (passim). (5) While Mk and Mt were originally at one in recording only an appearance of Jesus to the Eleven in Galilee, Lk proceeds on quite another line. He omits the Passion and the Resurrection program of Mk 14 27 f.; Mt 26 31 f. He changes the words spoken to the women at the tomb. Tho Galilee is mentioned, it is not as the place where Jesus has appointed to meet His disciples, but as the place where He was when He spoke of His Death and Resurrection (Lk 24 6 f.). In conformity with this, Jesus, who has already appeared to Peter and to two disciples on the way to Emmaus, appears also on the Resurrection Day to the Eleven and their company in Jerusalem (24 36), and after reassuring them as to His identity by such material proofs as Lk is partial to (vs. 39-43, cf. 3 22; Ac 10 41), forbids them to leave the city till they are endued with power from on high. Here appearances in Galilee are clearly and intentionally excluded. The most natural explanation of the differences between Mk and Mt on the one hand and Lk on the other is that it was no part of an Evangelist's conception of his duty to give all the appearances of Jesus, with details of time and place. All the Evangelists must have been familiar with the tradition summarized in I Co 15 3-8, yet all of them ignore it. The idea was rather to give one appearance only of Jesus to the Eleven, and to impart to that one a representative or universal character, by connecting with it, through a great commission, the whole significance of the Resurrection for the apostolic Church. This is what Mk, Mt, and Lk alike do—in substance it is what Jn does also in ch. 20—and the key to their treatment of the Resurrection is, therefore, theological, or literary, rather than historical. As for the divergence between Lk and the other Synoptics as to the scene of this representative appearance, it is clear that, if Jesus appeared in different places—as John shows—the scene must be arbitrarily chosen. The Petrine tradition in Mk and Mt makes it Galilee, as was natural to one who had chiefly associated with Jesus there; Lk as naturally makes it Jerusalem, for to him, a Gentile believer, Jerusalem, and not Galilee, was the native seat of the Christian faith. The literature on this subject is inexhaustible, but not very profitable. When the possibility of the Resurrection is denied, and it is assumed that apologetic and other impulses produced all that is put forward as fact in the Gospels, from the empty tomb to the Ascension, in which Jesus withdrew in a kind of solemn pomp from His post-resurrection intercourse with His disciples, and when attempts are made to show how this production of facts actually proceeded, the mind has entered a region practically without law, in which its operations cease to interest. For criticism of this whole area cf. Schmiedel in EB, cols. 4039 ff., and the list of English books and articles appended by Moffatt, ib. col. 4086 f. #### IV. APPENDED DISCUSSION.

19. The Birth of Jesus. The Christian religion rests on the testimony of the Apostles to Jesus, and the area covered by that testimony is that of the foregoing paragraphs—'from the baptism of John unto the day that he was received up' (Ac 1 22). Into this testimony the birth of Jesus, His childhood and youth, His years as the carpenter of Nazareth, do not enter. They are not part of the Gospel which the Apostles preached; it is not in them that the revelation is made which brings redemption to mankind. To say this is not to set aside what is properly called the Incarnation. The Incarnation means the presence of the Divine in the human, and to base our faith in it on the apostolic testimony means that to become conscious of his presence of the Divine in Christ we must look at Christ where, through the apostolic testimony, He offers Himself to our eyes—that is, in the life which He lived among men, and in which He revealed Himself as Son of God, Son of Man, and Savior. The Life, Death, and Resurrection of Jesus, as covered by the apostolic testimony and in particular the mind of Jesus Himself—His consciousness of His own unique relation to God and to the human race—are the original and sufficient basis of Christianity, whether we are, or are not, able to answer questions as to the mode in which this Jesus, the Person in whom we recognize that God is with us, actually came to be—a man among men. Apart from the Gospels of Mt and Lk the N T does not raise such questions. Mt and Lk do, and they agree in representing Jesus as supernaturally born of a virgin. The personality of which they speak owes its origin to an immediate act of God, an act of which we must conceive, not as sexual but as creative. It is this act in virtue of which Jesus is to the Evangelist 'Son of God' (Lk 1 34 f.). God makes the second Adam as truly as He made the first; only, not of the dust of the ground, but of the common stock of humanity already existing. The new humanity, so to speak, is engrafted on the old by the direct interposition of God. The way in which this is put in Mt and Lk is that Jesus had no human father. In the nature of the case there can be no question of historical evidence here, as for the events of Jesus' life. The impression such a conception as that of the supernatural birth makes on us depends on the impression which has already been made by the life and especially by the self-consciousness of Jesus. If we are sensible to something in Him of which we are compelled to say, 'It was not nature nor humanity which produced this from its own resources; this is Divine, it is of God and of God only,' the idea may carry evidence of its truth along with it, otherwise it will fail to impress. The witness of the Evangelists is complicated by the fact that, while both teach a supernatural birth, both give genealogies of Jesus which connect Him with David and Abraham, not through Mary—tho Weiss and others interpret Lk's genealogy in this sense—but through Joseph. However, with Joseph He has no connection whatever, and hence the genealogies are quite unreal. It is not unnatural to suppose that they were drawn up by people who wished to demonstrate the Davidic descent of Jesus, and were in the habit of thinking of Him, as His contemporaries did, as the son of Joseph (Mt 13 55; Lk 4 22), and that they were adapted by our Evangelists to their use by the modifications in Mt 1 16; Lk 3 23. It readily occurs to one that N T writers, like Paul and John, who believed in the preexistence of Christ, and thought of His coming from heaven to earth, must have conceived of this coming as supernaturally mediated (I Co 8 6; II Co 8 9; Ro 8 3; Ph 2 5; Jn 8 58, 17 5). The second Adam, the Eternal Word, can not have come into the world in the ordinary course of nature. But two considerations make us pause in appealing to these Apostles to support Mt and Lk. The first is their silence on the subject. John believed in Jesus as the Word Incarnate. But, tho he had seen the Father in the Son—and it is in words like Jn 14 9 that the true meaning of the incarnation is expressed—he raised, so far as appears, no physical and no metaphysical question as to the mode of His coming. He knew only that we are from beneath, and He is from above; that we are in the world and in our sins, and that He confronts us in the light and life of God for our salvation. How He came to be here in this character he never seems to ask. He does report sayings referring to preexistence (8 58, 17 5). If these are authentic, we must not assume that there was a continuity of consciousness in Jesus; but that, as His claim of Sonship was challenged, He gained intuitively the certainty that His was a relation to God not begun in time. It is the same with Paul—tho one may wonder whether, an intimate friend of Luke could be ignorant of or indifferent to, Lk chs. 1 and 2. He is interested in the motive of Christ's coming to earth, not in its method (Gore on II Co 8 9). The second consideration is that Mt and Lk do not at all, like Paul and John, conceive of a preexistent Divine person coming into the world. Their Gospels contain no hint of the preexistence of Jesus; His supernatural birth is for them the origination of His personality. In this respect the Evangelists have no contact with the Apostles. The most we can say is that as their genealogies connect Jesus with O T history, in Lk with universal human history, and with the Divine purpose in process of achievement there, so the story of the virgin birth connects Him with the creative power of God. In both connections there is a great truth. He does fulfil the Divine purpose in Hebrew and in human history, and He does in some peculiar way come from God; but whether the genealogies are accurate, and whether the peculiar relation to God involves a virgin birth, are questions on which Christian faith is not dependent. One of the weightiest arguments for the virgin birth is found in the difficulty of explaining the existence of the story except on the assumption of its truth. It can not have been produced in the interest of asceticism, to glorify virginity as opposed to marriage. There is no trace of this in Mt or Lk, and Mary had other children (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). It can not have been invented in view of Ps 51 6 to assert the sinlessness of Jesus. Sinlessness is not physical but moral, and there can be no physical guaranty of it. The purity and beauty of the narrative, also, as contrasted with the mythological stories of antiquity, where the gods are invested with the passions of men—stories which have their real parallel in the fall of the angels (Gn 6 1), not in Mt and Lk—argue for its truth. In particular, the primitive Palestinian character of the hymns, and of the whole scenery, characters, and language in Lk chs. 1 and 2, is in favor of historicity. It seems to exclude Greek influence entirely, and as the idea of a Son of God in the physical sense is as repellent to the Hebrew as to the Moslem mind, and can not have originated spontaneously, the inference is that the narrative is based on fact. It is not against this that it provides a way of expressing the assurance that the life of Christ is throughout Divine. His coming into the world is mediated by His mother's faith responsive to, and receptive of, the grace of God (Lk 1 30-38). If He was Son of God at all, He did not begin to be so at any given age—at twelve (Lk 2 49), or at the Baptism (Mk 1 11), or at the Transfiguration (9 7), or at the Resurrection (Ac 13 33; Ro 1 4). He never was anything else. It is in harmony with that unique relation to God and man which is of the essence of His consciousness, that there should be something unique in the mode of His entrance into the world as well as in that of His leaving it. The possible points in a line of transmission for Lk's narrative are suggested by Sanday, Expository Times, vol. xiv (1902-3), pp. 296 ff. See also Box in Preuschen's Zeitschrift (1905); Gore's Essay in his Dissertations (1895); Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ (1905).

LITERATURE: For the literary and historical criticism of the Gospels, see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.

Out of the enormous list of works on the Life and Teaching of Jesus the following are selected as fairly representative of different views and as most helpful to the Bible student.

LIFE OF CHRIST: Sanday, Outlines of the Life of Christ (1905), for its summary character; Holtzmann, O., Leben Jesu (English translation) (1904), and Weiss, Leben Jesu (English translation) (1883), the two best German Lives—Weiss supplementing Holtzmann with an Evangelical attitude; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (one-volume edition) (1890), for its Jewish background; Garvie, Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus (1907), for its presentation of the mind of Christ; Smith, David, In the Days of His Flesh (1905), for popular presentation of the story; Papini, The Story of Christ (1923), for spiritual appreciation of the story; Headlam, The Life and Teachings of Jesus Christ (1924), the best modern book—the incomplete as a Life and without considerations of vital problems.

THE TEACHINGS OF JESUS: The relevant sections in the N.T. Theologies, e.g., of B. Weiss (1896), English translation (1883-4); W. Beyschlag (1896), English translation (1895); A. Schlatter (1900); Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity (Tr. 1903); H. Weinel (1911); P. Feine (1923); G. B. Stevens (1899), Works on the whole or special phases of the Teachings of Jesus; H. Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus (tr. 1892); G. H. Gilbert, The Revelation of Jesus (1889); A. B. Bruce, The Training of the Twelve (1906); A. Harnack, What is Christianity (tr. 1901); W. Bousset, Jesus; T. R. Glover, The Jesus of History (1916); Chas. Gore, Belief in Christ (1923); James Denney, Jesus and the Gospel (1909); F. Peabody, Jesus Christ and the Social Question (1901), and Jesus Christ and Christian Character (1906); S. Mathews, The Social Teaching of Jesus (1897); Simkovitch, Toward the Understanding of Jesus; Jenks and Kent, Jesus' Principles of Living (1920); Dougall and Emmett, The Lord of Thought (1922); N. Micklem, The Galilean (1921); J. R. Seeley, Ecce Homo (1865), a great work of permanent significance. J. D.—A. E. G.

JETHER, jī'ther (יֶתֶר, yether), 'abundance':

1. In Ex 4 18 for Jethro, father-in-law of Moses (see RVmg.). 2. The first-born son of Gideon, a youth. He feared to draw his sword to slay Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 8 20). 3. The Ishmaelite husband of Abigail, David's sister (I Ch 2 17; in II S 17 25, called 'Ithra the Israelite,' a textual error for Ishmaelite) and father of Amasa (I K 2 5, 32). 4, 5. Two men of Indah (I Ch 2 32, 4 17). 6. A man of Asher (I Ch 7 38). C. S. T.

JETHETH, jī'theth (יֶתֶת, yetheth): A clan-chief-tain of Edom (Gn 36 40; I Ch 1 51).

JETHLAH, jeth'la. See ITHLAH.

JETHRO, jeth'rō or jī'thrō (יֶתְרוֹ, yithrō): A sheik and priest of the Kenites (Jg 1 16), a Midianitish tribe among whom Moses found an asylum on his flight from Egypt (Ex 2 15 ff.). The Israelitish leader married Zipporah, a daughter of Jethro, and the intimate relationship thus formed brought Jethro to the camp of Israel at Rephidim where he assisted Moses in organizing the tribes for administrative purposes (Ex ch. 18). There is some confusion as to his name in the O T narrative, for in Ex 2 18 and Nu 10 29 he is called Reuel. (See HOBAB.) That Jethro and Reuel are names of the same person is an explanation as old as the LXX., the latter being regarded as an official title.

J. A. K.

JETUR, jī'tur. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13, and ITURÆA.

JEUEL, jī-ū'el, jīū'el, or jī-ū-el (יְעֻל, yē'ul):

1. The ancestral head of a clan of Judah (I Ch 9 6). 2. A Levite (II Ch 29 13). 3. A leader of Ezra's company (Ezr 8 13). 2 and 3 = Jeiel AV.

JEUSH, jī'ush (יְעֻשׁ, yē'ush), 'he comes to help':

1. A son of Esau by Oholibamah (Gn 36, 5, 14 [Kethibh, yē'ish], 36 18; I Ch 1 35). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 7 10 [Kethibh, yē'ish]). 3. A Levitical family (I Ch 23 10, 11). 4. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 19). 5. A Benjamite of the family of Saul (I Ch 8 39, Jehush AV). C. S. T.

JEUZ, jī'oz (יְעֻז, yē'uts), 'He counsels': A Benjamite (I Ch 8 10).

JEW (יְהוּדִי, yēhūdī, Gr. Ἰουδαίος): This word does not occur in O T literature earlier than the period of Jeremiah. It then meant a citizen, or subject, of the kingdom of Judah (II K 25 25; Jer 32 12, 34 9, etc.). In II K 16 6 it means Judeans in contrast to Syrians (or Edomites?). As early as the days of Hezekiah the language of Judah was called Jewish (יהידי, yehūdīth). The exiles were called Jews because they came from Judah. As these exiles from Judah became the main historical representatives of ancient Israel, the term 'Jew' became equivalent to 'Israelite,' and this is its general sense in the later literature (cf. its usage in Ezr-Neh, Est, Dn, the N T, Josephus, etc.). In the N T there is a contrast at times between the Jew (Israelite) and the Gentile (Mk 7 3; Jn 2 6; Ac 10 28; etc.; cf. also Jewess, Ac 16 1, 24 24), or the Samaritan (Jn 4 9), and at other times between the Jews and Christ, or Christianity (Jn 2 18; II Co 11 24, etc.). E. E. N.

JEWEL. See STONES, PRECIOUS; and also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II.

JEWESS, THE (יהידי, yehūdīyyāh, Jehudijah AV): The wife of Mered, the Calebite (I Ch 4 18). Her name was Bithiah. She is called 'the Jewess,' possibly because of the foreign extraction implied in her designation 'daughter of Pharaoh.' E. E. N.

JEWRY. A term used three times in AV (Dn 5 13, 'Judah' RV; Lk 23 5 and Ju 7 1, Judea RV).

JEZANIAH, jez'-a-nai'a. See JAANANIAH.

JEZEBEL, jez'-i-bel (זִיזְבֵּל, 'zebbel): The daughter of Ethbaal, King of Tyre, and the wife of Ahab (I K 16 31). In her own home, she had been educated as a zealous Baal-worshiper. As the queen of Ahab she not only claimed the right of continuing in her ancestral religion, but tried to impose the same upon the people of Israel. She succeeded so far as to induce Ahab to erect a temple to Baal, and import a large retinue of Baal priests (I K 16 32). The movement was unflinchingly resisted by the prophets of J', headed by Elijah. When the latter prevailed in the test at Mt. Carmel, she threatened him with death, and thus caused his flight and temporary retirement from public life. Later, she secured Naboth's vineyard for Ahab by causing its owner to be judicially murdered, and confiscating his property (I K 21 7 ff.). This brought Elijah once more to the front denouncing the crime and predicting the speedy punishment both of J. and Ahab. The prediction was fulfilled when Ahab died from wounds received in battle, and Jehu, after his encounter with Joram and Ahaziah, came to Jezreel and demanded the life of J. (II K 9 30 ff.). The name of Jezreel became in later times the apocalyptic symbol of seduction to idolatry (Rev 2 20). A. C. Z.

JEZER, jī'zər, JEZERITE, jī'zər-ait (יֶזְרַיִל, yētsər, yētsrī): The name of a clan of Naphtali (Gn 46 24; Nu 26 49; I Ch 7 13). See also ABIEZER.

JEZIAH, ji-zai'a. See IZZIAH.

JEZIEL, jī'zi-el (יֶזְעִיֵּל, yēzī'el): One of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 3).

JEZLIAH, jez-lai-a. See IZLIAH.

JEZOAR, ji-zō'ər. See IZHAR.

JEZRAHIAH, jez'-ra-hai'a. See IZRAHIAH.

JEZREEL, jez'-ri-el (יֶזְרְעֵל, yēzr'e'el), 'God sow-eth': 1. 1. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 3). Perhaps a place-name, cf. No. 1 under II. 2. The name of the first-born of Hosea the prophet (Hos 1 4; see HOSEA). II. 1. A place in Judah, near Carmel (Jos 15 56; I S 25 43; probably also I Ch 4 3). David's wife Ahinoam, the Jezreelitess, probably came from this place (I S 27 3, 30 5; II S 2 2, etc.). Map II, E 3. 2. A town E. of the great plain of Esdraelon, formerly identified as modern Zer'in, now considered of doubtful location, Map IV, C 8. The deep vale (valley of Jezreel) that led down from Jezreel to the Jordan was the gateway for the tribes of the desert, attracted by the rich harvests of the plain. Upon such a motley horde, Gideon's little band fell like a thunderbolt from the heights above Jezreel (Jg 6 33-7 23). There are no certain references to Jezreel as a fortress until Ahab's day, when with Samaria it was made a royal residence with a palace and strong towers (I K 18 45 f., 21 1 ff.). From the E. tower Jehu was seen coming up from the Jordan, and here Jehoram and Jezebel met their death (II K 8 29, 9 10-10 11). The horror at Jehu's bloody deed was echoed later in the prediction of judgment to come on Jehu's house (Hos 1 4).

JOAB, jō'ab (יֹאָב, yō'ābh), 'J' is father': 1. The son of David's sister Zeruiah and general-in-chief of David's armies (II S 20 23). His appearance in public life coincides with David's struggle for the throne against Abner and the forces of Ishbosheth. When Abner transferred his allegiance to David, J. murdered him with his own hand, taking vengeance for the death of his brother Asahel (II S 3 27). J. had charge of David's military operations and conquered the Syrians (II S 10 13) and the Ammonites (II S 11 1), whose capital, Rabbah, he besieged, but refrained from taking the citadel, in order to afford David himself the glory of storming it. He also conquered the Edomites (I K 11 15). J. was thus one of the chief factors in the creation of David's empire. When David wished to have Uriah out of the way, that he might marry Bathsheba, it was J. who was entrusted with the task (II S 11 14). In the affair of Absalom's rebellion, J., altho previously kindly disposed toward Absalom, was loyal to David, and afterward dealt with the rebellious son with a strong hand (II S 13 1-18 33). He also met the revolt of Sheba (altho the command in this case had been given to Amasa, whom J. treacherously murdered), and promptly put it down. At the end of David's reign, J. espoused the cause of Adonijah, who claimed the succession, and was slain by Benaiah at the command of Solomon (I K 2 34). 2. A Judahite, descendant of Caleb (I Ch 2 54 AV). 3. The son of Seraiah (I Ch 4 14). 4. The founder of a family names of members of which occur in the list of the returned exiles (Ezr 2 6, 8 9; Neh 7 11). A. C. Z.

JOAH, jō'a (יֹאחַ, yō'āh), 'J' is brother': 1. An officer under Hezekiah (II K 18 18, 26; Is 36 3 f.). 2. A Levite (I Ch 6 21; II Ch 29 12). 3. A doorkeeper (I Ch 26 4). 4. An officer under Josiah (II Ch 34 8).

JOAHAZ, jō'a-haz (יֹאחָז, yō'āhāz), 'J' strengthens': The father of Joah (II Ch 34 8). See also JEHOAHAZ.

JOANAN, jo-an'an (יֹאנָן, Joanna AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 27).

JOANNA, jō-an'a (יֹאנָנָא): The wife of Chuza, superintendent of the estates and household affairs of Herod Antipas. She became a faithful disciple of Jesus, helped Him with her means, and accompanied Him from Galilee to Jerusalem. She was also one of the women who went to the tomb intending to embalm the body of Jesus, and there received the message of His resurrection (Lk 8 3, 24 10).

E. E. N.

JOASH, jō'ash (יֹאשָׁ, yō'āsh), a shorter form of Jehoash: 1. The father of Gideon (Jg 6 11). The narratives in Jg chs. 6-8 represent J. as a man of rank and influence notwithstanding Gideon's words (Jg 6 15). He was of the Abiezrite clan of Manasseh, the owner of a holy tree (Jg 6 11) and proprietor of the altar of Baal in Ophrah (Jg 6 29-31). Jg 6 31 represents him as giving Gideon the name of Jerubbaal. 2. A son of King Ahab, who perhaps represented the king in Samaria, during his absence on the field of battle. Ahab sent the prophet Micaiah, after he had prophesied unfavorably, to J. to be put in prison (I K 22 26 f.; II Ch 18 26). Some are of the opinion that 'king's son' is a title. 3. A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 22). 4. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 3). 5. A king of Israel (the third King of the Jehu dynasty), 799-784 B.C. (II K 13 10-25, 14 8-16), also called Jehoash; J. appears to have had a successful reign. The long conflict with Syria, in which, in the reigns of his father and grandfather, Israel had been brought to the verge of destruction (cf. II K 13 7) turned in Israel's favor (II K 13 5, 22-25), due to pressure on Syria by Assyria. J. was encouraged in this struggle by the aged prophet Elisha, the friend of the dynasty and foe of Syria (cf. II K 13 14-19). J. also accepted (tho unwillingly) the challenge of Amaziah of Judah and successfully defeated A. and capturing and despoiling Jerusalem (II K 14 8-14). 6. A King of Judah; see JEHOASH.

C. S. T.—E. E. N.

JOASH (יֹאשָׁ, yō'āsh), 'J' hath aided' (?): 1. A Benjamite, son of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 2. A man in charge of David's oil-cellars (I Ch 27 28). C. S. T.

JOATHAM, jō'a-tham. See JOTHAM.

JOB: A pr. n. in Gn 46 13 AV. See Iob.

JOB, jōb (יֹב, 'iyōbh), meaning unknown. An ancient patriarch, hero of the book bearing his name.

1. The Job of Popular Story. The Book of Job is highly composite, and can be most intelligibly handled by tracing historically its probable origin and growth. (1) The Hebrews had a story of a Job, righteous and holding by God in an evil generation (Ezk 14 14, 20), a prophet (probably) and upright (Sir 49 9), and patient (Ja 5 11). Later still in legend and comment the same ideas are found attaching to the name. (2) On the evidence of the book itself there existed a prose story of Job, the beginning and end of which form the present Prolog (chs. 1, 2) and Epilog (42 7, end); the middle has been removed. This story told of Job's trial by God at the instance of the Satan ('the Accuser')—how he was tempted by his wife and withstood her—how his friends spoke unseemly things of God, but he did not, remaining patient and upright—how the Lord appeared and rebuked the friends, praised Job for his constancy, and restored unto him double. It had been shown that Job would serve God for naught, and it was suggested that the apparently unmerited afflictions of the righteous might all be such trials as this. The evidence for this is in the Epilog with its blame of the friends and praise of Job and its crude restitution, and in the current Hebrew views of Job in (1) above. Of the source of this story there are two possibilities: one that it was a pure folk-tale, of popular origin, for edifying amusement; the other that it was a bit of the Wisdom literature, carefully told by a wise man for a purpose, i.e., to explain the misfortunes of the righteous. On the first hypothesis it was like the stories of Elijah and Elisha; on the second, like the Book of Jonah. The probabilities are with the second, and it may even have been constructed to suggest an explanation to the people of their misfortunes. It may well be that the Prolog at least had been rewritten by the Poet for his own purposes. In any case a folk-tale lies behind.

2. The Use Made of This Story by the Poet. Chs. 3-31. But the Job of this story was a quite impossibly stolid and wooden figure. No real man could have behaved so. A poet then appeared who took this figure and situation and humanized them. We are no longer to have a puppet representative of the oppressed righteous but a great living tragic figure. The change begins with the friends of Job. They sit now in silent sympathy, but thinking their own thoughts, which are thereafter to make them the 'Job's comforters' of all time. Under their eyes Job, now human, breaks down and curses the day of his birth which brought him to this pass (ch. 3). He is conscious of no sin meriting such punishment and would have recoiled in horror from a God who made such a bargain in flesh and blood with the Satan as had passed in heaven. The God he had known was not such a God, and thus he could not explain what had befallen him. The tragedy is to be his awakening to the real God, and to an independent sense of right within himself to which he must hold. This is developed in the colloquies with his friends which follow in three cycles, the last incomplete, of six speeches each, one by each friend with a reply from Job (chs. 4-27). In these the friends, too develop. Their first view is that Job's suffering is intended to awaken him and lead him away from sin; soon, however, they conclude that it is absolute punishment for gross sin. In Job himself two ideas war—and if the book is a drama this is its action—the remembrance of his past loving intercourse with God and his idea of justice. He is led to look around on the world, and he sees that there injustice seems to triumph even as in his case. He is driven to the conclusion that the rule of the world is non-moral. If God would only appear and explain; but let Him not come in awful might and in a whirlwind to crush him (9 17). So he tries to divide God into Him of the past and Him of the present, and to the first he makes appeal. The details of the long discussion we need not follow. There is much repetition, but also a steady development. We can see two sides to the artist. He was creating a great tragic character and in so doing was working at one of the greatest human problems. But he was a Semitic artist also, and loved brilliant words and pictures for themselves. These, often, are wearisome and do not appeal to us. His problem he did not solve; his tragedy did not reach 'reconciliation.' Perhaps he could not; certainly the defective sense of structure in the Semitic mind stood in his way. Ch. 24 is very disjointed; ch. 25 is a very short speech by Bildad; ch. 26 an equally short reply by Job; 27 1-8, a continuation by Job; 27 7-end, is in the tone of the friends, and may be Zophar's last speech; ch. 28 is a poem apart, telling that man can reach anything in the earth except Wisdom—this God has kept for Himself; chs. 29-31 are a final clearing of himself by Job. So far certainly, except for ch. 28 and stray verses interpolated, we have the great unknown poet.

3. The Speech of Elihu (Chs. 32-37) and Chs. 38-42. Chs. 32-37 are the speech of Elihu, an undoubted interpolation to supplement the supposedly imperfect defense of God by the friends. In reality it repeats, and adds nothing. Artistically, too, it is inferior. Then, chs. 38-41 give a long and disjointed speech by God out of a whirlwind, broken (40 3-5) and followed (42 1-6) by very humble withdrawals of everything by Job. Finally, we have the Epilog referred to above.

4. The Problem of the Book. The problem is the relation of these parts. This problem is twofold: (a) Is this dénouement the work of the Poet? If so, it is the most terrific irony and puts the author in the position of the author of Ec, only in open revolt. God crushes Job with His wisdom and might, but does not solve his moral problem. At most, He exhibits to him the esthetic anodyne of nature. God's attitude here is much the same as in ch. 28. Beyond this, His position is essentially that of the friends; but they had no whirlwind and storm. The fact that the poetry in this speech is quite as magnificent as that of the colloquies and a comparison of this with 9 17, where such a divine method of crushing him is deprecated by J., suggests that the speech may be by the Poet. If not, it must have been written, and by some other great poet, to make a suitable transition to the Epilog—a theory beset by difficulties. But (b) the problem of the Elihu speech may suggest a different result. The author of this speech certainly expresses his own mind. He does not create Elihu; he speaks through him. Also he fits him to the patriarchal scheme; Job is from Uz; Elihu is from Buz; both sons of Nahor, brother of Abraham (Gn 22 21). All the names in the book, apart from Job, belong to side-lines of the patriarchal genealogies, except Barachel ('God [El] blesses') and Elihu ('He is my God'). These meanings indicate an attitude and can not be accidental. 'Elihu,' then, considered that Job was wrong, but that the friends had failed to answer him. He tries, and practically repeats them; his position and theirs are one. But this is also the same as the position taken in the speech of the Lord. In what condition, then, did the book lie before 'Elihu'? It is hard to think that he would have written as he did, if it had been complete except for his speech. The Lord's condemnation of the friends and praise of Job would have prevented. His position would have been to condemn the whole book as profane. And even if the book had ended for him with 42 6, i.e., had only contained the speech of the Lord and Job's submission, but no condemnation of the friends, the speech of the Lord would have satisfied him that he could not write anything further. Apparently, then, he added his protest to a copy which ended with 'The words of Job are ended' (31 40). This means that the speech of the Lord is not by the Poet of the colloquies. Again there is an essential difference of attitude between the speech of the Lord and all the other parts of the book. In that speech man is treated as simply one element in this manifold world; it could exist without him and the Lord is equally interested in the sprouting grass and the creatures of the wild nature where man has never been. Everywhere else in the book, the world, explicitly or tacitly, exists for the sake of man. Further, it can hardly be doubted that the Poet would have rejected with scorn the essential argument in that speech that because J. admittedly could not control and rule the world any more righteously than the Lord, or even at all, he had no right to criticize the Lord's rule as faulty. From the Poet this could only have been the irony of (a), above. These critical results (a and b) can only be left face to face: the problem is still unsolved. But the balance distinctly inclines in favor of (b).

Another question may be raised. Could the Poet of the colloquies have reached a 'reconciliation,' starting as he did? (a) If the Lord had appeared, not in storm but calmly, and had said to Job, 'What you have said is true, and what your friends have said is not true. But you knew me as your friend in the past; can you not trust me now?' Consider this sense of justice in yourself which you say I violate. Did I not make you and it? Must it not be in me also?' Strangely, no Hebrew writer seeks refuge in this last idea, neither the author of Ec nor this Poet. But the latter could not. The Prolog stood there with the story of the Satan, and how Job was being sacrificed for naught (2 3). (b) Would a vision of spiritual immortality and recompense have satisfied Job? Almost certainly such a thought was current in his time (it is the thought, in one form or another, of all Apocalyptic), but could not help him in the position he ultimately reached. The burden of the painful earth, full of wrong and injustice, was on him and could not be lifted by such a bribe. Also, it was vindication here that he demanded. It is hard to see, then, how the Poet could have loosed his knot; the prose tale had tied it too hard. Finally, if we imagine that Goethe had died before finishing his 'Faust,' leaving the first part published, the second part unarranged, with the parallel passages uncanceled, and the dénouement unwritten, and then that some mechanical editor had taken it all, strung it together and ended it with the end of the Volksbuch of Faust, we shall have a rough external parallel to the present state of the Book of Job. Whether this parallel will lead or mislead us as to its origin is still the question. That several authors worked at the problem in succession seems to be certain.

5. Date. The date obviously can not be fixed. The separate elements may scatter anywhere from the late 7th to the 4th cent. B.C. Job himself, probably, is a figure from the earliest popular legend and, whether historical or not, well served the purpose of the author.

LITERATURE: None of the English versions is even remotely adequate. The best guide, in exegesis, for the English reader is Davidson in the Cambridge Bible. But he is timid in handling results, and may be supplemented by the extremely suggestive article by Cheyne in EB. A full bibliography will be found there. The com. of A. S. Peake (New Century Bible) will also be found useful. More recently several good technical commentaries have appeared: James Strahan (1914); S. R. Driver and G. B. Gray (2 vols., ICC, 1921); C. J. Ball (1922); M. Bittenwieser (1922). D. B. M.

JOBAB, jō'bab (יֹבָב, yōbhābh): 1. One of the sons of Joktan (Gn 10 29; I Ch 1 23). The sons of Joktan were a tribe of Semites allied to the Sabaeans, whose inscriptions contain the name yuhaibab (Glaser, Skizze, II. 303; and Mittheilungen, 3 ff. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13). 2. The second king of Edom (Gn 36 33). 3. A king of Madon (Jos 11 1). 4. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 9). 5. Another Benjamite (I Ch 8 18). A. C. Z.

JOCHEBED, jōk'ēd (יֹכְבֵד, yōkhebēdh), 'J' is glory': The wife of Amram, and the mother of Aaron and Moses (Ex 6 20; Nu 26 59, P). In the old document E she is designated, not by name, but as 'the daughter of Levi' (Ex 2 1). E. E. N.

JODA, jō'dā (יֹדָא, Juda AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 26).

JOED, jō'ed (יֹדִי, yō'ēdh): A Benjamite (Neh 11 7).

JOEL, jō'el (יֹאֵל, yō'ēl), 'J' is God'(?): 1. One of the so called minor prophets. See JOEL (the Prophet). 2. The eldest son of Samuel (I S 8 2; I Ch 6 33 [18] RV, 6 28 [13]). 3. An ancestor of Samuel (I Ch 6 36 [21], called Shaul in 6 24 [9]). 4. A Reubenite of Aroer (I Ch 5 4, 8). 5. A Levite (I Ch 15 7, 11, 17). 6. A Levite (I Ch 23 8, 26 22). 7. A Levite (II Ch 29 12). 8. A Gadite (I Ch 5 12). 9. A Simeonite prince (I Ch 4 35). 10. A chief of Issachar (I Ch 7 3). 11. One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 38). 12. A chief of Manasseh (I Ch 27 20). 13. One who had a foreign wife (Ezr 10 43). 14. A Benjamite overseer (Neh 11 9). C. S. T.

JOEL, jō'el (יֹאֵל, yō'ēl), 'J' is God'(?). 1. The Prophet. Son of Pethuel, and one of the minor prophets. Of his personality nothing is known except that his ministry was exercised in Judea, and more particularly in Jerusalem. It is clear also that he was a man of great moral force and insight.

2. Contents of the Book. The Book of Joel consists of three discourses. The first two are addressed to the people by the prophet himself (1 2-2 17); the third is represented as spoken by J' (2 18-3 21). The first two discourses (1 2-20 and 2 1-17) are upon the same subject—the invasion of the country by a plague of locusts. In the first, the announcement of the calamity is followed by a call to recognize in it God's judgment. The second enters into a highly picturesque description of the army of locusts. The third discourse in the book presents J' as giving His word of promise that His blessing would yet be bestowed upon the distressed land (2 18-3 21).

3. The Locusts. The subject throughout is the plague of locusts. Whether this means literal locusts or must be figuratively taken, and if figuratively, whether it is an allegory or an apocalyptic description have been much-mooted questions. If the representation is an allegory, the locusts stand for hordes of enemies overrunning the country and leaving ruin and devastation all along their track. If it is an apocalyptic vision, they are the emblems of world-forces which would appear in the last days. But neither of these interpretations is satisfactory. They create more difficulties than they explain. All the conditions of the prophet's description are best met by the assumption of a plain, matter-of-fact pest of actual locusts.

4. Date: Early? The historical situation portrayed is so void of the coloring, either of the Assyrian period (c. 800-650 B.C.) or the Babylonian (c. 650-538) that it is necessary to locate Joel's ministry either in the 9th cent. B.C. or in the 4th (possibly later). The place of the book in the Canon certainly reflects an ancient opinion that Joel was one of the earlier prophets of Israel, approximately of the same date as Hosea and Amos. All the other considerations, however, adduced in support of this view are of the nature of efforts to remove difficulties and objections to it, or to combat the alternate view of a postexilic date.

5. Date: Postexilic? In favor of the postexilic date stand the following considerations: (1) The kingdom of the Ten Tribes is not within the prophet's horizon. Whenever he uses the name Israel, he means Judah (cf. 2 27, 3 2, 16). (2) The people are scattered among the nations (3 2). (3) Jerusalem was not to be molested by strangers any more (3 17); which indicates that at the time of the writing it was, or had been, subject to such molestation. (4) On the other hand, the city was not in the hands of strangers, for the Temple service was in active observance. This is evident from the numerous allusions to priests and sacrifices (1 9, 13, 2 14, 17), which, however, are interrupted, because of the ravages of the locust plague. Even the house of J' is specifically mentioned (1 14). (5) The walls of the city were either standing, as before the capture by Nebuchadnezzar in 586, or as rebuilt by Nehemiah, preferably the latter (2 9). (6) Altho the allusion to the Grecians (3 6) may be a reference to sporadic cases of the subjection of Hebrews to bondage and their sale as slaves, it is not likely that such individual occurrences could have attracted attention and been made the subject of public discussion, except as the Jews came to realize the important menace to their national life in the growth of the Macedonian power. (7) The style and diction of Joel presuppose the earlier prophets. His language is smooth as if the use of centuries had had its effect upon literary expression. It also contains some echoes of the earlier prophets (Am 1 2=Jl 3 16; Am 9 13=Jl 3 18; Ob 17=Jl 2 32; Ezk 47 1=Jl 3 18). Accordingly, the most recent scholarship is almost unanimous in assigning Joel a postexilic date and more especially the 4th cent. B.C. An exception to this is Baudissin's exposition of reasons for a preexilic date.

6. Religious Thought. The religious thought of Joel centers very largely around the idea of the visitation of judgment by J'. From this general thesis suggested by the calamity of the locusts, the prophet rises to the portraiture of the Great Day of J'. He sees the principles underlying God's dealings with Israel in their world-wide application, and predicts the outpouring of the Spirit upon 'all flesh' which is recognized in the N T as finding its fulfilment at Pentecost (Ac 2 16 ff.). His general attitude too is inward and spiritual (cf. 'Rend your hearts and not your garments' 2 13).

JOELAH, jō-'lā (יֹאֵלָה, yō'ē'lāh): One of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 7).

JOEZER, jo-'zēr (יֹזֶר, yō'ezēr), 'J' is help': One of David's warriors (I Ch 12 6).

JOGBEHAH, jōg'bi-hā (יֹגְבֵהָא, yōg'hāhā), 'exalted' (?): A fortified city in Gad (Nu 32 35; Jg 8 11). It is the modern Khirbet-Agbehāt, NW. of Ammān, about midway between that place and es-Salt. Map III, J 4. C. S.T.

JOGLI, jōg'lai (יֹגְלִי, yōg'hā), 'exiled': A Danite (Nu 34 22).

JOHA, jō'hā (יֹחָא, yō'hā): 1. One of David's soldiers (I Ch 11 45). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 16).

JOHANAN, jo-hē'nān (יֹחָנָן, yō'hānān, shortened from y'hōhānān, the Heb. equivalent of John), 'J' is gracious': 1. A captain, apparently of an escaped remnant of Zedekiah's army, who submitted to Gedaliah, the governor appointed by Nebuchadrezzar, and opposed the conspirator Ishmael. After Gedaliah was assassinated, he was one of the leaders who, contrary to Jeremiah's counsel, led the remnant down into Egypt, taking the prophet with them (I K 25 23; Jer 40 8-43 5). 2. The eldest son of Josiah, King of Judah (I Ch 3 15). 3. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 24). 4. A Levite (I Ch 6 9 f.). 5, 6. Two of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 4, 12). 7. An Ephraimite (II Ch 28 12). 8. One of the leaders in Ezra's company (Ezr 8 12). 9. A high priest, the predecessor of Jaddua, the contemporary of Alexander the Great (Neh 12 22 f.). This J. is also mentioned on the papyri recently discovered at Elephantine, Egypt. Here we learn that J. was High-priest in the 17th year of Darius II (i.e., 408 B.C.), and to him, among others, the Elephantine Jews appealed for help in getting their case against their Egyptian neighbors to the attention of the Persian officials (see Cowley, Aram. Papyri of the Fifth Century, No. 30). The same J. is also mentioned in Josephus (Ant. XI, 7 1) as having trouble with the Persian Governor because he (J.) slew his brother in the Temple. See also JEHOHANAN. E. E. N.

JOHN (of the Sanhedrin): The John mentioned in Ac 4 6, as being in the gathering of the Sanhedrin hurriedly summoned to take action against the rapid influence among the people of the teachings of the disciples of Jesus. Nothing is known regarding him. Lightfoot's attempt to identify him with the famous Johanan ben Zacchai, president of the Great Synagog at Jamnia, is not convincing. M. W. J.

JOHN (the father of Simon Peter): The name is variously spelled in different MSS. and VV. In Mt 16 17 the undisputed reading is [Bx]ῆ; ἰωάνης, rendered Jona (AV) and Jonah (RV). But in Jn 1 43 (NB*L) and in Jn 21 15 ff. (NB BD) the best attested reading is Ἰωάννης (Jonas AV). While it is possible, as Chase suggests (HDB, vol. II, p. 677a), that the father of Simon had a double name, Jona-Jochanan or Jona-Johannes, the variation is more likely to be due to the freedom with which Gr. writers rendered the Heb. Yōhānān. The LXX., e.g., in II K 25 23, has Ἰωάν; in Jer 47 (=ch. 40 in Heb.) 8, Ἰωάν; and in II Ch 28 12, Ἰωάννης. Nothing is known of this John beyond his relationship to Simon and Andrew. J. M. T.

JOHN THE APOSTLE (Ἰωάννης): The son of Zebedee (Mk 1 19) and Salome (cf. Mt 27 56 with Mk 15 40), the brother of James, and, with him, one of the Apostles (Mk 3 17 and ||s). These brothers may have been cousins of Jesus (see JAMES, 1). The first distinct mention of him is in Jesus' call of the four fishermen at the Sea of Galilee to His discipleship (Mk 1 16-20 and ||s). His home was most likely in Capernaum, and his family perhaps one of means (see JAMES, 1).

Throughout the Synoptic narrative J. appears as one of the intimate disciples of Jesus (at the raising of Jairus' daughter, Mk 5 37 and ||s; at the Transfiguration, Mk 9 2 and ||s; at the agony in Gethsemane, Mk 14 33 and ||s with Andrew also, at the last teaching before the Passion, Mk 13 3, and with Peter alone in the preparation for the Last Supper, Lk 22 8), and was doubtless, with his brother, prominent among those whom Jesus chose specially for his service (see JAMES, 1). The name 'Boanerges' (q.v.), referred to by Mark in his list of the Apostles as given to the brothers by Jesus (3 17), was doubtless suggested later by some such incident as that referred to in Lk 9 51 ff., in agreement with which is the spirit of John's action in the case of the man, outside the discipleship, who was casting out demons in Jesus' name (Mk 9 38 f. and ||s). It may have been because of the above possible relationship of these brothers to Jesus and their acknowledged intimacy with Him that their mother requested special honors for them in the coming Messianic Kingdom (Mt 20 20 ff.), or their impetuous character may have been largely responsible for the request, if it did not lead them to present it first themselves (cf. Mk 10 35 ff.).

Tho J. seems in the Synoptic narrative to have been equally pronounced with his brother in impetuous and ambitious characteristics, he does not appear from the record of Ac to have developed into the same aggressiveness in the propaganda of the new religion; for when Herod laid his persecuting hand on the Church James was the first object of his cruelty. At the same time, he is mentioned with Peter twice in the public life of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 3 1-11 [with 4 1-23], 8 14-25), tho in each case Peter precedes him in word and action. Furthermore, Paul refers to him in his account of the Council as, along with Peter and James, one of the 'pillars' of Jewish Christendom, tho his name is the last of the three (Gal 2 9).

If to this record in Ac and the Synoptics there be added the references to himself by the author, or the editors, of the Fourth Gospel as applying to this Apostle, as we believe they do (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, §§ 2-4), these milder characteristics of the man are more fully brought to light. In this Gospel he is first mentioned in connection with the coming to Jesus of disciples of the Baptist for personal acquaintance (1 35-40). At the close of Jesus' ministry, at the Last Supper, he reclined at the table in front of the Master and, at Peter's suggestion, asked Him who it was that should betray Him (13 23-25). It is he also through whose acquaintance with the high priest Peter was admitted to the court of Caiaphas' house (18 16), and to whom at the cross Jesus committed the care of His mother (19 26). He and Peter were the first of the disciple band to receive the announcement from the women of the open tomb and to investigate the facts (20 1-10). In the closing chapter of the Gospel he figures prominently in Jesus' revelation of Himself at the Sea of Galilee. He was the first to recognize the Master (ver. 7), and received from Him an intimation of the long-continued service he was to render to His cause (vs. 20-23).

The tradition which attaches itself to the name of the Apostle John is considerable in extent. In brief, it gives us to understand that his later life was passed in missionary activity in Ephesus and the surrounding region; that in the persecution of Domitian (81-96 A.D.) he suffered banishment to the island of Patmos, from which exile, on the accession of Nerva (96 A.D.), he returned to Ephesus, where he continued to live and work until his death in the reign of Trajan (98-117 A.D.). The chief witnesses for this tradition are Irenæus, Polycrates of Ephesus, and Clement of Alexandria. In their corroborative support of one another they would appear to furnish us reliable facts. The credibility of their statement has been assailed, however, on the basis that they confuse the Apostle John with another John, known as the Presbyter John, whose existence and importance are claimed to be proved by the statement of Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, in the prolog to his expository work on the Oracles of the Lord, preserved by Eusebius (HE, III, 39). In this statement, however, Papias may not be distinguishing between two Johns, one of whom he classes with the Apostles, Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, and Matthew, and the other with the disciple Aristion. As given in Eusebius, his statement reads as follows:

'But I shall not hesitate also to put down for you, along with my interpretations, whatever things I have at any time learned carefully from the Elders (πρεσβύτεροι) and carefully remembered, guaranteeing their truth. For I did not, like the multitude, take pleasure in those that speak much, but in those that teach the truth; not in those that relate strange commandments, but in those that deliver the commandments given by the Lord to faith, and springing from truth itself. If then any one came who had been a follower of the Elders (πρεσβύτεροι) I questioned him in regard to the words of the Elders—what Andrew or what Peter said (εἶπεν), or what Philip, or what Thomas, or James, or what John, or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord said, and what things Aristion and the Elder (πρεσβύτερος) John, the disciples of the Lord say (λέγουσιν). For I did not think that what was to be gathered from books would profit me as much as what comes from the living and abiding voice.'

From the wording of the statement it is quite possible that the distinction Papias is making may not be between an Apostle John and an Elder John—the John in both groups is an Elder, and Elder would naturally have the same meaning in both groups—but between the classes of people from whom he sought his information (1) The first class would comprise those who had heard the words of the Elders, Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, John, Matthew, and of necessity had been long in Palestine where these Elders had lived and worked. (2) The second class would be made up of those who were hearing the words of Aristion and the Elder John and did not need to have been in Palestine, outside of which Aristion and John were then living and working. From both classes, however, he could ask for the words of John, since he had been in Palestine and was now in Asia, outliving the other Elders (Zahn, N T Introduction, ii, 435-438, 451, note 13).

At all events, it is quite impossible to ignore the difference between 'said' as applying to the first class, and 'say' as applying to the second. The only alternative is to refer 'say,' not to oral teachings but to written words (Drummond, Authorship Fourth Gospel, 199-202), which requires considerable ingenuity to reconcile it with what Papias immediately adds, that he made these inquiries because he did not think that what was to be gathered from books would profit him as much as what came from the living voice.

The claim, therefore, that the witnesses above referred to (Irenæus, Polycrates and Clement) confused the Apostle John with another, a Presbyter John, would deserve more consideration if it were more certain that such a Presbyter existed. In fact, all the references in post Apostolic literature to a Presbyter John as distinct from the Apostle John are based on the assumption of Eusebius that such a distinction was intended by Papias in the statement from his works which he quotes in his History. But as long as that statement is capable of an interpretation which identifies the two Johns, the belief in the existence of a separate Presbyter

John must be open to grave and serious doubt. See Zahn, as above, and Overbeck, Das Johannes Evangelium (1911), pp. 209-212. It is indeed somewhat surprising (1) that there is no reference to the Ephesian residence of John by such older fathers as Ignatius and Polycarp, especially by the former in his Epistle to the Ephesians, and (2) that we have a definite statement of Papias presented (a) in the Chronicle of Georgius Harmartolos (9th cent.) and (b) in the Fragment from Philippus Sidetes (5th cent.) to the effect that John suffered martyrdom along with his brother James at the hands of the Jews. That these are possible of explanation, however, and afford no evidence against the common tradition is clear from the argument of Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 214-219, 228-234.

In view of such testimony there does not appear to be justifiable reason for doubting at least the main facts which tradition has handed down as to the later life and activity of the Apostle John. As to the bearing of this tradition on the authorship of the Fourth Gospel see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, § 3.

The material for a consideration of the religious thought of John lies so exclusively within the contents of the Fourth Gospel and the First Epistle that the reader is referred to these articles for its presentation.

JOHN THE BAPTIST. (Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστής, Mt 3 1; Ἰ. ὁ βαπτίζων, 'J. the baptizer,' Mk 1 4): The son of the aged priest Zachariah and his wife Elizabeth, and the forerunner of Jesus Christ.

1. The Sources. The sources for our knowledge of John the Baptist are: (1) The references to him in the Synoptics, with which we may also place those in Ac; (2) the references in the Fourth Gospel; and (3) the brief account in Josephus (Ant. XVIII, 5 2). It will be helpful to note at the outset the general character of these somewhat different representations, beginning with the one mentioned last.

Josephus says that some of the Jews looked upon the defeat of Herod Antipas by Aretas, King of Arabia, as a Divine judgment on Herod for his treatment of 'John who was called the Baptist, for Herod slew him who was a good man and had commanded the Jews that they should practise virtue both in respect to righteousness toward one another and piety toward God, and that they should come together in a baptism. For baptism would thus appear acceptable to him, not when they used it as a request for the forgiveness of certain sins, but as a purification of the body after the soul had been thoroughly cleansed by righteousness.' And he goes on to say that Herod feared lest John's popularity might lead to some political disturbance and so he thought it best to forestall any such thing by putting

John out of the way. He therefore sent him to the castle of Machærus, where he was executed. This notice in Josephus is of great importance, for back of its somewhat vague generalities there must have been facts substantially the same as we have in the Synoptics. The great popularity of John, the appellation 'the Baptist,' his insistence upon righteousness, the relatively great importance attached to the rite of baptism, the unrest that might easily flame into political disturbance, the fact that it was Herod Antipas who put John to death—these are all chief points in the Synoptic account also. But Josephus' superficial explanation of the purpose or character of the baptism of John is hardly adequate, and is even inconsistent with the earnest insistence on righteousness he justly ascribes to him. Furthermore, that Herod Antipas put John to death merely to forestall the possibility of his heading a revolution is altogether vague and improbable. Something more definite must have been the reason for Herod's hostility. Whether Josephus knew of Herodias' hatred of John is, of course, not certain. Josephus' silence about the 'Messianic' element in John's preaching is not at all surprising.

The references to John in the Synoptics center, in the main, about the relation of the work of John to that of Jesus. This is viewed as a preparatory work, to 'make ready the way of the Lord.' His was thus essentially a prophet's work, and John is viewed as the last of the prophets, the one who closed the succession by ushering in the new Messianic Age. The Synoptic account is fragmentary. Only fragments of what must have been once a large amount of information have been preserved. The broken character of these notices, the disagreement between John's proclamation and the actual course of events that followed it, the remarkable strictures uttered by Jesus on the man He so highly honored—all make strongly in favor of the genuineness of the Synoptic account. The story of John's birth in Lk ch. 1 is not, of course, a part of the common Synoptic tradition. Except to those who are consistently skeptical of nearly everything in the Gospels, there is little, however, in Luke's account of the birth of John that should occasion serious difficulty. The beauty and simplicity of the narrative; the 'Hebraistic' style, indicating that his information was drawn from an Aramaic source; the type of thought, which is that of the pre-Christian Messianic expectations rather than what became current in the Apostolic Age—all tell strongly in favor of the historicity of Luke's account (cf. Plummer in ICC, Luke, p. 6, and see also LUKE, GOSPEL OF).

The references to the Baptist in the Fourth Gospel share the peculiarity of that Gospel's account of the teachings of Jesus. At times it is difficult to draw the line between the words of the Baptist and those of the Evangelist, his reporter (e.g., 3 30 f.), and at others between what the Baptist himself may have said or meant and the interpretation put upon his words by the Evangelist after years of meditation on the significance of John's appearance (e.g., 1 29). To the author of the Fourth Gospel this significance was solely that of a 'witness' (1 8, etc.; cf. 5 33). The baptism of Jesus by John is implied in 1 31 ff., which indicates the importance attached to it by the Evangelist. If this Gospel was written by one of the disciples of the Baptist whose 'witness' to Jesus led him to the One in whom he found life eternal, it is not surprising that this testimony to Jesus was so important in his eyes.

2. Life of John Previous to His Public Ministry.

The parents of John were an aged couple of priestly lineage (Lk 1 5, 7). Tho a priest, Zachariah, his father, had little sympathy with the worldly and corrupt Sadducee class in Jerusalem. His home in the 'hill-country' of Judea (exact location unknown) was characterized by the best type of Jewish piety, in which the ardent hope of the speedy fulfilment of Messianic prophecy was no insignificant element. As the son of a priest he must have been well versed in the traditional learning and, especially, well acquainted with the Scriptures. Knowledge of the portentous expectations awakened by his birth may have driven him to profound meditation upon the problem of Israel's 'salvation' (1 15 ff., 68 ff.). The death of his parents when he was still a youth may have been the occasion of his withdrawal into 'the deserts' (1 80) instead of taking up the active work of a priest. In these solitudes he pondered over the problem of the age, feeding his soul on the sterner aspects of the messages of O T Prophecy, giving less attention to those of a different cast. Any direct communications with the Essenes is improbable, tho he must have known of them. John learned his lesson at the feet of no human teacher. His doctrine was formulated by himself in the years of solitary communion with God and the message of Scripture in the wilderness.

3. John's Mission. At last, coming forth from his retirement, he began to preach (for the date see CHRONOLOGY OF THE N T), not for self-aggrandizement, not to organize a new sect, or to inaugurate a new political movement, but to proclaim a great message and issue a great summons. 'The word of God' (Lk 3 2) called him forth like one of the prophets of old. Clad in simplest garb, like Elijah (Mk 1 6; Mt 3 4; cf. II K 1 8 RVmg.; Zec 13 4), using the plainest speech, with no fear of man before his eyes, he made a profound impression. No such voice had been heard in Israel for centuries. The crowds came from near and far, and the excitement was intense.

And no wonder. For the main burden of John's message was something to which no Israelite could be indifferent. That the long-looked-for era, so often foretold in Prophecy, was at last at hand was a startling message (Mk 1 2 f.; Mt 3 2). But no less startling was the announcement of the way in which this age was to be ushered in. Not by an immediate and glorious victory over Israel's enemies (John was not a Zealot), but by a judgment on Israel herself, searching and thorough, in which every unworthy unrepentant Israelite should be destroyed. John's message was virtually a summons to repentance, in view of the speedy appearance of Another, through or by whom the judgment should be executed (Mk 1 7 f.). The moral earnestness of the man is seen in the scathing rebuke he administered to the hypocritical religious authorities (Mt 3 7-10; Lk 3 7-9), and in the common-sense advice he gave to those who inquired of him 'what shall we do?' (Lk 3 10-14). The common people and even those who were viewed as openly sinful were deeply moved and gave a heartier response to John than did the religious leaders (Mk 11 20-33 and ¶s; Lk 29 f.).

In view of these considerations it is easier to understand the significance of baptism as administered by John. This was but a preparatory step. It is called 'a baptism of repentance unto remission of sins' (Mk 1 4). Both the repentance and the remission found their reason solely in the expected ushering in of the Kingdom by a great judgment. John called upon all to repent and confess their sins and lead a better life and to symbolize and seal this new purpose by a baptism. It was all temporary, in the sense that it looked forward to being completed in or through the new developments to follow. Thus John's baptism, tho having the same moral end as Christian baptism, can never be identified with it. So well expressed is this difference in Ac 19 4 that further comment is unnecessary (see also BAPTISM).

4. John and Jesus. While John referred most positively to One who was to follow him, he refrained from describing Him except in most general terms. He was 'mightier' than he, and His sandals John was not worthy even to unloose; and while John baptized with water, that One was to baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire (Mk 1 7 f.). The way in which He was to execute the judgment was also described in figurative language (Mt 3 10, 12; Lk 3 17). All this would seem to indicate that John, like the prophets of old, spoke out of a general inspiration which left him free to construct the details of his representation according to his best judgment. Whatever the degree of acquaintance between the families of John and Jesus, it is evident, apart from Jn 1 31, 33, that the divergence between the views of John and Jesus makes it impossible that the two could have met and talked over their respective missions until Jesus presented Himself to John for baptism. Each went through his own peculiar preparatory experience without holding any communication with the other. And yet it can scarcely be doubted that it was John's proclamation that gave Jesus to understand that His time also had come.

The significance for Jesus of His baptism by John is discussed in the article BAPTISM. Here we consider only the effect of this meeting on John. This seems to have been twofold: (a) On the one hand, John was profoundly impressed by the personality of Jesus. He drew back from Him, instinctively feeling his unworthiness to baptize Him, and in the profound experiences of those few moments John had a vision of the Divine perfection of a Sinless One. It was not the awful visage of a terrible judge that he looked upon then, but of One willing humbly to 'fulfil all righteousness,' and who was also the beloved Son of God (Mt 3 13-17). This brief interview with Jesus must have suggested to John that some of his ideas of the Coming One needed revision. (b) Consequently, we find soon after that John's view of the Messiah's work had undergone some change. Only thus can we account for his words to his disciples, 'Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world' (Jn 1 29). If we bear in mind that these words were spoken after his meeting with Jesus, the contrast between them and the report in the Synoptics will be less surprising. John may have been led by that meeting to ask whether he had taken account of all that prophecy taught concerning the Messiah. What of the great passage on the Suffering Servant in Is ch. 53? The sight of Jesus might easily have led him to ponder over that prophecy, and while still under the spell of that impression he again saw Jesus once or twice and pointed Him out as 'the Lamb of God.' Yet John could not have had that full light on the person and work of Christ which the Fourth Gospel imparts to him, and still have been subject to the limitations Jesus assigns him (Mt 11 11=Lk 7 28; cf. Mk 2 18-22), or have sent from prison to ask Jesus whether He were really the One who was to come (Mt 11 2 ff.=Lk 7 18 ff.). Thus the meeting with Jesus and observance of His work had a rather perplexing effect on John. He certainly did not revise at once or altogether his Messianic program, and he could not easily adjust it to the facts as they actually transpired. On the whole, the conviction that the Messiah must sooner or later bring matters to a great crisis and execute the Divine judgment on the sinful nation remained fundamental with John. It was not given to him to see that the fundamental note of the Messianic era was love, not wrath.

5. John's Further Ministry, Imprisonment, and Death. Thus awaiting some definite, signal manifestation on the part of Jesus, John continued his ministry even after he had baptized Him. He could not see his way clear to lay it down before the judgment had begun. For his bold rebuke of Herod Antipas for his unrighteous union with Herodias, he was imprisoned. According to Mk 6 19 ff. it was Herodias rather than Herod who was angered at John. And it was her relentless hate that at last was gratified by gaining Herod's consent to the execution of the fearless preacher of righteousness (Mk 6 17-29=Mt 14 3-12). John's influence did not die with him. Some of his disciples betook themselves to Jesus. Others probably sought to perpetuate his work independently of Jesus, and traces of their influence we meet with, twenty-five years later, in Asia Minor (Ac 18 25, 19 1 ff.). A superstitious feeling that John might rise from the dead and reappear, or that he might be reincarnated seems to have been prevalent for a time (Mk 6 14-16; cf. Lk 9 7-9; Mk 8 28 and ||s).

6. Jesus' Opinion of John. The significance of John can not be a matter of doubt to one who takes Jesus' words as authoritative. He was a prophet, the last and greatest of the prophetic succession under the old dispensation (Mt 11 9, 13; Lk 16 16). His personal righteousness and integrity were unquestioned (Mt 11 7 ff.=Lk 7 24 ff.). To him was granted an honor greater than ever befell any other man, that of being the forerunner to prepare the way of the Lord (Mt 11 10 ff.=Lk 7 27 ff.). He was in truth the Elijah who was to come (Mk 9 12 ff.=Mt 17 11 ff.; Mt 11 14). He was the herald of a new age, through whom many had been stirred up to press into the Kingdom of God (Mt 11 12; Lk 16 16). And yet John did not belong to the new era. Incidentally, the rules of fasting he laid upon his disciples showed this (Mk 2 18-22 and ||s). But it was in his whole view of the Messianic Age, in which judgment, not mercy, was uppermost, and in his altogether one-sided view of the Messiah's work that he was not one of the great ones in the (new) Kingdom of God according to Jesus (Mt 11 11.=Lk 7 28). This was not a judgment on John's personal character, or a dictum regarding his final salvation. It had to do altogether with the value of John's view of the Kingdom. And it was out of His loving wisdom that Jesus sent John's messengers back, not with a categorical answer to his question, but with one well calculated to give John the clue to the truth he was seeking. See in addition to Comm., A. T. Robertson, John the Loyal (1911); A. Blakiston, John the Baptist and His Relation to Jesus (1912). E. E. N.

JOHN, EPISTLES OF: Three N T writings belonging to the group of the so called CATHOLIC EPISTLES (q.v.).

I. FIRST EPISTLE.

1. Authorship. The First Epistle, in spite of its anonymous character, is generally recognized as being so similar to the Fourth Gospel in its language and thought as to have been from the same author. If, therefore, the Gospel is from the Apostle John (JOHN, GOSPEL OF, § 2a), the Epistle also is to be considered as from him.

2. Literary Relation to Fourth Gospel. The fact however, that the Epistle is not addressed to any one church, or to any particular group of readers, and the peculiar form of its opening verses, in which a reference to the facts of the historical Gospel as in some way underlying the Epistle's message is so evident, raise the question of the literary relation between these two writings of the Apostle.

This question can be answered only by a consideration of the contents of the Epistle and the situation which these contents present.

(a) Contents. The Epistle opens with a preliminary statement in which is given the basis of its message, viz.: the historical fact of the Word of life and the Apostles' personal relation to it—a fact already announced to the readers with a view to their spiritual fellowship with him. On the basis of this historical fact the Apostle states his purpose in writing the letter, in order that his joy may be fulfilled (1 1-4).

There follows then a summation of the truth heard from the Word of life, viz.: that God is light and is without darkness, with its bearing upon the readers' fellowship with one another and their common relationship to Jesus Christ and to God (1 5-10). This constitutes the introductory part of the Epistles.

The message proper is then begun with a further statement of the purpose of its sending—that the readers may not sin (2 1a), accompanying which is a pastoral reminder of their privileges and obligations in their consciousness of sin (2 1b-11), bringing the Apostle to a restatement both of the present and of a previous message, from the point of view of the younger and the older classes among his readers (2 12-14).

This is followed by an exhortation against a love of the world, with reasons for the urging (2 15-17) and a statement in general of the fact of Antichrist (2 18-29), accompanied by assurances of the fact of their spiritual life (2 20 ff., 29), which brings him to a presentation of the theme of the love of God, exhibited in the Christian's relation of spiritual sonship to Him, with what this relationship involved for the future (3<sup>14</sup>) and its practical bearing upon the present life (3<sup>15-16</sup>).

This leads the Apostle to a statement and discussion of the main theme of the Epistle, viz.: the love of the brethren. This theme is taken up by calling attention (1) to the naturalness of the world's hatred of the Christian (3<sup>15</sup>) and (2) to the evidential nature of a love of the brethren (3<sup>14</sup>), with a statement of the necessary reason for the having of such love (3<sup>16</sup>) and the necessary inference from its non-possession (3<sup>17</sup>), closing with an exhortation to the possessing of it in its reality (3<sup>18</sup>), with the reasons which lie in its contribution to an assurance of the spiritual life (3<sup>19-20</sup>).

After a short digression (4<sup>1-5</sup>), there is given an exhortation to brotherly love, with reasons for the exhorting (4<sup>7-11</sup>), followed by a more formal discussion of its bearing upon (1) God's relation to us (4<sup>13-16</sup>) and (2) our confidence in the future (4<sup>17-19</sup>), leading to a statement (a) of the reason of such love (4<sup>19</sup>), (b) of what it involves in confession of love to God (4<sup>20</sup>), and (c) of its basis in the command of God (4<sup>21</sup>).

There follows then a discussion of the allied theme of faith in Jesus as the Christ (5<sup>1-12</sup>), consisting of a statement (1) of the relation of such belief to spiritual sonship with God (5<sup>1a</sup>), together with the consequences which follow as to love of the brethren (5<sup>1b</sup>); (2) of the relation which love to God and obedience to His command have to love of the brethren (5<sup>2</sup>); (3) of the relation which love to God and faith in Jesus as the Christ have to obedience to God's commands (5<sup>3-4</sup>); (4) of the fact of Christ's mission in the world and the witness to it of the Spirit (5<sup>6-9</sup>), together with the obligation which rests upon us of receiving such witness (5<sup>9-12</sup>).

This brings the Apostle to his conclusion, which consists in a restatement of the purpose of his writing, from the point of view of the readers' assurance of eternal life (5<sup>13</sup>), followed by a statement of varied spiritual results which issue from such assurance (5<sup>14-20</sup>), closing with an exhortation to the guarding of the spiritual life (5<sup>21</sup>).

(b) Situation. The situation disclosed by this review of the Epistle's contents is evidently one in which the spiritual life of the readers was in need of stimulating in the direction of its holiness, its brotherly fellowship, and its assurance of the facts which were basal to it. At the same time, it is clear from the polemic tone of certain passages (e.g., 2<sup>18</sup> ff., 3<sup>7</sup> ff., 4<sup>1</sup> ff.) that this need was due to false teachings which were dulling the readers' spiritual perception and leading them into false views of the truth.

When we come to study the Epistle closely it is apparent from such passages as 2<sup>20</sup>, 4<sup>6-8</sup>, 5<sup>13</sup>, 19 ff., where the question of real spiritual knowledge is claimed, 4<sup>2</sup> (cf. 1<sup>2</sup>), where the fact of Christ's coming in the flesh is emphasized, 4<sup>10</sup>, 14, 5<sup>10</sup> ff. (cf. 2<sup>1</sup> ff.), which accent Christ's redemptive functions as Son of God, especially 5<sup>5</sup> ff., which claims deity for Christ at His death as well as at His baptism, that the Epistle moved in very much the same Gnostic surroundings as the Gospel<sup>1</sup> (cf. in the Gospel such passages as 14<sup>7-9</sup>, 17, 20, 17<sup>3</sup>, 25, which assert this spiritual knowing; 1<sup>14</sup>, which declares this fact of Christ in the flesh; 6<sup>50-58</sup>, 12<sup>27</sup>, 16<sup>15</sup>, 17 ff., 28, 32, 17<sup>1</sup>, 11, 18<sup>11</sup>, which show Christ as Son of God in His death for the world's salvation).

The announced purpose of the Gospel's writing (20<sup>30</sup> ff.) that the readers might have a more abundant spiritual life through their faith in Jesus as the Son of God brings the Ep. into further alignment with the Gospel (cf. Ep 2<sup>1a</sup>, 3<sup>3-12</sup>, 18-24, 5<sup>13-21</sup>).

This similarity in the surroundings is made more evident by the fact that both Gospel and Epistle have in view a tendency among their readers to ignore the commands of God, especially at the point of love—not only to God, but to one another (cf. Gospel 14<sup>15</sup>, 21, 23 ff., 15<sup>9</sup> ff., 12-14, 17-19; Ep 3<sup>7-12</sup>, 21-23, 4<sup>20</sup> ff.)—a tendency with which we are made familiar in the later stages of Paul's ministry, especially in the Ephesian region (see EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO, § 4).

(c) Place, Date, and Occasion. If then both writings disclose the same general conditions in their surroundings, we have not only an idea of the time and the place of the Epistles' origin (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF, §§ 2b, 2c), but more particularly some hint at the relation which the Epistle sustained to the Gospel; for if, as we have seen, the Epistle takes up these points brought out in the Gospel's presentation of Jesus and develops them in their bearing upon the practical life, then it would seem that the Epistle was written either to introduce to more careful attention the Gospel which was to follow it (Lightfoot), or—which is much more likely—that it was written to follow the Gospel and make effective on these practical lines the historical facts of the Divine Personality which it presented. This would serve to explain the unique beginning of the Epistle, basing as it does the message that follows on the historical facts which already had been announced to the readers.<sup>2</sup> What was the occasion of the Epistle's writing and how soon it followed upon the Gospel, if it was not sent along with it, it is impossible to say. All that seems clear is that the specific message of the Gospel was in the Apostle's mind when he wrote and that it was his purpose to apply its great truths to the practical living of his readers.

3. Thought of the Epistle. The consideration of this question of relationship between the Epistle and the Gospel gives a special interest to the Epistle's thought. In general, it is apparent that, while this does not, as the Gospel's, gather around the personality of Christ, yet it is Christ not simply in His redemptive relations to us but in Himself that forms its background. He is never called the Son of Man, yet not only is the fact of His incarnation asserted (4<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1<sup>2</sup>), but His nature as the Son of God is constantly kept at the front. It is as the Son that He manifests the eternal life, which was with the Father (1<sup>2</sup>; cf. 5<sup>20</sup>), so that it is with Him, the Son, as well as with the Father, that we have our spiritual fellowship (1<sup>3</sup>, 2<sup>24</sup>). It is the confession of Him as Son that constitutes this fellowship (4<sup>15</sup>), and it is the denial of the Son, as well as of the Father, that constitutes the Spirit of Antichrist (2<sup>22b</sup>, 23). It is thus as Son that He has come into the world in His redemptive mission (4 9 f., 14, 3 8), and through Him as Son that God has given us eternal life (5 10-12). As Son, therefore, He cleanses us from sin through His death (1 7). At the same time, He is the Christ. As such He came into the world and accomplished His mission (5 6). As such He is the propitiation for sin (2 2, 4 10) and the Advocate with the Father in the sinner's behalf (2 1). With Him both as Christ and as Son is our fellowship (5 20). The denial of Him as Christ is, therefore, of the same Antichrist spirit as the denial of Him as Son (2 22 f., 4 2 f.), and belief in Him as Christ is of the same Divine spirit as belief in Him as Son (3 23, 4 2; cf. ver. 15, 5 1, 5). He is termed also in one passage the Word ( $\Lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ ) of life (1 1).

God is represented as Spirit, apprehensible only by the spiritual attitude of life (4 12; cf. 3 23). It is to this spiritual sense that God reveals Himself in His relations to us (4 7 f.). He alone is the true God and the only source of spiritual life (5 20; cf. 2 20, 3 10). He is presented to us as the Father (2 1, 3 1); He is also presented to us under the figure of love (4 8, 16), which is viewed not simply as an attribute, but as an energizing activity, imparting itself to us and in us, not only evidencing our possession of the Divine nature and fellowship (4 7, 12, 16), but perfecting itself in our obedience to God's commands (2 5; cf. vs. 15-17, 3 14), especially in that command which brings us into love of one another (3 23, 4 12). This love has prompted God to send His Son for the saving of the world (4 9 f.) and to bring us into filial relations with Himself (3 1). Further, He is presented under the figure of light (1 5), which is viewed specifically as an energizing activity. In fact, since this statement is presented as summing up the message of the Epistle and since the theme of this message is brotherly love, which is born of the love God has imparted to us, it would seem that this figure of light was an emphatic way of bringing out the energizing power of love, since the characteristic element in light is its pervading, infusing power (cf. Gospel 1 4, 9, 3 20 f., 11 9 f., 12 35 f.; cf. also Lk 11 33-36). This would seem to be evident from the fact that this Divine light is represented as producing practically the same results in us as those produced by love (cf. 1 6 f., 2 8-11, where walking in the light, as a sphere of activity to whose influences we are open, is evidence not only of fellowship with God but of the outgoing of our love in fellowship with one another). So the Holy Spirit is presented as given us by God not only to inform us of truth (as Gospel 14 26, 16 13 f.), but by His energizing within us to produce in us an assurance of our relation to God (3 24, 4 13) and to bring us to a living confession of Christ (4 2). Over against this is the energizing of the spirit of Antichrist (4 3).

As a consequence of all this, eternal life is presented not as a future possession but as a present activity. It is the Christian's present spiritual living. The world lies in the power of the Evil One (5 19; cf. 3 8-10); consequently, sin is not simply unrighteousness (1 9, 3 6-8, 5 17) and lawlessness (3 4), it is also hatred (3 10-12, 15), and darkness (1 6, 2 9-11), and death (3 14), and it can not escape our notice how these qualities of sin are interwoven to make up the general idea of sin as a resultant force, contrasted with the composite resultants of God's Divine energizing in the life of the soul. The forces of sin are gathered up in the term Antichrist, which is not necessarily an individual (in spite of the personal cast of 2 18 f.), but simply the personification of the principles of evil (2 22, 4 3), a persistent yielding to which may result in the hopelessness of spiritual life (5 10 f.). As a remnant of the old dominant forces of the evil life sin is still in the Christian (1 8-10, 2 16) but no longer as the habit of life—as such it is impossible in one begotten of God (3 6, 9). Consistently with this idea of the energizing of God in the spiritual life the Christian is the product of the life of God (2 29, 3 9, 4 7, 5 1 4, 18), and faith is distinctively the overcoming by Him of the evil influences of the world (5 4 f.).

II. SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES.

4. Writer's Designation of Himself. The point of chief interest in the study of these Epistles is the question of their authorship. They both claim as author one who designates himself 'the Elder' ( $\delta \piρεσβυτερος$ ), the question being who is to be understood by this name.

The likelihood of a satisfactory answer to this question lies naturally along the line of an induction of the contents of these letters, the such induction can not promise much because of the restricted form of the writings.

5. Situation. The situation presented by the letters is briefly as follows:

(1) The Second Epistle was written to the mother of a household, certain members of which were walking in the truth, presumably certain others not so walking (ver. 4). It was written to urge three things: (a) The following out of the command already given and known, viz., brotherly love (ver. 11); (b) the careful preserving of faith already possessed and the preventing of its further loss (ver. 12); (c) the non-receiving of false teachers already among them (ver. 10 f.)—all these things being urged until the author might personally come to them and restore their joy (ver. 12). (2) The Third Epistle was written to a certain Gaius, a prominent member, if not an officer, in one of the churches over which the author was in charge. It was written (a) to commend him for his reception of certain brethren who had come to him on their journey (vs. 5-9); (b) to inform him of a letter which they bore from the author to the church, and of a contrary attitude toward himself on the part of a certain Diotrephes, another prominent member, perhaps an officer of the church in question (ver. 9); (c) to announce his plan personally to come and rebuke this attitude (ver. 10); (d) in the meanwhile to warn Gaius against following this example of Diotrephes, to encourage him in good conduct until they should see each other (vs. 11, 13, 14), and particularly to commend to Gaius Demetrius, who probably was accompanying the brethren and was not in good favor with the Church (ver. 12).

From this it is clear: (1) That these were purely personal letters. (2) That the II Ep. moves in a surrounding which reminds us of that of the I Ep., which is confirmed by a closer study of the false teachers referred to in the former, showing them to have been (a) of the same Cerinthian class, denying the Divine Sonship of Jesus (vs. 3, 9; cf. I Ep. 4 10, 14, 5 10 f.); (b) of the same Docetic class, denying that Jesus is come in the flesh (ver. 7; cf. I Ep. 4 2 f.); (c) of the same Antinomian class, ignoring the commands of God (vs. 4, 6, 9; cf. I Ep. 3 7-12). (3) That the III Ep. shows the author to be in responsible charge of a certain church, or churches, with confidence enough in his influence to quell by his personal presence ambitious opposition to his authority when absent.

6. Time and Place. Nothing definite is disclosed in the letters as to the time and place of their composition, tho the similarity of conditions between II Ep. and I Ep. would seem to associate them in the Ephesian region and at the time of the labors of the Apostle John (q.v.).

7. Readers. The persons to whom the letters are sent seem distinctly enough designated, at least in the case of the III Ep.; yet nothing can be determined as to their identity. The phrase of address in the II Ep. ('the elect lady,' ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ) has been variously interpreted, but obviously is nothing more than an indefinite term for the individual to whom the letter is sent.<sup>3</sup> The Gaius of the III Ep. may be any one of those of the same name mentioned in the N T (Ac 19 29, 20 4; I Co 1 14; Ro 16 23), or may be another person. The name was a common one. The Diotrophes of the III Ep. is mentioned nowhere else in the N T, while the Demetrius is not likely to be identified with the Demetrius of Ac 19 23 ff.

8. Authorship. This all comes to the general result that while the Epistles disclose nothing which definitely decides their authorship, such indications as they give are in the direction of an authorship by the Apostle John. The only question is whether the author's peculiar designation of himself as 'the elder' is one which the Apostle could and naturally might, in the circumstances of these letters, use of himself.

In answering this question we must remember that the only testimony we have as to the existence of a so called Presbyter (Elder) John is the assumption of Eusebius that Papias distinguishes between an Apostle John and a Presbyter John in the statement which he quotes from his works in his Ecclesiastical History (III, 39), while there is absolutely no proof of the residence and work in Asia and the Ephesian region of such a John as distinct from the Apostle (cf. Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 194-235, and JOHN, THE APOSTLE). When we recognize, however, that in Papias' statement the Apostles, including John, are designated elders (πρεσβύτεροι), and when we consider the fact that in the N T this term is not used exclusively in an official sense (cf. Ac 14 23, where it refers evidently to a class of mature men, appointed to the general oversight of the community [f. I Th 5 12; I Ti 5 1, where obviously age is meant [cf. Tit 2 2-8]. See APOSTLE), it is clear that the author may have used the term here of himself, as Papias may have used it of the Apostles in his statement, to designate one who belonged to the older generation which was passing away. See Zahn, N T Introduction, II, 435 f.

Such a term would be quite in accord with the situation presented in these letters. To this Christian mother, in trouble about her household, to this Christian Gaius in the emergency of his church administration, it would give his encouragement and warning a peculiar appeal, through this relationship which he held to the venerated past. If Paul could use a similar term ('the aged,' πρεσβύτερος) in his personal letter to his friend Philemon (ver. 9), John might with even greater propriety use this term in his personal letters to these friends.

9. External Evidence. These letters came to be fully accepted by the Church only at a relatively late date. For a considerable while they were placed in the class of Antilegomena, and in Jerome's day were generally denied Apostolic origin and assigned to authorship by the 'Presbyter.' The earlier tradition, however, and that held by prominent Fathers such as Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria, was that they came from the Apostle, the 'Presbyter' tradition arising later. This may be accounted for by the fact that as private letters they would be relatively slow in coming to light and when known would be naturally questioned as to their Apostolic credentials, especially as they did not contain an Apostolic name (as Philemon did). This would tend to confirm such doubt as might arise from the slowness of their appearance and formulate it into an assignment of them to the assumed 'Presbyter' of Papias. The fact, however, that when they first appeared they were held to have come from the Apostle by persons who in those times were the best informed and that this view persisted even when the suspicion regarding them formulated itself into the other view shows that the evidence for the earlier opinion must have been peculiarly strong.

LITERATURE: Among Introductions, those of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn (Eng. transl. 1917) will best present the opposite positions of modern German scholarship. Among Commentaries, the following will be found most helpful: Ebrard (Eng. transl. 1860); Haupt (Eng. transl. 1870); Westcott (1886); and Weiss, in *Meyer Krit.-exeg. Kom. ab. d. JOHN, GOSPEL OF. The fourth of the N T Gospel Writings, commonly known as the Fourth Gospel, because of its distinctive difference in contents and character from the other three (see GOSPEL, § 3).

1. Criticism of the Gospel. This difference has always been recognized, but it was not until the end of the 18th cent., during the Deistic movement in England, that it was made the reason for a definite attack against the Gospel's genuineness (Evanson, 1792)—an attack which was repeated on broader grounds (Eckermann, 1796; Vogel, 1801) during the similar movement in Germany. Tho no lasting impression was made by these attacks, hostility against the Gospel was renewed a quarter of a century later (Bretschneider, 1820) with particular emphasis upon the differences in form and contents between the discourses of the Fourth Gospel and those of the Synoptics. Because of the critical uncertainty, if not weakness, with which it was met by the spiritual school of Schleiermacher (1825), this hostility grew until the purely mystical character of the Gospel was asserted (Strauss, 1835) and it was relegated to the category of fanciful productions (Bruno Bauer, 1850).

In the meanwhile the Tübingen School (1835) strengthened the unfavorable position in which the Gospel had been placed by returning to the differences which the Gospel presented to the Synoptic narratives and disclosing the historical situation by which they claimed these differences were accounted for. This situation they held to be that of the 2d cent., and the Gospel to be the natural product of the theological controversies of that age.

In proportion as this criticism was positive and constructive it appealed to the judgment of scholars, tho its essential ignoring of the field of external evidence opened the way for a vigorous opposition, which was carried on until the fundamental principles of Tübingen criticism in general were shown to be unfounded in fact (Ritschl, 1857) and the reaction against the claims and the conclusions of the School began. In this reaction the Gospel returned to a relatively favorable position, opponents and defenders drawing appreciably nearer together in the admission, on the one side, that much of its material was of actual Apostolic date, if not of Apostolic origin, and, on the other side, that there was a subjective element in the writing which had molded in form and substance much, if not all, of its narrative and its discourses.

Later, however, this middle position gave way to one of distinct antagonism, the question as to contents being not whether the record is more or less historical, but whether it is actually historical or purely fictional, the question as to the author being not whether it was the Apostle himself, or one of his disciples or contemporaries, but whether it was a writer of the Apostolic Age, or one who lived and wrote after that age had passed away and thus had no personal contact with it whatever. This flow of hostile criticism, Drummond's notable work, The Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (1904), more or less obstructed through its thorough study of the external evidence for the dating of the Gospel, and of the internal evidence for its authorship, establishing the conclusion (p. 514) that the work belongs to the 1st cent. and that, while the Johannean authorship can not be absolutely demonstrated, it can not be denied.<sup>1</sup>

Shortly after Drummond's book there came to light a Syrian manuscript of the Odes and Psalms of Solomon (published by Ronald H. H. C. Williams, Cambridge University, 1909), a production recognized as belonging to the later Apostolic century. Their significance lay in the fact that, whether they were of Christian origin (Harris), or of Jewish origin, with Christian editing (Harnack), they showed a striking resemblance to the thought of the Fourth Gospel, and yet disclosed their thinking as Jewish and not Hellenic. The argument naturally followed that if this Jewish document of 1st cent. origin contained the same mystical thinking as the Fourth Gospel, then the Gospel did not need to be considered of Hellenic 2d cent. date, but could be Jewish and of the Apostolic age.<sup>2</sup>

This gave further pause to the hostile criticism of the Gospel, tho the main contention still centered at the point of the historic value of its contents; criticism moving away from the earlier and cruder theories of documentary partition into the more refined field of editorial revision, with more or less of Apostolic or first hand element in the original material, Dr. Garvie's, The Beloved Disciple (1922), being the most recent and finest type of this method.<sup>3</sup>

In view of this present day criticism, the study of of the Gospel requires, not merely a general consideration of the Gospel's contents to determine whether they can have come from the Apostolic Age, but a more specific study of them, to ascertain to what extent they give us the personal and not the edited experience of the author, and to what degree they show the author to have participated in the events which he records.

We come, then, to the disclosures which the Gospel itself makes of itself.

2. Relation of Contents to Origin of Gospel: Outline. It presents to us, in spite of the deeply doctrinal character of its contents, a relatively simple plan of narrative which gathers around a framework of visits to Jerusalem (cf. Sanday, Criticism, p. 117) that extend from the beginning of the ministry to its end, tho, as will be seen later (note 4, p. 470, and § 4), all but one occur after the close of the Galilean work.

After the Prolog (1<sup>1-18</sup>)—whose opening statements regarding the preexistence of the Logos (1<sup>1-4</sup>), His creative relation to the Universe (1<sup>5</sup>), and His spiritually vital and illuminative relations to the soul of man (1<sup>4-14</sup>) are among the most profound utterances of Scripture, and whose following statements regarding the relation of this incarnate Word to the spiritual faith and life of men (1<sup>9-14</sup>; 16<sup>1-18</sup>) give an inspiring insight into the thought of all the Gospel—the narrative (1<sup>19-20</sup> 21) begins.

It opens with the Baptist's confession to the Jerusalem delegation which came to inquire as to the authority of his work (1<sup>19-28</sup>)—a confession prepared for in the Prolog itself (1<sup>6-8</sup>, 15) and followed by the Baptist's testimony to his own disciples (1<sup>29-30</sup>), which issues in the first disciple adherence to Jesus (vs. 37-41).

This occurring at Jordan, there are then related events which presuppose a return of Jesus and His new-found disciples to Galilee (2<sup>1-12</sup>), from which region He makes the first visit of His ministry to Jerusalem (2<sup>13-3</sup> 30).

This visit, which is at the time of Passover (2<sup>13</sup>), is evidently undertaken in the spirit of reform, the corruptions of the national worship being attacked in the cleansing of the Temple (2 14-16—Evangelist's comment ver. 17). It is so understood by the religious leaders of the people (2 18-20—Evangelist's explanation ver. 21 f.).

<sup>1</sup> An interesting contribution to the early date of the Gospel is given by Lamberton, Themes from St. John's Gospel in Early Roman Catacomb Paintings, Thesis for the Ph. D., Princeton University. (n.d.) An examination of the frescoes of what is known as the Greek Chapel, located in the primitive portion of the catacombs and dating from the time of Hadrian, or Trajan, at the latest, revealed that underneath the various strata of plaster on the walls a first stratum was found containing reproductions of scenes distinctive of the Fourth Gospel (e.g., the Raising of Lazarus, and the Talk with the Samaritan woman). If these scenes were executed even as late as 130 A.D., it would presuppose, not only a circulation and acceptance of the Gospel in the Church some time previous to this in Rome, but the origin of the Gospel some time even earlier in the East.

<sup>2</sup> This conclusion has been given confirmation by the publication of a careful study of the Fourth Gospel by C. F. Burney, Oxford University, entitled The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel (1922), in which it is claimed that the language, as well as the thought, of the Gospel is Semitic, even in the Prolog, which has been the mainstay of those who held the Gospel to be Hellenic in its ideas.

The effect of this opening ministry is then given (2 23—Evangelist's qualifying remark ver. 24 f.), an illustration being added in the visit of Nicodemus (3 1-15—Evangelist's amplification 3 16-23).

From Jerusalem there is a departure of Jesus and His disciples into Judea (3 22), issuing in a ministry in the neighborhood of the Baptist's work (3 23 f.). A dispute between the Baptist's disciples and the Jews about purifying introduces a further testimony of the Baptist to Jesus (3 25-30—Evangelist's amplification 3 31-36) and leads the way to a statement of the reasons for Jesus' final return again into Galilee (4 1-2—Evangelist's explanation ver. 3). Events on the journey through Samaria are given (4 4-42—Evangelist's explanations ver. 5) and His reception in Galilee (4 43-46) with miracles at Cana and Capernaum (4 46-54—Evangelist's comment 4 54).

There is then narrated a second visit to Jerusalem (ch. 5), the main incident in which is the healing of the impotent man at the Pool of Bethesda (5 2-9—excise vs. 3b, 4), which develops a strenuous opposition on the part of the Jews to Jesus' disregard of the Sabbath laws and an open vindication by Jesus of His position (5 10-47). At the beginning of His reply His assertion of the relation He bore to God (ver. 17) inflames the Jews to murderous hostility (ver. 18) from which new element the rest of the discourse develops.

Ch. 6 furnishes the one point of detailed contact with the Synoptic narrative, presenting to the readers the feeding of the multitude with which Jesus' Galilean ministry was brought to its close (cf. Mk 6 32-44 and Jn). It gives in addition, however, the subsequent address of Jesus in the synagogue at Capernaum before the crowd which had followed Him back to the other side of the lake (6 25-58—Ev's statement ver. 59), with its effect on the people (6 60-66a—Ev's explanation 6 66b, 65) and on the Twelve (6 66-70—Ev's explanation ver. 71), and statement as to effect on Jesus of the hostility of the Jews (7 1). [In consulting this analysis one should keep in mind the disarrangements of the material. See Note 4, page 470].

There then follows Jesus' final departure from Galilee at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, for His closing ministry in Jerusalem (7 2-10), the state of feeling in the city concerning Him (7 11-13) with His teaching in the Temple and its effect upon the people (7 14-31); the effort of the Pharisees and chief priests to arrest Him, with Jesus' reply and its popular effect (7 32-39), and finally His appeal on the last day of the Feast and its effect (7 40-44—Ev's explanation ver. 39), closing with the report of the officers to the Pharisees and chief priests and the effort of Nicodemus to stay action (7 45-52—Ev's explanation ver. 59).

Then is given Jesus' further public teaching—probably in connection with this same Feast—with the Pharisaic hostility which it developed and Jesus' escape from the city (8 12-52—excise episode of the woman taken in adultery, 7 53-8 11), Jesus' return to the city at the Feast of Dedication (Ev's statement ver. 22) and His healing of the blind man with the hostility it aroused (9 1-38) and Jesus' discourse (9 39-10 21), leading up to the Jews' demands on Him for a plain statement of His Messiahship and Jesus' answering discourse (10 22-38), its irritating effect upon the Jews, and Jesus' escape to the other side of the Jordan, followed by a sympathetic multitude (10 39-42).

Ch. 1 presents Jesus' return from the east of the Jordan to Bethany upon announcement of the sickness of Lazarus (11 1-14—Ev's explanation ver. 2 and prefacing statement ver. 3), whom He raises from the dead (11 17-44), the effect of the miracle upon the Jews who were present (11 45 f.) and upon the Pharisees and chief priests (11 47-53), with the departure of Jesus and His disciples to Ephraim (11 54).

There is then presented Jesus' last visit to Jerusalem—closing the main narrative of the book (11 55-20 31). This large section opens with a statement of the coming Passover Feast, the curiosity of the people, and the command of the Pharisees for Jesus' arrest (11 55-57). Following this come Jesus' arrival at Bethany and the supper given Him in Lazarus' home (12 1-8—Ev's explanation ver. 9 and additional statement ver. 9), the council of the Jews against Lazarus (12 10 f.), Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, with its effect on the Pharisees (12 13-19—Ev's comment vs. 16-18), the desire of certain Greeks to see Him, with His remarks and His withdrawal from publicity (12 20-36—Ev's statement as to the persistent unbelief of the Jews, with confirmation from prophecy, (12 37-43), with His further remarks (12 44-50).

This brings the narrative to the Passover Meal of Jesus with His disciples (13 1), which is given in detail, with the preceding controversy among the disciples (13 2-20), the disclosure of the betrayer during its course (13 21-30), and the questions of the disciples (13 36-38), leading up to His consolatory discourse (chs. 14-16), and valedictory prayer (ch. 17).

There then follow the departure of Jesus and His disciples from the room and their arrival in Gethsemane (18 1), with the narrative of the betrayal (18 2-12), the taking of Jesus to Annas (18 13a—Ev's explanation vs. 13b, 14), Peter's first denial (18 15-18), the trial before Caiaphas (18 19-24), Peter's second and third denials (18 25-27), the presentation of Jesus before Pilate for judgment (18 28), with the details of His examination by that official (18 29-19 12), and the final surrender to the demand of the crowd for His Crucifixion (19 13-16).

This is followed by a narrative of the Crucifixion (19 17-27—Ev's explanation 19 28a and self-testimony vs. 23-27), the Burial (19 28-42), and the Resurrection, with its accompanying appearances to the disciples (20 1-7), closing with the Ev's statement as to the motive of the narrative (20 8 f.).

Ch. 21 is added evidently by way of supplement or epilog, giving an appearance of Jesus to His disciples at the Sea of Tiberias (21 1-6), with its effect upon the disciples (21 7 f.—Ev's explanation vs. 7b, 8), the following meal upon the shore (21 9-14—Ev's statement ver. 14), Jesus' questions to Peter, with Peter's responses and the commissions given him (21 15-17), and finally Jesus' prophecy regarding Peter, with Peter's query and Jesus' response (21 18-23—Ev's explanation ver. 19 and statement ver. 23).

This is closed with a formal assurance by those who published the Gospel as to the reliability of the record, with the impression of the writer representing them as to its relation in extent to the whole of Jesus' life (21 24 f.).

(a) Bearing upon Authorship. When we come to study the material covered by this outline we find at outset that while the author is not named there is used an expression in referring to one of the disciples which is significant as appearing to be either the author's designation of himself or the designation of him by a later hand, or hands (see 21 24 in connection with 21 7, 20 ('the disciple whom Jesus loved,' 13 23, 19 26, 20 2, 21 7, 20). Naturally such a phrase turns us to one of the three disciples—Peter, James, and John—who were on terms of intimate fellowship with Jesus. Of these three, however, Peter is excluded, because of his being definitely named along with this peculiarly described disciple (13 23 f., 20 2-10, 21 7, 20, 23; cf. 18 15 f.). James is also excluded because of his early martyrdom (Ac 12 2, 44 A.D.). John alone remains, and while he is not described elsewhere in the N T by this phrase, he is found in such companionship with Peter in the Jerusalem Church life (Ac 31-41, 41-22, 8 14; cf. also Gal 2 9) as would correspond with the companionship of Peter and this peculiarly described disciple in the Gospel narrative (see passages above; cf. also Lk 22 8). Assuming that the Apostle John is thus referred to, is he to be identified with the author of the Gospel? In answer to this question there are certain things which a more detailed study of the Gospel renders quite evident.

(1) Such study shows that, whoever the author may have been, he was a Jew. The evidence for this is briefly: (a) His familiarity with the situation of Jewish national affairs—e.g., (α) the loss by the Jews of the legal right to put to death (18 31, 19 7); (β) the function of the high priest in the trial of a prisoner (18 19, 24, as compared with 18 13); (γ) Pilate's unstable position at Rome (19 12-15, 21). (b) His familiarity with the Jewish parties—e.g., (α) the party composition of the Sanhedrin (7 45-52);

(β) the identification of the chief priests with the Sadducees, as in their subordination to the popular leadership of the Pharisees (passim), and their haughty aristocracy of manner (11 49). (c) His familiarity with Jewish customs—e.g., (α) the minor feasts—as Dedication (10 22; cf. I Mac 4 59); (β) the custom of attending the feasts in Jerusalem (7 2-13), the habit of the Galileans in particular (4 45), as well as the ceremonial details during their observance—e.g., those of the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles (7 37); (γ) the necessity which controlled the Sabbath of the Passover (19 31, 42); (δ) the law of defilement during the feast (18 28) and of purification before the feast (11 55); (ε) the marriage customs (2 1 ff.) and the manner of burying (11 44, 19 39 f.). (d) His familiarity with ideas and conceptions peculiarly Jewish—e.g., (α) the relations between the Samaritans and the Jews (4 9); (β) the Rabbinic avoidance of conversation with a woman (4 27); (γ) the importance attached to education in the Rabbinic schools (7 15, 49); (δ) the Messianic expectations among the people (ch. 7). (e) The fact that he was acquainted with the Hebrew text sufficiently to correct the LXX. rendering of his quotations by the original reading—e.g., the citation from Is 6 10 (12 40), and that from Ps 41 9 (13 18). Finally (f) the fact that his style bears a Hebrew stamp and betrays a Hebrew influence—e.g., (α) the repetition of phrase with advancement of thought in 1 1-5, 10 11-16, 15 1-10, 17 2-5, 9 f., 15-17); (β) the parallelism of ideas with contrasted juxtaposition of words in 6 35, 12 44 f., 13 20; (γ) the symbolic tendency of thought in 1 4 f., 5 25, 6 55 f., 12 32, 14 19.

(2) It shows the author was a Palestinian Jew—i.e., a Jew who knew the land through a personal acquaintance which came from living in it. From the frequency and detail of geographical and topographical reference in Mt and Mk, as over against Lk, it would seem that such a characteristic agreed with the Palestinian residence of the first two writers. But this characteristic is more marked in the Fourth Gospel than in either Mt or Mk, and is often of a peculiarly detailed and descriptive kind—e.g., (a) a distinguishing of places from others of similar name (1 28, 2 1, 11), (b) a definiteness regarding out-of-the-way places (3 23, 11 54), (c) a descriptiveness regarding well-known places (4 5 f., 11, 20), (d) a familiarity of detail regarding Jerusalem and the Temple (2 20, 5 2, 8 20, 10 23, 18 1, 19 13, 41). The significance of these references is to places destroyed or lost sight of in the fall of Jerusalem and consequently which could only with difficulty have been known of in the 2d cent. (For fuller treatment of these two points, see Drummond, pp. 352-374).

(3) It shows the author was an eye-witness of the events which he describes. Obviously, in proportion as the foregoing points have to do with occurrences in Jesus' ministry, the familiarity which they disclose is that which goes most naturally with an actual participation of the narrator in what occurred. Obviously also, as this familiarity discloses itself to be the characteristic of the narrative in general, the inference of personal contact with the events recorded is strongly confirmed. Now, as a matter of fact, Matthew and Mark display this characteristic in their general narrative, as over against Luke, whose versatility would have enabled him easily to crowd his record with the marks of personal participation in its events if he had had it. This participation, however, Matthew did personally have (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF, § 1j), while Mark had it through Peter—from whom he got his material and who was one of Jesus' most intimate and perhaps most impressionable disciples. It is interesting, therefore, to note that this familiarity is characteristic of the Fourth Evangelist's narrative to a greater degree than it is even of Matthew's or Mark's. It is not a mere definiteness of statement that is displayed, since this is possible where there has been no personal presence (cf. Mt 4 13, before Matthew's call); much less is it mere length of statement, for this is even more possible without a personal presence (cf. Mt 4 24 f., before Matthew's call); but a familiarity of touch which gives to the narrative a personal cast that most naturally involves a personal contact with the events (cf. e.g., 1 35-51, 4 4-42, 6 1-14, 11 1-46, 19 25-27—notably in comparison with Synoptic parallels 7 2-10 [cf. Lk 9 51-56], 12 1-8 [cf. Mk 14 3-9; Mt 26 6-13], 13 1-20 [cf. Lk 22 24-30], 18 2-12 [cf. Mk 14 43-52; Mt 26 47-56; Lk 22 47-53]).

The author is constantly throwing into the narrative words and phrases and remarks that have no value apart from their connection with his own experience in the events he records. Note, e.g., (1) The incident of Peter and 'that other disciple' at the tomb (20 3-8)—there is no call for the details of his outrunning Peter and yet hesitating to enter until encouraged by Peter's impulsiveness, and then, when he saw the disposal of the napkin and the linen cloths, coming as by a shock to the conviction of the Master's return to life. There is no call for these details apart from his memory of the changes through which his thinking went in those swift moments. (2) The minute description of what took place on the Lake the morning after the multitude had been fed (6 22-24). Nothing of what happened the evening before, or in Capernaum afterwards, calls for these details—details so unimportant in themselves that they would never be looked for in the story, and yet, so interesting to the author that he could not refrain from giving them, because they were part of what to him was the crisis in the Master's Galilean Ministry. So (3) the note added to the discourse at the Feast of Dedication (10 22). Nothing in the discourse, or in the dispute that followed it, depends on that note. Also (4) the mention of Sychar and Jacob's well (4 5 f.); Bethany beyond Jordan (1 28); Aenon, near Salim (3 23); the city called Ephraim (11 54). None of these lend any weight to, or derive any significance from, the narratives with which they are connected. (For elaboration of this idea see Dr. H. Scott Holland's The Fourth Gospel (posthumously published, 1923) pp. 53-62.

This personal cast comes to its finest expression in the passages where the author gives the character of the disciples and some of the followers of Jesus (e.g., Philip, 6 5-7, 14 7-9; Thomas, 11 16, 14 5, 20 24-29; Peter, 13 6-9, 20 3-10, 21 3-22 [cf. Mt 14 28-31]; Martha and Mary, 11 20-32, 30 [tho see 12 2 in comparison with Lk 10 38-41]). There is an intimacy of knowledge in what is said, as tho the subjects had been studied not only at close range, but from the viewpoint of Jesus' own knowledge of them. In fact, there is a frequent appreciation of Jesus' own less evident intimations and allusions and a profound entrance into His action and thought which would most naturally accord not simply with a personal participation in His ministry, but with a peculiar closeness of companionship in all the life he was privileged to live with the Master (cf. 4 34-38, 6 6, 64 f., 71, 11 5, 13 11, 28 f.). If it be said that this, after all, might be the result of a native power of vision into the self of Jesus and of a keenness in the reading of the disciples' character exercised by some spiritual genius a hundred years after the earthly ministry had been finished, the question immediately arises whether such vision and insight would not have been immeasurably more possible under the stimulus of a personal contact with Jesus and His disciples in the actual events which that ministry produced. Altogether, the author's narrative has nothing in it of the artificial. The statements of fact are not forced. The reproductions of impressions are not labored. The undesigned way in which they appear bears the stamp of naturalness. The very frankness with which sometimes the impressions of the event are corrected by the better undersanding of later years (2 22, 12 16), and the independency with which in essential matters the Synoptic point of view—which by the 2d cent. had attained a position of authority in the church—is handled (e.g., as to the scene of the ministry, the duration of the ministry, the cleansing of the Temple, the date of the Last Supper, and the Crucifixion) betray a first-hand knowledge of the facts.

In fact, if one considers the Gospel's general relation to the Synoptic narrative, it is not easy to escape the conviction that the author had a knowledge of the Master's ministry without which it would be difficult fully to understand the narrative which the Synoptics give. That narrative presents us with a ministry of Jesus for which it offers practically no explanation. It does not tell us (1) why John's imprisonment made it necessary for Jesus to leave Judea and retire into a region removed from what was taking place there (Mk 1 14 f. and ||s); (2) why Jesus throughout his Galilean work was so careful that the news of His startling deeds should not be spread abroad and the Messianic acclaim of Himself should be suppressed (Mk 1 43 and ||s, 3 12, 5 43, 7 36); (3) why He followed up His feeding of the multitude with an abandonment of this Galilean ministry and retired with His disciples into the sparsely settled regions of Northern Galilee and the Decapolis (Mk 7 24, 31 and ||s); (4) why, after this period was over, on the disciples' confession of their belief that His Messiahship was spiritually something more than a national Messiahship, He declared that because of this fact He must go up to Jerusalem to be betrayed into the hands of the religious leaders and by them be put to death (Mk 8 31 f. and ||s); (5) how, when approaching the Holy City, He should weep over its coming rejection of His message and mission (Lk 19 41 f.); (6) or how, when He arrived there, He found a group of adherents and friends ready to do Him service (Mk 11 2 f. and ||s, 12 1 f. and ||s, 14 13 f. and 11 3). But the reason for these things is given in the Gospel: (1) Jesus left Judea on the imprisonment of John because He already had a ministry there in which His venturesome cleansing of the Temple had set Him in the public eye as a reformer in Israel (2 13-22, 4 1-3); He is careful about the spreading of His Messianic fame, not only because He feared to rouse the people's nationalism (6 15), but because He had already tested the religious leaders in the Holy City and found them unresponsive to His mission (2 23-25, 3 31-36); (3) He abandons His Galilean work after the feeding of the multitude and retires into the regions beyond the Jewish border, not only because that provided meal had so inflamed the nationalism of His followers that He had to meet it with a clear challenge of His spiritual claims (ch. 6), under the depression of which His following faded away, but because, when after that defection He went up again to the Holy City to take up there His work, the murderous hostility of the religious leaders so threatened a fatal ending to His ministry that, not only could His work there not be done, but He must withdraw with His disciples from all public activities and prepare them for the now inevitable end with which His ministry was confronted (5 18 and 7 1); (4) so, when that preparation had brought the disciples to an acceptance of His spiritual Messiahship, He declares to them that He must go up to Jerusalem and be put to death, it is because His previous visit to the Holy City had shown the certainty of this outcome and that the time had come to make plain to them what they must face (5 18 f., 7 25, 8 37, 40, 59, 10 11, 15, 17 f., 11 53); (5) so He weeps over the city because His previous visits had shown Him with increasing clearness how hardened to His claims were even the Covenant People of God (2 23-25, 7 31-40; chs. 8, 9, 10); (6) And when He came there, the friends and adherents He found, few in number and for the most part of small influence, were those who, apart from the unresponsive crowd, on these previous visits had doubtless attached themselves to Him (see 3 1 with 7 50 f., 7 31, 40, 9 38, 10 21, 40, 11 45, 12 11).

But, more significantly, the Synoptic narrative actually fails to give us any explanation of why it was that, in spite of the fact that Jesus' disciples had practically all been followers of the Baptist, whose message had emphasized the sinfulness of Israel, yet, when Jesus at the very outset of His ministry began to forgive people's sins, to the outraged amazement of the Pharisees and Scribes (Mk 9 5 and ||s, Lk 7 48), it produced apparently no sense of strangeness in the disciples. For this the Fourth Gospel offers not so much a doctrinal as a practical explanation when it discloses to us in Jesus the consciousness of a life and a character that, long before any doctrinal reasoning crystallized it in their mind, must, through the daily contact of an intimate fellowship, in some way have shown them the reasonableness and naturalness of the prerogative He assumed. (See Holland's striking presentation of this idea in his above-mentioned book, Part I.)

If behind the Synoptic Gospels lay the faith of the Early Church, the question naturally forces itself upon us, Where did the Church get that faith? The Synoptic narrative leaves us confused in the answer to that question unless we can understand that throughout His ministry Jesus was conscious of a character and life that found their natural reason in His unique relation to God. If He was, it is not difficult to realize how such a personality must have so impressed itself upon the disciples as to lead up to the faith that formed the life of the Church. It did not need to unfold itself to the disciples generally in such a profound way as it did to John, nor as fully to them as it did to him after it had been broadened and deepened by his experience, but that some such a personality as the Fourth Gospel discloses could have been among the disciples and not impressed itself upon them is difficult to believe. If it did, the source of the Church's faith is given us. If, however, no such personality accompanied with the disciples through those two years of Jesus' life and work, then it is hard to know what it was that produced that faith.

The same consideration should hold in judging the account in Ac 1-12 as to its value as revealing the real faith in and appreciation of the person of Jesus which was after all the most powerful factor in the situation. The record in Ac shows us the externals—a group of men and women who had known Jesus and who now were seeking to prove to their Jewish brethren that He was the Messiah. But what He was to them personally, what they had found or seen in Him that had spoken to their souls was hard to put into words. No Christian terminology was yet at hand, and would have been of little significance then as proof to others of the Messiahship. In the nature of the case that proof had to be drawn mainly from Scripture as fulfilled by him or from evidence of His supernatural power (His resurrection, miracles, etc.). The deeper, more personal experience, necessarily, came to expression later in such a writing as the Fourth Gospel, which is conditioned by just those circumstances which made possible and needful such expression. This experience, however, must have been present from the first, for without it there would have been no faith.

In view, then, of this indirect testimony as to the eye-witness character of the record, such passages as 19 35, where the author calls upon Christ Himself (ἐκεῖνος; cf. Zahn, Introd., § 65) to witness to the truth of what he says, and 21 24, where those who publish the Gospel indorse the truthfulness of its contents, are most significant. The first passage is the outpouring of the author's own soul in memory of the closing scene of the great tragedy on Calvary; the other is the deliberate assurance of those who knew him and his personal contact with the history which he gives.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> That the Gospel shows signs of editorial work is, of course, to be frankly admitted, in view of such a statement as that in 21 24<sup>1</sup>; In fact it may be that the designation of the author as 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' (13 23, 19 26, 20 2, 21 20) is more likely to have come from those who knew

(b) Bearing upon Date. As to the time when the Gospel was written, on the supposition that ch. 21 is by another hand or hands, ver. 24 would apparently show by its use of the present tense that the editors were contemporary with the author. Apart, however, from any testimony in this ch. the lateness of the Gospel's writing is evident from the maturity which pervades the Gospel's thought, as seen in the principle which evidently controls the selection of material—e.g., (a) the production of Jesus' profound discourses (chs. 2-8, 10-17), (b) the development of thoughts present germinally in the Synoptics (cf. Mt 11 4-6 with Jn 5 36, 10 25, 33, 14 11, 15 24; Mt 9 15, 26 11 with Jn 13 1-3, 33, 36, 7 34, 8 21, 14 2 f., 12, 19, 28, 16 5, 10, 16, 17 11). But this maturity of the Apostle's thought would in all probability be due to lateness in the Apostolic Age; since it is difficult to understand where the reason for such selection would be—even with a mature mind—unless it was in the author's times. His advance upon the Synoptists finds its natural explanation in the advance of the thought of the Church, which must have progressed with the lapse of time.

(c) Bearing upon Place. As to the place of writing, there is nothing in the Gospel to determine it; altho from what has been shown as to the lateness of its date it is not likely that it was written in Palestine.

(d) Bearing upon Readers. As to the readers, it is clear from 20 30 f. that they were already Christians—evidently those with whom the author had come in contact in his work and whom he sought by this presentation of Christ's life to win to a more vital faith in Him.

(e) Bearing upon Purpose. As to the purpose of the writing, it is clear the author was not aiming at producing a history; the narrative is too meager for that. Nor did he have in mind the writing of a biography; there are only glimpses of the life which are given to us. His object was religious, as 20 30 f. makes plain and clear. And if it be said that all the Synoptists had a similar object (GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 3), it is apparent that the religious object of this Fourth Gospel in a unique way centered itself on bringing out the personality of Christ as it had impressed itself upon the author's own spiritual life—not by a display of His miraculous deeds, for the miracles given are few; nor by a disclosure of the people's enthusiasm for Him, for it is the popular the author's relationship to Jesus than from this self-eliminating author himself; while the Baptist's designation of Jesus as 'the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world' (1 29, 36) is so different from his conception of the Coming One as given us in the Synoptics as to suggest a development of his spiritual ideas by others (see JOHN THE BAPTIST, § 4). Obviously, the displaced arrangement of the Gospel's material (e.g., ch. 5 before ch. 6, tho directly connected with 7 13-24; 7 1-14 before vs. 16-24, tho they stand rightly before vs. 25-36; 7 43-52 after vs. 37-44, tho they properly precede them; 12 34b-43, before vs. 44-50, tho they properly come after them; chs. 15, 16 after 14 21, which is clearly the close of the discourse, instead of after 13 29, or the 'Jesus saith' of 13 31; 18 12-21 between vs. 18 and 26, which properly belong together, instead of after ver. 13, to which they clearly relate)—all this displacement is most naturally accounted for by editorial manipulation of the original material (see Burton, Short Introduction to the Gospels (1904), pp. 117-129; also Lewis, Disarrangements in the Fourth Gospel (1910). Such editing, however, does not affect the bearing of the general material of the Gospel upon its authorship as presented in the foregoing section.

coldness and hostility to Him which characterize the record, but by a presentation of Jesus' own consciousness of His divinely human self.

This constitutes the internal evidence. It would seem to establish the identity of the author referred to in § 2(a), above.<sup>5</sup>

3. External Evidence. External evidence is practically at one in ascribing to the Gospel a 1st-cent. origin and an authorship by a John whose contact with the Gospel history is of first-hand character. In fact, it is so clear that by this John external evidence understands the Apostle that such scholars as Drummond (Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 346-351), Stanton (The Gospels as Historical Documents, Part I, pp. 231-238), Sanday (Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 238-248), Ezra Abbot (The Fourth Gospel, pp. 75 f., 84 f.), Harnack (Chronologie d. altchrist. Literatur, I, p. 677, and Overbeck, Das Johannes Evangelium, p. 123), on careful and painstaking investigation frankly admit it. This evidence is, in brief, that at the close of the 2d cent. the Gospel was universally accepted throughout the Church as the Apostle John's. From this date its acceptance as John's can be traced back to Irenæus<sup>6</sup>, the significance of whose assignment of it to this source lies in the fact that he was a pupil of Polycarp, who was himself a pupil of the Apostle John. At the same time its use, independent of assignment to Apostolic authorship, can be traced to the first decade of the 2d cent., showing it thus to be a product of the Apostolic Age. That external evidence, therefore, unchallenged at the time as it was by those whose every interest would have been to dispute it, confirms the evidence from the Gospel itself as to the identity of the author, not only with a John of Jesus' disciple band, but with the John of His Apostolic circle, would seem too strong to be successfully controverted. (For full discussion of the tradition see Zahn, N T Introduction, § 64.)

This John external evidence locates at Ephesus, from which place he carried on his later work throughout the surrounding region, until his death in the reign of Trajan (see JOHN THE APOSTLE). The importance of this testimony in connection with the character of the Gospel's contents is obvious; for Western Asia was a field of speculative thought even in the Apostolic Age (see COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, § 4), and developed along lines which bear significantly upon the so called philosophical element in the Gospel. This fact has been used, consequently, to show that the Gospel is the product of its environment, and thus, after all, a philosophical treatise, and not a record of historical fact. To this end the Ephesian residence of the Apostle is disputed and the authorship of the Gospel assigned to another John of Ephesus—the Presbyter—with whom it is claimed the Fathers have confused the Apostle, who lived and died in Palestine and who had neither the ability nor the quality which would produce such a speculative work. (See JOHN THE APOSTLE.) This is one of the points of the revived attack upon the Gospel to-day (Harnack, Chronologie, I, pp. 675-680; Jülicher, Introduction, pp. 402-429; Schmiedel in EB, II, cols. 2506-2514; see also Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, II, p. 275). It has secured naturally considerable weight through the confirmation given by the De Boor fragment (Texte und Untersuch., V, 2, pp. 170, 177) to the theory of the Apostle's martyrdom in 44 A.D. (see Note 5, this page). The effort, however, to sweep away the evidence for the Asian residence of the Apostle John must be considered a failure. There is no confusion in the minds of the Fathers as to the John whose life and work in Ephesus they assert. He is clearly the John of the Apostolic circle. In fact, for the residence in Asia of another so called Presbyter John we have absolutely no proof. (Drummond, Character and Authorship of Fourth Gospel, pp. 194-235, and Bacon, Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate [1910], p. 452 f.).

It would seem, therefore, that external evidence confirms the conclusions reached from internal evidence that the author of the Gospel was Apostle John.

4. Objections to the Discourses. In all the criticism of the Gospel the main point of objection has practically always been and remains to-day the difference between the discourses of Jesus given in the Fourth Gospel compared with those presented in the Synoptic narrative, the contention being that the difference between these two sets of discourses is of such a peculiar kind that the same person could not have delivered both<sup>7</sup>.

In proof of this position it is held that the Fourth Gospel presents us not simply with a more elevated form of discourse in place of the simple talks of the Synoptics—nor simply with an allegorical form of statement in the place of the parabolic form of the Synoptics, but rather that the Fourth Gospel almost exclusively substitutes Jesus Himself as the subject of the discourses in place of the varied and practical topics of the Synoptic talks (cf. Mt chs. 5-7, 11-13, 18, 20-23, 25; Mk chs. 6, 7, 10, 13; Lk chs. 10-13, 15-18); while it treats this self-subject of Jesus almost exclusively at the point of His Divinity and His relation to the Unseen World (cf. chs. 1-3, 5-8, 10-17)—in other words that the discourses of the Fourth Gospel are transcendental, philosophical and speculative, and unthinkable as having been uttered by the Jesus whom we know in the Synoptic narrative.

In considering this objection we must remember that these differences are not absolute. There are traces of Fourth Gospel peculiarities in the Synoptics (cf. Mt 11 25-30; Lk 4 16-30) and traces of Synoptic peculiarities in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 4 35-38); while certain expressions of Jesus have entered commonly into both sets of discourses and entered so naturally as to make it plain that in neither case are they artificial (cf. 2 19 with Mk 14 58, 15 29; 4 44 with Mk 6 4; 6 20 with Mt 14 27, etc.).

When, however, apart from these similarities, we ask a reason for the differences, the question arises whether one can wholly ignore the difference in the surroundings in which they were delivered, the difference in the audiences to which they were spoken, and the difference in the narrators by whom they were reported. Had the Synoptics reported Jesus as delivering to the country folk of Galilee, who were largely loyal to Him, and during the early practical period of His work, when He was gathering around Himself a discipleship from the people, the same sorts of discourses, on the same sorts of themes as the Fourth Gospel reports Him as delivering to the speculative Scribes and Pharisees of Jerusalem, who were largely hostile to Him and during the later theological part of His work, when He came to present His Messianic claims to the leaders of the Nation, the credibility of the Synoptics would have been justly called in question. On the other hand, had the Fourth Gospel reported Him as delivering the same sorts of discourses to the Scribes and Pharisees in Jerusalem, largely at the close of His ministry, as the Synoptics reported Him as delivering to the Galilean peasants at His ministry's beginning, the credibility of the Fourth Gospel would have been more doubted than it is now. In proportion as the discourses of the Synoptics are suited to the people and circumstances of Galilee and the early Galilean work and those of the Fourth Gospel to the people and circumstances of Jerusalem and the later controversial stage of the ministry—in that proportion are both sets of discourses supposable.

This is confirmed by the significant fact that the only discourse delivered outside of Jerusalem and to a Galilean audience so effectually confused and confounded those who heard it that it practically ended Jesus' successful work in this region. (See ch. 6.) Such discourses could not have been delivered to the Galileans from the beginning of the ministry and the ministry have accomplished what it did. This becomes all the more evident when it is remembered that through dislocations of the original order of the Gospel's narrative (see Note 5, page 471), among other changes, ch. 5 follows ch. 6—as must be obvious from a study of the connections between these chs. and ch. 7. This change, however, places the discourse of ch. 5 along with the other controversial discourses in the later Jerusalem ministry and adds to the isolated character of the discourse of ch. 6.

But, whether delivered in Jerusalem or in Galilee, one can hardly fail to note the naturalness with which they grow out of the situations with which they are connected and develop through the discussions they produce. Their relation to the circumstances in which they are delivered is no more artificial than that of the Synoptic discourses to the conditions which called them forth.

If it be claimed, that however illuminating all this may be, it does not adequately explain the differences in the discourses—that Mt and Lk give a record of the later Jerusalem ministry and yet do not present Jesus as discoursing in the way characteristic of the Fourth Gospel—it is to be remembered that while this is so they do not, on the other hand, present Jesus as speaking in the same way as in His early Galilean work. There is a tone of judgment in Jesus' later discourses as given by them which does not appear in His earlier talks on practical everyday themes.

If it be further queried—on the basis that both kinds of discourses were actually delivered by Jesus in His later work—why one kind should be so markedly confined to the Synoptics and the other kind with equal exclusiveness limited to the Fourth Gospel, it must be remembered that we have to deal, not only with differences in surroundings and in audience, but with differences in narrators as well, and that it is not impossible that the Fourth Evangelist saw a different side of Jesus from that which the Synoptists saw and in these discourses has given us that different side, which, as a matter of fact, must have disclosed itself in largest measure in Jesus' later ministry. If it be demurred finally that it is unthinkable that a Galilean peasant, such as the son of Zebedee, should have been capable of seeing such a side of Jesus if it did exist, and capable of giving it to us if he saw it, we must not forget that if John belonged to the intimate circle of Jesus' disciples, and if, in this circle, he could be designated as the disciple whom Jesus specially loved, then there must have been in the relation of the disciple to Jesus that personality of acquaintance with the Master which could have formed the foundation of such a knowledge of the deeper and more thoughtful side of Jesus which would have made possible an attention to and a reproduction of just such discourses as this Fourth Gospel characteristically gives. If it is natural for the more pragmatic Matthew and Peter to have caught the more practical side of Jesus' ministry and reproduced it in their narratives, is it beyond all naturalness that a more mystical John could have caught the more thoughtful side of Jesus' ministry and reproduced it in his narrative—especially when the manifestation of that side must have been so largely confined to the later Jerusalem ministry which he makes substantially the content of his record? Much is and ought to be made of the subjective element disclosed in the author's handling of his material. On this very basis, however, if the Gospel was written when and where tradition places it, the environment of thought and life in which the author found himself must have stimulated him to just such a deeper recollection and profounder presentation of the life which he had witnessed and the personality with which he had come in contact. Such a character as is here presented may not have been created by the philosophical and theological atmosphere of Western Asia at the close of the 1st cent., but the deeper appreciation of it as it had actually shown itself and the more thoughtful disclosure of it as it had come to be appreciated must have been influenced by such surroundings, as they could not have been by the simpler life and thought of the early years of the Apostolic Age. It is, of course, urged that in the criticism of the Epistle to the Hebrews it is claimed that a man like Paul could not possibly have written in such an elevated style and with such strange philosophical ideas as the writer of this Epistle, which is all that is claimed against the Fourth Gospel. This ignores, however, the important fact that the cases are not similar. Paul has given us an established character of style and views in his accepted Epistles. Disagreement with these on the part of the author of Hebrews is so great that there can be no identity of authorship. On the other hand, John has given us no such standard. In fact, we get a picture of the man from the Synoptic history and from the Book of Acts and from acknowledged tradition which shows him to have been in the direction of just such a writing. The question is simply whether he could have grown, not changed, to it. As a matter of fact, the whole problem reduces itself to the query whether it is easier to understand the Apostle as reproducing Christ's own expression of His personality, as he had come spiritually to appreciate it under the pressure of his environment, or an unknown genius of the 2d cent. as creating this personality itself as a product of his own idealizing through the suggestion of his surroundings. It has been due not a little to a realizing of this impossible alternative that recent criticism has moved so definitely in the direction of recognizing more or less of a historical basis in the contents of the book.

5. The Thought of the Book. I. The thought of the Gospel gathers around the Person of Christ. By this is meant not merely that the Evangelists makes Jesus' discourses the contents of his Gospel, but that Jesus makes the content of His discourses Himself (see preceding §). This is their characteristic; their subject is the self of Jesus. That personality of whose presence we are so conscious in the Synoptic narrative is presented to us here with a directness and a fulness that have made these discourses the storm-center of the Gospel's criticism. If it can be gathered from the Synoptics that Jesus' consciousness of His self was the source of His consciousness of His Messiahship and created not only the spirit in which, but the view-point from which, all His Messianic work was done, then from these discourses it must be convincingly clear that this self-consciousness of Jesus was the ever-present fact of His life, the eternal conviction in all that He said, and the undying motive and reason in all that He did. Jesus' teaching regarding Himself is thus naturally the heart of the Fourth Gospel's thought (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6).

In this teaching Jesus speaks of Himself in three ways: (1) As the Christ, (2) as the Son of Man, (3) as the Son of God. (1) As the Christ, Jesus came necessarily face to face with the traditional nationalism of the Jews, especially in the later controversial stage of His ministry. Over against their conception of what the Messiah should be stood the spiritual conception with which He informed the title. As Messiah He was not a political revolu-tionist (6 14 f.), not even the king who should fulfil the theocratic ideal (1 41, 49-51); He was the representative of a new spiritual order which, apart from all theocratic conditions, was to establish the will of God in the hearts and lives of men (cf. the talk with the Samaritan woman, leading up to His acknowledgment of Messiahship, 4 7-26). Naturally, therefore, He does not enter into the political debates of the people regarding His Messiahship (ch. 7), nor answer their request for a plain announcement of His Messianic claims (10 24). What He was as Messiah was so far above what they thought the Messiah to be that He could not use the title with any hope of being understood. It is only with the Samaritan woman at the beginning (4 26) and with the disciples at the end (17 3) that the title is assumed; but the conception of the spiritual opposite to their ideas is always present. When we examine this conception we find that Jesus practically identifies it with His conception of Himself as the Son of Man (cf. 7 31-34 with 12 34-36) and as the Son of God (cf. 9 22 with ver. 35; 10 24 with vs. 25-38; cf. also Martha's unrebuked identification, 11 27).

(2) As son of Man, Jesus came again in conflict with traditional Messianic conceptions, tho at a farther remove from popular ideas; for whatever the people may have known of it from its usage in the O T (Dn ch. 7), they had no distinct understanding of it (12 34). Jesus was, therefore, more free to use it and to put into it His consciousness of His relationship to man. As He presents it, this relationship is that of One who had descended from Heaven as His abode (3 13) and was, therefore, to ascend again into Heaven (6 62), and who was thus to establish in Himself communication between Heaven and Earth (1 51). Because of this heavenly origin and consummation, He was the dispenser of eternal life to men (6 27, 33, 51-54) and, at the same time, the executor of judgment among them (5 27). In this mission, however, He was to be lifted up upon the Cross (3 14, 8 28, 12 32), and through this Cross to be glorified (12 23 f., 13 31). This title designates thus the unique character of His personality as the Founder and Head of the Kingdom of God, and in proportion as it resolves into itself the title of Messiah shows His conception of His Messiahship to involve in itself a nature beyond that of man.

(3) This is brought out distinctly in His use of the title Son of God; for through this title Jesus presents His more intimate relationship to God in His origin with God (8 42), whom He knows thus in a primary way (8 55) and whose heavenly glory He possessed before His coming into the world (17 5), in the character of His work as perfectly representing the will of God (5 30, 6 38, 8 29, 46), and thus as perfectly revealing God's truth (8 40-46, 14 6 f., 18 37; cf. 8 26 with vs. 31 f. and 36; cf. 17 4, 6-8 with vs. 14-17), and in the character of His own self, as one with God not only morally (17 21-23), but actually (10 38, 14 9, 11) and essentially (10 30, 17 5). Such a title, whether understood by the people in a Messianic sense or not (1 49; cf. Mt 26 63), was certain to arouse the fiercest resentment from their monotheism (5 18, 8 58 f., 10 30-39), and we might have thought that for this reason it would have been declined by Jesus. Its use is, therefore, all the more significant as showing that, while Jesus avoided the political controversy into which the title of Messiah would have inevitably brought Him, He did not hesitate to face the people with the title which expressed the fundamental claim on which He was conscious the whole character of His work for the salvation of the world depended. At the same time, it is evident that with Jesus these two titles, Son of Man and Son of God, involve much of the same idea. In His discourse at the unnamed Feast [Pentecost] (ch. 5) He speaks of His work as The Son, asserting the power which He possessed as Son of God to raise the dead (vs. 25-29) and at the same time the judgment He was to execute as Son of Man (ver. 27). So in His discourse after the feeding of the multitude (ch. 6) He declares that through acceptance of the Son men were to have eternal life and be raised at the last day (ver. 40), and along with this asserts that it is His prerogative as Son of Man to give to men eternal life (ver. 27); in fact, that eternal life and resurrection at the last day are possible only through acceptance of this Son of Man (ver. 53 f.), and that spiritual life is to be found only in His words, who as Son of Man is to ascend where He was before (ver. 62 f.; cf. ver. 68). Again, in the discourse following the Feast of Tabernacles (ch. 8), He speaks of the accord of His words as the Son of Man with what had been taught Him by His Father (ver. 28). It is plain, therefore, that in a real sense His prerogatives as Son of God, His origin as Son of God, His character as Son of God, belong to Him also as Son of Man and so, in fact, as Messiah. In other words, Jesus' whole presentation of Himself rests upon and is derived from the unity of His consciousness of the unique relation which He sustained to God.

When we come to study the Evangelist's own conception of Jesus as apart from Jesus' conception of Himself, we find that, while he does not use the term Son of Man, he speaks of Jesus as the Messiah through whom has come into the world the revelation of God and spiritual life (1 17; cf. ver. 18), and as the Son of God whose origin was with God (13 3) and with whom He is in unique relations (1 18)—involving, according to 1 1-3, 10, a fellowship with God and an instrumentality in His creative activity before the world was—who was commissioned by God to the redemption of the world (3 16 f., 34 f.; cf. 1 9-14), and through whom alone this redemption is possible (3 18, 30). These titles he unites in his declaration of the purpose for which his Gospel was written (20 31).

If it be urged that he uses such Philonic terms as ὁ λόγος (1 1, 14) and ὁ μονογενής (1 14, 18, 3 16, 18) to express his conception of the person of Christ, it shows, even if we do not accept the Semitic possibility of these terms (as contended for by Harris, The Prologue to the Fourth Gospel [1917], and Burney, The Aramaic Origin of the Fourth Gospel [1922]), that he is interpreting his idea for the Hellenic world around him. But there is no evidence that this interpretation goes so far as a misrepresentation of Jesus Himself, in which the author struggled unsuccessfully to fuse the actual statements of Jesus with the philosophy of his day (as maintained by Scott, The Fourth Gospel [1906], ch. xii). For in the first place, it is to be noted that these terms are rigidly excluded from the discourses.<sup>8</sup> They appear only in those passages which represent the Evangelist's own interpretation of this Personality; in fact, they stand conspicuously as the expression of his own ideas. Furthermore, it is clear that the discourses themselves show nothing short of a perfect consistency between Jesus' statements regarding Himself and that fundamental consciousness of His separate relationship to God which He possessed in virtue of a sinlessness it was not possible for humanity to posit of itself, and of functions humanity itself could not exercise. This is all the more significant when we realize that this consciousness is disclosed in the Synoptic record which is claimed as the standard of Jesus' thought and life (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 6). This being, then, the teaching of Jesus and of the Evangelist on the doctrine whose presentation is characteristic of the Gospel, the remaining points in its thought can be briefly stated.

II. The idea of God. The statements of Jesus and of the Evangelist regarding the nature of God and His relationship to the world do not differ essentially from the presentation given us by the Synoptists. There is the same monotheism (5 44, 17 3), the same Fatherhood—in a general way toward all men (3 16, 4 23), and in a unique way toward Jesus Himself (3 35, 5 20, 10 17, 15 9, 17 24) and through Him toward His disciples (14 23, 16 27, 17 23). His commission of Jesus is the supreme evidence of His love to the world (3 16), which He desires not to condemn but to save (3 17, 5 22), the judgment, in the sense of testing, is essentially involved in the revelation of Jesus' mission (12 47-50). At the same time, God is in His nature Spirit (4 24), and so can be apprehended only by spiritual vision (6 45, 14 9), and, tho the giver of spiritual life to the world (5 26, 6 57; cf. 1 12 f.), can in this giving be appropriated only by a spiritual attitude (5 40, 6 37-40, 14 21-23).

III. The idea of the world. As the physical universe, it has come into being through the instrumentality of Jesus in His preexistent relationship with God (1 3, 10); as the world of human life, it was entered by Jesus as its spiritual light (3 19, 8 12, 9 5, 12 35 f., 40); as the human world alienated from God—which is the characteristic idea of the world in this Gospel (8 23, 12 31, 14 17, 30, 17 14, 25, 18 36)—it was the object of God's redeeming love (3 16) and of Jesus' redeeming mission (12 40 f.). Its sin is represented as a darkness, which is complacent with itself and hates to subject itself to the light (3 19-21), is of misleading influence (12 35) and of enslaving power (8 34), is a state and condition of the soul, whose sinful acts are simply manifestations of itself (8 24, 34), and has its source and impersonation in the devil (8 44).

IV. The idea of the Holy Spirit. As distinct in His personality from Jesus (14 16, 26, 15 26, 16 7), He is a teacher of the truth which Jesus Himself revealed (16 13-15), and thus the glorifying witness to Him (15 28, 16 14), dwelling within His disciples and inspiring them to an understanding of His words (14 26) and transforming them in character and life (7 38 f.). In relation to the world, He convicts it of its sin, convincing it of the righteousness of Jesus and bringing it to realize the judgment which rests upon it (16 8-11). The Spirit thus continues Jesus' redemptive work, fostering the spiritual life of the disciples and giving effectiveness to His message of truth to the world.

V. The idea of eternal life. It is a condition of the soul, the opposite of its condemned alienation from God (3 16-21, 36, 10 28). It is made possible by the death of Jesus (3 14 f., 6 51, 10 10-18), through faith in whom it is made effective (3 16-18, 6 46, 47, 11 25). This faith is a personal relation to Jesus, in which one is united spiritually to Him as the branch is united to the vine (15 1-8). It is called by Jesus a knowing of God and Himself (17 3), which is that conscious attitude of the soul in which it not only spiritually apprehends God, as revealed in Christ, but so opens itself to Christ's incoming that He becomes the ruling power of its life. It is—as is its opposite—a present spiritual state and condition, tho it is—as is also its opposite—to be consummated in the future world (6 54).

6. Personality of John. From the facts of the Apostle's life (see JOHN THE APOSTLE) and from the thought of his Gospel (see preceding §) and of his Epistles (see preceding art., § 3), it is plain that he presents to us a personality which commands our attention.

Such impetuosity as he showed in his early discipleship seems to have been the outcome of a nature whose strength lay in the intensity of its affections. He was not a 'Son of Thunder' in the same way as was his brother. Herod did not find in him the aggressive propagandist he did in James (Ac 12 1 f.); the Master did not find in James the devoted 'son' He did in him (Jn 19 26 f.). The stories told us by tradition of his rushing from the public bath when he knew the heretic Cerinthus was under the same roof, and of his allowing himself to be taken captive by a robber band in order to reclaim a youth whom he had converted and who had fallen again into evil life, if they are to be accepted as true, show, after all, the man of intense emotions rather than the man of aggressive action. This was really at the heart of what in the Gospel story he did with the exorcist (Mk 9 38 f.) and what with his brother he proposed to do with the Samaritans (Lk 9 51-54). From the day of that first acquaintance with Jesus at the Jordan to the morning of the Resurrection Day at the empty tomb, he loved. Tho he outraced Peter to the sepulcher, Peter pushed ahead of him into the darkened place, yet he was the first to understand and to believe.

The influence of this character upon his thinking is evident. It is not so much that he has flung his faith against the error with which he was surrounded, but rather that he has taken the greatest truth of that faith—the person of his Lord—and made it his message to his day. This it would not have been possible to do had he not first thrown himself into that truth and been mastered by it.

He is not speculative in his presentation of Christ. He is not a dialectician like Paul. The words of Jesus, as he heard them in those Gospel days, disclosed to him the unfathomable truth of that Divine life, and he meditated upon them in all the experience of his after-life, but with a profoundness of spiritual vigor he could never have possessed had he surrendered himself less intensely to Him who spoke them. The wondrous vision of that Divine personality burned itself into his soul and he contemplated it, but with the open eye of spiritual strength impossible in one who loved less passionately than did he. John is a mystic, but not a weak one. His thought is strong, because his nature was intense. His truth is profound, because his love of Him who incarnated it and revealed it in Himself was the passion of his life.

LITERATURE: Among Introductions those of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn (Eng. transl. 1917) are the best representatives respectively of the liberal and conservative tendencies of modern German scholarship. See also Bacon, N T Introduction in N T Handbooks (1900); Peake, N T Introduction in Studies in Theology (1910); Overbeck, Das Johannes Evangelium (1911); Jones, N T in the Twentieth Century (1914). Wade, N T History (1922); Perhaps the most complete introductory works on this Gospel representing present English and American scholarship are Drummond's Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (1904), and Bacon's The Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate (1910); see also Moffatt, Introduction to the Literature of the N T (1911). Among the Commentaries those of B. Weiss in Meyer's Krit. exeget. Kom. über d. N T (1902) and Zahn in Kom. z. N T (1908) are conspicuous for their exegetical insight; that of Holtzmann in Hand-Com. z. N T (1891) for its critical refinement. The comprehensive Commentary of Godet (Eng. transl. 1887) is in critical and exegetical protest against the liberal tendencies of his day. The English works of Dods, in Expositor's Greek Test. (1897) and Westcott (1902) are scholarly and thorough. The smaller work of Milligan and Moulton in the International Revision Commentary (1908) is exceedingly clear. JOHN MARK. See MARK.

JOIADA, joi'a-da (יֹדָא, yōyādā), 'J' knows':

1. One of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 6, Jehoiada AV). 2. A high priest, son of Eliashib. He was a contemporary of Nehemiah and held office c. 430, but the exact dates of his rule are not known (Neh 12 10 f., 22, 13 28).

E. E. N.

JOIAKIM, joi'a-kim (יִיכִימ, yōyāqīm), 'J' sets up': A high priest, son of Jeshua (cf. Ezr 5 2, etc.). He ruled c. 500-450, but exact dates can not be given (Neh 12 10, 12, 26).

E. E. N.

JOIARIB, joi'a-rib (יִיארִיב, yōyārīb), 'J' will contend': 1. The head of a priestly family (Neh 11 10, 12 6, 19; Jehoiarib in I Ch 9 10). 2. One of Ezra's assistants (Ezr 8 16). 3. A descendant of Perez (Neh 11 5).

JOKDEAM, jek'di-ām (יֻקְדָּם, yoqdē'ām): A city of Judah (Jos 15 56). Perhaps the same as Jorkeam (I Ch 2 44). Site unknown.

JOKIM, jō'kim (יֻקִּים, yōqīm), 'J' will set up': Probably the name of a postexilic family (I Ch 4 22).

JOKMEAM, jek'mi-ām (יֻקְמָם, yoqmē'ām): 1. A Levitical city in Ephraim (I Ch 6 68), called Kibzaim in Jos 21 22. Site unknown. 2. A city mentioned in I K 4 12, Jokneam AV, site unknown.

JOKNEAM, jek'nī-ām (יֻקְנָם, yoqnē'ām): One of the royal Canaanitish cities situated on Carmel (Jos 12 22). It lay on the SW border of Zebulun (Jos 19 11), and became a Levitical city (Jos 21 34). It is the modern Kaimān on the E. slope of Carmel. Eusebius mentions it as 6 m. N. of Legio, on the road to Ptolemais. It has ruins of buildings, and is in a well-watered region. On I K 4 12 see JOKNEAM. Map III, E 1.

JOKSHAN, jek'shān. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

JOKTAN, jek'tān. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

JOKTHEEL, jek'the-el (יֻקְתֶָּל, yoqthē'al), a name probably of Arabic derivation: 1. A town of Judah (Jos 15 38). Site unknown. 2. The name given by Amaziah of Judah to a place in Edom which he conquered. Its former name was, apparently, Sela, 'the cliff,' usually, but probably wrongly, identified with Petra, the capital of Edom (II K 14 7; cf. II Ch 25 11 f.). Site unknown. E. E. N.

JONA, jō'na, JONAS, jō'nās. See JOHN.

JONADAB, jen'a-dab. See JEHONADAB.

JONAH, jō'na (יֹנָתָן, yōnāh), 'dove'; in N T, Jonas (Mt 12 39 ff.; Lk 11 29 ff. AV): 1. A prophet, the son of Amittai (II K 14 25, see JONAH, BOOK OF). 2. The father of the Apostle Peter ('Jonas,' AV Jn 21 15). See JOHN.

JONAH, BOOK OF. 1. Place in the Canon. The place of Jonah in the O T is among the twelve minor prophets. But whereas the other books in this group contain for the most part prophetic discourses with just enough narrative material at intervals to show the occasion upon which these were delivered, the Book of Jonah is occupied mainly with a story, and the prophetic message in it is given as it were incidentally.

2. Contents. Ch. 1 begins with the account of Jonah's call to preach at Nineveh, tho what his message was to be is not yet stated (ver 1 f.). To avoid obedience to this command he takes passage on a ship for Tarshish (ver. 3). On the way a storm imperils the safety of the vessel with all on aboard, and the crew, on the assumption that their danger is due to the anger of the god of some one on the vessel, cast lots to find out who this may be, and Jonah is taken (vs. 4-7). This leads to their ascertaining his identity and the cause of the wrath of his god (vs. 8-10). A consultation on what should be done results in his being cast into the sea; but a monster especially prepared by J' swallows and holds him for three days and three nights (vs. 11-17). Ch. 2 gives the prayer of Jonah 'out of the fish's belly.' The language of the prayer, however, is that of one who speaks as if surrounded by waters and sea vegetation rather than of one imprisoned in the body of a living monster (vs. 1-10). Ch. 3 tells of the recommitment of Jonah and specifies his message (vs. 1-4). The people of Nineveh listen to the message, repent and are saved from the destruction predicted by the prophet (vs. 5-10). In ch. 4 Jonah is represented as grieving because his prediction of wrath had not been realized (vs. 1-5). But J' teaches him, through his regret at the withering of a gourd plant grown in the night, that He Himself could not easily consign to perdition such a large city as Nineveh, full of His own living, feeling, creatures (vs. 6-11).

3. Jonah, the Prophet. The identity of the Jonah of this book with the prophet of that name who lived in the days of Jeroboam II (782-740), and predicted the restoration of 'the border of Israel from the entrance of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah' (II K 14 25) can not reasonably be doubted. The question is whether the book was written by this prophet, and designed to be a record of his own experiences or a work of fiction with a moral lesson at the center of it, composed by some anonymous prophet of a much later date. The correct understanding of the message of the book will depend on the answer to this question.

4. Miraculous Element. One view of the book is that it contains a plain statement of facts. The reasons for this view are primarily the traditional acceptance of the book as true history, as far back as its existence can be traced. References to it are to be found in the Apocrypha (II Es 1 40; To 14 4, 8; III Mac 6 8; cf. also Jos. Ant. IX, 10 2). Moreover, it is to all appearances used in the N T as reliable history. Objections to its historicity drawn from the predominance of the prodigious element in the story are answered by the counter-proposition that similar objections would hold against the acceptance of all accounts of miracles, that there is nothing impossible in the miracles narrated, and that these are indeed on a level with those ascribed to Jonah's earlier contemporaries, Elijah and Elisha, in the Book of Kings.

5. Historicity of Contents. On the other side, it is alleged that the appeal to tradition is ineffective. Tradition expresses the mind of witnesses quite remote from the time of the composition of the book. The earliest point to which it can be traced is at least 200 years short of the latest date assigned to the writing, and more than 600 years after the date claimed by the historical view; and within this period a false conception of it was, in the circumstances, bound to grow. The use of the book as history in the N T is only apparent. The N T does not commit Jesus Christ or its own authors to one or the other of the contending theories. If the understanding of the N T men was that the book is an allegory, a parable, a legendary story, or any other form of fiction, they could not have used it in any other way than they do; and if so, the method of its use does not indicate what their view of it was.

6. N T Does Not Support Historicity. On the use made of the book in the N T, especially by Jesus, it may even be argued that it is inconsistent with the conception of it as a narrative of facts. Jesus refers to the story of the Ninevites as a great moral fact, which would put to confusion the men of His own generation at the Day of Judgment (cf. Lk 11 29 ff.; Mt 12 39 ff.). This, however, is quite different from His considering it historical in the strict sense of the word. For if the repentance had actually occurred, He must have viewed it either as transient or as permanent. He could not have viewed it as transient and deduced from it the argument He did. On the other hand, He could not have viewed it as permanent in face of the silence of the Books of Kings, and the still more significant silence of the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Nahum, and Zephaniah. He must, therefore, have used the book as a prophecy or, better, as a prophetic parable, in which the repentant Ninevites represent those Gentiles who saw the excellency of the religion of J". (Cf. C. H. H. Wright, Essays, 1886, The Book of Jonah, etc.)

7. Positive Proof Against Historicity. Date. The grounds upon which criticism builds a conclusion opposed to that of tradition are: (1) The impossibility of harmonizing the contents of the book with the setting within which it must have arisen, if it is to be taken as history. In the days of Jonah, 'the son of Amittai,' Nineveh did not possess the magnitude and importance assigned to it in the book. This feature of it is easily understood and appreciated as a skilful, artistic touch in a work of imagination, but it becomes gross misrepresentation if the work is to be judged strictly as history. It is clearly settled from the well-attested evidence in the case that the city of Nineveh was enlarged, embellished, and fortified by Sennacherib (701-687 B.C.), who also made it the capital of his empire. It had indeed served as such before the year 880, when Assurnazirpal, on ascending the throne, made Calah the seat of government and royal residence. Calah remained the capital between 880 and 701 B.C. Precisely in the days of Jonah, therefore (c. 781-741), Nineveh had fallen into a secondary place. Sennacherib found it 'a wretched poor place.' No matter how one may interpret the description of it as 'an exceeding great city of three days' journey' (Jon 3 3), it is impossible to take the description literally, in view of the testimony of the monuments. (2) The silence of the Hebrew records with reference to such a signal triumph of the religion of J", as the acceptance of it by the king of Assyria, is unaccountable. (3) At the time the book was written the greatness of Nineveh was a thing of the past ('Nineveh was an exceeding great city'). This fixes the date of its production to later than 612 B.C., when Nineveh was destroyed. (4) From ch. 2 it appears that the author was acquainted with and used several of the later Psalms in composing the prayer of Jonah. (5) The character of the language of the book is that of the postexilic period, not that of the 8th cent. Its affinities relate it with Ezra-Nehemiah. It contains Aramaic elements and the grammatical constructions, which in the O T are found in the latest books (cf. G. A. Smith in Expositor's Bible). (6) The book does not claim to be a work of Jonah, but one about Jonah. If it were by a contemporary, or even by an immediate follower, it might still be regarded as a true account of the prophet's experiences, but since it is a late production, it can only be considered a work in which Jonah figures as the central person of a story. Upon these grounds, especially the affinity with Ezra-Nehemiah in language, and an allusion to Joel, the date of the book is fixed at some year not much earlier than 300 B.C. Its acceptance in the Canon in this case as one of the twelve minor prophets becomes perfectly natural.

8. Jonah a Parable. The conclusion to which these considerations point is that the Book of Jonah was produced as a protest against the extreme form of Jewish nationalism in the latter half of the 4th cent. B.C., that in literary form it is an imaginative work with a moral lesson, and that the ancient prophet is chosen as its hero for his known anti-Assyrian bias. It is no valid objection against this view to say that the prophet Jonah is a historical character and the weaving of his personality into a work of imagination is improper, for that is precisely what all historical fiction has been doing through the history of literature. The lesson of the story is that J" is the God not of the Jew only, but also of the Gentile; that He is patient and merciful; that His love extends far beyond the limits of the Jewish world into the remoteness where Nineveh lies; that it includes not only the Ninevites, but the heathen sailors whose prayers He hears; that He cares even for the cattle (4 11). Contrasted with the true breadth of God's love stands the narrowness of Jonah's own view of the heathen world. Rather than carry a message to Nineveh, he tries to escape in an opposite direction. He has no desire to share the favor of God with others, and would even rejoice at their destruction. His attitude of mind, however, is the correct one from the point of view of the later Judaism; for this included, as a counterpart of the exaltation of Israel, the doctrine of the subjection of the Gentiles or their annihilation. Jesus fixed on this as the central theme of the book, and used it as a means toward arousing greater zeal for the Kingdom of God among the Jews of His own day. In a word, the lesson of the Book of Jonah is analogous to the foreign-mission idea of developed Christianity.

JONAM, jō'nām (Ἰωνάμ, Jonan AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30).

JONAS, jō'nas. See JONAH and JOHN.

JONATHAN, jən'a-thən (יֹנָתָן, yōnāthān, and יֹחָנָתָן, y'hōnāthān), 'J' has given,' also Jehonathan: 1. A son of Saul (I S 14 6, 8), and one of the most attractive figures in the early period of the monarchy. He appears first as an officer in his father's army (I S 13 3) during the war with the Philistines, and wins the love of the whole nation through the exploit at Michmash, through which he secured a decisive victory for Israel (I S 14 1 ff.). His friendship for and loyalty to David furnished a theme for one of the most touching passages in Hebrew literature (I S chs. 18-20). The genuineness, disinterestedness, and constancy of this affection were displayed in the way in which he effaced himself in the effort first to save David from his father's jealousy and then to promote his interests. The manly courage of Jonathan led him to lay down his life in the battle of Mount Gilboa, in the hope of saving Israel from the general wreck accompanying Saul's downfall (I S 31 2). David's appreciation of Jonathan's friendship is embodied in a beautiful elegy composed on the occasion of the latter's death (II S 1 17 ff.). 2. A son of Gershom, therefore a descendant of Moses (Jg 18 30). The AV reading 'Manasseh' is based upon a correction of the text by the insertion of an 'n' into the Heb. word for Moses, probably to obviate the supposed difficulty of a descendant of Moses becoming the priest of an idol. The old tradition represents him as the Levite engaged by Micah in Ephraim, but carried away by the Danites to their city, where he became the founder of a priestly family (Jg ch. 17 f.). 3. A son of Abiathar, the high priest in the time of David (II S 15 27). 4. A son of Shimea, a nephew of David (II S 21 21; in I Ch 27 32, David's uncle RV, but brother's son RVing.). 5. One of David's heroes (II S 23 32; I Ch 11 34). 6. A son of Uzziah, one of David's treasurers (I Ch 27 25). 7. A son of Jada (I Ch 2 32). 8. The father of Ebed (Ezr 8 6). 9. A son of Asahel (Ezr 10 15). 10. A Levite (II Ch 17 8). 11. A son of Joida of the house of Jeshua (Neh 12 11). 12. A priest (Neh 12 14). 13. A son of Shemaiah, a Levite (Neh 12 18, 35). 14. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer 37 15). 15. A son of Kareah, probably same as 14 (Jer 40 8). A. C. Z.

JONATH-ELEM-REHOKIM, jō'nəth-i'lem-ri-ho'kim. See MUSIC, § 6.

JOPPA, jep'ə (יָפוֹ, yāphō, Gr. Ἰόππη): The modern Jaffa, on the Mediterranean, 34 m. NW. of Jerusalem, the scene of the ancient legend of Andromache and Perseus. The border of Dan was 'over against Joppa' (Jos 19 48, Japho, AV), but apparently it was never an Israelite city. The cedars of Lebanon, both for Solomon's temple (II Ch 2 16), and the second temple (Ezr 3 7), were brought by sea as far as Joppa. Jonah found there a ship going to Tarshish (Jon 1 3). These references indicate that it was more or less in control of the Phenicians until the Persian period. It was brought under Jewish control by the Maccabees (1 Mac 10 74 ff.), and Simon fortified it, enlarged its harbor, and attempted to make it a Jewish town by driving out many of the heathen population and planting therein a strong Jewish colony. Pompey, in 63 B.C., made it a free city, but Caesar sixteen years later restored it to the Jews. From the time of Herod the Great it formed a part of Judea and was intensely Jewish in spirit. In the Jewish war of 66 A.D., because of its fanatical opposition, the Romans, under Cestius Gallus, massacred 8,400 of its inhabitants. It recovered, but was reconquered and destroyed soon after by Vespasian. As the only harbor on the Palestinian coast between Egypt and Carmel, Joppa was of great commercial importance, being the one port of Judea and Jerusalem, just as to-day it is the terminus of the railway from Jerusalem to the Sea. Christianity early found its way to Joppa (Ac 9 36-ch. 10), and in this exclusive Jewish city Peter had his vision with its lesson of the universality of the Gospel. The modern town with a population of about 40,000, built on a rocky ridge and surrounded by fruit gardens, is quite picturesque.

JOPPA, SEA OF: Only in Ezr 3 7, where we should read, with RV, 'to the sea, to Joppa.'

JORAH, jō'ra (יֹרָא, yōrah): The ancestral head of a large Jewish family (Ezr 2 18), called Hariph in Neh 7 24.

JORAI, jō'rə-ai (יֹרַי, yōray): The ancestral head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5 13).

JORAM, jō'rām (יֹרָם, yōrām): 1. For the mention of the name in II S 8 10, see HADORAM. 2. For the two kings, one of Israel, the other of Judah, sometimes called Joram, see JEHORAM. 3. A Levite (I Ch 26 25).

JORDAN, jōr'dan (יַרְדֵּן, yārdēn; in prose usually with the article, Gn 13 10, etc.): The great river of Palestine.

1. Name. The name is supposed by some to be derived from yāradh, 'to go down,' with the ending en for an, i.e., 'the descender' (Olshausen, Heb. Gr. 215 c.). Others, however, regard it as a name borrowed from a non-Semitic stock. The ancient derivation given by Jerome (on Mt 16 13), which makes it a compound from yē'ōr and dān, 'river of Dan,' or 'the river with the two sources, Jor and Dan,' is no longer entertained.

2. The Sources. The Jordan springs from four sources in the foothills of Mount Hermon. The first is a small stream, Nahr Bareighit ('Flea River'); the second, and most northerly, is the modern Nahr el Hasbanu, springing out of a basalt cliff on the W. side of the base of Hermon, 12 m. N. of Tell-el-Kadi, near Hasbeiya. The third is the Nahr el-Leddān, which issues out of Tell-el-Kadi (the ancient Dan). The fourth is the Nahr Banias, which gushes out of a cavern in a rocky ledge at Casarea Philippi (modern Banias). The final confluence of these streams takes place about 5 m. S. of Tell-el-Kadi, at which point the course of the Jordan strictly begins.

3. General Course. The entire length of the river is, however, generally reckoned from Hasbeiya to the Dead Sea, and in a straight line measures 135 m., but the windings of the channel lengthen this line to about 250 m. In its progress it falls 3,000 ft., or an average of 22 ft. to the mile. Its width varies from 80 to 180 ft. and its depth from 5 to 12 ft. except at the fords, where it runs shallower. Beginning at a point on Lake Huleh, it runs below the sea-level through the remainder of its course, the only stream in the world, so far as is known, to do this. Between the Hasbany source, however, and Lake Huleh, it falls nearly 1,200 ft., while from Lake Huleh it drops 690 ft. to the Sea of Galilee (682 ft. below the Sea), and thence another descent of 610 ft. brings it into the Dead Sea, so that at its mouth it is 1,292 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. Its course is interrupted by the two lakes just named (Merom, or Huleh, and the Sea of Galilee, or Tiberias). This breaks the Valley of the Jordan into three natural divisions.

4. The Upper Jordan. The northernmost section is known as the Upper Jordan Valley, and runs through a rich grazing district, the plain of Huleh (the Oὐλάδα of Josephus, Ant. XV, 10 3; XVII, 2 1), sinking, however, at its lower end into a morass overgrown with reeds and papyrus rushes, and offering a favorite resort to a large variety of waterfowl.

5. Middle Jordan. Four m. S. of Lake Huleh the river strikes a channel running comparatively straight N. and S. with a stony bed and basalt cliffs on each side. Between these the water runs for 10 m. almost in the form of continuous whirling rapids. It is arrested and slackened by a bar of sediment, entirely the result of its own activity, a short distance from the Sea of Galilee, into which it finds its way. It reappears at the SW. end of the lake, apparently directed toward the W., but soon turns S.

6. Lower Jordan. The third portion of the river's course is quite different from either of the preceding. The valley, called el Ghôr ('the deep,' in the O T 'the Arabah'), is 3 m. wide at the N. end, but spreads into a plain 12 m. in width in the neighborhood of Jericho. Within this valley the river has cut for itself a bed (called Zor) 20 ft. wide at the N. extremity, and 200 ft. at the S. The Ghôr is very fertile, and nearest the river banks it becomes a thick jungle, consisting of semitropical vegetation. In modern times these woods furnish a home for wild boars, gazels, and other similar fauna (see PALESTINE, §§ 24-26); but in the ancient period leopards and lions were known to haunt them (Jer 49, 19, 50 44; cf. 12 5).

7. The Tributaries. The tributaries of the Jordan from the W. are not significant. They include the Wâdy Feggas, the Wâdy el-Bireh, the Nahr Jalud, the Wâdy el-Gozeleh (Wâdy Fara), and the Wâdy Kelt (the brook Cherith?). Of these the Jalud, flowing from Beisan, and the Fara, rising near Shechem, are the most important. From the E. the Jordan is fed by the Jarmûk (Nahr Yarmûk) and the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerka). Besides these, the Wâdy Jabis, the Wâdy Ajlûn, the Wâdy Nimrin, and the Wâdy el-Kefren also join the Jordan from the E.

8. The Fords. The Jordan was the 'great divider' between E. and W. Palestine. It is not, however, the stream itself that constitutes the greatest barrier; for to pass from one bank to the other is no serious task, except in times of flood; it is rather the generally precipitous aspect of the banks, with their steep bluffs on each side. The crossing of the Jordan is effected either at certain places where it runs shallower—fords—or over bridges. Of the fords there appear to have been a large number. Five are known to exist on the 'Middle Jordan,' and fifty-four on the 'Lower Jordan.' The latter are unequally distributed. Above the juncture with the Jabbok they are numerous; but from that point to Jericho they cease and recur in the neighborhood of Jericho to the number of five. These last are probably those mentioned in Jos 27; Jg 3 28. Of these fords perhaps a dozen are passable ordinarily, but they are at the present day known only to those who dwell in their immediate neighborhood. One of the most famous is that of Adama (mod. Tell ed-Damiyeh), believed by some to be the spot at which the hosts of Israel crossed under Joshua (Jos 3 4). Another is Beth-Barah (Jg 7 24; Bethabarah in Jn 3 26; see § 12, below).

9. Bridges. In the Biblical period bridges over the Jordan were unknown. The word does not occur in the O T. It was only after the Roman conquest that any were built, and of these all the earlier ones have been washed away by the annual floods, some possibly by waterspouts. The ruins of five or six may be seen just below the Sea of Galilee. Three comparatively modern ones are still standing. The Jisr Benat Yakub ('bridge of Jacob's daughters'), between Lake Huleh and the Sea of Galilee, has probably been in existence for 500 years at least. Another is to be found about two hours' ride S. of the Sea of Galilee, and a third at Jericho.

10. Jordan in History. Political Significance. From the nature of the case, it was to be expected that such a feature as the J. should play a very important part in the history of Palestine. Accordingly, it is met at the very beginning as a boundary and division line. As a boundary it figures in Jacob's retrospect of his experiences (Gn 32 10), in the definition of the relations of the nine and one-half tribes to the two and a half (Dt 3 20, 27 4; Nu 34 10-12), and in the prospective view just before the conquest (Jos 1 2). It is also given as the ideal boundary-line of the land by Ezekiel (47 18). But as such it seems, with a single exception, never to have served as the scene of armed conflict. That exception is the case of an attack by Jonathan Maccabeus against the tyrant Bacchides (I Mac 9 45 ff.). Nevertheless, it was always recognized as a natural line of separation between the two sides of the land through which it flowed.

11. Historical Associations. Besides its political meaning, the Jordan providentially acquired also a spiritual significance, through the associations created about it by the great figures of Elijah, Elisha, and John the Baptist. Elijah made his appearance in Israel from some point on the E. side, and when he felt the approaching end of his early career (II K 27) he turned toward the river. Here, by the wonderful occurrences through which the transmission of his spiritual power and work to his successor was signified, the river seemed to be consecrated to spiritual ends. Elisha's bidding Naaman to wash in the Jordan (II K 5 10) was in perfect harmony with his new and sacramental view of the waters of the river. Whether or not John the Baptist was moved by its associations with the ministry of Elijah and Elisha in selecting it as the scene for his own work, he certainly found in its waters a convenient emblem of the purifying spiritual power of righteousness, which he so emphatically preached.

12. Special Sites. Places specially noted along the Jordan are: (1) the 'plain,' kikkār, v.e., 'round,' or rather more properly 'oval' (district) (Gn 13 10 f.; I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17; II S 18 23, etc.), which consists of the broad valley spreading out from the confluence with the Jabbok as far S. as the lost cities of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19 24, 28, 13 12). The term, however, is especially applied to the environs of Jericho (Dt 34 3; Neh 3 22, 12 28). The name is also used in various senses (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex.). (2) The name 'great valley' is applied in I Mac 5 52 to the region W. of the Jordan, in the vicinity of Bethshean. (3) The scene of the baptism of John is laid at 'Bethany (Bethabarah, or Betharabah AV) beyond Jordan' (Jn 1 28, 3 26), a much-disputed site, but as 'ābhārāh is in II S 19 18 rendered 'ferry-boat' ('convoy' mg.) and in II S 15 28, 17 16 'fords of the wilderness' ('plains' AV), the term indicates the existence of a resting-place ('house of the ford') on the E. side, and a suitable locality for John's work. J., son of Jacob. The account of J.'s birth is given briefly in Gn 30 22-24, while Gn chs. 37-50 are occupied with the details of his career.

(a.) General Characteristics of the Narrative. Of all the patriarchal stories this is the most artistic, its composition showing a high development of the literary faculty. A striking peculiarity of the story is the individuality and marked personality of the hero. The typical element prevails in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and even of Jacob. They are presented as examples of the life of faith, or as expressions of national ideals. But Joseph is many-sided; he is a man whose life displays the noblest traits, not in one direction only, but in all. As his character presented itself to the minds of the narrator and his hearers, there was in it no flaw of passion or prejudice. As slave, prisoner, interpreter of dreams, grand vizier, he passed through every phase of life unscathed and unsullied. Furthermore, the story is remarkable for the vividness of its local color. The dreams have a detail that is unlike anything else in Genesis. The harvest picture (Gn 37 7) with the sheaves forming a circle in the field; the vine with its processes of growth from budding leaf to perfect fruit (Gn 40 10); the white bread different from the common food of the country (Gn 40 16); the sedge of the Nile on which the cattle feed, and the blighting east wind (Gn 41 2-6) are literary touches most lifelike. To these may be added the account of Joseph's preparation to go to Pharaoh (41 14), his courtly response (41 16), the particulars of his agrarian policy (41 33 ff., 48 ff., 56, 47 13-26), the allusion to the interpreter (42 23) and to the table customs (43 32). Very interesting is the picture of the nomads, entirely out of their element in the cultured life of Egypt.

There is no particular Palestinian habitat for the story. Hebron, Shechem, and Dothan (Gn 37 12, 14, 17) are mentioned, but the narrative does not find its locus in any of them. The climactic form is rather of the novel than of the sanctuary story, told to explain the origin of altar or of cultus. It is a task quite apart to determine the actual historicity of the narrative itself, but to the narrator it is evident that Joseph was as real a character as Samuel, Saul, or David, and it is probably vain to seek an origin for the main outlines of his story in the migrations and mutations of tribal life.

(b.) Analysis of the Narrative. Gn chs. 37-50 have been divided into thirteen sections by Gunkel. Most of the sections have each its special climax and crisis. (1) Ch. 37. Joseph's preference by his father, his brothers' consequent jealousy, his sale into Egypt, and complete disappearance from the homeland. (2) Ch. 38 accomplishes two purposes: first, it serves to intensify the sense of Joseph's loss by the picture of the life in Canaan going on without him. He has vanished completely, and while Judah's story is being told, the mind of the reader is held in suspense. But secondly, the conduct of Judah and his sons forms a sharp antithesis to Joseph's (ch. 39). (3) Ch. 39 1-20b. Joseph tho a slave is in high favor with his master, but at the moment of prosperity the sinful passion of his master's wife is turned to hate by his resistance to her advances, and to the humiliation of slavery is added that of imprisonment. (4) Chs. 39 20b-40. In prison he grows in favor and is able to interpret the dreams of officers near to Pharaoh, but they leave the prison and he is forgotten. (5) Ch. 41. Pharaoh dreams, and when all others have failed to interpret, the butler remembers Joseph, who, as the result, is suddenly exalted to power and influence. (6) Chs. 42-45 24 (sections VI, VII, VIII of Gunkel's division) are better treated as one—Joseph's power and the way he used it. The crisis of the story is reached in these chapters, and two delicate touches appear. First, it is Judah who stirs Joseph so deeply. The two representatives of the great division of the Hebrew race are brought face to face, one as suppliant, the other as superior, yet both are dignified; there is no cringing on the one side nor haughtiness on the other. The one is ready to sacrifice himself for the good of all; the other acts, not from the privileges of his station, but from the impulses of his heart. There seems to be an echo of this in Dt 33 7. It is as if the writer, weary of the division of the two kingdoms, pictured the union that might come through noble self-renunciation wherein neither thought of himself, but only of his brethren's welfare. Again, it is a fine sense of art which makes Joseph conceal his identity until the last. His severe dealings are all in the character of the ruler of Egypt. When he reveals himself, the princely disguise is thrown aside entirely. A less artistic narrator, or a less magnanimous brother, would have terrified the brethren at the outset with the fact that they were in the power of one whom they had cruelly wronged, but no such bitter memory is left to rankle in their hearts. (c.) Critical Analysis. With the exception of 37 1, 2a, 41 46, 46 6-27, 47 5, 6a, 7-11, 27b, 28, 48 3-6, 7 (?), 49 1a, 28b-33, 50 12, 13, which are extracts from P, and carry along the chronological and genealogical threads of the narrative, chs. 37-50 belong to JE. The documents are closely interwoven and the same essential elements are behind each source. See GENESIS, § 4.

(d.) Egyptian Analogs. 'The Tale of the Two Brothers' (cf. Petrie, Anc. Egyptian Tales) is frequently cited as the parallel, if not the original, of Gn 39 1-20. It would be difficult to deny the dependence of the one upon the other, tho the conclusions of the two are different. Both reflect the same conditions of life, and the Egyptian background is, therefore, consistent and authentic. The gold collar and the garment of byssus (Gn 41 42) were parts of the regular investiture of a high court official. Abrech (q.v.), 'abhrēkh (41 43 mg.), may be the Assyrian word abarakkū, the title of a dignitary, such terms readily passing from land to land. The names (Gn 41 45) have been variously identified, but they have an undoubted Egyptian stamp, tho they have undergone considerable phonetic change in becoming Hebraized. The famine, whose length is remarkable, finds two or three parallels in Egyptian history, and one which occurred in the XVIIth dynasty has been by some identified with the Biblical account. The crown ownership of the land, together with the rate of taxation and the exemption of the territory of the priests, recorded and explained (Gn 47 13-26), are well-evidenced economic conditions.

It is difficult to determine under what Pharaoh Joseph flourished. The best evidence locates him at the end of the Hyksos period, perhaps under Apepi II. All such calculations must, however, be received with great caution (see Driver in HDB, art. Joseph).

(e.) Purpose and Teaching. The story has been read as if intended merely to glorify the progenitor of the leading tribes of the Northern Kingdom and to answer questions about the origins of tribal life. We need not reject such theories altogether, but we should miss much if we took the tale simply for an attempt to minister to ancestral pride. As in most O T stories the ethical element predominates, but there is more in it than virtue triumphant. Joseph presents a noble ideal of character, remarkable as so many O T representations are, because the features most exalted are those least often seen, such as faithfulness in public and in private, and gentleness where harshness might be condoned, with no trace of rancor for injuries most deep. In the speech of Judah (44 18 ff.) the grand note of self-sacrifice is struck, which glorifies the narrative and reads almost like a foregleam of the Suffering Servant. Of what is called theology there seems to be little, yet that little is like a deep undertone. 'How then can I do this great wickedness and sin against God' (39 9), he exclaims in the stress of temptation. And after keeping his brethren in ward for three days he says, 'This do and live; for I fear God' (42 18). The miraculous appears only in dreams and their interpretation, which are narrated as signs that an unseen God is shaping events for His children. The relation of Joseph to God differs much from that of other O T characters; there is a modernness to the picture which is noteworthy, God's dealings being providential and not apparitional (Gn 50 20).

(f.) The Tribe. 'Joseph' is frequently used to denote the combined tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh or the N. Kingdom as a whole (Gn 49 22 ff.; Nu 1 32; Dt 33 13 ff.; Jos 16 1, 4; Jg 1 22; I K 11 28; I Ch 5 1; Ps 78 67, 80 1, 81 5 [Asaphite]). An interesting problem is presented by the possibility of early settlements by this tribe in Canaan before the Exodus. The probable occurrence of the place-name Joseph-el in the lists of Thothmes III suggests this, and I Ch 7 21 ff. seems to refer to an old invasion by the way of Philistine territory and to the establishment of Joseph clans on the slopes of the mountains of Ephraim. The early alliance of Gibeon with Israel and the decisive battle of Beth-horon, fought on adjacent territory, the close connection of Joshua with the region, the age-long holdings at Shechem, where the first (Manassite) king held sway (Jg 9 6), and the appropriation by the Northern Kingdom of the name Israel, indicate that Mt. Ephraim was very early a center of national life. 'Joseph' is equivalent to the people as a whole in Ps 80. The Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5) places the Joseph tribes in the forefront of the muster, while Judah does not appear at all. It must also be noted that of all the twelve sons of Jacob, Joseph alone is given a position in the Genesis narrative alongside of the great fathers of the race. These facts can best be accounted for on the theory that the national life attained in Joseph its highest development and argues strongly for an early and long-continued hegemony of the tribe. In the Blessings of Jacob (Gn 49 22) and of Moses (Dt 33 13 ff.) the chief glories of the Hebrew race are made to cluster around the head of him who was separate from his brethren, and, in spite of all the vicissitudes of the ages, the overthrow and the defeat, the ruthless destruction by foreign invaders, in spite of all attempts to crush and annihilate every vestige of national life, in spite of scorn and repudiation by his brethren to the South, tho the archers have sorely grieved him and shot at him and persecuted him, it is at Shechem and upon the heights of Gerizim alone—the hard-won inheritance of Joseph (Gn 48 22)—that the light of early Hebrew faith continues to burn and to shed its poor flickering rays over the mountains and valleys, where dwelt the ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of Manasseh (see SAMARITANS; FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7).

2. See Nu 137. 3. A 'son' of Asaph (I Ch 25 2, 9). 4. One of the 'sons of Bain' (Ezr 10 42). 5. A priest (Neh 12 14). 6, 7. Two ancestors of Joseph, husband of Mary (Lk 3 24, 30). 8. Joseph of Arimathea, a wealthy Jewish counselor, friendly to Jesus (Mk 15 43 and ||s). 9. The husband of Mary, see MARY, THE VIRGIN. 10. One of the brothers of Jesus (Mt 13 55, Joses AV; also called Joses Mk 6 3, 15 40, 47 and || in Mt). See BRETHREN OF THE LORD. 11. Another name of Barnabas (Ac 4 36, Joses AV). See BARNABAS. 12. See BAR-SABBAS.

JOSSES, jō'siz or jō'zez (Ἰωσῆς): 1. One of the brothers of Jesus (Mt 13 55, Joseph RV; Mk 6 3), called also the son of Mary (Mt 27 56; Mk 15 40, 47). See BRETHREN OF THE LORD. 2. Another name of Barnabas (Ac 4 36, Joseph RV).

JOSHUA, jō'sha (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, yōshāh): The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 34).

JOSHAPHAT, jōsh'a-fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, yōshāphāt), 'J' is judge': One of David's heroes, from Methen, site of which is unknown (I Ch 11 43). 2. A priest (I Ch 15 24, Jehoshaphat AV).

JOSHAVIAH, jōsh'vai'a (יְהוֹשָׁבָבֵד, yōshawyāh): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 46).

JOSHBKASHAH, jōsh'bi-kē'sha (יְהוֹשֶׁבֶכַשׁ, yōshbēqāshāh): In the common Heb. text this is read as one of several proper names (I Ch 25 4). It is probable that these should be read as constituting a hymn of praise (see W. R. Smith, The O T in the Jewish Church, p. 143, also Curtis in ICC, ad loc.). The combination occurs again in ver. 24. E. E. N.

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH, jō'sheb-bas-shī'beth. See JASHEBEAM

JOSHIBIAH, jōsh'i-bai'a (יְהוֹשִׁבָבֵד, yōshibbyāh, Josibiah AV): The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 35).

JOSHUA, jōsh'iu-a (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, yōshūā), 'J' is salvation': 1. The son of Nun (originally Hoshea, Nu 13 8, 16, Oshea AV, changed by Moses to Joshua. In AV of Ac 7 45 and He 4 8 Jesus.)

(1) Early Life. By appointment of Moses he led an attack upon the Amalekites at Sinai, gaining a brilliant victory (Ex 17 10 f.); accompanied Moses as his 'minister' to the summit of the mountain

(Ex 24 13, 32 17), and cared for the Tent of Meeting erected by Moses. He was next chosen to represent his tribe (Ephraim) among the spies (Nu 13 8). When these returned with their discouraging report, J., with Caleb, urged trust in J' and immediate advance on the land (Nu 14 6). For this he was rewarded with long life (Nu 14 38), and was eventually appointed by the laying on of hands in the presence of the priests (Nu 27 18 f.) to succeed Moses.

(2) Story of Life in Book of Joshua. The story of of his public life from this point onward is given in the book that bears his name. As this is a compilation from various sources, most of them of very much later date than J.'s own time, the book gives on the whole an unhistorical rather than a historical representation of J.'s career. As the story now stands, as soon as Moses died J. took charge of the people and led them across the Jordan. In a quick succession of campaigns he attacked and took Jericho and Ai (Jos chs. 1-8). Being then confronted with the alliance of the five kings, which was headed by Adonizedek of Jerusalem, he waged a warfare of conquest against these, and practically broke all opposition to the entrance of the Hebrews into the land (ch. 10). The resistance made by Jabin, King of Hazor, with his allies on the plain beside Lake Merom was not vigorous enough to turn the tide backward (ch. 11). There remained the task of distributing the conquered territory among the tribes of Israel, which occupied Joshua during the remainder of his career (chs. 13-19). Meanwhile he did much to strengthen and complete the worship of J' and nationalize the religion. But to what extent his activities in this direction reached, and what their success was, the working over of the sources by later hands does not permit us to say. He is represented as closing his career with two impressive addresses, in which he put high ideals of a national life controlled by the religion of J' before the people, and induced them to establish a covenant upon this basis (ch. 23 f.). (For literary and other questions see JOSHUA, BOOK OF.)

2. A man of Bethshemesh in the days of Samuel (IS 6 14, 18). 3. The governor of Jerusalem in the days of Josiah (II K 23 8). 4. The son of Jehozadak (also called Jeshua), high priest at the time of the return under Zerubbabel (536 B.C.) (Ezr 2 2; Hag 1 1, 12, 14; Zec 3 1, 3, etc.). In Zechariah's third vision, he was chosen as the representative of the Jewish people, and through the taking off of his filthy garments and the putting on him of clean ones, the expiation of the sins of the people through the sufferings of the Captivity was symbolized. As the representative of the people he also received the announcement of the coming of the Messiah under the name of the Branch (Zec 3 1-8).

JOSHUA, BOOK OF: The sixth book of the O T, constituting the last portion of the Hexateuch (q.v.).

1. Name. The Book was named from Joshua, the leader of Israel in the conquest of Canaan, narrated in the book, perhaps because he was considered the author of most of its contents. According to the later Jewish scholars, Jos was the first of the four 'former Prophets' (Jos, Jg, S, K. See O T CANON, § 8).

2. Contents. The contents of Jos may be analyzed as follows:

- I. THE CROSSING OF THE JORDAN AND ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CAMP AT GILGAL (chs. 1-6)
  1. Preparations for the crossing (1 1-3 18)
  2. The crossing of the Jordan (3 14-4 18)
  3. The camp at Gilgal (4 19-5 12)
  4. The capture of Jericho (5 13-6 27)
- II. THE CONQUEST OF THE INTERIOR HIGHLAND (chs. 7-12)
  1. Conquest of Ai (and Bethel), etc. (7 1-S 29)
  2. Law read on Mts. Ebal and Gerizim (8 30-35)
  3. Defeat of the confederacy against Gibeon (9 1-10 27)
  4. Other conquests in the W. and S. (10 28-43)
  5. Defeat of the Canaanites in the N. (11 1-15)
  6. Summary of conquests under Joshua (11 16-12 24)
- III. THE FIRST ALLOTMENT OF TERRITORY (chs. 13-17)
  1. The earlier allotment by Moses to the E. Jordan tribes (ch. 13)
  2. The allotment by Eleazar at Gilgal (chs. 14-17)
    - (1) Of Judah (chs. 14-15)
    - (2) Of the House of Joseph (chs. 16-17)
- IV. THE SECOND ALLOTMENT, AT SHILOH (chs. 18-21)
  1. Of seven tribes (chs. 18-19)
  2. Of the cities of refuge (ch. 20)
  3. Of the Levitical cities (ch. 21)
- V. DISMISSAL OF E. JORDAN WARRIORS (ch. 22)
- VI. JOSHUA'S LAST DAYS (ch. 23 f.).
  1. A farewell address (ch. 23)
  2. The farewell address at Shechem (24 1-25)
  3. Joshua's death, etc. (24 26-35)

3. Contents Not Homogeneous. A close examination of Jos will reveal the fact that the narrative is not homogeneous, and is also in some instances inconsistent, either with itself or with statements in other O T books. Some of the more significant inconsistencies may be cited as examples of many others of like character. In 2 15 Rahab's house is on the wall of Jericho, but in 6 22, after the wall has fallen down flat, Joshua sends men into the city to find the house and bring out the woman. In 4 2 f. twelve stones from Jordan are to be set up as a memorial on the bank (at Gilgal, ver. 19), but in ver. 9 they are set up in the bed of the river. In 8 3 f. an ambushment of 30,000 men is placed near Ai, while in ver. 12 an ambushment of 5,000 men is placed in exactly the same spot for the same purpose. The section 8 30-35 demands a much longer time and a more complete work of conquest than is suggested in the preceding account. In 10 29-43 J. is represented as completely conquering all S. Canaan, including the towns of Hebron and Debir, but in 14 6 f. this same region is asked for by Caleb, given to him, and in 15 13 f. conquered by Caleb as a part of the inheritance of Judah (cf. also Jg 1 2-20). In 13 1-7 J. is an old man, and, the main work of the conquest being over, he is directed to allot the land to the nine and one-half tribes, but in 14 6 f. the hill-country of Judah is not yet conquered, and in chs. 14-17, instead of nine tribes, only Judah and the house of Joseph get their allotment at this time; 13 1-7 is, therefore, no suitable caption for what follows. In the story of the second allotment (ch. 18 f.) the introductory statement, 18 1-2, has no connection with, nor does it find any explanation in, the preceding narrative. Finally, that two farewell addresses should have been delivered by Joshua (chs. 23 and 24) is in itself remarkable, and the more so when we compare them and find them so different in style and point of view. See also HEXATEUCH, § 26.

4. Explanation of This Lack of Unity. The only satisfactory explanation of such inconsistencies is to be found in the theory that in Jos several originally separate narratives have been combined into one somewhat incoherent whole. The main thread of the narrative in chs. 1-12 (Div. I and II) was probably drawn from the old J and E narratives, but not until after these had undergone some revision under the influence of the conditions of later times. 1 10-11a, 2 (all but 9b-11 and 24b), 3 1, 5, 9-10a, 11, 17, 4 1b-7a, 8, 10b-11, 18, 20, 5 2-3, 8b-9, 13-15, 6 (all but 18-19, 24b), 7 (except ver. 1), 8 (all but 1b-2a, 27 f., 30-35), 9 3-9a, 11-15a, 16, 22 f., 26, 10 1-7a, 9-14, 16-24, 26-27, 11 1, 4-9, may with reason be assigned to this source. In chs. 13-24 (Div. III-VI) the later Deuteronomist and Priestly elements predominate, especially the latter. Only 13 1, 7, 13, 15 14-19, 63 (cf. Jg. 1 10-15, 21), 16 1-3, 10 (cf. Jg. 1 29), 17 11-18 (cf. Jg. 1 27b), 18 2-6, 8-10a, 19 47, and ch. 24 (except vs. 13 and 31) seem to belong to the ancient JE narrative.

For the passages that seem to have belonged to the Priestly narrative see HEXATEUCH, § 28 (end). The remainder of the material is 'Deuteronomist,' that is, it was written under the influence of the great ideas of Dt in which Israel's history is viewed almost exclusively on its religious side (see DEUTERONOMY, § 6).

5. Process of Composition. The problem of the process of composition of Jos is a complex one. The following view, it is believed, will be found to satisfy the main conditions. The old JE narrative probably included an account of the conquest of Canaan, ending with Joshua's farewell and death (see HEXATEUCH, §§ 12 and 20). In consequence of the combination of JE with Dt, the connection of the material in JE relating to the conquest with the earlier portion ending with Moses' death was broken. This later part of JE was then worked over in the spirit of the Deuteronomist school more extensively than were the preceding portions, giving a distinctively 'Deuteronomist' history of the conquest (see HEXATEUCH, § 20). Later, these older portions of the Hexateuch were combined with the Priestly narrative, and either then, or not long after, all the material relating to the conquest was separated from the preceding, resulting in the formation of the Pentateuch (as the Law) and the present Book of Joshua (see HEXATEUCH, § 30).

6. Historical Value. Notwithstanding the late character of much of its material, Jos contains historical information of the highest value. With Jg ch. 1 the JE portions of Jos give us practically all we possess of the early tradition of the conquest of Canaan by Israel. While a complete account of the conquest is not given, the main outline of the movement has been preserved. But even in J and E the exact course of events is no longer clearly perceived. The traditions have become obscured or confused. The later unity of the Kingdom period (when J and E were written) was projected back into the earlier period. It is in the Deuteronomist and Priestly parts, however, that the most glaring historical inconsistencies are found. The Deuteronomic writers failed to remember that the actual work of conquest was difficult and gradual, and accomplished largely by the different tribal elements of Israel, each working out its problem largely by itself; hence the résumé of Joshua's work in 10 28 ff. and ch. 12, so contrary to the older notices in JE, in Jg 1, and in other early accounts. Ch. 23 reveals the 'Deuteronomic' point of view perfectly. It was forgotten by both the Deuteronomic and Priestly schools that the work of conquest broke Israel into a number of separate, detached elements, and that the unity under one military leader (Joshua) and one priestly head (the high priest) never really existed. That was an ideal of later and especially post-exilic days projected back into the remote past. It is only in the ideals they set forth, not in their actual historical characters, that such elements are of value to the historian of Israel to-day. The geographical notices giving the tribal boundaries and the cities belonging to each tribe (chs. 13-19) contain valuable information on the historical geography of Palestine.

JOSIAH, jo-sai'a (יְשִׁיָּאָה, yō'shiyyāhū), 'J' supports: 1. The son of Amon and Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah, and king of Judah (638-609). He was raised to the throne at the age of eight, upon the assassination of his father (II K 21 23, 25.) It was in the eighteenth year of his reign that his distinctive policy was inaugurated. In that year he sent Shaphan, the scribe, to superintend some repairs in the Temple. While engaged in this work, Shaphan was given 'the book of the law' by the high priest, Hilkiah, which the latter said he had found in the Temple. The book was read to the King and by him believed to be the ideal national constitution of Israel. Upon its basis, Josiah instituted thorough-going religious reforms, centralizing all the worship of the land at the Jerusalem Temple (II K 22 1-20). It is generally agreed that this book was the code now found in Dt chs. 5-26 (or at least chs. 12-26), but that it was forged for the purpose of furnishing the king with the instrument of his reformation is not to be thought of. It is probable that it had taken form gradually as an ideal around a nucleus of Mosaic prescriptions. But it can hardly be questioned that in Josiah's reformation the Deuteronomic legislation for the first time became operative as the national constitution (see also DEUTERONOMY). In 609 Pharaoh Necho made an invasion into Palestine which Josiah undertook to resist, and in doing so lost his life in the battle of Megiddo. 2. JOSIBIAH, jos'i-bai'a. See JOSHIBIAH.

JOSIPHIAH, jes'i-fai'a (יְשִׁפְיָאָה, yō'siphayāh), 'J' adds: The father of Shelomith (Ezr 8 10)

JOT (the letter i, the Gr. iota): The smallest letter of the Greek alphabet (Mt 5 18). If Jesus spoke in Aramaic His reference was to yōdh (י), the smallest letter of the Aramaic and Hebrew alphabets. E. E. N.

JOTBAH, jot'ba (יֹתְבָּה, yōt'bah): The native place of Meshullemeth, mother of Amon, King of Judah (II K 21 19). Site unknown.

JOTBATHAH, jot'bā-thā (יֹתְבָּתָּה, yōt'bāthāh), also Jothbath AV): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 33 f.; Dt 10 7). Site unknown.

JOTHAM, jō'tham (יֹחָתָם, yōthām), 'J' is perfect: 1. The youngest of the seventy sons of Gideon, who alone of all his brothers escaped the murderous designs of Abimelech. Through the parable of the trees selecting the bramble to be their king he warned the Shechemites against Abimelech (Jg 9 5, 7, etc.). 2. A son of Uzziah (Joatham in Mt 1 9 AV) and king of Judah (c. 750-734 B.C.). He began his reign as coregent, when leprosy appeared upon the person of his father (II K 15 5). He is said to have fortified and extended the dominion of Judah over the Ammonites (II Ch 27 3-6), and to have built the upper gate of the Temple. 3. A son of Jehdai (I Ch 2 47 AV; Jothan, RV). A. C. JOZABAD, jōz'a-bad (יֹזָבָד, yōzābhādh), 'J' gives: 1, 2, 3. The names of three of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 4 [Josabad AV], 20). 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. The name of six Levites (II Ch 31 13, 35 9; Ezr 8 33, 10 23; Neh 8 7, 11 10). 10. A priest (Ezr 10 22).

JOZACAR, jōz'a-kār (יֹזָאכָר, yōzākhār, Jozachar AV): One of the conspirators who slew King Joash (II K 12 21). In II Ch 24 26 by a scribal error he is called Zabab. His mother was an Ammonitess. E. E. N.

JOZADAK, jōz'a-dak. See JEHOZADAK.

JUBILEE, YEAR OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2; and SABBATH, § 5.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF: An apocryphal writing, commonly classed with the Apocalypses. It was known to the ancients and to medieval Christian writers under the name of the Little Genesis, but having disappeared in the 14th cent., it was forgotten until the middle of the 19th. The missionary Krauf brought an Ethiopic MS. of it to Europe in 1848, which was published by Dillmann. It reproduces the contents of Genesis and of Exodus as far as ch. 14, with many additions and embellishments of a legendary nature. It appears to have been composed by a Pharisee between 100 B.C. and 100 A.D. Cf. R. H. Charles, The Book of Jubilees (1902), and in Apocr. and Pseudepigr. of the O T, Vol. II (1913). A. C. Z.

JUDAS, jū'das ('Ιούδας): The Gr. form of the Heb. name Judah, a common one among the Jews (Mt 10 4, 13 55; Lk 6 16, etc.). It was possibly endeared to late Judaism by the heroism of Judas Maccabeus (I Mac 2 4). R. A. F.—E. C. L.

JUDAS, an ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30)

JUDAS, THE LORD'S BROTHER: One of the younger sons of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Mk 6 3; Mt 13 55). With his other brothers he evidently misunderstood Jesus until after the Resurrection (Mk 3 31; Jn 7 5, 19 26, 27; Ac 1 14). Later, he seems to have been known in Paul's circle as engaged in the work of the Gospel (I Co 9 5), tho never as prominent as his brother James (Gal 2 9, 12; Ac 15 13-21, 21 17-25). If, as may well be, he wrote the Epistle of Jude (q.v.), he shrank from calling himself 'the brother of the Lord,' desiring to be identified as the brother of the well-known James. JUDAS BARSABBAS. See BARSABBAS.

JUDAS OF DAMASCUS: The person in whose home the converted Saul of Tarsus was found by Ananias (Ac 9 11). Otherwise unknown.

R. A. F.—E. C. L.

JUDAS OF GALILEE: So called, tho a native of Gamala in Gaulonitis. Together with a Pharisee, Sadduk, he led an agitation against the Roman authority when Quirinius undertook a census for the purpose of taxation—probably in 7 A.D., after the deposition of Archelaus (Ac 5 37). It was essentially a religious movement, based on the belief that God alone was to be their ruler, and from it sprang the Zealots (see CANANEAN), who became a distinctively political party over against the more or less religious sects of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. Josephus says nothing about the death of Judas and his followers, but his sons perished in later revolts.

R. A. F.—E. C. L.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, is-kar'i-ot. One of the twelve disciples, the betrayer of Jesus. In each of the three lists of the Twelve (Mk 3 19 and ||s) he stands last—a position suggestive of his tragic failure (cf. Jn 6 70 f.).

1. Origin. In the Synoptics he is called 'Iscariot,' but in the Fourth Gospel his father, Simon, is also so named (6 71, 13 26), and evidently the term means 'man of Kerioth.' Kerioth is either the modern Karjetan, S. of Hebron, Map II, E 3 (cf. Jos 15 25), or Kuriut, Map III, G 4 (Koreæ, Jos. Ant. XIV, 3 4), on the extreme northeastern border of Judea. Judas was, perhaps, the only Judean in the circle.

2. Call. From Mk 3 14 f.; Jn 6 70, it would seem that Jesus selected those to whom He was to entrust His gospel with the greatest care, but in view of Jn 6 64 the choice of Judas is very perplexing. Attempts have been made to explain it as a conscious submission by Jesus to the Divine plan for effecting His redeeming death, but the Synoptics require a different solution. Judas must have promised well, and Jesus with His insight into character saw that in the Messianic enthusiasm of this Judean there were great possibilities for good—or evil; and out of His loving heart He took the risk and gave him his chance. If any of the band should prove disloyal, Jesus knew from the beginning who it was that should betray Him. Judas shared all the poverty and hardship of the itinerant discipleship without suspicion on the part of his comrades, for they made him their steward (Jn 12 6).

3. Betrayal of Jesus. The crisis was probably brought on through the announcement in Jesus' Capernaum address of the spiritual character of His mission (Jn ch. 6) involving the necessity of His death (Mk 8 31). Upon this announcement the enthusiasm of the Galileans died out, and whereas in the other disciples their love for Jesus struggles victoriously with their disappointment, in Judas it settles into demonic hatred (Jn 6 70), and at last utterly ruins his soul (17 12). Possibly the evil showed itself in pilfering from the common fund, and he may have been detected by John, who of all the Evangelists has the most aversion for him (Jn 12 6). The actual betrayal (Mk 14 10 f., 18-21, 42-46; Mt 26 14-16, 21-25, 46-50; Lk 22 3-5, 21-23, 47, 48; Jn 13 2, 10 f., 18 f., 21-30, 18 2-9) presents difficulties, but we infer—(a) Jesus knew that Judas was betraying Him, and Judas was conscious of this knowledge at the Last Supper, which he seems to have left before the Eucharist was instituted; (b) the disciples, shocked at the possibility of such treachery, do not suspect Judas, for Jesus simply says that one of those in table fellowship with Him will betray Him. (c) Avarice was a partial motive (Mt 26 15; Jn 12 6), but Judas also was a tool of Satan (Lk 22 3; Jn 13 2, 27). (d) Judas knew the resort of Jesus and took every precaution to avoid miscarriage of his plans, but at the garden seems to have been disconcerted by the Master's self-possession. It is not quite clear how the kiss of the traitor can be adjusted to the Johannine account.

4. Final Estimate. The two narratives of Judas' death (Mt 27 3-10; Ac 1 18 f.) present serious discrepancies, which can only be reconciled with much ingenuity. Mt emphasizes the traitor's remorse, while Ac brings into prominence his fate. The attempt to interpret the conduct of Judas favorably, as, e.g., that he wished to force Jesus to lead a popular movement, is inconsistent with the narratives. His remorse shows that he was not wholly bad. Avarice, desire to save himself since the death of Jesus was inevitable, despair at being involved in a spiritual movement which was issuing in a Messianic fulfilment wholly different from what he had hoped for, intolerance of the constant rebuke of his selfish nature by the penetrating insight of Jesus, all contributed to the awful ruin.

JUDAS OF JAMES. One of the Twelve, according to Lk 6 16 and Ac 1 13 (but not in the list as given in Mk 3 16 ff. = Mt 10 2 ff.). The phrase 'of James' would be taken ordinarily to mean 'son of James,' but it may mean 'brother of James.' The same person is referred to probably in Jn 14 22 ('Judas, not Iscariot'). Many think he is to be identified with the Thaddeus of Mk 3 18 (= Lebbaeus in Mt 10 3). Nothing certain is known of him other than what is contained in the references just cited (see also THADDEUS). It is possible that this is the Judas who wrote the Epistle of Jude (q.v.). E. E. N.

JUDAS MACCABEUS. See MACCABEES.

JUDE, EPISTLE OF: 1. Authorship. Who was Jude or Judas who claims (ver. 1) to be the author of the Epistle? He simply calls himself 'a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James.' If there are no cogent reasons to the contrary, it is natural to identify him with the brother of Jesus mentioned in Mark 6 3.

2. Apocalyptic Influence. No weight can be attached, as by some, to the fact that he quotes from apocalyptic literature. Thus ver. 14 f. is taken from the Book of Enoch, which has influenced various passages in the Epistle. Ver. 9 is quoted from the Assumption of Moses. And there are further traces of apocalyptic influence.

3. Date. These apocalypses were in existence long before the 2d cent. If we could speak more definitely of the incipient Gnostic tendencies attacked throughout the Epistle, we might venture to be more dogmatic about the date. There is an ancient tradition quoted by Eusebius (H E, 3 19 f.) as to the grandchildren of Judas, the brother of James of Jerusalem, being brought before the Emperor Domitian, which makes it necessary to place the Epistle early in his reign or before it.

As to attestation, it may be said that by the close of the 2d cent. it was acknowledged by such writers as Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian as genuine, and it appears in the Muratorian Canon.

Its destination must be pure conjecture.

4. Aim. The aim of the Epistle is entirely practical. The writer is seriously concerned by the inroads of false teaching in the community or communities he has in view. Assuming that his readers understand the errors against which he warns, he gives no minute definition of them. He speaks of the abuse of love-feasts (ver. 12), of antinomianism (passim), of denying Christ (ver. 4). But we have no grounds for connecting them with any theoretical errors like that of Cerinthus.

5. Errors. Plainly sexual abuses and covetousness were rampant. The false teachers are described as having 'crept in.' Moffatt thinks that the references point to 'a familiar type of the prophet or mystagog who traded on the credulity and generosity of his dunes.' The identification of them with definite groups of heretics such as the Ophites or Carpocratians is quite unwarranted. But they possessed some of the characteristics which already marked out those Gnostics who were beginning to be influential in the Christian community. Thus they were exclusive, prided themselves on their special attainments (so the author deliberately names them ψυχικοί, denying them the πνεῦμα), and so lacked the true spirit of the Christian brotherhood.

For the relation of the Epistle to Second Peter, see the article on that book.

LITERATURE: The best English Commentary is that of J. B. Mayor (1907). A very full and well-balanced account of all the questions at issue is given in the relevant section of Moffatt's Introduction to the Literature of the N T (1915).

JUDEA, ju-dī'a. See PALESTINE, §§ 33, 34.

JUDGE. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, §§ 2,4.

JUDGES: The eighth book of the O T.

1. Name. The name 'Judges' was given to it because the main portion of the book relates the deeds of leaders who are said to have 'judged' Israel. The Heb. term shōphēl, translated 'judge,' must not be understood in an exclusively judicial sense. As used in the book of Jg, is practically equivalent to 'ruler.'

2. Contents. The analysis of Jg is simple. The book consists of three main divisions

I. A FRAGMENTARY ACCOUNT OF THE CONQUEST OF CANAAN BY THE DIFFERENT TRIBES (1 1-2 9)

1. The movements of Judah and Simeon (1 1-21)
2. The conquest of Bethel by the House of Joseph (1 22-26)
3. The unsubdued Canaanite cities in various tribes (1 27-35)
4. The rebuke by the angel at Bochim (2 1-5)

II. ISRAEL UNDER THE 'JUDGES' (2 6-16 31)

1. Introductory, giving the religious significance of the history of the judges (2 6-3 6)
2. The deeds of the judges (3 7-16 31)

III. AN APPENDIX, CONTAINING TWO STORIES OF THE TIMES OF THE JUDGES (chs. 17-21)

1. The migration of the Danites, and the establishment of the sanctuary at Dan (chs. 17-18)
2. The outrage at Gibeah, and the vengeance visited on the tribe of Benjamin (chs. 19-21)

3. Unity. The unity of Jg is only superficial. The three main divisions have no real internal connection. They do not form, taken together, a progressive, self-consistent narrative. The introductory statement, 'And it came to pass after the death of Joshua,' prefaces a narrative that deals with events which took place while Joshua was yet alive. Much of the material in ch. 1 is found also in Jos., partly in identically the same words (cf. 1 10-15 with Jos 15 13-19; 1 21 with Jos 15 63), and relating to Joshua and his contemporaries. The question (ver. 1b), 'who shall go up for us first against the Canaanites,' plainly refers to the beginning of the conquest, and can not be applied to a time after Joshua's death. The next notice of Joshua's death in 2 8 is in perfect order, for there it serves to introduce the history of the age succeeding Joshua. The first words of Jg are then either out of their original place (2 11 ?), or are merely a late editorial addition to connect the book with the preceding Book of Joshua.

In the second main division a distinct difference is to be observed between the introductory section (2 6-3 6, with the setting, e.g., 3 7 f., 12 f., 4 1, etc., given to the separate stories of the judges) and the stories themselves. The stories themselves say little about the religious situation, but in the long introductory section and in the shorter interspersed comments this is the aspect on which all the emphasis is laid. The stories were, therefore, not composed by the author of the context in which we now find them, but were already at hand and used by him to point out the religious lessons of Israel's early history. The two stories in the third division are likewise in no close logical or chronological connection with the rest of the book. Neither of them relates to the deeds of a judge, and both concern events that were thought to have taken place very soon after the Conquest.

4. Composition of Judges. The critical problem presented by Jg is complex. Two features stand out clearly: (1) the abundance of very old material in the book and (2) the use made of this material by later writers, who belonged to an entirely different age, and whose main interest was not historical but religious. The oldest material in Jg is to be found in the stories of the deeds of deliverance wrought by heroes of the olden time, and in the poem in ch. 5. Such material was preserved in the first place in the various localities where the valiant deeds were performed, and was there available for later collectors. The evidences of a double thread of narrative in the old stories, e.g., in that of Gideon, in which the characteristics of both J and E appear, have led an increasing number of scholars to conclude that these documents, or the literary work of the schools that produced them, included not only the history of the Conquest but the later period down to the time of Saul and David or even later. For details of this complicated literary problem see Driver, LOT<sup>9</sup>, or such comm. as those of Moore in ICC, or Burney (1918).

The collector (or collectors, if we adopt the view that this was the work of 'J' and 'E') of these stories was interested, naturally, in the religious significance of Israel's early history. But his (or their) viewpoint was that of the early Kingdom pd. (the pre-Deuteronomic pd.). Consequently the theory of religious defection and its punishment does not appear in this older material. It was a later hand, anticipating the more fully developed view of the 'Deuteronomic' school who worked over the stories as already collected and provided them with the general introduction and setting, to which reference has been made above (§ 3), but whose religious pragmatism was not so pronounced as that of the later Deuteronomic school. This pre-Deuteronomic collection of stories of the 'judges' was then revised by a later writer of the Deuteronomic school, who omitted the Eli and Samuel parts (probably also chs. 9 and the older elements in 17-21), added the story of Othniel (3 7-11), and worked over the introduction (2 6-3 6) and similar passages, in the spirit of the rigid pragmatism of the Deuteronomic writers. At a still later date this Deuteronomic 'Judges' was enlarged by the addition of 1 1-2 5, and the restoration of chs. 9 and 17-21 (considerably worked over), thus producing the book in its present form.

This theory of the composition and formation of the Book of Judges (essentially that of Burney) gives an adequate explanation of the facts discoverable on close study. For somewhat divergent theories consult Driver, LOT<sup>9</sup> or the various comm.

5. The Chronology of the Judges. In Jg the periods covered by the different oppressions, the careers of the various judges, and the era of peace are given in great detail. The total amounts to 410 years. If we add to this sum the years of the wandering (40), of Joshua's life (30?), of Eli (40), and Samuel (40?), Saul (20?), David (40), we have a total of over 600 years between the Exodus and the building of Solomon's Temple. But this figure is altogether too high. It contradicts the statement in I K 6 1 that the Temple was begun 480 years after the Exodus, which is itself an excessive estimate, probably based on an artificial scheme of twelve 40-year periods from Moses to Solomon. Since the Exodus could not have taken place much before 1200 B.C. and David's accession must be placed circa 1000 B.C., only about 150 years can be assigned to the period of the judges. The simplest solution of the problem is that the stories of the various judges were originally independent of each other and that the judges themselves were really local heroes, whose authority was in most cases limited to the tribe to which they belonged. Many of them were probably contemporaries. It was through the later arrangement of the stories in a chronological succession that the excessively long sum total was obtained. If we assign 50 years to the era of Deborah (including Othniel, Ehud, and Shamgar), 50 more to the era of Gideon (including Abimelech, Tolah, and Jair), and 50 more to the era of Jephthah and Samson (with the rest of the 'minor' judges), we shall have an approximately correct chronological distribution of the material in the book. (See also CHRONOLOGY OF THE O T.)

6. The Historical Value of Judges. In estimating the historical value of Judges a distinction must be drawn between the statements made by the editors of the old stories and the stories themselves. The later editors (especially those after the original collector) viewed the early history almost entirely from a religious standpoint. The reverses and misfortunes narrated in the old stories were, therefore, interpreted as indisputable evidence of religious defection, which was thus punished by J'', who also in His gracious forbearance took pity and raised up deliverers. That there is a certain amount of truth in this 'pragmatic' view of the history no one would care to deny, but it is nevertheless a late interpretation by writers who failed to see the real character of Israel's early life in Canaan as revealed in the old stories and poems (see HEXATEUCH, § 14 f.). Apart from these late editorial sections Jg must be considered of great historical value. The first part (1 1-2 5) was drawn largely from the old JE history and contains just the information needed to supplement and correct the narrative in Jos (see JOSHUA, §§ 3-5). In the second part (2 6-16 31) the stories of Deborah, Gideon, etc., well reveal the character of the struggles and problems of the pre-kingdom period. The loose tribal organization, the jealousy and strife between different tribes and clans, the great degree of intermixture (both social and religious) with the Canaanites, the conflicts with invading barbarians, the beginnings of the long contest for supremacy with the Philistines (Samson stories) and with the Ammonites (Jephthah story), the generally rude and rough character of the age, and the fundamental religious basis of the unity of Israel (loyalty to J'')—all are well reflected in these ancient stories. The Ode of Deborah in Jg ch. 5 is one of the most important historical documents in the O T. Evidently composed on the occasion of the great victory over Sisera, it gives us a view of the times of the greatest value, both for what it tells us of the conditions in Israel in that day, and for the historical presuppositions as to the preceding Mosaic period. No theory of Israel's early history that is inconsistent with the Ode of Deborah can be accepted as correct. The two stories in the Appendix (chs. 17-21) differ in historical worth. The first one (ch. 17 f.) is full of most reliable and valuable information regarding early religious conditions in Israel. The second story as it stands is less trustworthy. The account in ch. 19 is in the main old and historical. But this was used by a later writer as a basis for a narrative, which is artificial and contains many historical improbabilities. While some early disaster may have befallen Benjamin, and while very probably the maidens of Shiloh were accustomed to dance at the annual feast of J'', the main narrative, which thinks of all the tribes of Israel as acting in that early period as a religious unit, is contradicted by all that we know of those times, which were characterized by anything but unity.

LITERATURE: G. F. Moore in ICC (1901), and the Com. on Judges by C. F. Burney (1918) are all that can be desired. Briefer Coms. are those in the New Century Bible and in the Camb. Bible. See also Driver in LOT<sup>2</sup>. E. E. N.

JUDGMENT. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 29, 36, 39, 41, 46-49.

JUDGMENT HALL. See PRETORIUM.

JUDGMENT SEAT: In ancient Israel the judge was accustomed to sit in giving judgment (Ex 18 13), and the royal throne was preeminently a seat of judgment (I K 7 7; Is 16 5; Pr 20 8). It was thus natural that J'''s throne should be thought of as a judgment seat (Ps 9 7; Jl 3 12; Dn 7 9 ff.). The N T speaks not only of the throne of God (Rev chs. 4-5, etc.), but of the judgment seat of Christ (Ro 14 10; II Co 5 10) as the bar before which all men must appear (cf. Mt 25 31). In a figurative sense, Jesus told His disciples that they also should sit on thrones to judge Israel (Mt 19 28; Lk 22 30).

The term βῆμα is used in a strictly technical sense in Mt 27 19; Jn 19 13; Ac 18 12-17, etc., of the judgment seat of the Roman governor, and in Ac 25 17 of the tribunal of the emperor himself at Rome. E. E. N.

JUDITH (יְהִידִית, yehūdith), 'woman of Judah':

1. A daughter of Beeri the Hittite and one of the wives of Esau (Gn 26 34). 2. The daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon, and the widow of Manasses of the same tribe (Jth 8 1, 2), the heroine of the Book of Judith. J. S. R. E. E. N.

JUDITH, BOOK OF: One of the O T Apocrypha.

1. General Character. It is a romance written with the purpose of encouraging the people in their fidelity to the God of Israel, and stimulating them to a careful observance of the precepts of the Law. Under names that belong to a much earlier time than that from which the book dates, it veils situations which are the reasons for its religious exhortations. There is a difference of opinion among scholars as to just the time of the situations thus veiled, whether they belong to the period of the approach of Pompey to Jerusalem (Gaster), or to the days of Trajan (Volkmar), or to the Maccabean era (Schürer). Each supposition has had strong support, but the last seems most probable.

2. The Story of the Book. Nebuchadrezzar, King of the Assyrians, in the 12th year of his reign, made war with Arphaxad, King of the Medes, and defeated him. To help him in this undertaking he had summoned many peoples far and wide, among them the Jews. They, as well as others, refused to go to the help of Nebuchadrezzar, and he determined to punish them. Holofernes, one of his great generals, was sent westward for this purpose. The Jews fortified themselves as best they could, and prayed earnestly for the help of the Lord. Holofernes blockaded Bethulia (Shechem), and cut off the water-supply. The situation was becoming desperate when Judith, a widow, rich, beautiful, and devout, offered to try to save her people.

Arraying herself in her most beautiful garments and accompanied by her maid, she found her way to the tent of Holofernes, professing to all who met her that she wished to help the Assyrians to victory. Holofernes himself, greatly pleased with her beauty and apparent sincerity, provided for her sojourn in his camp. On the fourth day, he invited her to a banquet in his tent. The unwary general gave himself up to the merriment of the hour, and stupefied himself with wine. This was Judith's opportunity. With his own sword she cut off the head of the drunken sleeper, and, putting it into a sack, hurried back to Bethulia. Great was the rejoicing in Israel, and equally great was the consternation among the Assyrians, so great, indeed, that they fled before the attack of the Jews, and the land was saved.

3. Texts and Versions. The original language of the book was Hebrew, the standard Greek text being a translation from this. Three Greek recensions have been preserved: (1) the standard text, as given in most MSS. (including BAS); (2) a text found in Codex 58 (Holmes and Parsons); (3) a text closely related to (2), found in codices 19 and 108. The story is also extant in several Hebrew versions. Ancient versions of it are in Old Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic. Jerome prepared the Vulgate with the help of an Aramaic version.

4. Date and Author. In what is said above regarding the situations revealed in the story itself must be found the means for estimating the time of writing. These, especially the references to legal observances and the Pharisaic theology, point to a late date (not before 150 A.D.). The author was undoubtedly a Jew. J. S. R.—W. G. J.

JULIA, jū'li-a (Ἰουλίᾱ): One of a group of persons greeted in Ro 16 15. Probably the group represents a Christian household (cf. Ro 16 3), in which case Julia is the wife of Philologus, and the mother of Nereus and his sister. J. was a common feminine name, occurring frequently among slaves and freedmen (cf. CIL, VI, 20416). J. M. T.

JULIUS, jū'li-us (Ἰούλιος): The name of the centurion of the Augustan band (q.v.) into whose keeping Paul and other prisoners were committed on their journey to Rome (Ac 27 1). He treated the Apostle with considerate kindness, permitting him to go ashore at Sidon to visit his friends (ver. 3), and, tho he ignored Paul's warnings in the earlier part of the voyage (ver. 10 f.), he followed his counsel later (ver. 31 f.), and in order to save Paul's life prevented the soldiers from following the Roman custom of killing the prisoners lest they should escape (ver. 42 f.). It is not unlikely that the privilege of separate residence which Paul enjoyed on his arrival at Rome (28 16), besides the favorable elogium from Festus, was due to Julius' report of the voyage.

M. W. J.

JUNIA, jū'ni-ə, or JUNIAS, jū'ni-as: Only the acc. form, Ἰουνία, is found in Ro 16 7, which may represent either the fem. Junia, or a contraction of a masc. name Junianus. In view of the large number of names of women and of Christian households in this ch. (cf. vs. 3, 6, 13, and 15), the former seems most likely. Probably J. was the wife of Andronicus. The expression τοὺς συγγενεῖς, 'kinsmen,' merely implies that they were of the writer's race (cf. Ro 9 3), while συναχθῆναι, 'fellow prisoners,' may be used either literally or figuratively. The words καὶ πρὸ ἐμοῦ, 'before me,' may indicate that J. and Andronicus were among the very early converts to Christianity.

J. M. T.

JUNIPER. See PALESTINE, § 21.

JUPITER. See GREEK RELIGION.

JUSHAB-HESED, jū'shab-hī'sed (יְשָׁבִי הַשֵּׁד, yū-shabb heshed): A descendant of David (I Ch 3 20).

JUSTICE: In the Eng. Bible the word 'justice' is used in an intermediary sense between the two (much more frequent) terms 'judgment' and 'righteousness.' The word mishpāt, 'judgment' (primarily the decision of a judge), is sometimes, especially in RV, rendered 'justice' (Job 29 14, 36 17; Am 5 24, etc.). On the other hand, tsedheq and ts'dhāqāh, 'righteousness,' or 'the right,' are also frequently rendered 'just' or 'justice' (Dt 16 20; Ps 89 14 AV; Jer 31 23 AV, etc.). See JUDGMENT and RIGHTNESS. In Ac 28 4 ἡ δίκη ('vengeance' AV) means the divine nemesis, which was popularly supposed to pursue a criminal until it was satisfied by his punishment.

E. E. N.

JUSTIFICATION: This word is used in N T to describe the act of God in which a sinful man is forgiven and received into the fellowship of God through his faith in Jesus Christ. (1) Literally, the verb (δικαιοσύνη) means 'to pronounce righteous'; in other words, it affirms that, in spite of past sin, an accused person now stands in right relations. It does not mean that he has become a righteous character (see SANCTIFICATION), nor that he has not sinned in the past (see CONDEMN, CONDEMNATION), but that now God, his holy judge, treats him as righteous. This is the righteousness or justification (δικαιοσύνη) of God (Ro 1 17, 3 21-26), which makes the fundamental difference between the Jew and Gentile and the Christian man. It is made the subject of full and explicit discussion in Paul's letters to the Galatians and the Romans. His argument has its force in the fact that it brings to light the inner meaning of the Divine forgiveness and the human responsive faith, which form for all N T writers the kernel of the Gospel, and of the new experiences which it has created (on the significance of the term 'sanctification' in the Ep. to the Hebrews, see A. B. Davidson's Commentary, in Handbooks for Bible Classes, pp. 203-209; cf. also Moffatt in ICC (1924), especially the Introduction, pp. xxx ff.) (2) This act of God stands in contrast (a) with the ideal of law, according to which God's approval depends on man's independent achievement of personal righteousness (good works, or works of the law, Gal 3 10-12); and (b) with the state of condemnation ('cursed') in which every man, because guilty of sin, must find himself, apart from God (Jews, Gal 3 10; Gentiles, 3 8, 13 f.; Ro 1 18-32; all men, Ro 3 9). (3) This act of God has been made possible (a) by the death of Christ, who assumed the curse (Gal 3 13), and became propitiatory, through the shedding of His blood (Ro 3 25, 8 3; cf. I Jn 2 2, 4 10; He 9 11-14; I P 1 19, 3 18; Mk 10 45, 14 24) (see RECONCILIATION and ATONEMENT). The man who sees in this death the atoning act of God will see in it the offer of mercy to himself; but (b) to see this, with inward trust, is for a sinner the supreme act of faith in God. For the awakened conscience the dream of immunity is the worst defiance of God. But in the cross of Christ God is revealed as at once righteous and merciful (Ro 3 26, 5 8-11). Consequently, our trust for the removal of guilt is fixed on that holy will, so rich in mercy (Eph 1 6 f., 2 4 f.). (4) This act must be distinguished from the process of sanctification. It conditions, underlies, and makes possible that process, but its power lies in its being directly apprehended in its own meaning and glory. To be real it must be continuously realized, and that can only be in a life which is its confirmation and its fruit (Ro 5 17, 21 [δικαιοσύνη]; Gal 5 2-6). (5) Dr. Sanday says, 'The Christian life is made to have its beginning in a fiction' (ICC, Romans, p. 36). Not so; the Apostle says explicitly 'faith is reckoned for righteousness.' We must remember that faith is viewed by the N T as the act in which the fundamental right relation with God is really established. The man who trusts in God is righteous. Without that no man can be righteous toward God, since it is faith that creates the base and quality of all action. The fear that thus a doctrine of works is reestablished and that this view of faith would imply that man is saved by his own merit is groundless. For (a) faith is the trust of man's soul in God, whose redeeming love in Christ and that alone made faith possible. Faith is not the result of man's age-long progress in the search for God; it is the response to God's goodness. And (b) faith is thus in its very spring and essence the denial of personal merit, the acceptance of grace. To claim merit for it would be to stifle its very life. To class it with 'works' because we call it a human and righteous act would be to ignore its fundamental difference from all 'works.' When, therefore, God reckons the believing man as righteous there is no fiction on God's part and no merit on man's part. And yet he is righteous.

The danger of making 'justification' a strictly legal process and interpreting relations with God exclusively through that must be avoided. It is an aspect, or element, in those relations; but the moral action and reaction between the Divine and the human is manifold and has other no less real aspects and elements. (See FORGIVENESS; GRACE; LOVE, § 2; REGENERATION, etc.)

The principle of justification by faith is implicit in the teaching of Jesus, as in the prayer of the Publican (Lk 18 10 ff.), the reception of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15 11 ff.), the treatment of the Sinful Woman (Lk 7 36-50), throughout His teaching about forgiveness at the hands of the Father, and in His own treatment of those who came to Him for rest.

JUSTUS, jus'tus (Ἰουστος): The surname of three persons mentioned in the N T. 1. Joseph, called Barsabbas, who was one of the two from whom the disciples chose the successor of Judas, the lot falling upon his colleague Matthias (Ac 1 23 ff.). 2. Titus (Τίτος, WH), a proselyte whose house Paul made his home and doubtless the center of his mission, when the opposition of the Jews in Corinth compelled him to abandon his teaching in the Synagog and give himself to work among the Gentiles (Ac 18 7 f.). 3. Jesus, who was one of the fellow workers of the Apostle who proved a comfort to him in his first Roman imprisonment, and from whom he sent greetings to the Church at Colossæ (4 11). In the case of 1 and 3, 'Justus' is a Gentile surname assumed by a Jew; in the case of 2, it is the surname of a Roman, who had associated himself with the worship of the Synagog (σεβόμενος τὸν Θεόν). M. W. J.

JUTAH, jut'a, JUTTAH, jut'ta (יֻטָּה, yūṭāh [Jos 15 55], יֻטָּה, yūṭāh [Jos 21 18]): A town in the hill-country of Judah, S. of Hebron, which was given to the priests for a city of refuge. It is the modern Yutta, a large Moslem village standing on a high ridge, with stone houses, cisterns, rock-tombs, and rock wine-presses. The inhabitants are rich in flocks. Map II, E 3. C. S. T.

KAB, kab: See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

KABZEEL, kab'zi-el (קַבְצֵֿעֵל, qabhts'el): A town in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 21), the home of Benaiah, captain of David's guard (II S 23 20). It was reinhabited by the Jews in postexilic times (Neh 11 25; here called Jekabzeel). Site unknown. E. E. N.

KADESH, kē'desh (קָדֵֿשׁ, qādhēsh, 'holy') or KADESH-BARNEA, -bār'nā (קָדֵֿשׁ בַּרנֵֿא, qādhēsh-barneā), 'the holy place of Barnea': A city located at the S. end of the Israelite territory, according to Ezk 47 19 ('Meriboth-kadesh') between Tamar and the river of Egypt, but according to Nu 34 4 between the latter point and Akkrabbim. According to Gn 20 1 it was near Gerar. It was for a long time the site of the camp of the tribes of Israel (Nu 20 1 [J]; 27 14; 33 36; Dt 1 46). The modern site has been made the subject of dispute, but it is more than probable that Trumbull was right in identifying it with Ain Kadis in the plateau between Nakh es Safat and E. of Wādī Gerar, where a rich spring with several wells and pools contribute toward rendering the place an oasis. It was also called En Mishpat, 'fountain of judgment' (Gn 14 7), evidently because the locality served as a seat of judgment for a time (cf. H. C. Trumbull, Kadesh Barnea, 1884, pp. 238-332). A. C. Z.

KADMIEL, kad'mi-el (קַדְמִיֵֿעֵל, qadhmi'el), 'El is the ancient one': 1. The ancestral head of a Levitical family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 40; Neh 7 43, 12 8, 24). 2. One or more individual Levites of this name and family may have assisted in rebuilding the Temple (Ezr 3 9), in the services of the day of humiliation (Neh 9 4, 5), and in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 10). C. S. T.

KADMONITE, kad'men-ait (קַדְמוֹנִי, qadhmonī): The Heb. word signifies a dweller in the East, and is synonymous with 'sons of the East.' It refers to the Arabs of the Syrian desert (Gn 15 19). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. J. A. K.

KAIN, kēn (קַיֵֿן, qayin): I. Another term for the Kenites (Nu 24 22, RVmg.; 'the Kenite' AV); see KENITE.

II. A town in the mountains of Hebron (Jos 15 57; Cain AV), more correctly Hakkain, probably an old Kenite settlement, traditionally the tomb of Cain. Supposed to be identified with the modern Yukin, near Hebron (Buhl, Pal. p. 162). Map II, E. 3.

KALLAI, kal'le-ai (קָלַי, qallay): A priest (Neh 12 20).

KAMON, kē'men (קָמוֹן, qāmōn, Camon AV): The burial-place of Jair, one of the Judges (Jg 10 5). Map IV, F 8.

KANAH, kē'nā (קָנָה, qanā), 'reed': 1. A brook forming the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Jos 16 8, 17 9). Map III, E 4. (Identification not certain.) 2. A city of Asher (Jos 19 23). Probably the modern Kanah near Tyre (Mao IV, C 4).

KAREAH, kē-rī'a (קָרֵֿא, qārēah), 'bald': The father of Jonathan, a leader of the remnant of the Jews (II K 25 23, Careah AV; Jer 40 8 ff.).

KARKA, kār'ka (קַרְקָֿא, qarqā'ah, Karkaa AV): A town on the S. border of Judah (Jos 15 3). Site unknown.

KARKOR, kār'kōr (קַרְקֹֿר, qarqōr): The place where Gideon overthrew Zeba and Zalmunna (Jg 8 10). It lay E. of Jogbehah, but its site is unknown.

KARTAH, kār'ta (קִרְתָּה, qartāh): A city of Zebulun assigned to the Levites (Jos 21 34). It may be the same as Kattath (19 15).

KARTAN, kār'tan (קִרְתָּן, qartān): A city of Naphtali, assigned to the Levites (Jos 21 32), called Kiriathaim (Kirjathaim AV) in I Ch 6 76. Site unknown.

KATTATH, kat'tath (קִטְתָּה, qattāh): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 15). Perhaps the same as Kartah (21 34), and Kitron (Jg 1 30). Site unknown.

KEDAR, kī'dār (קִדְרָה, qēdhār): One of the sons of Ishmael (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29) and the eponym of an important tribe of nomads of Arabian origin (Jer 2 10). Their flocks and tents were famous (Ezk 27 21; Jer 49 28 f.), and served as familiar embellishments of poetic speech (Ps 120 5; Song 1 5). But in Is 42 11 they are said to inhabit 'villages,' and in Is 21 16 f. to furnish mighty 'archers,' which may mean either that a portion of the people had settled down to agriculture and military life, or that the 'villages' were simply encampments and the warriors only such as a nomad people might develop. There seems to be no doubt, however, that the name did not always indicate the small section of Ishmael alluded to in Gn. In the Assyrian records K. is placed in juxtaposition with Nebaioth, as it is also in Is 60 7 (cf. COT, I, p. 133 f.; II, p. 107 f.), and its religion is said to be the worship of Syrian deities. See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 11 and 13.

A. C. Z.

KEDEMAH, ked'i-ma (קִדְמָה, qēdhmāh), 'east': An Ishmaelite tribe (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 31). See ISHMAEL; and ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

KEDEMOTH, ked'i-meth (קִדְמוֹת, qēdhēmōth), 'east (regions)': 1. The wilderness of K. was near the upper waters of the Arnon on the E. of Moab (Dt 2 26). 2. The city of K. assigned to Reuben (Jos 13 18, 21 37; I Ch 6 79) was probably in the same locality, some miles E. of Dibon. Map I, G 10.

E. E. N.

KEDESH, kī'desh (קִדְשָׁה, qedhesh), 'holy place': 1. A city in Naphtali, often mentioned. It was an old Canaanitish city with a king (Jos 12 22) and fortified (19 37), more definitely designated as 'K-naphtali' (Jg 4 6) and 'K. in Galilee' (Jos 20 7, 21 32) in the hill-country of Naphtali. It was a city of refuge and a Gershonite Levitical city (I Ch 6 76 [61]). In Jg it is mentioned as the home of Barak, where he and Deborah gathered their forces to fight against Sisera (4, 6, 9 f.). It was taken by Tiglath-pileser (II K 15 29). Jonathan Maccabeus defeated Demetrius, King of Syria, at this place (I Mac 11 63, 73), and Josephus (BJ, IV, 2 3, etc.) mentions that it lay between Galilee and Tyre, to which it belonged, and was hostile to the Jews. It is the modern Kedes, on the E. slope of a hill, NW. of Lake Huleh, in a fruitful country with spring and cistern, and many Roman ruins. Map IV, E 5. 2. A Gershonite Levitical city in Issachar (I Ch 6 72 [57]), probably a mistake for 'Kishion' (Jos 19 20, 21 28). 3. A place in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 23) to be distinguished from Kadesh-barnea.

C. S. T.

KEEPERS: In Ec 12 3 'keepers of the house' is applied figuratively to the arms or hands as the guardians of the body. In all other cases in the Bible 'keeper' means 'watchman,' 'guard,' or 'caretaker.'

E. E. N.

KEHELATHAH, kī'h-lē'hā (קִהְלָתָה, qēhēlāthāh): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 22 f.). Site unknown.

KEILAH, kī-ai'la (קִיְלָה, qē'ilāh): 1. A walled city in the lowland of Judah, which David protected against Philistine raiders (Jos 15 44; I S 23 1-13). It is mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna tablets as Kilti. In Nehemiah's time it was a double district (Neh 3 17 f.). This once important city is probably to be identified with Khurbet Kila, a ruined village on a terraced hill 7 m. E. of Eleutheropolis. Map II, D 2. 2. 'Keilah the Garmite' (I Ch 4 19). Many of the names in this chapter refer to localities, and Keilah is apparently the same as 1 above. The meaning of 'Garmite' is unknown.

L. G. L.—L. B. P.

KELIAH, kī-lē'ya (קִלְיָה, qēlāyāh) also Kelita (קִלְיָה, qēlīyā): One who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 23). He is also mentioned among the expounders of the law as read by Ezra (Neh 8 7), and among the signers of the Covenant (Neh 10 10).

KELITA, kel'i-ta. See KELIAH.

KEMUEL, ki-miū'el (קִמְוֵל, qēmū'ēl): 1. The ancestral head of the Nahorites, from whom Aram was descended (Gn 22 21; but cf. 10 22). 2. A prince of Ephraim (Nu 34 24). 3. A Levite (I Ch 27 17).

KENAN, kī'nān (קִנָּן, qēnān, Cainan AV): The son of Enoch in the Sethite genealogy (Gn 5 9; I Ch 1 2), the equivalent of Cain in the genealogy of 4 1, 17 ff. It is also the name of a Sabeian deity (Skinner, ICC, ad loc.).

KENATH, kī'nāth (קִנָּת, qēnāth): A city in E. Gilead (I Ch 2 23). In Nu 32 42 it is said to have been taken by Nobah (a Manassite clan?) and called Nobah. Tho there was a Nobah near Jogbehah (q.v.) (Jg 8 11), there may also have been another. If so, K. may possibly be identified with Kanawāt in the Hauran, beyond the NE. border of Gilead at the E. end of Map I, J 4).

E. E. N.

KENAZ, kī'naz (קִנָּז, qēnaz), also KENEZ: The ancestral head of an Edomite clan of the same name (Gn 36 11, 15, 42; I Ch 1 36, 53). K. (Kenizzite RV, Kenezite AV) is also named as the clan to which Caleb (Nu 32 12; Jos 14 6, 14) and Othniel (Jos 15 17; Jg 1 13, etc.) belonged. K. (Gn 15 19) thus appears to have been either an Edomite clan, a part of which was absorbed into Judah, or an independent clan, one portion of which became Edomite, while the other united with Judah. Its seat was in S. Judah in the neighborhood of Hebron.

E. E. N.

KENITE, kī'nait (קִנִּי, qēnī, Gentile of Ḳayin, Kain [found in Nu 24 22; Jg 4 11]): The Kenites were a nomadic people whose original home lay in the region S. of Palestine. Moses' father-in-law, Hobab, was a Kenite (Jg 1 16, 4 11), and hence we may infer that they were originally counted with the Midianites. The Kenite clan of which Hobab was chief threw in its lot with Israel on the march from Horeb to Canaan, and later joined Judah when that tribe undertook to conquer S. Palestine (Jg 1 16f.). The Kenites took possession of a district to the S. of Judah proper, and there became closely identified with the Amalekites (in Jg 1 16 read 'and they went and dwelt with the Amalekites'; cf. Moore in ICC, ad loc.). A small clan led by Heber afterward moved to N. Palestine (Jg 4 11). When Saul marched against Amalek he warned the Kenites to save themselves by separating from the Amalekites (I S 15 6). They occupied a distinct part of the Negeb near the Jerahmeelites (I S 27 10, 30 29). Later they were reckoned as an integral part of Judah (I Ch 2 55), and it was the Kenite Hammath who was considered the ancestor of the Rechabites (q.v.). The Kenites are mentioned in the enigmatic oracle ascribed to Baalam (Nu 24 21 f.). Many recent writers have advocated the theory that the Kenites were originally worshipers of J', and that it was from them that Moses derived his knowledge of J', but this theory is beset with many difficulties.

E. E. N.

KENIZZITE, kī-niz'zait. See KENAZ.

KERCHIEF: The rendering of the Heb. miṣpāḥāh (Ezk 13 18, 21), a head-covering or veil of some sort, the exact nature of which is unknown. See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

KEREN-HAPPUCH, kī'ren-hap'uk (קֶרֶן הַפִּיחַ, qeren happūkh): One of Job's daughters (Job 42 14). The name means 'horn of eye-paint,' the reference being to the black antimony dye used for the eyebrows and eyelashes.

KERIOTH, kī'ri-ōth (קִרְיֹת, qiryōth, in Jer 48 41 with the article), the pl. of qiryāh, 'city': A place in Moab (Jer 48 24) with royal palaces (Am 2 2), perhaps the capital city. On the Moabite Stone (see MESHA) it is mentioned as containing a principal sanctuary of Chemosh. Buhl (GAP) identifies it with Rabbath Moab, the capital city of the district 'Ar, S. of the Arnon. C. S. T.

KERIOTH-HEZRON, kī'ri-ōth-hez'rən. See HEZRON.

KEROS, kī'res (קֶרֶס, qērōs): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 44 = Neh 7 47).

KETIAH: The rendering of קֵטִיָּה (I S 21). See Food, § 11.

KETURAH, kī-tū'ra (קֵטֹרָה, qeturāh), 'frankincense': The wife or concubine of Abraham, perhaps like Hagar taken during Sarah's lifetime. She was the mother of six sons, representing Arab tribes S. and E. of Palestine. But the episodic nature of the passage (Gn 25 1-6), the plurals in ver. 3, and the broad geographical distribution of her descendants argue strongly for a tribal interpretation of Keturah's personality. A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

KEY, See HOUSE, § 6 (1).

KEZIAH, kī-zai'a (קֵצִיָּה, qetsi'āh), 'cassia': One of the daughters of Job (Job 42 14).

KEZIZ, VALLEY OF, kī'ziz. See EMER-KEZIZ.

KIBROTH-HATTA'AVAH, kib'rōth-hat-tē'a-va (קִבְרוֹת הַתַּאֲוָה, qibhrōth hatta'āwāh, 'graves of lust': A station on the wilderness journey from Horeb to Kadesh (Nu 11 34 f., 33 16 f., Dt 9 22). It was the scene of the wonderful supply of quail, the greedy eating of which brought on a plague causing the death of many in the camp. Site unknown.

KIBZAIM, kib-zē'im (קִבְצַיִם, qibhtsayim): A Levitical city of Ephraim named in connection with Gezer and Beth-horon (Jos 21 22), called Jokmeam (q.v.) in I Ch 6 68.

KID. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5; FOOD, § 10.

KIDNEYS: In the O T the Heb. kēlāyōth is used in two senses. (1) Literal—of the kidneys with their fat. In one passage the term is used to indicate the choicest part of the wheat (Dt 32 14). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10. (2) By metonymy—for the emotional nature of man with its impulses and affections. In such passages it was rendered in AV by reins, for which RV substitutes 'heart' (cf. also Rev 2 23). See MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 8. E. E. N.

KIDRON, kid'rən (קִדְרֹן, qidhrōn): The name of the valley E. of Jerusalem, the stream of which is dry during the greater part of the year. Originally the spring Gihon (see JERUSALEM, § 11) emptied its waters into this part of the valley. The Valley of Jehoshaphat (Jl 3 12) is not to be identified with the Kidron, at least that portion of it near Jerusalem. See also JERUSALEM, § 5. E. E. N.

KINAH, kai'na (קִנָּה, qīnāh): A town in the extreme S. of Judah (Jos 15 22). Site unknown.

KINDRED: The translation of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms in AV, most of which have been more correctly rendered by other words in RV. Attention may be called to the following: 1. In the O T. (1) In Ezk 11 15, the term rendered 'kindred' means 'redemption.' This gives no good sense, and it is probable that the original reading was 'captivity,' or 'exile,' giving the meaning 'fellow exiles.' (2) In Ru 3 2, the Heb. means literally 'acquaintance.' (3) In Gn 24 7, etc., the Heb. word (rendered 'nativity' in RV) is the same as that rendered 'kindred' in 12 1, etc. It is derived from the verb meaning 'to give birth to,' and both senses are correct. In Est 2 10, 20, 8 6 it might be rendered 'race.' (4) The Heb. word for 'family' is sometimes used in a broad sense for 'kindred' (Gn 24 38; 1's 22 27, etc.). 2. In the N T. (1) In Ac 4 6 γένος means 'family,' while in 7 13, 19 it has its usual meaning of 'race.' (2) In Ac 3 25 πατριάς, 'family,' is used in a very broad sense, almost equivalent to 'race,' or 'nation.' (3) In Rev 1 7, 5 9, etc., the RV 'tribe' is the literal meaning of the Gr. φυλή. E. E. N.

KING: The Heb. melekh, 'king,' appears to be derived from a root, mlkh, meaning 'to decide' or 'to give counsel,' (cf. the status of the head of a tribe, whose main function was to give counsel rather than to rule absolutely). The verb mālakh, 'to rule,' or 'to reign,' is denominative from melekh. The original constitution of Israel was patriarchal (see FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 2, 4; and ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, §§ 11, 12) and tribal.

There was no central authority, even in religion. Individual leadership in war or in time of peace was after all, subordinate to the government of the tribes through their 'elders.' As Israel in Canaan entered into the experiences of a settled, instead of a nomadic, life, the essential weakness of the tribal constitution became only too evident. The invasion by the Midianites (Jg chs. 6-8) and the conquest of central Israel by the Philistines (I S chs. 4-6) showed the need of union under one capable head. Gideon refused the offer of a crown (Jg 8 22 f.), and the attempt to found a kingdom by his incapable son Abimelech was abortive (Jg ch. 9). It was in the days of Samuel that the desire for a king came to be generally prevalent. The oldest narrative (I S 9 1-10 16, 11 1-13) represents Samuel (and J' also) as at one with the people in this matter, and gives as the motive the desire for a leader to save Israel from the Philistines. Saul was the choice of both J' and His people. As king, Saul's status was midway between that of the chief of a tribe and the more fully developed regal state exhibited by David. Saul was the war leader of all Israel, and in war his authority was supreme. But in other respects his court and the organization of his government were crude and primitive. It was otherwise with David (q.v.), in whom Israel found a man of truly regal character. David was chosen king by the tribal 'elders,' first of Judah (II S 2 4), then, seven years later, by those of all Israel (II S 5 3). As king, David was the military head, the supreme judge, and the religious head of all Israel. His authority was not absolute, for there were many ancient customs and rights which he was expected to uphold, not to annul (cf. the later case of Ahab and Naboth, I K ch. 21); still, in many respects his will was the supreme law of the land, and in the selection of his officials, both military and civil, less attention was paid to the local tribal nobles and more to persons who would be directly dependent upon the king himself. As the supreme court of appeal, this king and his officials practically supplanted the old tribal courts in matters of great importance. In these and other respects the tendency of the kingdom was to break down the old tribal system. Under David the kingly government was organized, and there was a real court and cabinet (II S 8 15-18, 20 23-26). Under Solomon, this organization was extended to cover the economic measures for the maintenance of the royal establishment (I K 4 1-28), and also the royal prerogatives were insisted upon in an autocratic spirit (cf. I K 12 8-11) unknown in earlier days, and exceedingly distasteful to the majority of his subjects, especially those outside of Judah (I S 8 10-18; I K 12 4-7). The northern tribes therefore at the death of Solomon refused their allegiance to his son, who declined to renounce the autocratic policy of his father. The Northern Kingdom thus originated in a protest against absolutism. Omri, the fifth king, was the real organizer of the Northern Kingdom. Being the choice of the army, he had the power to enforce his authority. He diminished the independent power and significance of the old local and tribal constituencies, and made the throne supreme, and under the Omri dynasty the Northern Kingdom came to be as closely organized about and dependent on the throne as was that of Judah. See ISRAEL, SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT OF, §§ 30, 31.

There was something ideal in the conception of a king to the mind of the ancient Israelite. The limits of the royal authority were somewhat vague, and hence there was all the greater need that, as the final court of appeal and the fountainhead of justice, the king be perfectly just and impartial. As the head of the state, he was to be the successful leader of its armies, the wise provider of all things conducive to public welfare, having at heart his people's interests, quick to detect and punish the evil and reward the good (Dt 17 14-20; I K 12 7). As the chief of his people, he was also their representative before God. He was 'J''s anointed' (I S 26 11, etc.) and really their high priest. He officiated at the national sacrifices, prayed for his people, and blessed them in the name of J' (I S 14 33 f.; II S 6 18 f.; I K 8 12 f., 13 4, etc.). It was easy, therefore, for the Messianic thought at times to conceive of the ideal future as the time when a perfect king should reign on David's (ideal) throne as God's own representative, and his kingdom be the realization of the rule of God in Israel and on earth (Is 9 6-7, 11 1-5, 32 1 f.; Jer 23 5; Ezk 32 22-24, etc.). On the other hand the monarchical idea had its opponents, perhaps from the first. The later strands of the narrative in I S view the desire for a king and the choice of Saul as equivalent to rejection of J''s leadership (cf. I S 8, 10 17-24, 12, 15). These late passages may well preserve the memory of early opposition which later was more fully developed and formulated. Solomon's autocratic tendencies aroused opposition. Prophets boldly stood out against royalty; Dt 17 14 f. only grudgingly sanctions the kingdom. While no definite conflict between king and priesthood developed during the period of the monarchy, the priestly system formulated in the Law left practically no place for a monarch. It reduced him to a mere figurehead in an ecclesiastical state at the head of which was the high priest, wearing insignia proper to royalty (Ex 28 36 f.; 39 38-31). E. E. N.

KINGDOM OF GOD: 1. Usage of Terms. A NT phrase based upon and expressing in its final form the OT idea of the spiritual rule of God over men. The phrase kingdom of heaven (βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν) is used in the NT by Mt only, and is an exact equivalent of the phrase 'kingdom of God' (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ). The substitution of 'heaven' for 'God' is based on the popular superstitious feeling in later Judaism, which led to the avoidance of the Divine names in common speech. Outside of the NT, it was in use as the Targumic name of the Messianic empire (malḥūtā' d'ḥishmayyā'), an alternate form of the older phrase, which, however, it never completely displaced. Which of the two expressions Jesus himself adopted, and whether He limited Himself to one or the other are open questions. (Cf. Stanton, The Jewish and Christian Messiah [1886], pp. 209-210; Dalman, Words of Jesus [1902], pp. 91 ff.). Less technical and formal expressions denoting the same idea are, 'kingdom of their [my, Mt 26 29] father' (Mt 13 43), 'thy kingdom' (in the Lord's Prayer, Mt 6 10), 'the kingdom,' without qualification (Mt

8 12); and, after the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah, 'kingdom of Christ' (Pauline usage, I Co 6 9 f.; Gal 5 21).

2. The Idea in the O T. The essence of the conception of the kingdom of God is to be found in the O T. In one of the passages of the Hexateuch (Ex 19 5 f. [J, or perhaps the redactor of JE]), Moses is represented as bringing the promise of J' to the people of Israel that they should be 'a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.' This was distinctly assumed by later writers as substantially realized in the last stages of the period of Judges. Gideon refuses the throne offered him upon the ground that J' only must rule over Israel (Jg 8 23). When the people demanded a king from Samuel and he took the matter to J', according to the later narrative (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF) he received the answer that it was not himself that the people had rejected but J' (I S 8 7; cf. 12 12). In its simplest form, the idea expressed in these passages may be put in the proposition: Israel's government is ideally a theocracy, i.e., The reign of God, and Israel, accordingly, the kingdom of God (see KING for the older narrative with a somewhat different view; also cf. SAUL and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF). With the establishment of the monarchy this idea naturally receded into the background, but the thought that God was the true king of Israel was never completely lost to sight. In the dark days of the exile, as Israel's need became great, the prophets foresaw the re-establishment of the reign of J' in the future as the only effective remedy for the ills from which the nation was suffering.

3. Apocalyptic Development of the Idea. The root and ground of this hope was naturally the belief, becoming stronger from generation to generation, that Israel's God was by right the sovereign of the whole world, the king of all the nations (Ps 74 12, 47 6-8). His restoration of Israel to supreme power and his return to the visible throne of his own people would only be the manifestation of an inner reality. The apocalyptic type of thought seized upon this idea and brought it into a new and rather elaborate phase of development. It transformed it into a comprehensive eschatological conception incorporating into it all the expectations quickened by the older prophets. Among these was first and foremost that of the coming of an ideal king (Messiah) after the type of David (a Son of David). Next, since the Messianic era was not in the way of coming quietly through a historic and gradual unfolding, the expectation arose that it would be brought in through a sudden break of the existing order by God's interference from above. This was interlinked with the notion of the 'Ages.' The present age would be supplanted speedily and suddenly by the new (coming age). So great a change was naturally looked upon as 'the end of the world,' altho the phraseology used only designates the end of an age or dispensation. Finally, God's assumption of the visible rule would involve the judgment of all enemies (sinners), both in Israel and without. This was the development and reassertion of the doctrine of the Day of J', promulgated as early as by Amos (5 20).

The word Kingdom came to be applied to this expected new and ideal order (cf. Slav. En. 41, 52 4; Pss Sol. 5 21; Ass. Mos. 10 1) and the phrase 'kingdom of God' ['kingdom of heaven'] passed into the Targumic usage (cf. Targum, Is 40 9; Mic 4 7; also Targ. Jon. Is 53 10, 'The kingdom of the Messiah'; see also Cremer, Bibl. Theol. Lex., βασιλεύς; Schürer, HJP, II, ii, 170).

4. Teaching of Jesus. John the Baptist, basing his expectation, as did the men of his age, on Dn 2 44, took the imminence of the kingdom as the occasion and motive of his preaching of repentance (Mt 3 1).

But it was the use of the conception by Jesus that has lifted it into the place of its supreme importance. In fact, according to the synoptists, He made it the substance of His preaching. His theme was 'the Gospel of the Kingdom' (Mt 4 23).

The usage of Jesus represents the kingdom (1) figuratively, under the form of a place. This is the case in all expressions involving the act of entering into the kingdom (Mt 7 21, 13 3; Mk 10 15, 23; Lk 18 24 f.). Sometimes, the place is more narrowly presented as an enclosure, or walled territory, or city with gates that can be closed (Mt 23 14). It is better to enter into the kingdom of heaven with one eye than, having two, to be cast out (Mk 9 47). Men are said to be 'near' or 'far' from the kingdom (Mk 12 34). It requires effort to enter (Mt 11 12). But the difference between those who enter and those who do not is not the difference between the Jew and the Gentile, but that between those who possess a certain fitness for it and those who do not (Lk 9 62). But after entrance has been secured, it is a place of enjoyment, a place where even Jesus Himself shall eat and drink (Mt 26 29; Mk 14 25; Lk 22 16, 18). (2) In a second class of passages, the kingdom is represented as a possession. Of the poor in spirit and of those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake it is said, 'theirs is the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5 3, 10; Lk 13 16 f.). It is something that can be given and taken away. It will be taken from the Jews and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof (Mt 21 43). It is promised to the little flock (Lk 12 32). The parables of the treasure hidden in the field and the merchantman seeking goodly pearls (Mt 13 44-46) give this view of it. It is the most valuable of possessions, and it is the height of wisdom to seek for it and the summit of prosperity to acquire it (Mt 6 33; Lk 12 35). (3) A third class of passages represents the kingdom of God as an organization, constituted of a certain class of men. It is a body politic, growing from small beginnings into large proportions and power (Mt 13 31; Mk 4 26, 27). Its members are the children of the kingdom (Mt 13 38). Like every human organization this, too, must have its offices and officers; but to suppose that these are to be appointed without reference to their character and on the same principle as in the political sphere—in order to lord it over their fellow members—is a grievous error. They that rule shall be they that serve. They shall rule in the very act of serving their brethren (Mt 20 21 ff.). (4) A fourth class of passages designates the kingdom as an order of things, or a dispensation. In the vision of Daniel, it had been foreshadowed that with the coming of the fifth kingdom (that of the 'saints,' Dn 7 14, 22, 27) a revolution would occur in the affairs of Israel and, in fact, of the whole world. And it was the nearness of this new order of things that John the Baptist had preached. Jesus came with the same message, and taught His disciples to announce the coming of the kingdom, to pray for it, and to prepare for it (Mt 6 10-13; Lk 9 2, 11). The new feature of the dispensation thus announced is its spirituality. Its laws are essentially ethical. It is an order of things in which humility and purity count for more than self-assertion and outward conformity to standards (Mt 11 11; Lk 7 28). It is an administration of justice and equity. Faithfulness and diligence are rewarded in it and sloth and unbrotherliness are punished (Mt 21 43; cf. 25 1 ff.). See also JESUS CHRIST, §§ 13, 14.

5. Parallel and Contrasted Conceptions. After His answer to the rich young man who asked Him what he must do to inherit eternal life, Jesus turned to His disciples and said, 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God' (Lk 18 24), and His disciples asked Him, 'Then who can be saved?' (Lk 18 26). In this passage the three phrases 'kingdom of God,' 'eternal life,' and 'be saved' are applied to the same thing. Whether the conversation is reported verbatim or as later interpreted it is certain that it indicates at least what the kingdom of God was understood to be when Luke wrote. The Fourth Gospel also uniformly presents the 'eternal life' as the great theme of Christ's teaching, thus putting it in the place occupied by the idea of the kingdom in the Synoptic account.

Further, the kingdom of God is contrasted with the kingdom of Satan (Mt 12 26; Mk 3 24; Lk 11 18). This kingdom involves an organization controlled by one dominating power, and it is necessary that its law should be harmoniously observed by its subjects, else its integrity disappears and it collapses (Mt 12 25 f.; Lk 11 18). The kingdom of God is finally identified with the 'coming age' of the apocalyptic literature (Lk 18 30; Mk 10 30), and the 'present age,' being the obverse of the coming, falls into the place of opposition to the kingdom of God.

In making the idea of the kingdom of God the main subject of his preaching, Jesus adopted what he found current in his age. At the same time he gave the conception a new interpretation. Just how much of its old content he retained and how much of his own he added has been a question much debated.

6. The Coming of the Kingdom. On the one side, it is claimed that His thought on this point coalesces with that of the Apocalyptists (apocalyptic-eschatological view), and that, like them, He looks upon the coming of the kingdom as an outward event to be ushered in with a unique display of supernatural power (J. Weiss, Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes [1906]; Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu [1903]; Bousset, Die Predigt Jesu in ihren Gegensatz zum Judentum [1892]; Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede, E. T., The Quest of the Historical Jesus [1910]). On the other side, His utterances are interpreted as representing the kingdom as a present evolving organism (ethico-religious view). Exclusively taken, either one of these views fails to account for all the facts in the case, some of which seem to support one and some the other. Thus arises a problem which might be solved by denying the genuineness of either class of utterances attributed to Jesus. The eschatological discourses may have been incorporated into the ethico-religious teaching of the Master by His reporters, because these were unable fully to appreciate His pure religious thought; or, less probably, the ethico-religious elements may have been read back into His speeches, tho developed later in the course of Apostolic activities; or the eschatological may have been but the form current in His day which Jesus used as a medium for His ethico-religious ideals; or, again, the eschatological may have formed the chief content of His teachings, and those instances of His usage in which the kingdom appears as a present reality may be proleptical. All these methods of dealing with the data do more or less critical and exegetical violence to them. The truth is that the primary element in Jesus' conception is the ethico-religious, and the eschatological is used, partly as a vehicle for conveying this, and partly as a possible culmination and expression outwardly of the inner reality. The kingdom is then a present and growing power, whose final triumph might be conceived as taking place in the form ordinarily represented in the Apocalyptic writings.

7. The Kingdom in Apostolic Teaching. The Apostolic teaching continues this blended presentation without any tendency either toward the absorption or toward the expulsion of the one view by the other. In the Epistles of Peter, the eschatological idea prevails. The kingdom is a future manifestation (I P 1 7 f., 4 13); Christ Himself would come in glory and establish it (I P 4 5 f.). In the Epistle of James, it is a privilege to be enjoyed by those who love Jesus as Christ that they shall inherit the kingdom (Ja 2 5). On the other hand, in Revelation, it is more than a future reign of God. With the ascension of Jesus, Satan has been overthrown, and the kingdom has come (12 10). Believers are already rulers in it (1 6, 5 10). The Seven Churches are in the domain of Christ. In the Johannine writings, the conception and phraseology of the kingdom yield to those of eternal life, which is represented as a present good secured by faith in Christ (Jn 3 30, 6 54; I Jn 5 11, 13). But most clearly does this alternation of the idea from a present to a future reality appear in Paul's system of thought. Here the two advents of Christ mark the developments. The first coming has already resulted in the establishment of a kingdom of which His disciples are fellow citizens, Eph 2 19; a dispensation of the fulness of the times, Eph 1 10; the body of Christ, Eph 1 23, 4 12, etc., constituted by the predominance of certain inner realities (Ro 14 17; I Co 4 20). Men are transferred into it ('the kingdom of the Son') by faith in God through Jesus Christ (Col 1 13). Yet this kingdom is associated with the future coming of Christ (II Ti 4 1), and is to be inherited (Gal 5 21; I Co 6 9 f.). Paul also distinguishes between the kingdom of God, pure and simple, and the kingdom of Christ; but the difference is simply that the former represents an earlier stage in the Apostle's thought and the latter a later one. Yet the kingdom of Christ is the means of furthering the kingdom of God (I Co 15 24-27). It was only after the close of the Apostolic period that the identification of the kingdom of God with the Church of Christ began to be made.

8. The Kingdom and the Individual. The new meaning thus imparted to the conception of the kingdom of God broke down the older barriers of mere national and racial privilege about it. Both in the teaching of Jesus, and still more clearly in the system of Paul, the kingdom was to extend over the great heathen world (cf. Eph 3 6, where Gentiles are referred to as fellow heirs, fellow members of the body, and fellow partakers of the promise), and even possibly leave out some of the old Jewish communities (Ro 9 31 f.). From being the commonwealth of Israel, it came to be regarded as the community of the righteous within Israel, and, finally, as the righteous among all nations. The conditions of membership are, accordingly, placed within the reach of the world at large, and consist in repentance from sin and trustful acceptance of the Christ as Savior (Mt 16 16; Ac 13 39, 3 19, 17 30; Ro 1 16). The privileges of such membership are correspondingly lifted out of a material sphere (currently expressed in such phrases as 'eating bread in the kingdom of God' [Lk 14 15], 'partaking in a banquet of manna,' or 'of the flesh of leviathan,' or 'Behemoth') into the more spiritual one of the vision of God, the recognition of sonship, the satisfaction with righteousness, the communion with the devout of past ages, and the completion of communion with God already begun. But on their part, the members of the kingdom must maintain a Christian character. As such, they are to be distinguished by humility, meekness, a forgiving spirit, a devout and prayerful attitude toward God, earnest aggressiveness in extending the kingdom, and a fraternal loving attitude toward their fellow members. Over one another they are to watch with care (Mt 18 15-20), and serve one another with devotion.

9. Later Interpretations of the Idea. When the Christian Church became a fully organized institution and entered upon its career of influence in the world, the tendency arose to identify it with the kingdom of God (Augustine). This view continued to the days of the Reformers, who, for obvious reasons, amended it by identifying the kingdom of God with the invisible church. In more recent times the inclination prevailed to view the general sovereignty of God, morally and providentially exercised, as the true notion of the kingdom (F. D. Maurice). But the eschatological idea also is widely held. It is interpreted, however, as involving the notion that the original intention of Jesus was to establish a visible kingdom such as was expected by the Jews of His time. But since the Jews rejected Him, the kingdom was not then set up. It is held in abeyance until some time in the future when at his Second Coming he will establish it.

10. Summary. The Biblical idea of the kingdom of God may then be said to center about the thought of a special order of things or dispensation, the chief characteristic of which is that men recognize God as absolute sovereign. But they do so because, in the person and teaching of Jesus Christ, He is revealed to them as their Father. The relation of the individual to the kingdom is thus established by faith i.e., by the acceptance of the revelation made by Jesus; but those who accept Him irrespective of previous station in life or nationality are banded together as His new people. The order of things thus begun is to be completed in the future. Yet its complete manifestation at the last will not bring a new reality into existence, but will only fill out and reveal its outline.

KINGS, BOOKS OF. In the Heb. Canon Jos, Jg, I and II S (as one book), and I and II K (as one) form a group called the 'Early (or Former) Prophets.' How old this grouping is can not now be ascertained, but it antedates the LXX. and persisted (in Heb. MSS.) until the age of printing.

1. Name and Place in the O T Canon. Both Origen and Jerome speak of the difference between the LXX. division into two books (Third and Fourth 'Kingdoms') and the Heb. designation of the whole as one book of 'Kings.' Our subdivision of S and K into two books each, based as it is on the LXX., is of no special significance, and is purely arbitrary, having no basis in the text. The dividing line between K and S has also been drawn somewhat arbitrarily, since I K chs. 1 and 2 are really the conclusion of the history of David narrated in II S. Lucian, in his recension of the LXX., made a much more natural division between II S and I K at I K 2 12, perhaps following ancient Heb. authorities in so doing. The exact relation of the original Heb. book of 'Kings' to the preceding historical books is obscure. It is certain that the older material in them all has been edited by compilers in the same spirit, and that together they form a closely connected series. But whether they were originally planned as such a series, and were once but four parts of one large work all edited by the same hand, are questions that can not be answered definitely.

2. General Structure and Purpose. Disregarding the artificial subdivision into two books, the entire work consists of three main parts: (1) The history of Solomon's reign (I K chs. 1-11). (2) A synchronous history of the two kingdoms (I K ch. 12-II K ch. 17). (3) The history of Judah from the fall of the Northern Kingdom to the Exile (II K chs. 17-25). Throughout each of these three parts we find evidence of the use by the editor, or compiler, of a variety of sources, sometimes quoted verbatim in longer and shorter excerpts, at other times used more indirectly, but always in accord with one ruling purpose, to set forth the history from a religious rather than from a political point of view, and to show what lessons were to be learned from it regarding J''s dealings with His people. In political events or measures, as such, the compiler took little interest. Of the careers of some of the most important kings (e.g., Omri and Jeroboam II) he gives only the briefest notices. The record of a half-century is compressed into a few lines (e.g., the reign of Manasseh). This was due simply to the 'pragmatic' or didactic aim of the historian. He selected from his sources only those things that seemed best suited to his main purpose. The signs of the compiler's hand are manifold. (1) He makes definite reference to three works as authorities (cf. I K 11 41, 14 19, 29, and see below, § 4). (2) The constant recurrence of certain favorite formulas, which form the framework, as it were, of the whole. (a) Those by which a reign is introduced, which include, when complete, the synchronism with the contemporaneous reign in the other kingdom, the name of the king, his age, length of reign, name of queen-mother, and a statement as to his character (I K 14 21, 22 41 f., etc.). (b) Those by which the account of a reign is closed, which include a reference to the editor's authority, a notice of the king's death and burial, and the name of his successor (I K 11 41 f., 14 19 f., 29, 31, 15 7 f., etc.). (3) The synchronistic scheme, according to which the accession of a king in one kingdom is dated according to the regnal year of the contemporaneous king in the other. This appears as a regular element of the formula (2) (a) just noted, and is carried through the entire period of the divided kingdom. It is not likely that these synchronisms were in the original authorities; they were probably computed by the editor on the basis of figures found in his sources. (4) The presence of a large number of passages, scattered through the work, all revealing the same religious point of view and holding a most important place in the general composition of the work. Some of them appear conspicuously in the framework (cf. (2) above) as judgments on the character of the individual kings, while others of more didactic character seek to show why misfortunes came upon different kings or the nation (e.g., I K 11 1-13, 32-39, 15 4 f., 29-31; II K 17 18-23, etc.). The standpoint from which these are written is the 'Deuteronomic.' Kings are condemned for worshiping at the high places, a practise clearly contrary to the Deuteronomic theory of one only legitimate sanctuary. The sins of Solomon, of Jeroboam, of N. Israel in general, and of Manasseh are all of just the kind that are especially condemned in Dt. The doctrine that the national prosperity was directly dependent upon its loyalty to J', and that disloyalty would surely be visited with heavy retribution is also a cardinal doctrine of Dt (see DEUTERONOMY, § 8). Along with such passages as these, a number of others, which are similar in literary style and mode of thought, will naturally be classed as from the compiler rather than from his sources.

3. Date. The narrative of K is carried down to the time when Evil-merodach, King of Babylon (562-560 B.C.), released the captive Jehoiachin, of Judah, from prison, i.e., some time later than 561. This makes the book, as it stands, of exilic (or possibly post-exilic) date. There are also a number of editorial sections, such as II K 17 19 f., 21 10-15, 23 26 f., possibly also I K 9 6-9, where an exilic point of view seems presupposed. But over against these indications of exilic date there are others which imply an earlier date for large portions of the work. (1) The frequently recurring expression 'unto this day' can be assigned often only to the editor (not to his source), and refers to conditions that passed away with the Exile (cf. I K 8 8, 9 21, 12 19; II K 8 22, 16 6). In other instances, as I K 10 12; II K 17 23, 41, a preexilic date for the phrase is not certain, but it is probable, while in others, as II K 10 27, it may belong to the source used by the compiler. (2) The presence of two separate strata in the editorial matter. One such stratum has just been referred to as evidence of exilic, or postexilic, date. The other, however, seems to demand a preexilic date—that is, there seems to be no consciousness, on the part of the writer, of the fall of Jerusalem, or of the cessation of the rule of David's line, or of the captivity of Judah (e.g., I K 8 22-43, 11 29-39; II K 8 19, 17 18-23, in which vs. 19 f. are a later insertion). The conclusion, therefore, to which the evidence seems to point is that the work was composed before the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.), and that during or shortly after the Exile it was revised, and also supplemented by the addition of the account of the downfall of the Judean kingdom, all in the same spirit as that in which the original book had been written. The work as we have it is thus, in the main, the work of two editors, whom we may call R<sup>1</sup> and R<sup>2</sup>.

The date of the first draft of the work by R<sup>1</sup> can not well have been earlier than the publication and adoption of the book of Deuteronomy as the standard exposition of Israel's religious constitution in 621 B.C. (see DEUTERONOMY, § 5). The influence of Dt is evident in all parts of the work. It extends even to minute points of phraseology (cf. the long lists of identical, or similar, expressions in K and Dt collected by Driver, LOT, pp. 200-203, and by Burney in HDB, II, pp. 859-861). The probability is, therefore, that some one, profoundly influenced by Dt and the reformation of Josiah's time, also perhaps by the earnest appeals and denunciations of Jeremiah, undertook to compile a history of the kingdom in which the great religious and moral teachings of Dt would be seen to be illustrated and enforced in the actual course of events. The exact date of R<sup>1</sup> can not be fixed. In view of his reference in II K 24 5 to one of his sources as containing a full account of Jehoiakim's reign (608-597), it is probable that he wrote in Zedekiah's reign (597-586), on the eve of the fall of the kingdom. The date of the second revision by R<sup>2</sup> does not need to be placed later than the Return (536). Somewhere between 561 and 536 satisfies all conditions, as the few passages that seem to show acquaintance with the Priests' Code (I K 6 1a, 'most holy place' 6 16, 'the golden altar' 7 48, a few expressions in 8 1-7, and II K 18 31b) can easily be accounted for as late glosses.

4. Sources. The compiler R<sup>1</sup> had at his disposal a number of sources, some of which he names, while others can be detected by close study of the work. The sources named are 'the book of the acts of Solomon' (I K 11 41), 'the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah' (I K 14 23, etc., cited for all reigns except those of Abaziah, Athaliah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah), and 'the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel' (I K 14 19, etc., cited for all reigns except those of Jehoram and Hoshea).

(1) The 'book of the acts of Solomon' must have been one of the main sources used by R<sup>1</sup> for his history of Solomon's reign (I K chs. 1-11). But he did not draw all his information from this work. The introductory part of the account of Solomon (I K chs. 1-2) was, in the main, taken from the history of David's reign in Jerusalem (see DAVID, § 2 (3), and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF). The remainder of the account of Solomon's reign (chs. 3-11) comprises three main kinds of material: (a) Annalistic and statistical notices, such as we find in 3 i, 4 i-28, 9 i-28, 10 i-20, 26, 28 f.; (b) an extended account of the building of the Temple and of its furnishings in 6 2-7 51; (c) a series of notices, all serving to show Solomon's great wisdom and glory (3 6a, 7-13, 16-28, 5 i f., 6-11, 13-18, 8 i-13, 62-66 [?], 10 i-10, 13), with which 11 i-25 may be connected. Of these three groups it is likely that (b) was taken by R<sup>1</sup> from a larger description of the Temple, perhaps preserved in its archives; (c) comprises just the kind of material we should expect to find in a 'book of the acts of Solomon,' while (a) was probably derived ultimately from the royal annals of Solomon's reign. Whether (a) was found by R<sup>1</sup> in the 'book of the acts of Solomon,' or was gathered by him directly from the royal archives or through some intermediate source is difficult to decide. It is more probable that (a) was not a part of the 'acts.' (2) The exact nature of the two books 'of the chronicles of the kings' of Judah and Israel is difficult to determine. The designation 'book of the words' (i.e., deeds or affairs) of the days' is the technical term for official records (i.e., chronicles) such as would be kept by one of the court officials (I K 4 3; cf. Ezr 4 15, 19, 5 17, 6 i f.; Neh 12 23; Est 2 23, etc.). And as these works are referred to as sources of information for only such things as would naturally have a place in official records, it is natural to infer that such records are meant by this term. Modern scholars generally, but for no cogent reasons, reject this view, and think that two comprehensive historical works (perhaps based largely on the archives) were meant. In any case, much of the precise detailed information in K regarding the two kingdoms, such as the length of the different reigns, the specific events of these reigns, etc., must have been derived primarily from official records. But there is also much in K that may well have been drawn by R<sup>1</sup> from other sources. The story of Elijah, especially in I K chs. 17-19 and 21, and most of the story of Elisha in II K chs. 2-8 were derived probably from written 'prophetic' histories of these men. There are also accounts too extended and of too general a character to have been drawn immediately from official annals, the largely political in character, and not marked by that specifically religious tone that distinguishes the 'prophetic' stories. These may well have been taken from written narratives of a popular nature, dealing with important events of both kingdoms. Another special source seems to have been a biography of Isaiah, used for certain events of Hezekiah's reign. The following tabular presentation of the distribution of the sources (with the symbols by which they are frequently designated by modern scholars) used by R<sup>1</sup> may be found useful:

- A. (Annals, or official records including the 'books of the chronicles of the kings'), I K 3 i, 4 i-19, 22 i., 25-28, 9 i-23, 10 i f. The remainder of the work, not covered by these references, can be considered as editorial, belonging either to the main editor (R<sup>1</sup>), or to his later reviser (R<sup>2</sup>), or to later hands (R<sup>3</sup>). Sections that may be assigned to R<sup>2</sup> or R<sup>3</sup> are: I K 3 2, 4 30 f., 24 f., 29-34, 8 46-61, 9 6-9, 29, 10 21-25, 27, 12 17, 22 f., 13 i-22a, 15 4b, 33, 16 7, 18 31, 19 2b-11a, 20 35-42, 22 38; II K 1 9-17a, 13 4-6, 12 f., 15, 14 17, 26 f., 17 7-17, 19, 29-40, 21 7-15, 23, 25 f., 23 10-20, 26 f., 24 2 f., 8-25 30.

5. Chronological Scheme. In K there are two separate sets of chronological data. (1) The lengths of each reign in both kingdoms. (2) The synchronism of each reign with that of the contemporary king in the sister kingdom. Theoretically, these two ought to harmonize perfectly, and ought to agree also with the well-established data of contemporary Assyrian chronology. But this is not the case, nor do the two parallel lists of figures for the separate reigns of the two kingdoms for a given period, when added, give the same total. Thus for the period from the disruption to the contemporaneous accession of Jehu in Israel and usurpation of Athaliah in Judah we have these figures:

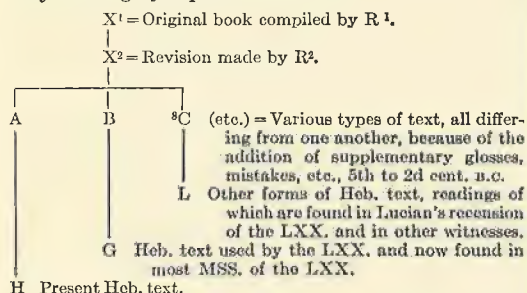

JUDAH.	ISRAEL.
Rehoboam.....17 years (16)	Jeroboam.....22 years (21)
Abijam..... 3 " (2)	Nadab..... 2 " (1)
Asa.....41 " (40)	Baasha.....24 " (23)
Jehoshaphat.....25 " (24)	Elijah..... 2 " (1)
Jehoram..... 8 " (7)	Zimri..... (7 days)
Ahaziah..... 1 " (1)	Omri.....12 years (11)
	Abab.....22 " (21)
	Ahaziah..... 2 " (1)
	Jehoram.....12 " (11)
95 years (90)	98 years (90)

Here is an apparent discrepancy of 3 years. But the length of each reign is evidently only approximate. Rehoboam's reign, e.g., was not exactly 17 years to a day, but probably 16+ or possibly even 16-, the year to which the last part of one reign and the first part of the next belonged is counted twice, and in one case of short reigns (1 year or 2 years) even a few months might be reckoned as 2 years. Consequently there is probably no real discrepancy between these two lists. But if, on the basis of these figures, one attempts to construct a synchronistic table, he will find that it will not agree with the synchronisms given in K and supposedly constructed from the same figures. In most instances, in the synchronism, 1 year is deducted from the figures given for the separate reigns, but this is not always the case. For the next period, from the accessions of Athaliah and Jehu to the fall of Samaria, the difference between the totals of the two lists is about 20 years—about 160 years for Judah and 144 years for Israel—and as the actual length of the period was only about 120 years (842-722 B.C.), it is evident that serious errors must be charged to the text as we now find it. For the next period, from 722 to 586 (the fall of Jerusalem) the (single) list of figures for the kings of Judah is approximately accurate. The necessary corrections to be made in the figures of the second period can be seen in the article on O T CHRONOLOGY.

6. Text. The Heb. text of K as now found in MSS. presents serious difficulties, and in many places the difference between it and the ancient versions, especially the LXX., is very considerable. Furthermore, MSS. of the LXX. reveal the presence of at least two different types of text as known to these translators. For details, reference must be made to the literature noted below. The textual history of K may be roughly represented thus:

7. Historical Value. In spite of the fact that K is a didactic or 'pragmatic' historical work, there is no sufficient ground for charging the compiler (R<sup>1</sup>) with wilfully distorting or suppressing the truth. He gave the facts as he found them in his sources, altho he selected only such facts as he thought useful for his general purpose. His interpretation of the facts was also dictated by an earnest and high-minded motive. That he took Dt as a standard was due to the commanding influence that book had attained in his day. The legendary character of a part of his material, e.g., some of the stories told of Elijah and Elisha, can not be laid to his charge. It was a most important task to which he addressed himself, and it is due to him alone that we of to-day possess a working outline of the history of Israel during its most important period.

KING'S DALE (in Gn 14:17 referred to as 'the vale of Shaveh, the same is the King's Vale' ['dale' AV]): The place where Abraham was met by the King of Sodom and Melchizedek on returning from his victory over Chedorlaomer. It is also mentioned as the place where Absalom erected a memorial to himself (II S 18:18). It was probably near Jerusalem. The word rendered 'vale' means 'valley land,' or a 'low lying plain,' in distinction from hilly land. See also JERUSALEM, § 8.

E. E. N.

KING'S POOL. See JERUSALEM, § 13.

KINSMAN, KINSWOMAN, KINSFOLK, etc.:

(1) In the majority of the occurrences of this term in the O T, it is the rendering of gō'el, 'redeemer,' 'avenger,' ptepl. of gā'al, 'to redeem,' 'to avenge.' It referred originally to the duty of every tribesman, or clansman, to support or avenge the cause of his tribe, clan, or family, and thus easily became the term whereby to designate one's nearest relatives. (2) In Ru 2:1, 3:2, II K 10:11 (cf. RV), and Pr 7:4 the Heb. term means literally 'acquaintance.' (3) In Job 19:14 and Ps 38:11 (cf. RV) the Heb. means 'one who is near.' (4) In Lv 18:12 f., 17 and Nu 27:11 it means 'flesh,' i.e., 'blood relation.' (5) In the N T the one term is συγγενής, i.e., 'relative' (in various degrees: Mk 6:4; Lk 1:36, 58, 2:44, 14:12, 21:16; Jn 18:26; Ac 10:24; Ro 9:3, 16:7, 11, 21 when 'fellow Jew' is perhaps meant). KIR, ker (קִּיר, qīr), 'wall': 1. A land and a people under Assyrian rule. According to Am 9:7 it was the original home of the Arameans (i.e., those of Damascus) and the country to which they were deported (Am 1:5; II K 16:9) by Tiglath-pileser. The LXX., however, omits Kir in II K 16:9, and it may have been inserted from Am 1:5. This people served in the Assyrian army (Is 22:6). No mention of the place has been found in inscriptions. The more common identification of Kir has been with the river Kur in N. Armenia. A comparison of Is 21:2 and 22:6 suggests that it was in the far East, as in 21:2 Media and Elam appear, and in 22:6 Kir and Elam. 2. 'Kir' is also used as the first part of the names of Moabite cities (see next article).

C. S. T.

KIR (of) MOAB (קִּיר-מֹאָב, qīr-mō'ābh): The name of an important city of Moab, and connected with Ar (of) Moab (Is 15:1). Some consider the two places identical. Buhl (Geog. des alten Palästina, p. 269 f.) suggests that Ar of Moab is the name of a district S. of the Arnon, of which Kir Moab, the modern Rabba (Rabbath Moab), was the chief city. Others identify it with Kir-hareseth (q.v.).

C. S. T.

KIR-HARASETH, ker'-ha-rē'seth, -HARESETH, -ha-rē'seth, -HARESH, -hā'resh, -HERES, -hī'res (קִּיר-חָרָסֶת, qīr-hārāseth [II K 3:25], קִּיר-חָרָשׁ, qīr-hāresh [Is 16:7], קִּיר-חָרָשׁ, qīr-hāresh [Is 16:11; Jer 48:31], קִּיר-חָרָשׁ, qīr-hāresh [Jer 48:36]): The Targum has Kerak in all five passages, and 'Kerak in Moab' for 'Kir Moab' in Is 15:1. It is the modern El-kerak, fortress on the wādy of the same name, E. of the Dead Sea, above the peninsula, Lisān. From II K 3:21, 24 f. it was evidently not far from the southern boundary of Moab and was a fortified city. It lies on a precipitous hill, only slightly connected on the eastern side with the highlands. Its summit was originally accessible only through two rock tunnels. The present walls are largely medieval; only the lower portions are ancient. Water was provided by means of deep wells, cisterns, and tanks. The present population of a few thousand consists of several groups, each under its own sheik or head, and among them are many Greek Christians. They are half nomadic, rough, and hostile. Buhl identifies Kir-haraseth with Kerak, but not with Kir Moab (Is 15:1), which he places farther to the north.

C. S. T.

KIRIATH, ker'-i-ath (קִּירְיָת, qiryath, Kirjath AV), 'city of': K. is the construct form of qiryāh, 'city,' and forms the first element in a number of compound city-names. 1. K. is found alone once (Jos 18 28) for K-jearim (see 5 below). 2. K.-arba, 'city of Arba,' an ancient name for Hebron (Gn 23 2; Jos 14 15, etc. See HEBRON). 3. K.-arim and K.-baal, see 5 below. 4. K.-huzzoth (K-hūtsōth), 'city of streets' (tho the LXX. favors 'city of sheepfolds'), a city of Moab (Nu 22 39). Site unknown. 5. K.-jearim, 'city of forests (or thickets).' An important town of Judah, on the W. boundaryline of Benjamin (Jos 15 9, 60, 18 14 f.). Once it is called Kiriath (Jos 18 28), also Baalah (Jos 15 9; I Ch 13 6), K.-baal (Jos 15 60, 18 14), and Baale-judah (II S 6 2). It was an ancient Canaanite city, one of the league to which Gibeon belonged (Jos 9 17), and was doubtless once a seat of Baal worship. It was here that the Ark of J' rested after the Philistines returned it to Israel, until David removed it thence to Jerusalem (I S 6 21, 7 1 f.; II S 6 2 f.; I Ch 13 5 f.; II Ch 1 4; cf. Ps 132 6). K. was the home of the prophet Urijah, who was put to death by Jehoiakim (Jer 26 20 f.). The town was reoccupied in postexilic times (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29). At some time during its history it seems to have received a contingent of Calebites from Hebron (I Ch 2 50-53). In spite of its importance and the many references to it, the site of K. is uncertain. It was near Mt. Jearim (Jos 15 10), and according to Eusebius (Onom.) 9 Rom. m. from Jerusalem on the way to Lydda (Map II, E 1 gives the usual identification with Kh. Erma; others prefer K. el-'Enab [Kiriath on the Map]; and recently H. Guthe [ZDPV, 1913, pp. 81 ff.] argues for El-Kubēbe about 3 m. N. of Kiriath). 6. K.-sannah and K.-sepher, two names for the town otherwise known as Debir (q.v.) (Jos 15 49, 15 15 f.; Jg 1 11 f.). E. E. N.

KIRIATHAIM, ker-'i-ā-thā'im (כִּרְיָתַיִם, qiryā-thayim), 'double city': 1. A city in the old Moabite territory assigned to Reuben (Nu 32 37; Jos 13 19), and afterward reoccupied by Moab (Jer 48 1, 23; Ezk 25 9). Shaveh-Kiriathaim, i.e., 'the plain of K.' (Gn 14 5), was probably the level highland around K. Map II, J 2. See also Moabite Stone, line 10, under MESHA. 2. See KARTAN.

KIRIATH-ARBA, -ār-bā. See HEBRON.

KIRIATH-ARIM, -ā-rim. See KIRIATH (5).

KIRIATH-BAL, ker-'i-āth-bā'al (כִּרְיָת־בְּעַל, qiryath bā'al), 'city of Baal.' See KIRIATH (5).

KIRIATH-HUZZOTH -hin-zəth (כִּרְיָת־חֻצוֹת, qiryath hūtsōth), 'city of streets': A city of Moab (Nu 22 39). Site unknown.

KIRIATH-JEARIM, -jī'a-rim. See KIRIATH (5).

KIRIATH-SANNAH, -san'ā. See KIRIATH (6).

KIRJATH, ker'jāth (and compounds). See KIRIATH and compounds.

KISH, kish (כִּישׁ, qish; Cis in N T, Ac 13 21 AV), probably the name of an old Semitic deity (cf. Wellhausen, Reste arab. Heidenthums, p. 67): 1. A wealthy man of the tribe of Benjamin. He was the father of Saul, the first king of Israel (I S 9 1 f., 10 11; I Ch 8 33, etc.). A variant genealogy appears to be given in I Ch 8 30, but the text here (in vs. 29-32) is confused, or some other Kish may be meant. 2. A Levite (I Ch 23 21 f., 24 29). 3. Another Levite (II Ch 29 12). 4. An ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5).

E. E. N.

KISHI, kish'ai (כִּישִׁי, qishī): A Levite (I Ch 6 44; called Kushaiah in I Ch 15 17).

KISHION, kish'i-on (כִּישְׁיֹן, qishyōn): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 20) assigned to the Levites (21 28 Map III, F 1).

KISHON, kish'an, and KISON, kis'an (כִּישׁוֹן, qishōn, always with nahal, river), 'stream of (the god) Kish': The name of a river watering the Plain of Esdraelon or Megiddo, the modern Nahr el-muqatta'. Map IV, B 7, C 8. Its N. arm rises in springs (el-Mezra'ah) W. of Tabor, its S. arm near Mt. Gilboa (Jelbōn), which meet in the plain under Megiddo (called the 'waters of Megiddo,' Jg 5 19). The river then flows between Carmel (I K 18 40) and the southern Galilean hills, across the plain of Acre, emptying into the bay of Acre N. of Haifa. Water is found in its bed during the whole year only in the last 7 m. of its course, in which it receives an abundant supply from springs in Mt. Carmel, and from two streams from the NE. emptying into it in the plain of Acre. In the rainy season, however, the streams from the hills of Galilee and Ephraim become rushing torrents, dangerous to chariots and horsemen (Jg 4 7, 13, 5 21; Ps 83 9 [10]), and overflow the whole plain, which is settled only on the higher ground about it (cf. G. A. Smith's instructive description of the campaign against Sisera in HGHL, pp. 391 ff.). There are always deep and treacherous pools along its course, and in the plain of Acre it seems to lose itself in marshes E. of Haifa. It is probably 'the brook before Jokneam' (Jos 19 11).

KISS: The kiss was the expressive token of a variety of sentiments: (1) Friendship, especially in greeting among equals (Ex 4 27). The abuse of it constituted the aggravation of the treachery of Judas (Mt 26 49). (2) Good will at parting (Gn 31 28; Ru 1 14). (3) Submission, or reverence (Job 31 27; Ps 2 12). (4) Worship, especially in idolatrous practise (I K 19 18; Hos 13 2).

KITE. See PALESTINE, § 25.

KITHLISH, kith'lish. See CHITHLISH.

KITRON, kit'ron. See KATTATH.

KITTIM, kiti'm (כִּיִּתִּים, kittim from Chittim AV): According to the table of nations (Gn 10 4), Kittim, with Elishah, Tarshish, and Dodanim, are the 'sons' of Javan, i.e., they are the Ionian Greeks. In Phœnician inscriptions Cyprus is known as Kition (kty). Originally this was the name of a town on the S. coast of the island, now known as Larnaka. This place was of such importance that the Hebrews applied the name to the inhabitants of the entire island. The exclusive application of the term Kittim to the Greek inhabitants of Cyprus (Gn 10 4) is based upon the knowledge that there was a Greek population before the Phœnician immigration, but in Is 23 1, 12 the prophet uses this name for the Phœnicians who had colonized the island. The 'isles of Kittim,' the antipodes of Kedar (Jer 2 10), form a comprehensive geographical term, in all probability including the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor, as well as the islands of the E. Mediterranean. In Dn 11 30 it is predicted that the ships of Kittim will come against one of the kings of 'the North,' i.e., Antiochus Epiphanes. In this instance the reference is to the Romans, as the LXX. clearly proves. According to I Mac 1 1, Alexander the Great came from the land of Kittim; here it is equivalent to Greece. The last two passages, together with Nu 24 24, point to the conclusion that Kittim was used as a comprehensive geographical designation, including Italy and Sicily, as well as Greece and her islands. In Ezk 27 6 Kittim is spoken of as a source of boxwood for the Tyrians. See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

J. A. K.

KNEADING-TROUGH. See FOOD, § 2.

KNEEL: This is the primary meaning of the Heb. bārakh, also signifying 'to bless,' 'to pray (for blessing).' It also renders the Gr. γυνυσκεῖν, 'to fall on the knees,' also the nouns berekh and γόνυ, 'knee,' in construction with such verbs as 'to bend,' 'bow,' etc. A man knelt to show homage or reverence to God (Is 45 23; Ro 14 11; Ph 2 10) or Baal (I K 19 18; Ro 11 4), and to worship and pray, usually with the hands stretched out, as if before an idol (I K 8 54; II Ch 6 13; Ezr 9 5; Dn 6 10; Lk 22 41; Ac 7 60, 9 40, 20 36, 21 5). By kneeling as well as by prostration (Ru 2 10; Lk 17 16), a man did homage to his king or superior (Lk 5 8); in mockery, Mk 15 19). This homage he showed often when presenting a petition (II K 1 13; Mt 17 14; Mk 1 40, 10 17).

C. S. T.

KNIFE: The earliest knives were of flint (Jos 5 2 f.; cf. RV), which are found in abundance in the lower strata of excavated sites in Pal. and which were gradually displaced by those of bronze and, later, iron. The shape of an ordinary knife was that of a dagger or dirk. In Gn 22 6, 10; Jg 19 29, and Pr 30 14, the Heb. term ma'ākheleth signifies the large knife used for slaying animals. In Jos 5 2 f., I K 18 23, and Ezk 5 1 f., the term herebh is that usually rendered 'sword.' In Pr 23 2 and Ezr 1 9 the text is perhaps corrupt, originally not reading 'knife.' See also ARMS AND ARMOR, § 2, and FOOD, § 11.

E. E. N.

KNOP. See TEMPLE, § 13.

KNOW, KNOWLEDGE: The several Heb. and Gr. terms rendered 'know' (yādhā', the most comprehensive term in Heb.; nākhār, 'to scrutinize carefully,' and then 'to know'; γινώσκειν and compounds; εἶδω, ἐπιστάμαι, and their derived nouns) are used to express many shades of meaning, too numerous to be discussed at length here. These meanings vary from the simplest kind of objective perception to the more subtle processes of moral and religious understanding. The Biblical writers had no philosophic theories of knowledge, and no abstruse metaphysical meanings should be read into their words, which are always to be taken in the sense naturally suggested by their contexts.

God's knowledge is not specifically differentiated from man's. The distinction drawn by the Biblical writers is one of degree rather than of kind. Whereas man's knowledge is limited and also seriously impaired by his moral imperfection, God's knowledge, not subject to such limitations, is all-comprehensive and perfect. The deep-seated reverence of the Semitic mind tended to check undue curiosity in prying into such secrets. The Hebrew was content to say 'such knowledge is too wonderful for me' (Ps 139 6). The skepticism which carelessly said 'What doth God know?' (Job 22 13; Ps 73 11; Is 5 19 f.; cf. 22 13 f., 29 15) was utterly revolting to the devout Hebrew. The primitive anthropomorphic mode of thought shows itself occasionally, as in the old narratives in Gn ch. 3 f., 11 1-9, etc., where God's ability to know or discover all things—e.g., human actions—is not viewed as immediate omniscience, but as dependent partly upon investigation. However, as time passed the sense of His omniscience impressed itself ever more strongly, and was expressed most significantly in passages like Job 21 22, 23 10, 28 23, chs. 38-40; Is chs. 40-48, etc. Especial emphasis was laid upon God's knowledge of the human heart, and in this fact the devout Israelite found great comfort (cf. Pss 1 6, 37 18, 44 21, 69 5, 94 11, 103 14, 139 1 f., etc.). Naturally, this conviction of the all-knowing and all-directing wisdom of God was a fundamental postulate of Hebrew prophecy.

As to man's knowledge, that on which the Bible lays especial emphasis are its religious and moral aspects. In the O T knowledge of God is the essence of religion, and while God is held to be infinite and surrounded by mystery and so, in a sense, unknowable (cf. Job 36 24 f.), this was not allowed to interfere with religion or ethics, both of which, in Hebrew thought, rested on a knowledge of God. Even the strong sense of the limitations of human knowledge did not drive the author of Ec to atheism, irreligion, or immorality. It was all-important that the Israelite should know that 'J' is God' (Ex 7 17, 16 12, 31 13; Ezk 6 7, etc.). But such knowledge, which might be purely theoretical or formal, or might be taught by the sever discipline of events, still lacked something. Not simply to know 'that J' is God,' but to 'know him' as God personally, experientially is the supreme demand of the religious teachers of the O T, especially the prophets (e.g., Hos 4 6, 6 6; Mic 6 8; Jer 31 34, etc.). That this involved necessarily a moral surrender on man's part, and was thus very different from speculative intellectualism, or from mere formalism, should need no proof to any reader of the O T. It is the 'fear' (i.e., reverence) of J' that is the 'beginning' of knowledge (Pr 1 7).

In the N T it is the knowledge of God in or through Christ that is set forth as the climax of spiritual as well as moral attainment (Mt 11 27; Jn 17 3; Ph 3 8-10, etc.). Christ Himself alone knows God the Father fully (Mt 11 27; cf. Jn 7 29, 8 55, etc.) as well as knowing all that is in man (Jn 2 24). Consequently, through Him alone man can come to the highest knowledge of God. But both in the Fourth Gospel and in Paul, this knowledge is never allowed to pass over into intellectual speculation or to become mere theory. It is always held to consist in the highest and fullest development of the moral nature. It always necessarily includes the surrender of the will to, and the bestowal of the affections upon, Jesus Christ in a personal, not theoretical, act which is to be completed in a life full of good and loving service to God and man (cf. Jn 7 17, 8 31 f., 10 14, 14 7 ff.; Ro 1 21; I Co 13 2, 8 3; I Jn 2 3, etc.). And while Paul sometimes finds it hard to choose words adequate to express his rapture as he thinks what it means to 'know' God in Christ, it is very instructive to note how he always holds himself and his readers down to the fundamental personal, ethical, experiential elements of this knowledge (e.g., in I Co ch. 13 f., cf. 8 1 ff.). E. E. N.

KOA, kō'a (קֹא, qōa'): A term mentioned only in Ezk 23 23 ('Pekod and Shoa and Koa and all the Assyrians'). Shoa and Koa are often coupled in the Assyrian inscriptions, however, where they appear as the Sutā and Kutā (or Gutī; cf. 'Goiim,' Gn 14 1), peoples dwelling E. of the Tigris on the steppes between the upper courses of the Adhem and Diyaleh rivers. L. G. L.—E. C. L.

KOHATH, kō'ath (קֹהַת, q'hāth): One of the sons of Levi (Gn 46 11; Ex 6 16-18; Nu 3 17, etc.) and the reputed ancestor of one of the great divisions of the Levites, the Kohathites. See PRIESTHOOD, § 9 d.

KOLAIAH, ko-lē'ya (קֹלַיָּהוּ, qōlāyāh), 'voice of J': 1. The father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer 29 21). 2. The head of a Benjamite family (Neh 11 7).

KORAH, kō'ra (קֹרַח, qōrah), 'baldness': 1. A son of Esau (Gn 36 5, 14, 18; I Ch 1 35). 2. One of the 'dukes' of Esau = Edom, perhaps a mere duplication of 1 (Gn 36 16). 3. A 'son' of Hebron (I Ch 2 43; cf. 12 6, Korhite AV), probably a clan of Judah. 4. A Levite and the ancestral head of one of the guilds of Temple musicians, the Korahites (Ex 6 21, 24, Korhite AV; Nu 26 58, Korathite AV; I Ch 6 22; II Ch 20 19, Korhite AV; cf. the titles of Ps. 42, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 84, 85, 87, 88), also of a body of doorkeepers and assistants (I Ch 6 37, 9 10 [here the name is spelled Kore, קֹרֵי, qōrē], 31, 26 1, Korhite AV, 19). It was this K. who rebelled against Moses in the desert (Nu 16 1-49, 26 9-11, 27 3; Jude 11, Core AV). On the significance of this story see PRIESTHOOD, § 9a. E. E. N.

KORE, kō'ri (קֹרֵי, qōrē): 1. A Korahite clan (I Ch 9 19, 26 1; on 26 19 cf. RV). 2. A Levite under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 14).

KOZ, kōz. See HAKKOZ.

L

LAADAH, lē'a-da (לֵאדָה, la'dāh): Probably a late clan of Judah, inhabiting Maresha (I Ch 4 21).

LAADAN, lē'a-dan. See LADAN.

LABAN, lē'ban (לָבָן, lābhān), 'white'; possibly so named because he was fair in comparison with his bedawin neighbors: A descendant of Nahor, and brother of Rebekah. His covetousness is well-characterized in Gn 24 30, where the sight of the presents sent by Abraham makes him obsequious in his courtesy. He is no more attractive on his next appearance, and his attempt to overreach Jacob by giving him Leah instead of Rachel (Gn 29 23) receives its reward in more than one stroke of poetic justice. The bargain which he makes with Jacob (Gn 30 31 ff.), laughing in his sleeve the while at Jacob's simplicity, leaves him unexpectedly with a dwindling flock (Gn ch. 31), while Jacob drives his sheep to a safe distance, providing beforehand for a three days' start when the time should be ripe for flight (Gn 30 30, 31 25). But the most unexpected blow of all was that Rachel should steal his teraphim (Gn 31 19). His story carries with it a satire upon the Arameans, who had to be watched lest they fleece their own kin, but whose cleverness often overshot itself. Laban and his sons left behind on the hither side of Galeed (Gn 31 48) are like a racial vestige, sloughed off as the Jacob-Israel nation developed into its larger heritage. A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

LACE: This word is the rendering of pāthāl (in Ex 28 28; etc.), which means the 'thread,' or 'string,' by which the rings of the breastplate were joined (laced) to the rings of the ephod.

LACHISH, lē'kish (לָכִישׁ, lākhīsh): A royal Canaanite city captured by Joshua (Jos 10 3, 31 f., 12 11, 15 30) and assigned to Judah. It was made a fortress for the defense of Judah (II Ch 11 9). It was to L. that Amaziah fled, but in vain, when he discovered that a conspiracy had been formed against him (II K 14 19; II Ch 25 27). Later (701 B.C.) Sennacherib besieged it (II K 18 17), and from his camp sent messengers to Hezekiah summoning him to yield to Assyrian suzerainty. It was to L., therefore, that Hezekiah sent the tribute required and made his submission (II K 18 14). Nebuchadnezzar also laid siege to the city (Jer 34 7). In the Amarna letters L. is represented as under Egyptian control. Until the excavations conducted in behalf of the PEF by Flinders Petrie (Tell el-Hesi, 1891) and F. J. Bliss (A Mound of Many Cities, 1893) the modern site was supposed to be Umm Lakis. These excavations have shown that Tell el-Hesi is the real site. (Map II, C 2. Cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 234.) Umm Lakis, 3 to 4 miles from the site, may be a New Lachish settled by the returned exiles (Neh 11 30) and so named from its proximity to the ruins of its predecessor. A. C. Z.

LADAN, le'dan (לָדָן, la'dān, Laadan AV): 1. An Ephraimite (I Ch 7 26; cf. Eleadah, ver. 20). 2. The ancestral head of a division of the Gershonite Levites (I Ch 23 7-9, 26 21). See also LIBNI.

LADANUM, lad'a-num, the Gr. rendering of Heb. לָדָן, lōt (Gn 37 25 Myrrh AV). In Gn 43 11 both EVV render 'Myrrh.' An aromatic gum. See PALESTINE, § 22.

LADDER: The translation of the Heb. šullām, which occurs only in Gn 28 12. A better rendering from the root-meaning would be 'a flight of steps.' The figure was suggested by the conformation of the mountains near Bethel, and was used to signify the communication between heaven and earth. Cf. ver. 17, 'the gate of heaven.' C. S. T.

LADY: In Is 47 5, 7 the RV gives the more correct rendering 'mistress.' In Jg 5 29 and Est 1 18 the Heb. sārāh means a 'princess,' or woman of rank. On II Jn 1 5 see JOHN, EPISTLES OF.

LAEL, lē'el (לֵאֵל, lā'ēl), [belonging] 'to God': A Gershonite Levite, father of the 'prince' of the family (Nu 3 24), to which was entrusted the care of the tabernacle and tent (Nu 3 25 f.). It is one of the many names in Nu in which 'ēl appears as a suffix. C. S. T.

LAHAD, lē'had (לַחָדָד, lahadh): The ancestral head of a Zorabite family in Judah (I Ch 4 2).

LAHAI-ROI, lā-hai'roi. See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAHMAM, lā'mām (לַחְמָם, lahmām, in some MSS. lahmās): A city of Judah (Jos 15 40). Map II, D 2.

LAHMI, lā'mai: In I Ch 20 5 we read, 'Elhanan . . . slew Lahmi brother of Goliath.' In the ||, II S 21 19, we read 'Elhanan . . . the Beth-lehemite slew Goliath.' In the Heb. 'Beth-lehem' and '[the] Lahmi' are almost identical in appearance, and might easily be confused. But it is more likely that in Ch the text of II S has been altered to avoid contradicting I S ch. 17. E. E. N.

LAISH, lē'ish (לַיִשׁ, layish, 'lion'): I. The original name of the city Dan in the extreme N. of Israel (Jg 18 7 ff.), also called Leshem (Jos 19 47). See DAN. On Is 10 30 see LAISHAH. II. A Benjamite (I S 25 44; II S 3 15).

LAISHAH, lā-ci'sha (לַיִשָּׁה, layshāh): A city of Benjamin, not far from Anathoth (Is 10 30).

LAKE OF FIRE. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 48.

LAKKUM, lak'kum (לַקּוּם, laqqūm, Lakum AV): A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 33). Site unknown.

LAMB: This term is in the Bible used in different senses: (1) In the literal sense, as the name of the young of the sheep, either male or female. As this animal was common in Palestine (see PALESTINE, § 24), there are many Heb. terms rendered 'lamb.' These are: (a) kebhes, kibhsāh, and kabhsāh (Ex 29 38; Gn 21 28; Lv 14 10). (b) kesebh, kisbāh (Gn 30 40; Lv 5 6). (c) tāleh (I S 7 9; Is 65 25), also tālā'im (Is 40 11). (d) kar, especially of a half-grown ram (Dt 32 14; Am 6 4; Ps 37 20). (e) tsō'n, 'flock' (Ex 12 21), also ben tsō'n, 'a son of the flock' (Ps 114 4, 6). (f) seh (Gn 22 7; I S 17 34). (g) 'immerin (Ezr 6 9). (h) ἀμνός (Jn 1 29). (i) ἀρνός (Lk 10 3). (j) ἀρνίον (Jn 21 15; Rev 5 6, etc.). The place of the lamb in the sacrificial system was a conspicuous and important one (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, 5 ff.). In common life, its flesh furnished a delicate article of food (Am 6 4). It was not lawful to slaughter a lamb before it was eight days old (Lv 22 27). (2) Metaphorically, the figure of the lamb appears in poetic phraseology designed to convey the idea of harmlessness as contrasted with ferocity (Is 11 6), of guilelessness as contrasted with cunning (II S 12 3 ff.; Jer 11 19; Is 53 7), and of playfulness (Ps 114 4, 6). (3) Symbolically, the 'Lamb' was a designation of Christ, with a twofold reference to the O T. In the testimony of John the Baptist (Jn 1 29, 36) to Jesus, the ἀμνός is evidently the lamb of Is 53 7, but in Rev 5 6 and passim the meaning is undoubtedly sacrificial, and Christ is viewed as the antetype of the paschal lamb. A. C. Z.

LAME, LAMENESS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6.

LAMECH, lē'mek (לֶמֶךְ, lemekh): This name occurs in both of the genealogies of the antediluvian patriarchs (Gn 4 1-24 [J]; Gn ch. 5 [P]). In the former list, known as the Cainite genealogy, Lamech appears as the son of Methushael, and is represented as introducing polygamy into human society by marrying two wives—Adah and Zillah. The former is the mother of Jabal, who is the father of tent-dwellers and herdsmen, and of Jubal, the ancestor of musicians—the latter bears Tubal-cain, the founder of metal industries. Thus the sons of L. are looked upon as the founders of civilization and the originators of the arts. The song of L. is a sword-lay, the boasting of an Arab sheik after the slaughter of his enemies (Gn 4 23-24 [J]). The ninth member of the second, or Sethite, genealogy also (Gn 5 26-29 [P]; cf. Lk 3 36) is Lamech, a man of exemplary piety and father of Noah. The latter, like the sons of L. in the first list, figures as the promoter of civilization by being the first to introduce the culture of the vine (Gn 9 20). If the two genealogies are different Heb. versions of the same prehistoric Semitic tradition, as is now usually held, then instead of two patriarchs we have one. The Babylonian counterpart of L. (2) is Otiartes, or Ardates, the ninth of the antediluvian kings, who, according to Berossus, reigned for 12 sars, or 432,000 years. As L. is the father of Noah, so Otiartes is the father of Xisuthros, the hero of the Babylonian flood story. J. A. K.

LAMENTATION. See MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

LAMENTATIONS: 1. Name. One of the poetical books of the Bible usually placed in the EVV between Jeremiah and Ezekiel and attached to Jer as Ru is to Jg. The Eng. name is derived from the Latin Lamentationes Jeremiae, which was used by the Fathers. The Vulgate title of the book, however (Threni Jeremiae), is not a translation but a transliteration of the LXX. Θρήνοι: Ἰερουσαλὴμ. In the Heb. Bible the book is called תְּהִינִי, 'ekhāh, 'how?' from its first word, in analogy with many other Biblical books (see GENESIS, § 1; EXODUS, § 1, etc.), and is placed in the third division of the Canon, the writings, and not among the Prophets, as in the Eng. Bible. In the usage of the Synagog it is reckoned as one of the Five Rolls (Megilloth, i.e., Song, Ruth, La, Eccl, and Esther).

2. Structure and Contents. As extant, La consists of five chapters, each one of which is complete in itself (in spite of Ewald's contrary view). The first four of these consist of verses which are alphabetical acrostics. But here the identity of structural plan ends. In chs. 1 and 2 each letter of the Heb. alphabet is assigned one verse, and each verse consists of three members [clauses]. In ch. 3 each letter of the alphabet is given three verses, but each verse consists of a single member. In ch. 4 each letter is given one verse, and each verse consists of two members. Moreover, in chs. 2-4 the alphabetic arrangement deviates from the present order of the Heb. letters by placing ב before ג, a transposition which has never been satisfactorily explained. Finally, ch. 5, tho consisting like the others of twenty-two verses, is not arranged as an acrostic. The literary form is that of the elegy (qināh) characterized by a special meter, the second line of which is shorter than the first—usually three accents followed by two. If this be regarded, as it is almost universally, the true form of Lamentations, each of the first four chapters is a separate elegy, and the fifth is a prayer. The general theme of the whole book is the grief of the faithful, in view of the desolation of the Holy City by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. In the first elegy the poet bewails the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Temple (1 1-11), tho he sees in the event a penalty for sin (vs. 5 and 8). Yet he laments her doom as a bitter and comfortless one (1 12-22). In the second elegy the desolation of the city and the horrors of the siege are once more brought into view (2 1-10), and their distressing features intensified by allusion to the joy of the enemies of Israel (vs. 11-17). The city itself is then represented as making her appeal to God to consider her distress (vs. 18-22). The third elegy begins with a complaint of the poet in his own person (3 1-21), but proceeds to recall the love of God as the ground of Jerusalem's hope for the future (vs. 22-35). This leads to an exhortation to penitence and confession (vs. 36-55) and a prayer for vengeance upon the enemy (vs. 55-66). The fourth elegy bewails the fate successively of the people (4 1-6), the princes (vs. 7-11), the priests and prophets (vs. 12-16), and the king (vs. 17-20), and closes with a prediction of doom on Edom (ver. 21 f.). The last of the five poems laments before J' the manifold sorrows of Zion (5 1-18), and pleads fervently for deliverance from them (vs. 19-22).

3. Authorship. A very ancient tradition ascribes the authorship of La to the prophet Jeremiah. As early as the days of the Chronicler (c. 250 B.C.) a document, called 'the lamentations' (qinōth), was supposed to contain a dirge composed by Jeremiah upon the death of Josiah (II Ch 35 25). However, the only passage in La which may be construed as referring to Josiah is 4 20, which speaks of 'the anointed of Jehovah,' and this, tho conceivably a mournful retrospect by Jeremiah of the fate of his friend Josiah (the last pious king of Judah), is almost certainly a reference to the fate of Zedekiah. Shortly after the age of the Chronicler (c. 200 B.C.) the LXX. translator of La incorporated the tradition at the opening of the book in the following words: 'And it came to pass, after that Israel was made captive and Jerusalem laid desolate, that Jeremiah sat down weeping and lamented over Jerusalem, saying . . . Thus the belief found explicit written expression, and through the later Jewish history (Jos. Ant. X, 5 1; where La is viewed as a dirge to be used at Josiah's funeral), as well as by Christian writers (Jerome, in Zec. 12 11), La was uniformly and implicitly taken to be a work of Jeremiah's. This conclusion has the further support of internal considerations, i.e., (1) the antecedent probability that the sensitive and emotional prophet who had witnessed the inevitable approach and culmination of Jerusalem's doom should give vent to meditative feeling after all was over; (2) the linguistic resemblances between his prophecies and the style of La, and (3) the fact that certain passages seem to have been written by an eye-witness. As against these considerations, generally admitted to be quite strong, it is argued (1) that it is unlikely that Jeremiah would deliberately express his grief in alphabetic dirges; (2) that the artificial form of the acrostic is inconsistent with the intensity of feeling which must have possessed the prophet at the time of the fall of Jerusalem; (3) that certain passages of La betray dependence on Ezk (cf. 2 14, 4 20 with Ezk 22 28, 19 24, etc. For a full list of parallels and echoes of Ezk see Cornill, Introd. to the O T, p. 416, and Löhr, ZATW, 1894); and (4) that Jeremiah could hardly be imagined as saying, 'the prophets find no vision' (2 8), or as describing the weak Zedekiah as 'the breath of our nostrils' (4 20), or as exclaiming, 'our fathers have sinned and we have borne their iniquities' (5 7; cf. 31 29). On the ground of these considerations, the traditional assignment of the authorship of La to Jeremiah is much shaken.

4. Unity. But the question of authorship is further involved in that of unity, and the starting-point for the denial of the unity of La is the consideration that one man would scarcely have made the same subject the topic of five different compositions. Further, there are internal characteristics evidencing differences of date. Yet on attempting to assign the different parts to different authors analysis has not gone so far as to claim five authors for the book. Some (Thenius) hold that the 2d and 4th chs. were composed by Jeremiah, while the 1st, 3d, and 5th were by three other authors. Others (Stade and Budde [formerly]) believe chs. 1, 2, 4 and 5 to be the work of one author and ch. 3 of another. Most investigators, including Nöldeke, Löhr, Cornill, Wildeboer, and Budde [later] divide the elegies into three groups (chs. 2 and 4, 1 and 5, and 3), assigning each group to a separate author. But these attempts at analysis attach too much significance to slight and doubtful data, and are far from being established upon sound critical foundations. The authorship of chs. 1, 2, 4, and 5 by Jeremiah is quite probable. Ch. 3 was written at a later time, and perhaps by another author, but no part of the collection is later than 530 B.C.

LAMP: Properly the rendering of the Heb. nēr (LXX. λύχνος). The correlated Heb. mēnōrāh is translated 'candlestick,' and is used especially for the golden lampstand of the Tabernacle (Ex 25 31-35, etc.) and of the Temple (I K 7 49, etc.); while lappīdh (LXX. λαμπάς) (which in AV of Gn 15 17; Jg 7 16; Job 41 19; Ezk 1 13 is translated 'lamp') is more properly rendered in RV by 'torch.' The Aram. nebhraštā (Dn 5 5, 'candlestick') signifies a 'lamp' or 'light,' but the exact kind is uncertain.

There is no description of a lamp in the Bible. All we know is that it had a wick of flax, pishtāh (Is 42 3, 43 17), which was saturated with the oil, shemen (Ex 25 6, 27 20). In general, the ancient lamps were the same as those in common use in the East to-day (see illustration). From ancient times the lamp has been an indispensable household article, not alone of the dwelling-house of the fellāhīn, but even of the tent of the bedawīn. It was burned both day and night, not only to light the room of the tent, which was somewhat dark even in the daytime, but mainly in order that fire, which it was difficult to obtain easily, might always be at hand. Even at the present day among the Arabs it is only the very poor that sleep in the dark. If it be said of a man, 'Poor fellow, he sleeps in the dark' ('ala l'atme), it is the same as saying: 'He hasn't a penny left to buy oil; he has got to the end' (cf. Jer 25 10; Pr 13 9, 20 20). In the figurative language of the O T the burning lamp signifies the continuance of healthy, vigorous life, the extinguished lamp the reverse (cf. Ps 13 29; Pr 13 9, 20 20, 24 20, 31 18, etc.). In the N T we have φανάρις (in Jn 18 3 lantern EV), a 'light,' but it is not clear whether lamps or some kind of torches are meant, and λαμπάς, lampstand (candlestick, in AV of Mt 5 15; Mk 4 21; Lk 8 16, 11 33, and also in RV of He 9 2; Rev 1 12, etc.), by which some sort of rest, on which the lamp was placed, is meant, like a small table, or a shelf. See K. Galling, 'Die Beleuchtungsgeräte im israelitisch-jüdischen Kulturgebiet' ZDPV, xlvii (1923), 1-50. W. N.—L. B. P.

LANCE, LANCET. See ARMS AND ARMOR. § 1.

LAND: In most instances in the O T 'land' is the rendering (1) of the Heb. 'ādhāmāh, 'ground,' 'soil,' properly used of arable land, but often used in a wider sense (cf. Dt 7 13 AV, for both usages); (2) of 'erets, which means 'land' as a portion of the earth's surface, and is properly used in such expressions as 'land of Canaan,' 'land of Israel,' etc. The great majority of occurrences of 'land' are renderings of this term. In addition, we have (3) sādheh, 'field,' 'open country,' sometimes rendered 'land' (Ru 4 3; I S 14 14, etc.). In the N T we find (4) ἀγρός, corresponding to (3) above, and (4) γῆ, corresponding to (2) above. Furthermore, we have (6) ξηρός, 'dry land' (Mt 23 15), (7) χώρα, 'region,' 'place,' 'country' (cf. RV in Mk 1 5; Lk 15 14; Ac 10 39), and (8) the diminutive χωρίον, 'small place,' 'plot of ground' (Ac 4 34, 5 3, 8). The land of promise (He 11 9) is the land of Canaan promised to Israel's ancestors (Ex 12 25; Dt 6 3, etc.). The expression 'born in the land' (Lv 24 16; Nu 15 30 AV) is but one word in Heb. and is better rendered 'home-born' as in RV. See also COUNTRY and GROUND. E. E. N.

LAND CROCODILE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

LANDMARK: The rendering of the Heb. g'bhāl (nearly always rendered 'border,' q.v.) in Dt 19 14, 27 17; Pr 22 28, 23 10; Hos 5 10 'bound' AV; and of g'bhālāh in Job 24 2. The boundaries of the ancestral estates in ancient Israel, as in other nations, were considered sacred and inviolable (cf. the festivals in honor of the god Terminus in ancient Rome).

LAODICEA, lē-əd'ī-sī'ā (Λαοδικεία): A now deserted site in the Lycus valley of ancient Phrygia. Its earlier names were Diospolis and Rhoas. Antiochus II, Theos, rebuilt it and named it after Laodice, his wife. It owed its wealth and importance chiefly to its situation at the forks of the great trade-route from the East to Ephesus and Pergamum. It belonged to the Seleucids till 190 B.C., when it was given by the Romans to Eumenes, King of Pergamum. Two generations later (133) it passed finally to Rome. Successive captures aided by frequent earthquakes caused its final abandonment. It was never a really great city, tho it was populous, magnificent, a money center. When damaged by an earthquake (60 A.D.) it refused assistance from the imperial treasury (cf. Rev 3 17, 'I am rich and have gotten riches and have need of nothing'). Its banking operations embraced the whole empire (cf. ver. 18, 'I counsel thee to buy [through martyrdom, not as a gift] of me [not the filthy gold of thy banks, but] gold refined by fire, that thou mayest become rich [with true riches].' L. was also a great manufacturing center, having its trade chiefly in clothing. Its territory produced a breed of sheep (now extinct) with soft, glossy, black wool, needing no dyeing. This was manufactured into cloth, rugs, but chiefly into seamless black garments; also cloaks, the famous shirts, woven of thread of three thicknesses, called trimita, costly shirts with purple borders (paragadia), woolen rain-coats (phainoula), embroidered outer garments (chlamydes, chlanides) (cf. Rev 3 18), 'I counsel thee to buy of me [not the black garments of thy looms, but] white garments that thou mayest clothe thyself.' L. produced many wealthy citizens (one of them, Hiero, gave the city over $1,000,000), and the remarkable family of the rhetor Zeno, whose son Polemon became king of Lycaonia (39 B.C.), king of Pontus (38 B.C.), and progenitor of a long line of kings and princes. It was the seat of the famous medical school at the shrine of Men Karou, whose physicians compounded the famous 'Phrygian Powder' in cylindrical tablets, for the cure of ophthalmia (cf. Rev 3 18, 'buy of me [not the tablets used by the physicians in your medical school, but true] eye-salve.' Many Jews (7,500 adult freemen) were settled there by Antiochus the Great. It became Christian at an early period, but Rev 3 14 ff. shows that the first enthusiasm had cooled as a result of wealth. The Epistle 'from the Laodiceans' (Col 4 16) was perhaps evidently Paul's encyclical letter which we have in the N T under the title 'Epistle to the Ephesians' (q.v.). The 'Epistle to the Laodiceans,' current in the Middle Ages, consists of excerpts from Paul's canonical Epistles, mainly Phil., and was doubtless compiled to satisfy the interest aroused by the foregoing reference in Col. Paul did not personally labor among the Laodiceans (Col 2 1). Epaphras, chiefly (Col 1 7, 4 12 f.), and Timothy (Col 1 7) were probably the actual founders of the Christian Church there. It is possible that it also came within the personal work of Philip and of John.

LAODICEANS. See LAODICEA.

LAP. This word is used in RV three times, in each case for a different Heb. term. In II K 4 39, 'his beghedh full') beghedh, 'garment,' here rendered 'lap,' is used for the hēq (rendered 'lap' in Pr 16 33 on which see DRESS AND ORNAMENT, § 3. In Neh 5 13, the Heb. hōtsen, 'bosom,' probably also refers to the hēq.

LAPPIDOTH, lap'i-dōth (לִּפְדוֹת, lappīdhōth) 'torches' (or 'lightning-flashes?'): The husband of Deborah (Jg 4 4).

LAPWING. See PALESTINE, § 25.

LASEA, la-sī'a (Λασέα): A very small island E. of Cape Lithinos, about the center of the S. coast of Crete, called Traphos, on which the town of Las(s)aea is located. Luke's mention of it in connection with Fair Havens (Ac 27 8) is the only known reference to it in antiquity. J. R. S. S.*—E. E. N.

LASHA, lē'shā (לָשָׁה, lāsha'): A border town of Canaan (Gn 10 19), site unknown, but commonly located in SE. Palestine. Jerome (Quest. in Gen. 10 19) identifies it with the hot springs of Callirrhoë, mentioned by Pliny and Josephus, situated in the Wādy Zerka Ma'in, in Moab. Dillmann, Com. on Gen., ad loc., thinks this too far N. Wellhausen considers it the same as Laish on the NE. border, but this is improbable. C. S. T.

LASSHARON, las-shē'ren (לָשָׁרֹן, lashshārōn; La-sharon AV): A place mentioned only in Jos 12 18 as a royal city of Canaan. From the readings of the LXX. we should perhaps take the first letter as the preposition ל and read, 'the king of Aphek that belongs to Sharon,' i. e., a district rather than a town. See SHARON 1. C. S. T.

LAST DAYS, LATTER DAYS. See ESCHA-TOLOGY, § 3.

LATCHET. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 7.

LATIN ('Ρωμαϊστὶ, 'Ρωμαϊκός, 'Roman'): The official language of the Roman Government. Altho neither as widely known nor as far on the way toward recognition as an international language as Greek, it could not have been dispensed with in a legal declaration such as the inscription on the Cross was designed to be (Jn 19 20; Lk 23 38). A. C. Z.

LATTER RAIN. See PALESTINE, § 19.

LATTICE: The rendering of four Heb. words: (1) 'eshnābh (Jg 5 28); (2) hārakkīm (Song 2 9), (3) hālōn (I K 6 4; Pr 7 6), all meaning 'lattice windows.' See HOUSE, § 6 (j). (4) s'bhākhāh (II K 1 2), strictly the trellis battlement of the roof. See HOUSE, § 6 (d).

LAVER. See TEMPLE, § 15; and TABERNACLE, § 3 (1).

LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE. 1. Origin of Israelitic Law. The people of Israel, during the course of their national history came successively under the influence of different environments, each of which had a decisive effect on Israel's life and contributed its share to the formation of Israelitic law. Of these we specify as most important the following four: (1) The first determining influence came from the primitive type of life, which was the nomadic. In this early period there was no such thing in Israel as 'law,' as we now use the term. The fundamental basis of the tribe was the family (q.v.), in which the will of the father was supreme. In the exercise of his authority the father of a primitive Semitic family was doubtless guided by custom. Custom, as interpreted or sanctioned by the father's authority, was law. And as a Semitic family was not only a social but a religious unit, all family customs carried with them the authority of religion, and thus to the early Semite religion and law were almost one and inseparable. In the process of centuries many of these family customs became so strongly intrenched and of such binding authority that no father of a family would even think of abrogating them. In the case of Israel we find them regnant, or at least influential, down to the latest periods, and it is therefore in these ancient family customs that we are to seek for the origin of much of Israel's law. The tribe was but the union of large clans, or families, and tribal custom was but the extension to a larger sphere of the principles already embodied in family custom. In the tribe, the heads of families, or clans, formed the authoritative body, but the authority of these over the tribe was not nearly so strong as that of the father over his family. Tribal custom, however, being the wider application of family custom, was of the highest authority. (2) Through Moses who made J'' the bond of union among the tribes of Israel, the influence of religion on the whole of Israel's life took on a new significance. Among all the early Semites, family and tribal customs were under the protection of the family or tribal deity. When the customs were violated or disregarded it was the same as disobeying the Divine will, and a punishment, or some other manifestation of Divine displeasure, was liable to take place. Under Moses the same Divine sanction of Israel's inherited customs was inculcated—and something more. For J'', as Moses taught, was a God to whom righteousness, in the highest sense then possible to be conceived of, was a matter of supreme interest. Moses is said to have taught Israel, in cases of dispute between man and man, the 'statutes of God and his laws' (Ex 18 16), and in such sentences of justice and in all his work with Israel Moses had the opportunity to inculcate higher conceptions of religion and right than were possessed by other Semitic peoples. In these higher conceptions we may find the reason for the spirit, if not the exact form, of many of the specific enactments of later Israelitic law. It is evident that in the foregoing citation the word statutes is used in the sense of formulated law, the sense in which it is commonly used by the later Deuteronomic and Priestly schools. Its use by the older E. writer simply shows how, as early as 8th cent., Moses was looked back to as the formulator of statutes and judgments (Ex 21 1). (3) A third determining influence came from Canaanite law and custom. When Israel conquered Canaan, the majority of the Canaanites were not exterminated, but only gradually subdued. Israel gained her foothold first in the highlands and in the least thickly settled parts of the country. The Canaanite cities in the more open lowland-places were the last to yield. The presence of this large Canaanite element, which had been so long in possession, and which by intermarriage and other ways was gradually absorbed into Israel, was of highest significance for Israel's customs and religion. The Canaanites were well advanced in civilization. Theirs were the cities and the farms that Israel appropriated. It was their tongue that Israel came to speak. They were Israel's teachers in agriculture and other arts of civilized life. Their influence on Israel's religion was very great. It would therefore be passing strange if, in the codified law of Israel, as we find it in the Pentateuch, there were not many enactments that, in whole or in part, reflect ancient Canaanite practice. (4) A fourth determining influence was that of the Babylonian civilization. A knowledge of Babylonian culture had been prevalent in Canaan a thousand years before the conquest by Israel. Where Babylonian civilization, commerce, and literature were known it is probable that Babylonian law was also known. This is perhaps the chief reason for the many remarkable similarities that exist between the Code of Hammurabi of c. 2000 B.C. and the Code in Exodus, ch. 21 ff. (committed to writing not earlier than the 9th cent. B.C.), altho it is not necessary to suppose that the Babylonian code is directly quoted in the Pentateuch. During the latter half of the kingdom period (735-536 B.C.) the contact between Israel and the civilization of the Euphrates Valley was very close, and during the Exile and after the Jews were face to face with this ancient and complex civilization. If Israel made use, in her own way, of the Creation and Flood stories of the East, there is no reason why she should not have done the same with its law, and that even in the Priestly law there may be much that is the result of such appropriation.

2. Formal Sources of Israel's Law. From these various fields of influence and environment those who built up Israel's system of law drew in formulating their decisions, and it was such decisions that formed the sources which the codifiers used who have given us the codes of the Pentateuch. Those who thus formulated law in Israel were: (1) The Elders, a general term inclusive of fathers of leading families heads (sheiks) of tribes, and, after the settlement in Canaan, the chief men of a town ('elders of the city,' Ru 4 2 ff.; cf. Dt 19 12, 21 3 ff., 22 15 ff.; I K 21 8, etc.). These elders, or 'judges' (Dt 16 18), pronounced judgment in cases of dispute between man and man. It was for them to decide the guilt or innocence of the accused, and fix the penalty. In earliest times criminal cases (theft, oppression, etc.) were probably most numerous. But with the more complex life of the kingdom-period many other cases acquired their attention. (2) The Priests. Of equal importance with the elders were the priests, and, as time went on, the priest gradually encroached upon the sphere of the elders, until finally (but not until after the Exile) almost the entire judicial system was in the possession of the priests. This progress is clearly reflected in the codes. The oldest civil code (Ex chs. 21-23) makes no mention of priests as judges, except possibly in the reference to the judgment of God (Ex 22 8). In the code of Dt the secular judges (elders) are fully recognized, but the attempt is being made to give the priests a larger share (cf. Dt 17 8 ff., 19 15 ff.). In the Priestly Code (and in the echoes of its legislation in Chronicles) the Levites, or priests, alone are recognized as judges. In most ancient times the priest's duty was primarily to care for the (a) sanctuary, and to give forth the Divine oracle. The old custom of 'casting the lot' was probably one of the earliest modes of determining the Divine oracle, and from this perhaps arose the term tōrāh (usually rendered 'law'), from yārāh, 'to cast,' tho many modern scholars derive the meaning 'teaching' 'direction,' etc., directly from the Hiph'il (hōrāh) of the vb. yārāh (III). The priest had to do mainly with matters having a religious significance, and the sanctuary became a place of religious instruction. When the sanctuaries became great centers, as they did in the kingdom-period, the priesthood became more influential, and it was natural for them to claim (as is done in Dt) a large share in deciding civil as well as religious cases. (3) The King and the royal courts. The king in Israel, especially after David, was a supreme court of appeal. The king was supposed to decide 'justly,' i.e., in accordance with what was recognized as custom and right in Israel, as well as in accordance with his natural sense of justice. The king was thus not supposed to be a mere autocrat bound by no will but his own, and could not lightly override ancient law. A decision of a king covering a new case, or modifying the application of traditional practise, became itself a legal precedent or law (cf. I S 30 21-25; II S 14 11; II K 14 5, where the editor of II K has reversed the facts). Able kings, like David, Solomon, Omri, and Jehoshaphat, doubtless did much to arrange a system of courts, religious and civil, all working harmoniously, but of their work only the faintest traces remain in the unreliable statements of the late Chronicler. (4) The Prophets. The prophets gave forth their utterances as of Divine authority; they spoke a Divine 'word' which they called tōrah, 'law', better, 'direction' or 'teaching' (Is 8 10). The prophets dealt with principles, however, and only rarely interfered with special cases, and then only by way of rebuke. But the prophetic teachings, being an exposition of the fundamental principles of Israel's religion and of conduct, exercised a great influence on Israel's later lawmakers, as is evident especially in the Code of Dt. (5) The learned class of Scribes. From the Exile on, much was done by learned scribes, mostly in the way of expanding and extending the application of legal principles already recognized. The early stages of this activity are no longer known. Of only one such man do we have any definite knowledge, Ezra, the 'ready scribe,' through whose efforts the Priestly law was first codified. But Ezra was only one of many. After the formal adoption of Ezra's law-book (Neh chs. 8-10) and the subsequent canonization of the Law (in the Pentateuch), the application of this Law to all manner of circumstances was made the object of serious study, and comprised the greatest portion of the work carried on in the scribal schools. The opinions of the most learned and honored scribes or Rabbis (doctors of the Law; cf. Lk 5 17; Ac 5 34; lawyers; cf. Mt 22 35, etc.), were held to be of nearly as great authority as the written Law itself. In process of time there came about an organization of the legal bodies, at the head of which, as the final court of appeal, was the Sanhedrin (q.v.). In the rabbinical schools the decisions of the learned Rabbis were not at first committed to writing, but passed on orally through many generations, gradually becoming more numerous and complex as time went on. Finally, circa 200 A.D., the first codification of scribal law was made, the Mishna. This in its turn was commented on orally, until at last, circa 600 A.D., these comments on, and discussions of, the Mishna, which constitute the Gemara, were reduced to writing, resulting in the Talmud (=Mishna + Gemara). Thus, in the course of centuries, through the decisions of its elders in the petty local courts, of its priests at the various sanctuaries, notably the larger ones, of the king and the royal courts, in the teaching of the prophets, and through the painstaking toil of its scribes, Israel came to have in her possession a large body of formulated law, a portion of which we have codified in the Pentateuch, which represents but the survival of a selected part of the ancient Law, another portion of which is contained in the voluminous material of the Talmud.

3. The Codification of Israel's Law. We shall now proceed to note briefly the stages through which Israel's law passed, until it reached the form in which we now find it in the Pentateuch. (1) Preliminaries to Codification. Nothing can be said of codification in the period before Israel became acquainted with the art of writing. However the traditional laws and customs were remembered in most ancient times, a code, even the shortest, implies a knowledge of writing. It is a priori probable, then, that even the earliest of Israel's codes dates from the time when Israel had become acquainted with the civilization of Canaan, and after it had relinquished its nomadic type of life. It is also only when people are living in settled communities with something like a fixed judicial system that the need of codes will arise, and an authority will be at hand to promulgate them. If Moses did anything in the way of giving Israel a code, it must have been a brief and simple one, and it must have been given at Kadesh, where for many years Moses acted as the supreme judge of Israel, rather than at Sinai, where Israel stayed but a few months. In any case, what Israel received from Moses were principles rather than detailed statements, and the earliest code we have in the O T was probably formulated in Canaan, at least a century or two later than Moses, by those who felt that they were but putting into definite form the principles of justice taught by Moses. (2) The oldest codes. The oldest codification of Israelitic law we find in Ex chs. 20-23 and 34 10-26.

This consists of: (a) Two sets of the fundamental principles of Israel's covenant with J<sup>e</sup>. One of these is the Decalog (originally two pentads of five short commands each). The other covers the more external and ceremonial features of the Covenant, and is found in two recensions, one of which was given in J (34 10-26), the other in E (20 22-26, 22 27, 23 10-32). Both of these recensions show many marks of elaboration, especially in the way of naming against the seductions of Canaanite practises, and were made to serve a historical rather than a legal purpose in the documents in which they stand. The original form back of both recensions was possibly a decalog (double pentad) prescribing: 1. J<sup>e</sup> alone to be worshiped. 2. No molten gods. 3. Feast of unleavened bread. 4. Gift of first-born and firstlings. 5. The Sabbath. 6. Feast of Weeks and In gathering. 7. No leavened bread with a sacrifice. 8. Passover. 9. First-fruits. 10. A kid not to be seethed in its mother's milk. Both of these sets of fundamentals may well go back to Moses.

(b) A civil code (Ex 21 1-23 9), called 'the judgments.' It has been analyzed as follows (Carpenter-Harford, Comp. of the Hex., p. 472 f.):

1. Concerning Hebrew slaves (21 2-11, two pentads).
2. Violence punishable by death (21 12-17).
3. Injuries (21 18-27).
4. Cattle (21 28-30).
5. Property, theft and damage (22 1-6).
6. Property, breach of trust (22 7-17, two pentads).
7. Various ordinances (22 18-27).

8. Reverence (22<sup>28</sup>).9. Administration of justice (23<sup>1-9</sup>).

The fact that two of the sections can be subdivided into two pentads each makes it possible that the code was originally longer, and that each section once formed a complete decalog, but this is only hypothesis.

So far as we know, this was the only attempt at codification between the conquest and the labors of the author(s) of the Deuteronomic code. To what extent this code (of Ex) was well-known throughout all Israel is uncertain. It is also uncertain whether all the sanctuaries or courts had the same body of law. This code probably represents what was taught at the most important centers (Jerusalem, Bethel, Samaria, etc.). As it was based on custom, it is likely that its general principles were pretty well known. It is just such a code as this that is presupposed by the early prophets (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah) as known and violated by the leading men of their day. (3) The Code of Deuteronomy. The Exodus code must have been formulated very early, for between it and the much more elaborate Code of Dt the difference is so great that it can be accounted for only by a long period of development. The Code of Dt was compiled about 650, and probably contains the Law as it had been expanded and developed, more particularly in Judah, and especially in the capital. In this code, however, we have a new factor to reckon with. Its author, or authors, were reformers, and at many points altered existing law to make it conform more nearly to their ruling ideas. This is particularly true of the sections dealing with religious practise, where the aim was to purify the worship by centralizing it at Jerusalem while conserving the standing of the Levitical priesthood. For an analysis of the Code of Dt and other particulars see DEUTERONOMY, § 2. (4) The Holiness Code. To a certain extent parallel to the Code of Dt is the so called Holiness Code found mainly in Lv chs. 17-26 (with fragments in earlier chapters of Lv; see LEVITICUS, § 3, and also HEXATEUCH, § 23). This code covers, in part, the same ground as the Code of Dt, but differs from it in that it is mainly concerned with 'holiness,' a conception which is made to include both moral and ceremonial purity. The moral tone of this code is high, in spite of its strong leaning toward ceremonialism. As the code stands in Lv it is probably the result of a number of revisions. Its first draft was probably drawn up before the Exile, but its final revision took place after Ezekiel's prophecies were published. (5) The Contribution of Ezekiel. Toward the end of his prophetic ministry (572 B.C.) Ezekiel formulated his conception of the restored Israel (Ezk chs. 40-48). The central, dominating element here is that of holiness. Israel is (to be) a holy community, in whose midst 'J' dwells in His sanctuary. The Temple as J's dwelling-place, the Priesthood as His ministers, the sacrifices and offerings as the means of communion with Him—these things held the first place with Ezekiel, while 'the prince,' the laity, and secular affairs in general were relegated to an altogether secondary place. There can be no doubt that the views of Ezekiel proved a powerful influence with all the subsequent workers on Israel's Law. The tendency was to emphasize and develop the ceremonial elements.

The conception of Israel as a nation was displaced by the conception of Israel as a church. It was along these lines that the workers labored who revised the Holiness Code and who sought to develop and perfect other elements of their traditional Priestly law, much of which had not been as yet codified. (6) The Priestly Code. The climax of these labors was reached when, in the middle of the next century (5th cent. B.C.), Ezra had in his hand a completed Priestly Law-book, which he wished to take to Jerusalem and there have it adopted as the law of the community. This law-book was both a history (of Israel as the Covenant People) and a code. For its analysis see HEXATEUCH, § 27. It was a complex in which numerous earlier codes, as the manual for worshipers (Lv chs. 1-7), the Holiness Code, etc., were embodied. Later enactments, or formulations, were placed side by side with the earlier ones, in spite of the inconsistency and even contradictions thus introduced at many points. With the adoption of this law-book in 457 B.C. (if Neh chs. 8-10 is to be placed immediately after Ezr ch. 10). (Dt had been adopted in 621) the process of codification did not immediately cease. Many minor additions and adjustments were probably made after Ezra's time. Finally the Law, as we have it in the Pentateuch, came to be considered holy and of final authority, altho the actual practise in Judaism has never been identical at every point with the letter of the Law.

4. Procedure at Law. A case at law (cause, or controversy) might be criminal, civil, or religious, but the Law does not make these distinctions. The whole law was supposed to rest on a religious basis, and offenses against morality, or against religious ceremony, were equally against religion. The same courts had jurisdiction (in the O T period) over all cases. (1) Constitution of the Courts. In the O T the term 'court' does not appear. Judge, judges, elders etc., are the concrete terms that take its place. The earliest courts in Israel of which we have any record are those mentioned in the early historical narratives and in the old code of Ex chs. 21-23. The 'elders,' or 'judges,' here spoken of were, doubtless, the heads of the prominent families in their respective localities, and other men distinguished for wisdom or judgment. Except as we may infer from the immemorial custom of viewing the father of a family as a judge, we have no light on the question how these persons were appointed or recognized as judges. From Ex 18 21 (cf. Dt 16 18) it may be inferred that some mode of selection was in vogue. In the towns of Canaan there was also, doubtless, a judicial system of some sort. Here the basal social form was the city, not the family, or clan, as in Israel. So we read of 'the elders of the city' as the judges (Jg 8 16, 11 5; Ru 4 2, etc.; cf. Dt 19 21, 21 3, 22 15, etc.), an expression that may have been adopted in Israel from Canaanite usage. How these primitive courts were organized we do not know. Later, the king became a supreme court of appeal. Some correlation was perhaps established between the local courts and the royal courts in the capitals (Jerusalem, Samaria), but we have no record of anything of the kind, except in the late notices in Chronicles, where David is said to have appointed

6,000 Levites as 'officers and judges' (I Ch 23 4), and Jehoshaphat (a century later) is said to have set judges in all the fortified cities of Judah, with a supreme court of Levites, priests, and elders in Jerusalem (II Ch 19 5-8). To the last reference some degree of historical truth may be allowed, but the first is plainly unhistorical. In Dt, while the old secular judgeship is recognized as legitimate, an effort is made to give the Levites (=priests) a larger and more important place in this work (cf. Dt 17 8 ff., where the priests, as knowing J's law, give the decision in difficult cases; 19 17, 21 5). Dt probably reflects the historical development in this matter, for as time went on the position of the priesthood at the greater sanctuaries became even more important. During the Exile it was natural that the priestly students and expounders (e.g., Ezekiel) of Israel's Law should favor the theory that the Levites and priests were alone capable of acting as judges, and it is to these classes alone that the judges belong, according to the Priestly Code and the literature that echoes the teaching of this code. But as the restored community (536 B.C.) was organized not on the basis of PC, but on that of the earlier codes of JE and Dt, this theory did not hold in actual practise (hence the references to elders in Ezr 5 5, 9, 6 7, 14, 10 8, 14). During the Persian period, the Persian governor was, of course, the final court of appeal, tho probably in all religious questions he gave full authority to the high priest and his council of priests. The power of the priesthood with the high priest at its head increased greatly in the later Persian period, and at the beginning of the Greek period the priesthood was supreme. In the council that assisted the high priest, which was composed of priests, we may have the origin of the Sanhedrin (q.v.). Toward the end of the Maccabean and in the Roman periods the Pharisees became influential, and a certain proportion of the members of the Sanhedrin was of this party, tho the priests (the Sadducees), with the high priest at their head, appear to have predominated. The Sanhedrin did not displace the local courts, and it was not a simple court of appeal. It decided questions that the lesser courts could not decide. It decided also many matters independent of the lower courts. Its decisions were binding throughout Jewish Palestine, but death-sentences needed the sanction of the Roman governor. It is doubtless with special reference to the procedure of Roman law that the terms examine, examination, are used in the N T (Lk 23 14; Ac 4 9, 12 19, 24 8, 28 18). (2) Modes of Procedure. The procedure was simple as compared with Occidental usage. The courts were held in the open, generally in the broad place near the city gate. Only at the royal court (Solomon's hall of judgment) and in the later Greek and Roman period were houses of judgment used. The proceedings in early times were public. The civil or religious authority did not prosecute officially, but heard and decided accusations or cases brought before it. Each side, accused and accuser, stated or pleaded its case. The accuser stood at the right hand of the accused, who, at least in postexilic times, was clothed in mourning garb (cf. Zec 3 1 ff.; Jos. Ant. XIV, 9 4). Witnesses, at least two, preferably three, were summoned (Dt 19 15; Nu 35 30). They testified on oath, and the heaviest penalties were laid upon false witnessing (Dt 19 15-21; Lv 9 11) if, on special investigation (inquisition, Dt 19 18), this was discovered—an indication that such corruption of justice was common (cf. I K 21 10). Bribery of judges is also severely condemned in both the Law and the Prophets, and was, doubtless, a source of much abuse. In cases of death-penalty, the witnesses were the first to lay hands on the condemned to put him to death (Dt 17 7; cf. also Ac 7 58). In certain cases where witnesses were not available circumstantial evidence (Dt 22 15 ff.), or the discernment of the judges, had to be relied upon. In desperate cases recourse was had to the judgment of God (Ex 22 8 f.; cf. Nu 5 11-31; Dt 21 1-9; cf. also I Co 5 2-5). For other details see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

LITERATURE: Commentaries on the Pentateuch, e.g., Driver on Ex (Camb. B.) and Dt (ICC); G. A. Smith on Dt (Camb. B.); McNeill on Ex (Westminster Series). In Carpenter-Harford Comp. of the Hezateuch, valuable discussion and conspectus of the codes will be found. Cf. also the works on Archæologie by Benzinger (2nd ed., 1907) and Nowack. The articles on Law and Justice and on Law and Law Literature in EB are illuminating.

LAWYER. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, §2 (5).

LAYING ON OF HANDS: The act of laying on of hands expressed different ideas, as follows: (1) Most commonly it indicated the self-identification of the person that performed the act with the one on whom hands were laid. In the offering up of sacrifices, the offerer indicated his willingness to be considered one with the victim by placing his hand on its head (Ex 29 10 ff.; Lev 1 4 f., 3 2, 8, 4 4 ff.). (2) The impartation of an inner or spiritual gift. Thus the father's blessing (Gn 48 14), the good-will of Jesus Christ for children (Mk 10 13, 16), health to the sick (Mk 5 23), and the bestowal of the Holy Spirit by the Apostles (Ac 19 6). (3) Consecration to the service of God. Joshua, when he succeeded Moses (Nu 27 18, 23; Dt 34 9), the deacons, when they were set apart to their service (Ac 6 6), likewise the Levites (Nu 8 10), the missionaries (Ac 13 3), and ministers in the Apostolic Church (I Ti 4 14, 5 22; II Ti 1 6) were ordained by the laying on of hands. (4) Another symbolical use of the act is more difficult to explain, viz., that in which the witnesses against one accused of crime punishable by death laid their hands on him (Lev 24 14). This may be a reflex of the sacrificial laying on of hands as in (1), with the idea involved of devotion to death. On (2) and (3) see also CHURCH LIFE, § 8; cf. also ORDAIN.

LAZARUS, laz'a-rus (Λάζαρος, from Heb. Eleazar, 'God has helped'): 1. L. of Bethany. A friend of Jesus, and brother of Mary and Martha (Jo 11 1 f.). He is not mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels, but his resurrection from the dead forms the climax of the miracles of Jesus recorded by John (11 1-44). He is described as subsequently making a feast for Jesus in Bethany, at which Mary anointed the Lord's feet (12 1-8). He is supposed, on account of the silence of Luke and the order in which the three are named in John (11 5), to have been the youngest of the family, the circle of whose acquaintance it is inferred was large (11 19), and their circumstances comfortable (12 3). His name seems to be preserved in the designation of El-Azar'iyeh, a village on the SE. of the Mount of Olives, about 1¾ m. from Jerusalem, which is generally identified with the ancient Bethany.

His resurrection constituted the occasion for many Jews believing in Jesus, and also was the determining cause of the Sanhedrin's plot to put Jesus (and incidentally Lazarus) to death (11 45-53, 12 10). Much critical interest centers about this miracle, its problem being inseparably connected with the larger one of the authorship and historicity of the Fourth Gospel. Those who believe this Gospel to be purely an allegorical fiction take the story of Lazarus to be a free composition out of elements drawn from the Synoptic Gospels. His name is obtained from the beggar of the parable (Lk 16 19-31), and the whole is an attempt to present a demonstration of the truth of Abraham's words in Lk 16 31, or a personification of Paul's in Ro 7 24, 8 20 f. The personalities of the sisters, the practical Martha and the contemplative Mary, are borrowed from Lk 10 38-42, and the details of the miracle are an enhancement of those of the raising of the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5 22 ff. and [s]), and of the son of the widow of Nain (Lk 7 11 ff.). The supper is explained as a combination of the Bethany meal (Mt 26 6 ff.; Mk 14 3 ff.), and the story of the anointing by the sinful woman in the house of Simon the Leper (Lk 7 36 ff.). The consensus of critical opinion to-day, however, is that there are many trustworthy data underlying the accounts of the Fourth Gospel (cf. JOHN, GOSPEL OF, § 2), and that it is not to be considered, therefore, simply a religious and dogmatic allegory. In that case, the story of Lazarus contains trustworthy elements, even tho it may be difficult to determine just how much is fact and how much is due to modification and interpretation of the fact in the mind of the Evangelist. Obviously it is very difficult to explain the absolute silence of the Synoptic Gospels regarding Lazarus, containing references as they do to the two sisters and an anointing at Bethany, even tho we freely admit the partial character of the sources of these Gospels. It would seem that such an event with such consequences as are described in the Fourth Gospel could hardly escape notice. Yet, on the other hand, it is perhaps more difficult, once the hypothesis of pure allegory is abandoned psychologically to explain the story's composition as an ideal construction by the Evangelist to illustrate his view of Christ as 'the resurrection and the life.' It is too stupendous for any personal follower of Jesus, at least, simply to have invented. Some historical foundation is required, and the underlying facts, whatever they are, most probably therefore belong to that body of trustworthy information regarding a ministry of Jesus in Judea which appears to have been known to the author of the Fourth Gospel alone. 2. L. of the Parable (Lk 16 19-31). A beggar pictured by Christ in contrast to an unnamed rich man to illustrate the truth of the words recorded in Lk 16 13, 15. Tho designated by name, he is probably a hypothetical personage.

LEAH, לֵאָה (לֵאָה, l'ah), 'gazel,' or 'wild cow': The daughter of Laban, and Jacob's first wife through the father's ruse (Gn 29 23). L. was the mother of six sons and one daughter (Gn 29 32 ff.). She was buried in Machpelah (Gn 49 31). In Ru 4 11 she is styled one of the builders of Israel. Under the name of Leah, traditions of large Aramean accretions to the original Hebrew stock have probably localized themselves (see TRIBES, § 2).

LEANNOTH, לֵאֲנוֹת, h-an'noth: A musical term from 'anah, 'to sing' (Ps 88, title) in the phrase 'Mahalath-Leannoth,' which would appear to be equivalent to 'Mahalath, to be sung.' But the meaning of 'Mahalath' is unknown. See PSALMS, BOOK OF, § 3.

LEASING: An old English word meaning 'falsehood' (Ps 4 2, 5 6 AV).

LEAVEN: The term which renders two Heb. words (s'or, 'ferment,' and hamets, 'to be sour') and one Gr. word (ζύμη), all of which are used to signify a lump of sour dough. The daily bread of the Hebrews was kneaded in a trough, and the yeast was added in the form of a small piece of dough. Bread prepared in a great hurry or in an emergency was unleavened (Gn 18 6; Ex 12 34). Leaven was absolutely prohibited in connection with the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread (see FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7), as well as in meal-offerings (Ex 12 15; Lv 2 11, 6 17). At the Exodus unleavened bread was used on account of a pressing emergency (Ex 12 34-39), and the prohibition of leaven ever afterward was due to the sacred associations clinging about the first Passover. The Feast of Unleavened Bread being an agricultural festival, the unleavened cakes represented the first-fruits unmixed with last year's harvest. The exclusion of leaven from all sacrifices (Ex 23 18, 34 25 [JE]) and from meal-offerings (Lv 2 11, 6 17 [P]) was due to the feeling that fermentation was closely allied to putrefaction and corruption, a view that the Hebrews shared with other peoples of antiquity. The peace-offering (Lv 7 13) and the wave-loaves (Lv 23 17) are only apparent exceptions, as they were not placed upon the altar. In the N T leaven is usually regarded as a symbol of corruption, which has a mighty pervasive power (cf. I Co 5 6-9; Gal 5 9). In this sense Christ used the phrase 'the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod' (Mk 8 15). In one of the parables the Savior uses it in a good sense, as an emblem of the pervasive power of the Kingdom of God (Mt 13 33 and [l]). In Rabbinical literature leaven is a symbol of evil desires, and in Jewish theology it is used figuratively for the inherited corruption of human nature.

LEBANA, לֵבְנָנָה, h-bē'nā, LEBANA, לֵבְנָנָה (לֵבְנָנָה, l'bhānāh): The ancestral head of one of the divisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 45; Neh 7 48).

LEBANON, לֵבָנוֹן (לֵבָנוֹן, l'bhānōn [in Heb. prose with the art.], from lābhēn, 'to be white,' because of its appearance when the snow covers its summits, as it does for the greater part of the year, tho according to some it was the whiteness of its cliffs that gave L. its name): In general the double range of mountains running from NNE. to SSW. for about 95 m. from the plain of Jun Akkar on the N. to the turn of the river Litani westward and Banias on the S. The two parallel ranges are separated by a broad valley (the ancient Coele-Syria), narrowing toward its S. end, alluded to in the Bible,

The geological constitution of the range is mainly threefold. The strata are irregular and faulty. The lowest of them is cretaceous (Glandaria limestone), the middle consists of Trigonia sandstone and the uppermost of Hippurite limestone. This last forms the summits. The foothills in the vicinity of the sea abound in chalk. The vast masses of limestone collect the rain and melted snow and yield it up in the form of innumerable springs where the sandstone as the Valley of Lebanon, and now called Buga'-el-Aziz. By classical writers the W. range was named the Libanus and the E. the Anti-Libanus (cf. also Jth 1 7). In Biblical usage the two are given the same name (Dt 1 7, 3 25, 11 24; Jos 1 4, 9 1). The whole mass abuts on the Mediterranean to the W. and slopes down into the plateau of Syria to the E. The average height of the range is not far from 6,000 ft., rising, however, at the highest point (Mt intervenes. The scenery of the Lebanon is exceptionally fine and has served as the basis of the poetical allusions in the Bible, which are many and richly colored.

Politically, the Lebanon appears as a part of the ideal land of Israel (Jos 13 5; Dt 11 24), but was never conquered (Jg 3 3). The actual boundary of the land is, however, given as 'Baal-Gad in the Valley of Lebanon' (Jos 11 17). In other particulars the Lebanon is noted for its height, which makes it a place of outlook (Song 4 8), for its streams (Song 4 15), its snowy summits (Jer 18 14), its fragrance (Song 4 11; Hos 14 7), probably the odor of its cedar forests; these are also mentioned on their own account (Jg 9 15; Is 2 13, etc.) and poetically called 'the flower of Lebanon' (Nah 1 4), 'the glory of Lebanon' (Is 35 2, 60 13). The 'violence done to Lebanon' is evidently the cutting down of these stately forests (Hab 2 17). Besides the cedars, however, large pines, firs, oaks, and cypress groves are to be found on the range; while the almond, the mulberry, the fig, the olive, the walnut, the apricot, the pear, the pomegranate, the pistachio, and the grapevine also flourish. Of animal life the region sustains, besides the domestic fauna, the mountain, or wild goat, the gazel, the panther, the bear, the jackal, the hyena, the boar, etc.; but these are rarely alluded to (cf. II K 14 9=II Ch 25 18). Whether the Tower of Lebanon in Song 7 4 was connected with Solomon's royal House of the Forest of Lebanon (I K 7 2); see JERUSALEM, § 30, and TEMPLE, § 4), or was an independent structure, either real or imaginary, does not appear. In the N T no mention is made of Lebanon.

The general structure of the Lebanon is rugged and irregular, except for the main direction of the chain of summits, and abounds in precipitous cliffs and hollows, which make it difficult for the traveler, and at the same time an easy hiding-place for the fugitive. This feature has made the Lebanon territory the home of such persecuted peoples as the Maronites and the Matawilē, as well as of such untamed and warlike races as the Amorites, the Itureans, and the Druses.

LEB-KAMI, leb'-kē'mai (לִבְקָמַי, lēbh-qāmāy). A cryptic way of writing the pr. n. Kasdīm (Chaldea) by the use of Athbash on which see SHESHACH (a similar case). Probably the cryptic spelling was not in the original text of Jer 51 1, but was a later gloss as the LXX. read 'Kasdīm.' E. E. N.

LEGION (λεγιών, or λεγεών, from Lat. legio): The unit of organization in the Roman army, consisting of a body of troops including both infantry and cavalry and varying in size, composition, and tactical arrangement at different periods. In the N T period a legion contained 5,000 to 6,000 men, all Roman citizens, composed of ten cohorts of six centuries each. The total military force of the empire consisted of twenty-five legions, of which four were stationed in Syria. See AUGUSTUS. To each legion was attached a body of 'auxiliary' troops, also about 6,000 in number, not composed of Roman citizens, but of provincials, recruited in the provinces, and usually on service in some other province than the one to which they belonged. Cf. Tucker, Life in the Roman World of Nero and St. Paul (1911), pp. 338-360. The name 'legion' came to be used in Greek, Rabbinical Hebrew, and probably in Palestinian Aramaic for any great number, and occurs in this sense, with perhaps the additional thought of obedience to a superior will, in Mt 26 53; Mk 5 9 and ||s. S. D.—E. E. N.

LEHABIM, h-hē'bim. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

LEHI, l'hui (לֵהִי, lēhī), 'jaw-bone': A place, as yet unidentified, somewhere in the northern Shephelah of Judah, famed as the scene of Samson's single-handed slaughter of the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass (Jg 15 9-19; II S 23 11, where for 'into a troop' we should read 'in Lehi'). Jg 15 17-19 should be interpreted as follows: In the place known as Ramath-lehi ('height of Lehi') there was a 'hollow place' or basin, in which there was a spring known as En-hakkore, 'the spring of the one who calls' (or, since qōrē, 'caller,' means 'partridge,' 'the partridge spring'). The text does not mean that the 'hollow' was in the jaw-bone. See also HEAPS, HEAPS. Cf. Moore in ICC or Burney, Judges, ad loc.

LEMUEL, lem'yu-el (לֵמֹּעַל, lēmō'el [Pr 31 1], lēmō'el, lēmō'el [31 4], 'belonging to God': The name of a king to whom was attributed the poem in Pr 31 2-9, formerly commonly identified with Solomon. RVmg. makes him king of Massa (cf. Gn 25 14; I Ch 1 30), perhaps an unknown Arabian city (see Massah in ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13). Toy (ICC, ad loc.) considers the L. of ver. 4 a scribal repetition of the preceding letters. C. S. T.

LEPROSY (נֶגַע, tsāra'ath, or נֶגַע־זָרַע, negha'-tsāra'ath, lépra):

1. Medical Definition. From the medical point of view, what is called leprosy in the Bible is not a single disease, but a group of essentially dissimilar diseases. True leprosy, as known in modern times, is an affection characterized by the appearance of nodules in the eyebrows, the cheeks, the nose, and the lobes of the ears, also in the hands and feet, where the disease eats into the joints, causing the falling off of fingers and toes. If nodules do not appear, their place is taken by spots of blanched or discolored skin (macular leprosy). Two types of the disease are recognized which sometimes blend into a mixed form. The first affects the skin and works inward (tuberculous leprosy); the second is seated in the nerves and causes local anesthesia (anesthetic leprosy). The latter advances much more slowly than the former, and may be arrested giving the appearance of having been healed. The cause of leprosy was discovered by Hansen in 1871 to be a specific bacillus. Defective diet, however, seems to serve as a favorable condition for the culture of the bacillus.

2. Ceremonial Uncleaness of Leprosy. Leprosy was one of the few abnormal conditions of the body which the Levitical law declared unclean. Elaborate provision was therefore made for testing its existence, and for the purification of those who were cured of it. As to the description of the disease, it is rather external and conventional than scientific. Both in the diagnosis and the prescription for ceremonial treatment the term used is generic, and includes other ailments which fall outside the correct modern definition of leprosy. It would be wrong, however, to infer that the whole subject is treated without any effort at discrimination. On the contrary, Lv ch. 13 deals with it in a somewhat systematic manner.

3. Distinctions. As a subject for ceremonial treatment, leprosy is given the general name of 'plague' ['stroke'] of leprosy. It is then divided into three kinds, as it might affect (1) the human skin, (2) articles of clothing, or (3) houses. So far as it appears in the human body, two stages in its development are marked, the incipient and the confirmed. In the incipient stage it was possible to mistake for it several other diseased conditions. Hence the provision that, when a suspicious case appeared, it must be brought to the priest to be tested (Lv 13 2, 9, etc.). From the moment, however, that the priest began his inspection and failed to declare his subject clean, the person under test was designated a leper, and considered unclean (Lv 13 3, 20, etc.).

4. Test of Leprosy. In the incipient stage leprosy was only constructively such, and might be cured. According to its development, which was scrutinized and judged by the priest, it might be declared (1) a 'scab' (šappāhath, psoriasis, Lv 13 2), (2) tsāra'ath-nōshēneth, false ('old') leprosy (Lv 13 11), (3) an inflamed cicatrix ('scar of the boil,' tsärebheth hash-sh'hîn, Lv 13 23, 'burning boil' AV), (4) a scar of a former burn (s'e'eth hammikhwâh, Lv 13 28), (5) a scalled-head (netheq, 'ringworm,' Lv 13 37), (6) a tetter' (bôhaq, Lv 13 39), or (7) a baldness (gibbeah, Lv 13 41). But any of these abnormal conditions might turn into a permanent leprosy, in which case the subject was required to be isolated, have distinctive signs by which he might be recognized, and be regarded as unclean (Lv 13 45 f.). For the purification of this uncleanness a special ceremonial was provided (Lv ch. 14. See also under PURITY, PURIFICATION, § 12 (3)).

5. Leprosy of Clothing. The leprosy of clothing, as far as it can be identified, was the result of a fungus, or mildew, produced by unknown causes. It was to be tested for a week, and if persistent, the garment was to be burned (Lv 13 47-59).

6. Leprosy of Houses. The leprosy of a house (Lv 14 33-57) is also hard to identify. It is described as consisting in hollow streaks, greenish, or reddish, in color, and lower than the wall, i.e., as if issuing from its interior portions. It is probable that 'dry rot' is meant. Its treatment involved the scraping or removal of part of the wall, the carrying of the dust to a place for refuse, the replastering or rebuilding of the destroyed portion of the house, and the ceremonial cleansing of it as a whole (Lv 14 48-53).

7. Instances of Leprosy in the O T. Altho so carefully provided for in the ritual law, leprosy does not appear to have been of frequent occurrence in actual experience in the Bible. And the untechnical use of language about it renders it difficult to judge as to the special type in each case recorded. Of these cases, that of Naaman (II K 5 1 f.) was probably not one of true leprosy. It covered his whole body and was white in appearance. These are more approximately the symptoms of psoriasis. Not enough is said of Miriam (Nu 12 10) and the four lepers of Samaria (II K 7 8) to convey a clear idea of their types. That of Uzziah (II K 15 5; II Ch 26 10) was plainly an instance of the genuine incurable disease.

8. Leprosy in the N T. In the N T the disease is included among those healed by Jesus in his daily ministry as the Messiah (Mt 10 8, 11 5; Lk 4 27, 7 22). Two instances of healings of leprosy are specifically recorded, viz., that of the man who by his too exuberant gratitude for being cleansed prevented Jesus' admission into a certain city and obliged him to withdraw into the wilderness (Mt 8 2; Mk 1 40; Lk 5 12), and that of the ten from among whom only one, a Samaritan, came back to express his gratitude. In healing leprosy Jesus was careful to lay stress not only on the healing act, but also on the ceremonial cleansing which restored the subject to social relationships. (Cf. in general Benzinger, Heb. Archäologie<sup>2</sup>, 1907, pp. 79, 92, 186, 377, 412; and see DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (3), and III. A. C. Z.

LEVIATHAN, li-vai'a-thān (לִּיָּאֶתָן, liwyāthān): A mythological figure, popularly believed to cause eclipses of the sun and moon by swallowing these luminaries or by throwing its folds around them. The monster was supposed to be subject to enchanters who could rouse it to perform its feat. They were therefore alluded to as those that 'curse the day' (Job 3 8; cf. Davidson, Camb. Bible, ad loc.). In Ps 74 14 and Is 27 1 it is the symbol of Egypt as the great devourer. In Job ch. 41 the reference is to the crocodile. A. C. Z.

LEVITICUS, li-vit'i-kus: 1. Name. The fourth book of the Pentateuch, called by the Jews, from its opening words, wayyiqra', 'and he (J') called.' The Greek-speaking Alexandrian Jews called it, from the general character of its contents, Λευιτικόν, i.e., 'the Levitical [book],' which the Vulgate rendered by Leviticus.

2. Lv a Part of the Priestly Element (P) of the Hexateuch. The real character of Lv is revealed when it is perceived that it is but a portion of that long section of the priestly law and history book ([P] see HEXATEUCH, § 5) which deals with the organization of the worship at Mt. Sinai. This section begins at Ex 24 15b-18a, is continued in Ex 25 1-31 18a (the command concerning the making of the Sanctuary), and in chs. 35-39 (the making of the Tabernacle). Here begins the story of the institution of the worship of Israel, which can be outlined as follows:

1. The general command regarding the setting up of the Sanctuary and the initiation of the Priesthood (Ex 40 1-16).
2. The erection of the Sanctuary and the first services (Moses in charge on the first day) (Ex 40 17-23).
[Insertion—The sacrificial manual, Lv chs. 1-7.]
3. The initiation of the Aaronic Priesthood and related matters continuing the narrative of Ex 40 33 (Lv chs. 8-10).
  - (a) Aaron and his sons formally inducted into the priestly office (Lv ch. 8 f.), according to the directions in Ex ch. 29 and 40 12-16.
  - (b) The death of Nadab and Abihu (Lv 10 1-11), with additional legal prescriptions in vs. 12-20.
[Insertion—A code concerning ceremonial purity, Lv chs. 11-15.]
  - (c) Legislation following the death of Nadab and Abihu—the Day of Atonement (Lv ch. 16).
[Insertion—The Holiness Code (Lv chs. 17-26), with a supplement concerning vows (ch. 27).]

The large section of P, to which all this belongs, is continued in Nu, concluding at Nu 10 10.

Disregarding the obvious connection with P and viewing it as a book by itself, LV may be divided into four parts. I. The manual of offerings (chs. 1-7). II. The consecration of the Priesthood (chs. 8-10). III. The laws of ceremonial purity (chs. 11-16). IV. The law of holiness (chs. 17-27).

3. Relative Age of the Various Strata in Lv. It is generally recognized to-day that the extensive literature known as the P element of the Hexateuch went through a complicated process of editing before it attained its present form. Evidence of such editing is abundant in Lv. Space allows the mention here of only a few of the most important instances. (1) In the manual of offerings (chs. 1-7). This manual at present consists of two parts, the general directions for the five principal offerings (1 1-6 7), and a manual for priests (6 8-7 38). It will be noticed that in the first part of the main introductory portion formulas differ remarkably. In 1 3, 10, 14 (for the burnt-offering) and 3 1, 6, 12 (for the peace-offering) the regular formula is, 'If his oblation be . . . he shall'; but in 2 4-16 the formula uses 'thou' and 'ye,' while in 1 2, 2 1-3 and in 4 1-6 7 the formulas are of a less distinctive character. Such facts as these may indicate that in 1 3-17 and 3 1-17, dealing with the two oldest and main classes of offerings, we have the oldest form or original content of this manual, which was then supplemented by ch. 2 and later by the addition of 4 1-6 7, and still later by 6 8-7 38 (which itself seems to be composed of earlier and later elements). If the reader will compare this manual with other sections of the Pentateuch covering, in part at least, essentially the same ground, as, e.g., Nu 15 1-31, he will discover for himself the existence of other and quite different sacrificial codes besides the comprehensive one found here. (2) In Part III, the laws of ceremonial purity, perhaps the clearest evidence of strata of different dates, is found in chs. 11 and 16. In ch. 11 we have the law regarding clean and unclean animals. This same subject is covered in the Code of Dt (14 3-21). In Lv ch. 11 the order of treatment is: (a) Quadrupeds which are 'unclean' (vs. 2-8); (b) water-animals which are 'abomination' (sheqets) (vs. 9-12); (c) birds which are 'abomination' (vs. 13-19); (d) winged insects which are 'abomination' (vs. 20-23); (e) defilement by contact with carcasses (vs. 24-28); (f) creeping things and reptiles which are 'unclean,' and contamination from them (vs. 29-38); (g) defilement from contact with carcasses (vs. 39-40); (h) creeping things which are 'abomination' (vs. 41-46). In Dt 14 3-21 the order is: (a) Not to eat anything 'abominable' (tō'ēbhāh) (ver. 3); (b) quadrupeds that may (clean) and may not (unclean) be eaten (vs. 4-8); (c) the water-animals that may and may not be eaten (vs. 9-10); (d) the birds that may and may not be eaten (vs. 11-20); (e) that which dies of itself may not be eaten (ver. 21). It is evident that the whole section in Dt is much simpler than the corresponding one in Lv, and also that in Lv there are really two sets of prescriptions, one using the term 'unclean' (as in Dt), the other using the term 'abomination' (sheqets) (not in Dt). These and other facts seem to indicate that in Dt we find the earlier and simpler law on this subject, and that the form in Lv is based on an old source, which has been supplemented by later additions. Ch. 16, in the main, forms a fitting conclusion to the preceding material in chs. 11-15. The command for an atoning ceremony, covering all phases of sin in the nation as a whole, might well conclude the group of laws on ceremonial purity. But in ch. 16, as it now stands, there is interwoven another set of prescriptions which have to do with Aaron and his sons alone and by ver. 1 are connected with ch. 10. These prescriptions (found in vs. 1, 3, 6, 11, etc.) are probably later additions to the original law. (3) Part IV, The Holiness Code, also appears to be made up of different strata. A general analysis of this code will be found in the article HEXATEUCH, § 23 and need not be repeated here. If this analysis be compared with the Code of Dt (see DEUTERONOMY, § § 2, 4), it will be found that the two present many striking similarities, enough to suggest that both have been modeled on the earlier code in Ex 20 22-23 end, altho their many differences also show that they are independent of each other. Within this code, many passages may be found which are either contrary to or only loosely connected with the context, and have all the appearance of being added to the original code. Thus in ch. 23 a large amount (vs. 1-8, 21, 23-38, 39a, c, and 44) seems to belong more naturally with the later and more precise (as to fixed dates, etc.) priestly material (that forms the main thread of P) than with the earlier and more vague specifications that are characteristic of the original Holiness Code. The same differences can be noted in chs. 17, 21 f., and 24 f. (for detailed examination and proof, see Driver LOT<sup>6</sup>, pp. 47 ff.). Ch. 27 is not a part of this code, but a later piece of legislation (P), dealing with the estimation and commutation of vows, consecrated things, and tithes. In its original form, the Holiness Code probably antedated Ezekiel. This prophet seems to have been well acquainted with it (or its constituent elements, in case it was compiled after his date), and largely influenced by it. (See also HEXATEUCH, § 24.)

4. General Character of Lv. Lv is thus a book in which materials originating in widely separated periods are found closely woven together. In general, the earlier portions are marked by greater simplicity, less preciseness in details and specifications, a closer touch with the old agricultural type of life, less emphasis on ceremonialism per se, and more on morality and spirituality. The moral character of the Holiness Code is especially high. 'Holiness to Jehovah' is here more than mere formalism. In the later portions the rigid ceremonialism of the later Judaism is more manifest and the cultus is made all-important.

LIBERTINES. See SYNAGOG OF THE LIBERTINES.

LIBERTY, CHRISTIAN: This term is used to denote the breadth of action allowed the believer as distinguished from the non-believer. The nearest approach to the conception in the O T is that underlying the release from obligation and penalty, which was provided for in the law of the Sabbatical year of Jubilee (q.v.) (d'rōr, Lv 25 10; Is 61 1; Jer 34 8 f.). Furthermore, he who serves J<sup>h</sup> is conscious of an advantage in this particular (Ps 119 45). In the N T the new light on the inner relationship of the believer with God reveals liberty to be one of the essential results of faith (Jn 8 32 f.). In general, this larger range for the play of human activity is viewed as obliterating restraints created by other conditions. Bondage and slavery in the political sense cease to be sources of distress to the possessor of Christian liberty (I Co 7 21; Col 3 11). This liberty consists in the change of attitude toward the law, whereby conduct becomes loving conformity to the will of the Father, instead of constrained obedience to arbitrary prescriptions (cf. 'against such there is no law' Gal 5 23; also Ro 7 3; Gal 2 4, 5 1). Moreover, the principle of sin as a dominant force over conduct loses its compelling power. To this extent the believer is free from sin (Ro 6 18, 8 2). The added knowledge gained by the believer enables him to see many actions as indifferent, and therefore to be done or not, according to his pleasure (I Co 10 23-29). This is 'the perfect law of liberty' (Ja 1 25), which, however, places upon its subject the responsibility of guarding against its misuse and abuse (Gal 5 13; I P 2 16).

LIBNAH, lib'na (לִבְנָה, libhnāh) 'whiteness': 1. The third station after Hazeroth (Nu 33 20 f.), perhaps identical with Laban (Dt 1 1). 2. A town in the Shephelah, probably a member of the coalition against Gibeon defeated by Joshua (Jos 10 29 f.). It was made a priestly city (Jos 21 13). Apparently lying S. of Lachish, it joined in the revolt of Edom against Judah (II K 8 22). In the days of Hezekiah it was evidently a strongly fortified town, and required the attention of Sennacherib in order to secure his base of operations against Jerusalem (II K 19 8; Is 37 8). L. was the birthplace of the wife of Josiah, the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (II K 23 31, 24 18). Map I, C 9. A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

LIBNI, lib'ndi (לִבְנִי, libhnī): 1. The ancestral head of one of the divisions of the Gershonite Levites, the Libnites (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18-21, etc.). Also called Ladan (q.v.). 2. Another Levite, the grandson of Merari (I Ch 6 20).

LIBYA, lib'i-a (Λιβύη): The name of the large territory which included in ancient times Cyrenaica in the W. and Marmarica in the E.; the whole of L., therefore, lay between Egypt (the Delta) and the Roman province of Africa. Accordingly, the 'parts of Libya about Cyrene' (Ac 2 10) meant the western portion of the country. In the O T, L. is the AV translation of the Heb. pūt (Ezk 30 5, 38 5). Libyans is the rendering of pūt (Jer 46 9 AV, 'Put' RV) and of libhīm (Dn 11 43); tho this word is rendered 'Lubim' in II Ch 16 8 and Nah 3 9. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 7 and 13. A. C. Z.

LICE. See PALESTINE, § 26; and PLAGUES.

LIE. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (b).

LIEUTENANTS: The AV rendering of the Heb. transliteration (לְחָשְׁדָּרְפָּנִים, 'āhashdarp'nīm, Ezr 8 36; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3), of the Persian khshatrapān, the original of the Gr. satrapēs, 'satrap,' 'governor.' See SATRAP.

LIFE: This term is used in the English Bible to render a number of different Heb. and Gr. words, each of which has its own special significance. (1) In the O T the proper and most frequent term is hay, 'life,' used (both as noun and adj.) almost exclusively of men and animals, and with reference to the principle of animate existence—in the case of man often of sentient existence—in contrast with that which is inanimate or dead. Consequently, even running water or spring water, in contrast with stagnant or cistern water, is spoken of as 'living' (cf. Gn 26 19; Lv 14 6, etc.). The noun, when rendered 'life,' is generally in the plural (the so called abstract plural). As examples of the more general use of the term, cf. Gn 2 7 ('breath of life'), 9, 3 22, 7 15. In some cases it is the period of conscious existence that is meant (Gn 3 14, 7 11), in others, life as affected by external conditions is the main idea (Ex 1 14), especially the ideal happy or blessed condition on earth, in which God's favor is manifest (Dt 30 15, 19 f., 32 47; Ps 30 5; Pr 2 19). In one case at least it is one's consciousness of his own condition, or state of his feelings, that is meant (Job 33 20). A special, but frequent, use of the term is in oaths, at times when God swears by Himself (Nu 14 21, 28; Dt 32 40; Jer 46 18), or when man swears by God (Ru 3 13; I S 14 39, 45, etc.) or, with a slight change in the Heb. pronunciation (hēy instead of hay), when man swears by some other man (Gn 42 15 f.; I S 1 26; II S 15 21, etc.). In all such cases the word is really used as a predicate adjective. (For the combination of hayyāh [the fern. adj.] with nephesh, see the following.) (2) The word nephesh, frequently rendered 'life,' signifies the physical principle of life, which was sometimes located in the breath (Gn 2 7; in Job 41 21 it is rendered 'breath'), but more generally in the blood (Gn 9 4; Lv 17 14; Dt 12 23, etc.). The more usual rendering of this term is 'soul' (which can be understood in more than one sense), but where it is rendered 'life,' it is nearly always the physical existence that is intended (Gn 9 4 f., 19 17; Dt 19 21, etc.). Frequently a broader meaning is given to the term (e.g., Gn 44 30), and at times 'soul' would seem to be a better rendering than 'life' (e.g., Pr 6 26). The combination nephesh hayyāh, rendered 'living creature' (Gn 1 20), indicates, when used of man (e.g., Gn 2 7), the individual entity, the seat of personality, which, tho originating with the Divine breath being breathed into the material form, is not altogether destroyed when, at death, man returns 'unto dust' (Gn 3 19). See also MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 1-3. (3) yāmīm, 'days,' is rendered 'life' in I K 3 11; II Ch 1 11; Ps 61 6, 91 16. (4) In Job 7 15 AV 'life' renders 'etsem,' 'bone'; cf. RV. (5) In the N T, ζωή is the equivalent of the O T hay. It is used to indicate conscious existence, especially in its higher moral and spiritual aspects. Of this God alone is the ultimate source; then, derivatively from God, its source is the Word (this only in Jn), and then in the Word Incarnate, Jesus Christ (Jn 1 4, 4 14, 5 26, 6 36, 14 6; cf. Col 1 15-17). Consequently, it often means the true life of the soul as found in communion with God, and the enjoyment of this throughout eternity (Mt 7 14, 12 50; Lk 12 15; In eternum). (6) The N T ψυχή is the equivalent of the O T nephesh, 'physical life,' altho in Mk 8 35 and ||s the term is used in a double sense, indicative of the higher and lower aspects of the soul's life. The more usual rendering of ψυχή in the N T is 'soul.' (7) The term βίος, meaning the external aspects of life, its material benefits or enjoyments, its affairs, also its period, occurs a few times in the N T (Lk 8 14; I Ti 2 2; II Ti 2 4; I Jn 2 16). (8) In Rev 13 15 AV πνεῦμα, 'breath,' is rendered 'life,' cf. RV. See also in general MAN, DOCTRINE OF; and ESCHATOLOGY. E. E. N.

LIFE, BOOK OF: This phrase is used to denote the record of the privileges of God's people. God's 'book' (Ex 32 32; Ps 56 8, 139 16) is the emblem of His remembrance and guardianship of His people (cf.

Mal 3 16). It is also called the 'book of life' (Ps 69 28, 'the living' RVmg.; Ph 4 3). The phrase is based on the custom of enrolling citizens for various purposes, e.g., as 'childless,' Jer 22 30; for identification of pedigree, Neh 7 5, 64, 12 22; for safeguarding of rights, Is 4 3; Ezk 13 9 (spiritual analog, Lk 10 20). From the O T usage was developed the apocalyptic conception of a special 'Book of Life' to be used at the last Judgment (Dn 12 1; Rev 3 5, 13 8, 17 8, 20 12, 15, 21 27; cf. Eth. En. 47 3, 108 3). A. C. Z.

LIGHT: The rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms: I. Terms relating to natural or physical light. (1) 'ôr (both verb and noun), used primarily of the physical phenomenon, either generally as created by or emanating from God (Gn 1 3; Job 38 19), or as opposed to darkness (Gn 1 4, 5; Ex 10 23, etc.), or specifically, of daylight, or the morning light (Jg 19 26; I S 14 36; II K 7 9, etc.), of the light of the sun (Job 31 26, cf. RV, 37 21; Hab 3 4), of the heavenly bodies (Ps 136 7), of the lightning (Job 36 32), or in the simple sense of 'brightness,' or 'shining' (Job 41 18; Is 13 10, 30 26, etc.). This term is often used figuratively: (a) Of the guidance, strength, and comfort vouchsafed by God to those who trust Him (Job 22 28, 29 3; Ps 27 1, etc.); so in the expression 'the light of thy countenance,' where the idea of communion with God is also set forth (Ps 4 6, 44 3, 89 15); (b) as the equivalent of physical life (Job 3 16, 20; Ps 49 19, etc.), or of the true moral life (Job 24 13; Pr 4 18, etc.). (2) mā'ôr, 'a light giver,' used of the planets, sun and moon (Gn 1 14-16), and of the lamps in the Tabernacle (Ex 25 6, 27 20, etc.), less specifically in Ps 74 16, 90 8; Pr 15 30). (3) nûr, in various derivative forms nêr, nîr, etc., used in AV, 'lamp' RV) of David (II S 21 17); of the continuance of his dynasty (I K 11 36; II K 8 19; II Ch 21 7); and in a more literal sense in Dn 2 22, 5 11, 14; Job 3 4. (4) nōghah, 'brightness' (Is 50 10). On the AV of I K 7 4 f. and Is 8 20 cf. RV. (5) In the N T the principal term is φῶς, which corresponds to 'ôr in the O T. Besides its use in a physical sense, metaphorically the term stands for the highest form of spiritual and moral life of which God is the source (I Jn 1 5, 7), and is mediated to man through the Word—Jesus Christ (Jn 1 4 ff., etc.). Consequently, the saving truth of God and the Christian character and life, which expresses it, is called light (Mt 5 14; Jn 3 19 f.; Ro 13 12; Eph 5 8, etc.). Related to φῶς are the nouns φωστήρ, literally 'light-giver,' used of beacon-lights, metaphorically in Ph 2 15, but perhaps more literally in Rev 21 11, and φωτισμός, 'illumination' (II Co 4 4, 6), the verb φωτίζειν, 'to give light to' (Jn 1 9; I Co 4 5, etc.), and the adj. φωτεινός (Mt 6 22; Lk 11 34 ff.). (6) λύχνος, 'lamp' RV (Mt 6 22; Lk 11 34, 12 35; Jn 5 35; II P 1 19; Rev 21 23). (7) λαμπάς, 'torch,' then 'lamp' (Ac 20 8); and the related verb λαμπειν, 'to give light as a torch' (Mt 5 15). (8) φῶγος, 'the light (of some bright object)' (Mt 24 29, etc.). (9) The verbs καίειν, 'to burn' (Mt 5 15), ἕπτειν, 'to kindle' (Lk 8 16, 11 33, 15 8), ἐπιφάειν, 'to shine upon' RV (Lk 1 79), and ἐπιφάσκειν, 'to shine upon' RV (Eph 5 14). II. Terms relating to weight. (I) From qālal, 'to be light' (I K 12 4, etc.), we have qāl, of agility and swift-footedness (II S 2 18), and the verb itself, in the sense of 'to consider insignificant' (I S 18 23; I K 16 31; II K 3 18, 20 10; Is 49 6; Ezk 8 17), and q'lōqēl, in the sense of 'unsatisfactory,' possibly 'contemptible' (Nu 21 5). (2) pāhaz, 'unreliable' (Jg 9 4; Zeph 3 4). (3) ἀμελεῖν, 'to be careless' (Mt 22 5). (4) ἐλαφρότης (Mt 11 30; II Co 4 17). III. Terms relating to motion. (1) yāradh, 'to come, or go down' (Jg 4 15; I S 25 23 AV, etc.). (2) nāphal, 'to fall' (Gn 24 64; II K 5 21 AV; Is 9 8). (3) pāgha', 'to chance upon' (Gn 28 11). On Mt 3 16 and Rev 7 16 cf. RV. E. E. N.

LIGNALOEES, lig-nal'ōz or lain-al'ōz. See ALOES.

LIKHI, lik'hui (לִּיחִי, liqhi): The head of a Manas-site family (I Ch 7 19).

LILY. See PALESTINE, § 22; also TEMPLE, § 14.

LIME (לִימָה, sidh): In Is 33 12, Am 2 1 reference is made to the process of securing lime from its compounds by intense heat. In these passages it is used figuratively to mean complete destruction. In Dt 27 2, 4, the Heb. word is translated 'plaster,' to designate the substance made from lime, and put on walls to secure a smooth surface for decorating. C. S. T.

LINE: (1) hebhel, strictly, a 'cord' or 'rope,' then a 'measuring-line,' as in II S 8 2; Am 7 17; Zec 2 1. This word is often rendered 'portion' or lot, and its metaphorical meaning in Ps 16 6 rests on the more literal use of the word for that portion of J''s land, measured by line, which was each Israelite's patrimony. (2) qaw, and qeweh (from qāwāh, 'to be stretched,' 'fixed,' or 'strong'), a line, especially one used for measuring (I K 7 23; II K 21 13; Is 28 17; Jer 31 39, etc.). In Is 28 10 and 13 it is doubtful whether the Heb. qaw lāqāw should be rendered 'line upon line,' as these syllables are probably mere imitations of the thick, foolish utterance of the drunkard. A derivative of qāwāh, tiqwāh, is found in Jos 2 18, 21. (3) hūt, 'cord,' or 'thread,' is rendered line in I K 7 15. (4) pāthil (from pāthal, 'to twist') is rendered 'line' but once (Ezk 40 3; cf. Gn 38 18, 25; Ezk 40 3; Jg 16 9, etc.). (5) seredh, in Is 44 13, is of doubtful meaning. The RV pencil is probably correct, but not certain. (6) καλῶν (II Co 10 16) is strictly a 'reed,' then a rod for measuring, and then came to be used in the sense of 'limit,' or 'bounds.' The RV 'province' is a fair interpretation. E. E. N.

LINEN: The various words translated 'linen' in the O T are for the most part of somewhat uncertain meaning, and possibly in some cases varieties of cotton as well as of linen are meant. Where the Heb. word is pishteh, 'flax,' the meaning 'linen' is practically certain (Lv 13 47-49; Jer 13 1; Ezk 44 17 f.). śādhīn (Jg 14 12 f.; Pr 31 24; Is 3 23) means a square linen garment, something like a robe, that could be used as a wrapper, made probably of fine material. In I K 10 23, II Ch 1 16 RV has the correct reading. The N T terms present no difficulty, all meaning linen of various degrees of fineness. See also FINE LINEN; and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5. E. E. N.

LINTEL: In I K 6 31 the meaning of the Heb. term ayil is very uncertain. RVmg. suggests 'posts,' but 'projection' may be nearer the truth. The verse then would mean that the door-opening was pentagonal in form, thus: . See illustration of front elevation, Solomon's Temple, under art. TEMPLE. On Am 9 1 and Zeph 2 14, cf. RV. See also HOUSE. E. E. N.

LINUS, loi'nus (Αἰνός): One of four persons sending greetings to Timothy in II Ti 4 21. Since the name is a comparatively rare one (only in CIG, No. 8518; I. Sic. et Ital. No. 2276) much is to be said for Irenaeus' identification of L. with the successor of Peter and Paul (Adv. Hær. III, 3 3; cf. Eus. HE, III, 2; V, 6). According to the Ap. Const. (VII, 46) L. was the husband, or son, of Claudia (Αἰνός ὁ Κλαυδίας), who is mentioned in the same salutation in II Ti 4 21. J. M. T.

LION. See PALESTINE, § 24.

LITTER: The translation of the Heb. word tsābh in Is 66 20. The same word occurs in Nu 7 3 with 'āghālāh ('wagon'), where it indicates that the wagons were covered like palanquins. By itself the term meant 'a covered conveyance,' constructed so that it could be carried by two mules, one in front and one behind. C. S. T.

LIVER. The expression 'till an arrow (dart, AV) strike through his liver' (Pr 7 23) is probably figurative, not a specific reference to any disease. For special conceptions regarding and uses of the liver, see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10; MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 8; and MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 4.

LIVING CREATURE (pl. hayyōth; in N T, ζῶον; 'beast' AV):

1. In the Bible. The name given to a symbolical figure first presented in Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1 5 ff.), and again in Rev 4 6-9, 5 6, 8, 11, 6 1, 3, 5-7). The dependence of the latter on the former is quite manifest, tho the figure is worked over with a considerable amount of originality. The LXX. translation of the Heb. word in Ezk is the link of connection between the two. The figure is composite. It contains a human element and elements drawn from the world of lower animal life, either terrestrial or aerial. In Ezk 10 1 ff., the living creatures are called 'cherubim'; but as cherubim, they differ from those which symbolize the Divine presence in the construction of the Mercy Seat (I K 6 23 ff.; see also CHERUBIM).

2. Extra-Biblical Parallels. The affinity between these 'living creatures' and the winged bulls, the sphinx, and the griffin of extra-biblical lore is most unmistakable. But only with the winged bull of the Assyrian cult is the relation such as to call for explanation. And here it is not difficult to see that, whereas the form of the Biblical living creature is derived from Mesopotamia, the use made of it is radically different. The Biblical figure represents the highest elements of creation, as ministering to and worshipping the Creator. They are never, as in Mesopotamia, themselves objects of homage or worship. A. C. Z.

LIZARD. See PALESTINE, § 26; and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 9.

LOAF, LOAVES See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 2.

LO-AMMI, lō'-am'ai. The symbolic name of Hosea's third child (Hos 1 9). See AMMI, and HOSEA, § 2.

LOCK. See HOUSE, § 6 (1); and CITY, § 3.

LOCUST or GRASSHOPPER: A migratory insect of which forty different species are known to exist in Palestine (Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible, 1889, pp. 306 ff.), tho the Rabbis assert that there are as many as 800 species. Those named in the O T, without strict regard to scientific classification, are the following: (1) 'arbeh, 'multiplier' (Ex 10 4-6; Lv 11 22). (2) sol'am, bald locust (Lv 11 22). (3) hargōl, 'galloper' (Lv 11 22; 'beetle' AV, 'cricket' RV, but 'locust' RVmg.). (4) hāghābh, 'grasshopper' (Lv 11 22). (5) ts'ātsal, 'the tinkler,' because of the whirring noise of its flight (Dt 28 42). (6) gēbh, only in pl. gēbhīm (Is 33 4). (7) gāzām, 'shearer' (Jl

Locust (with extended wings).

1 4, palmer-worm AV). (8) yeleq, 'lopper' (Jl 1 4; Nah 3 15; Ps 105 34). (9) hāšil, 'finisher' (Ps 78 46, but usually translated caterpillar). (10) gōbh or gōbhay (Am 7 1; Nah 3 17). Certain of these kinds were permissible as food, and were and are largely eaten by the natives, being regarded very palatable (cf. Lv 11 22, Mt 3 2). The destructiveness of the locust is particularly noted by Biblical writers hence threats of judgment are couched in terms of a visitation of a plague of locusts (Jl 1 4 f.; Nah 3 15; Jer 51 14, 27, canker-worm RV, 'caterpillar' AV). Upon the basis of this characteristic of the insect arose later the apocalyptic figure of the locust with certain features of the war-horse, of the warrior, of the king, of the woman, and of the lion attached to it (Rev 9 3-11). This is evidently a symbol of destruction, and is represented as appearing in large numbers—an army under the command of Abaddon (q.v.; the Gr. equivalent is Ἀπολλών, 'destroyer'). A. C. Z.

LOD, led (לֹד, lōdh), or Lydda (Λύδδα), during the Roman period called Diospolis, now Ludd: A village lying in a fertile hollow of the Plain of Sharon, 11 m. SE. of Jaffa. Map III, D 5. It is mentioned in the later books of the O T (I Ch 8 12; Ezr 2 33; Neh 7 37, 11 35), and once in the N T (Ac 9 32 ff.). Its exposed position, in the path of armies going from the coast to Jerusalem, subjected L. to devastation by Roman, Saracen, Crusader, and Mongol. In the time of Josephus, however, the city was large and prosperous, and was a celebrated seat of Rabbinical learning. It later became the seat of a bishopric. The present population is about 7,000. According to ancient Christian tradition (adopted also by the Moslems), St. George was born at L. in the 3d cent. A.D., and, after his martyrdom, was buried there. The cathedral of St. George, whose crypt was said to contain the hero's tomb, has been frequently demolished, and its ruins now enclose both a mosque and a Greek church. (see HGHL, pp. 160-164).

LO-DEBAR, lō'-dī'bār (לֹדְבָר or לֹד, lō'- or lō-dhābhār): A place E. of the Jordan, near Mahanaim (II S 17 27), where Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan, dwelt (II S 9 4 f.). Grätz translates the same Heb. words in Am 6 13 by 'Lodebar' ('thing of nought' EV), the reference being to victories won, probably by Jehoash or Jeroboam II over the Syrian, at Lo-Debar and Karnaim (EV 'horns'). The same place is probably meant by Debir (Heb. Lidhbhir) (Jos 13 26, cf. RVmg.).

C. S. T.—E. E. N.

LODGE: I. The verb. (1) In the O T the verb rendered 'to lodge' usually is the Heb. lān, 'to pass the night' (Gn 24 33, 32 13, etc.). (2) In Jos 2 1 the term is shākhābh, 'to lie down'; cf. RV. (3) In Mt 21 17, the Gr. ἀλλέγειν means properly 'to pass the night in an αὐλή' ('court-yard,' or 'sheep-fold'), but here it is used in a general sense. (4) In Lk 9 12 καταλύειν means 'to loosen,' hence 'to unbind,' preparatory to lying down for the night. (5) κατασκηνοῦν, 'to pitch the tent' and hence 'to dwell,' is found in Mk 4 32 and ||s. (6) ξενίζεν (from ξένος, 'stranger'), 'to receive as a guest,' is found in Ac 10 6, 18, 23, 32, 21 16, 28 7 (cf. RV).

II. The nouns rendered lodge, lodging, or lodging-place are (1) tā' (Ezk 40 7, 10, 12, etc. RV), meaning an antechamber of some kind, rendered 'little chamber' in AV. Dr. Davidson (on Ezk in Camb. Bible) suggests 'guard-room' (cf. I K 14 23; II Ch 12 11), see TEMPLE, § 18. (2) mālōn, 'place to spend the night' (Gn 42 27, 43 21; Ex 4 24 all 'inn' AV; Jos 4 3, 8; II K 19 23; Is 10 29; Jer 9 2). The closely related term m'kīnāh, meaning the temporary structure for the watchman in a garden, is rendered 'lodge' in Is 1 8; cf. 24 20 in AV and RV. (3) ξενίς (from ξένος, 'stranger') means first 'hospitality,' and then 'lodging' (Ac 28 23; Phm ver. 22). E. E. N.

LOG. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

LOIS, lō'is (Λωίς): The grandmother (probably maternal) of Timothy (II Ti 1 5). She was a Jewess, but whether by descent or by conversion from paganism is unknown. Through Paul she was led to embrace Christianity. E. E. N.

LONG-SUFFERING. See GOD, § 2.

LOOKING-GLASS. See MIRROR.

LOOPS. See TABERNACLE, § 3 (2).

LORD: The rendering in EV of a number of Heb. and Gr. terms. As the ordinary term used in addressing a superior: (1) 'ādhōnāy, 'my lord.' It is used of (a) a prophet (I K 18 7, 13; II K 2 19, 4 28), (b) princes or nobles (Gn 42 10, 43 20), (c) a king (I S 22 13, 26 17), (d) a father (Gn 31 35), (e) an elder brother (Gn 33 3 f.), (f) Moses (Ex 32 22; Nu 11 28), (g) a priest (I S 1 15 f.), (h) the theophanic angels (Gn 19 2; Jos 5 14; Jg 6 13), (i) a captain (II S 11 11), (j) any superior (Gn 24 18; Ru 2 13). In the N T κύριος, is the customary term for addressing Jesus, and also frequently occurs in the full title applied to Him, the Lord Jesus Christ. It is also used (Mt 25 11, 24, and elsewhere) in addressing a superior, when it is frequently rendered 'Sir.' (2) In AV it is the usual rendering of the Divine name יהוה (and of its shorter form יה, Yāh), properly pronounced Yahweh, but usually transliterated 'Jehovah' in ARV. In AV it is usually rendered 'LORD' (in capitals). The plural form, 'ādhōnāy, 'my lords,' is also very commonly used in the Heb. O T for God, and is always rendered 'Lord,' 'my Lord,' or 'O Lord.' Where the Heb. has both terms together, 'ādhōnāy Yahweh (Gn 15 2; Dt 3 24, etc.), AV renders 'Lord GOD' (in capitals), but ARV renders 'Lord Jehovah.' The term 'ādhōnāy expressed in particular the authority and lordship possessed by God over His creatures. See also JEHOVAH. (3) srānām, a plural term of uncertain etymology, is used to designate the princes or leaders of the Philistine confederacy (Jos 13 3; Jg 3 3, etc.). Some think that the word is allied to the Gr. τύραννος. The exact nature of the Philistine confederacy is unknown. Practically, these five 'lords' appear to have been petty kings, each a primus inter pares (cf. I S 29 2 ff.). (4) In the case of the other Heb. terms rendered 'lord,' this rendering is to be taken in a general rather than a specific sense. Such are (a) ba'al, 'master,' 'owner' (Nu 21 28; Is 16 8); (b) g'bhīr, 'a [strong] man' (Gn 27 29, 37); (c) mārē (Dn 2 47, 4 19, 24, 5 23); (d) rabh, which is simply an adjective, 'great' (Dn 2 10; cf. RVmg.); (e) sar, 'prince' (Ezr 8 25 AV); (f) shālīsh, which means probably one who has distinguished himself and thereby has attained to high rank (II K 7 2-19; Ezk 23 23); (g) rabhr'bhānīn, 'magnates,' 'great ones' (Dn 4 36, 5 1, 9, etc.). (5) In the N T we have (a) δεσπότης, 'ruler,' 'master,' as a designation of God (Lk 2 29; Ac 4 24; II P 2 1; Jude ver. 4; Rev 6 10); (b) κύριος, the ordinary Gr. term for master or lord, is also the equivalent through the LXX. of both 'ādhōnāy and Yahweh in the O T, as well as being the common designation of Jesus Christ. In I Ti 6 15 the verbal form κυριεύων (ptcpl. of κυριεύειν) occurs with κύριος in the same sentence; (c) μεγιστάνες (Mk 6 21) is properly 'great ones,' 'magnates.' On Mk 10 51, cf. RV.

LORD'S DAY. See SABBATH, § 7.

LORD'S PRAYER, THE: The title traditionally given to the prayer that Jesus taught His disciples (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-5), better known in the older Catholic churches by its opening words (Pater Noster, Πάτερ ἡμῶν). It occurs in two different forms, and the differences suggest the question of the relations of these to one another. In Mt it is incorporated in the Sermon on the Mount; in Lk it is given in answer to the request of the disciples, 'Lord, teach us to pray, even as John taught his disciples,' presumably on an occasion which fell after the Galilean ministry. If these accounts of its first delivery are absolutely independent of each other, the prayer must have been given on two separate occasions. Inherently this is neither impossible nor improbable. But from the literary point of view it appears more likely that the version in Mt is adapted to the plan of the Evangelist, and represents a transposition of it to a different setting from the original. In such a case the parallel account of Lk is to be regarded as giving the exact circumstances of the delivery. The occurrence in both versions of the unusual word epiousios (rendered 'daily') indicates that the two forms are not independent. Most probably both versions are based on one translation of an original Aramaic adopted by Mt into the Sermon on the Mount and modified by Lk in accordance with his design of making the life and teachings of Jesus clear to Gentile readers. Of the two Lk's version is the older.

The omissions and changes made by each may be presented in parallel form:

Mt.	Lk.
Our father who art in heaven,	Father,
Hallowed be thy name.	Hallowed be thy name.
Thy kingdom come.	Thy Kingdom come.
Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.
Give us this day our daily bread.	Give us day by day our daily bread.
And forgive us our debts.	And forgive us our sins;
As we also have forgiven our debtors.	For we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us.
And bring us not into temptation,	And bring us not into temptation.
But deliver us from the evil one.

The prayer is a unit, and altho extra-Biblical parallels of some of its phrases have been pointed out in Rabbinical sources, it does not appear that Jesus compiled the whole from such preexisting forms (against Wetstein, on Mt 6 9). The similarities alleged are for the most part verbal, and the sources from which they are drawn of much later date than the times of Jesus. The purpose for which the prayer was given is not defined with precision. Evidently, however, it was neither to furnish a stereotyped form which should do away with the free expression of the individual at the throne of God, nor, on the other hand, to show the true nature of prayer to those who were totally unaccustomed to it. The disciples both knew and used prayer; but they had misleading and confusing models before them in the practise of the Pharisees. It was as a corrective of these, and at the same time as a comprehensive summary of all that might properly find a place in their devotional utterances, that the ideal was given.

The contents of the Lord's Prayer (as given in Mt) are usually outlined as consisting of seven petitions: (1) Hallowed be thy name. (2) Thy Kingdom come. (3) Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. (4) Give us this day our daily bread. (5) Forgive us our debts. (6) Lead us not into temptation. (7) Deliver us from the evil one. Of these the fourth is beset by obscurity in both versions. This is occasioned by the use of the term ἐπιούσιος (deriv. uncertain; possibly through the ptcl. of ἐπιέναι, 'to be at hand') which occurs nowhere else, either in Biblical or in classical Greek. The explanations of the term proposed are: (1) That it means bread of subsistence, i.e., sufficient; (2) bread for the morrow; (3) but best of all, because of the customary time of prayer in the evening, as having reference to the bread that shall be immediately needed (cf. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Wörterbuch<sup>1</sup> (1893); Chase, The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church, Texts and Studies (1891). The seventh petition is omitted in the Lucan version. The word 'evil' in it is in the original (πονηροῦ) capable of being read either as a neuter ('evil' in general or as a masculine ('the evil one'—Satan). The latter sense is, on the whole, the most probable.

LORD'S SUPPER, THE (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, I Co 11 20); also often called the Eucharist, from the Gr. εὐχαριστεῖν 'to give thanks' (cf. Lk 22 19; Mt 26 27; Mk 14 23): The name of the ordinance (sacrament) observed from the earliest Apostolic days to signify the communion of the disciples of Jesus Christ in His sacrificial death, and to commemorate that death as well as to draw the disciples together into a closer fellowship with one another. There are four accounts of the institution of the ordinance (Mt 26 26-29; Mk 14 22-25; Lk 22 15-20; I Co 11 23-26). According to their differences these fall into two groups, Mt and Mk, and Lk and Paul respectively. Mt and Mk say nothing of a formal institution of a new rite by Jesus. Luke and Paul do. In each of the groups one account is primary and the other secondary. Mt is dependent on Mk, and Lk on Paul. Reduced to their primitive forms the sources show that Mk represents Jesus as introducing the elements with the simple formula, 'Take ye'; and Paul reports Him to have added, 'This do in remembrance of me.' The question must therefore be raised whether Jesus originally used the fuller form given by Paul, or the simpler one by Mk. If the former be true, then Jesus instituted the sacrament, and with such additions and developments in meaning as may be traced in the history of its observance, it has been perpetuated by the Church to the present day. If, on the other hand, it is Mk who gives the original and correct account, the occurrence in Paul's version of the command, 'This do in remembrance of me,' must be explained. The phrase may be (1) an addition of Paul's, on his own initiative. In this case, the ordinance as a permanent institution must be regarded as a creation of Paul's. But this is scarcely probable from the historical point of view. Paul, as a late comer into the community, would not have ventured to tell eye-witnesses what the exact facts had been upon any definite historical occasion. But (2) Paul may have embodied into his account a later addition to the words used by Jesus. Yet, how could such an addition have arisen? Spitta (Urchristentum, 1893) answers that if Jesus died on the 14th of Nisan (the very day of the Passover), His death broke up the whole tenor of the lives of His disciples, and made it impossible for them to enter into the festivities engaged in by the rest of the people. But by the law of Nu 9 10, the disciples must have returned to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover on the 14th of Iyyar. This accounts for the fact that they were found at Jerusalem at that time. But in observing the Passover in the light of what had occurred, they saw the death of their Master very differently; the parallel between Jesus and the paschal lamb, slain at the same hour in which He died, forced itself upon them, and the idea that He was the Passover sacrifice dawned on their minds; but with the awakening of this idea came the peculiar meaning of the Lord's Supper. The original circumstances were lost sight of, and new words and acts imagined in their places. Paul simply reproduces this account of later origin. (3) Professor Briggs proposes the conjecture that Jesus met His disciples between His resurrection and His ascension, and having again sat at supper with them repeated the words He spoke on the night of His betrayal, explaining more fully their sacrificial and sacramental significance, especially with reference to the Sinaitic covenant (Ex 24 1-12), and then added the charge to commemorate His death, reported by Paul. Paul simply combined the record of the two occurrences into one in I Co 11 23 ff. (The Messiah of the Gospels, p. 123). These theories seem too ingenious to represent the true history, and have found no favor with critical investigators. From the point of view of pure probability they have no advantages over the harmonistic theory which would make the account of Paul the fuller, and that of Mk the more defective, report of the same event. There is only one ground on which it can be claimed that Mk's account is more primitive than Paul's, and that is the fact that it omits a feature contained in the other. Chronologically, Paul's was given in a written form earlier than Mk's, and in an oral form it had evidently been preached to the church at Corinth still earlier. In the absence of stronger grounds for doubting the authenticity of the whole account as given by him, the best explanation of the facts is that his report is full, and Mk's omits one feature of the affair, less important from the point of view of his purpose.

Upon the ground of the facts as above stated, it appears that for the body of the followers of Jesus the supper was to be an institution commemorative and symbolical, both of what Christ accomplished through His death, and of what He was to be to them continually; that it was to symbolize the union of His followers with Himself; and also to serve as a method of its progressive realization. In bringing His death to the memory, it should signify the sacrificial nature of that death as a basis of a new covenant. The underlying assumptions are that the covenant is a relationship of the most cordial and intimate kind, that in order that it may exist all sources of offense must be removed, and that in the case of man's relation to God the source of offense was sin, therefore it must be obliterated by a sacrifice. (See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 8.)

The Lord's Supper, however, was to be not only a memorial festival, but also a symbol of Christ's present relation to the believer. Through the bread and the cup the believer was to represent to himself the nourishing and strengthening of his inner life by communion with Christ. It has been alleged, upon the basis of comparative religion, that in the pagan faiths there are parallels to the eating of food which is believed either to be, or to represent, the Divine life and thus to bring the worshiper into vital relations with the Deity. Thus in the cult of Dionysus, a bull which was regarded as the incarnation of the god of fertility, was torn and its flesh eaten raw, in order that his divine life might be transmitted to those who took part in the ceremony. (Cf. other illustrative details in Frazer, Golden Bough, II, 260-300; Percy Gardner, Expl. Evang., 240 ff.) But whether such antecedents underlay the Christian sacrament at its inception or not, it is evident that its meaning was primarily that of the mystic infusion of the spirit of Christ symbolized in the external act of the eating of a common meal. The thought is dimly present in the sacrificial festival-meal of the earlier Israelitic ritual. (Cf. SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 3.) The institution was doubtless developed out of the O T Passover, and conveys in an exalted and spiritualized form the idea that in partaking of a sacrifice one enters into communion with God. This is only a part of the significance of the Lord's Supper, but it is a prominent part. On the other hand, while it is possible to lay undue stress on the influence of ideas drawn from the mystery cults of pagan religions on the Lord's Supper, it is not necessary to deny the kinship between the symbolism used in the institution and the sacraments of the mystery cults, in order to realize its spiritual import. Even in such passages as Jn ch. 6 the main stress is on the spiritual significance of the metaphorical language; and the Church in the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic ages clearly perceived this.

The words, 'Having given thanks' in Lk 22 17-19 (εὐχαριστήσας . . . εὐχαριστήσας), denoting probably an act in the old paschal ritual, have served as the ground for one of the names of the Lord's Supper in the historical usage of the Church (the Eucharist).

For the modern mind, the meaning of the Lord's Supper, as presented in the N T, may be found (1) in the commemorative aspect of it, bringing to mind the redemptive death of Christ, (2) in the expression of communion with God under the new covenant, (3) in the communion of the disciples with one another, (4) in the promotion of the spirit of gratitude (Eucharist) for redemption, and (5) in the realization of the anticipation of the completed redemption in the future ('till he come').

LO-RUHAMAH, lō''ru-hē'mā (לֹרְחָמָה, lō' rāhāmāh), 'not pitied': The name of one of Hosea's children. She was probably so named by the prophet in view of his wife's infidelity to him. Later when his domestic tragedy enlightened him as to the religious condition of Israel, he used the name symbolically of Israel (Hos 1 6, 8, 2 23). See HOSEA, § 2.

LOT (לֹט, lōṭ): According to J, the kinsman of Abram, who emigrated with him from Haran to Canaan (Gn 12 4a), where the relatives at length separated on account of strife between their herdsmen. L. took his flocks and his herds to the fertile plain of the Jordan, and ultimately dwelt in the wicked city of Sodom (13 5-13). Angelic guests (cf. He 13 2) warned L. of the impending doom of the cities of the plain (19 1-13; cf. Lk 17 28 f.), and he escaped with his two daughters to the little city of Zoar (19 15-23). His daughters' husbands, however, ridiculed his fears and refused to leave Sodom (19 14), and his wife (see LOT'S WIFE) also perished. From Zoar, L. and his daughters fled to the hill-country E. of the Jordan, where they lived in a cave (19 30). Here, of incestuous unions, were born Moab, 'seed of father,' and Ben-ammi, 'son of kinsman,' (19 31-38), the ancestors of the Moabites and the Ammonites (cf. Dt 2 9, 19; Ps 83 8). According to the document in Gn 14, whose age and origin are much disputed (see CHEDORLAOMER), he was captured in a raid by the eastern kings, but was rescued by his uncle Abram (14 12-16). According to P, L. was the son of Haran, Abram's brother, and came with him from Ur of the Chaldees (Gn 11 27, 31; 12 5).

Most modern scholars explain the story of L. as personifying the characteristics, migrations, and alliances of certain tribes of which he was the supposed ancestor (see PATRIARCHS). The name is apparently identical with Lōtan, 'son' of Seir (=Esau), and 'father' of the Horites (Gn 36 20, 22, 29), and is perhaps to be equated with Lutn (Rutn), an early Eg. name for Palestine. Lot would thus be the aboriginal population of the lands later occupied by Moab and Ammon. The ancestry of the hated nations Moab and Ammon was intended to be brought into disrepute through the punning story of their shameful origin. The rescue of Lot by Abram (Gn ch. 14) belongs to a unique portion of the Pentateuch, which must be studied with the aid of the commentaries.

In rabbinical literature L. is usually represented in an unfavorable light as self-indulgent and quarrelsome (cf. JE, s.v.). The Koran, however, frequently refers to him as a preacher of righteousness (e.g., Sura 29 27 f.; cf. II P 2 7), and calls the Sodomites 'the children of Lot.' The modern Arabic name for the Dead Sea is Bayr Lūt, 'the sea of Lot.'

LOT: (1) The Heb. word gōrāl, always rendered 'lot,' 'lots,' is probably derived from the root grl, which appears in Arabic words, meaning 'stones,' 'stony place,' etc.; since in the primitive method of 'casting lots' stones were probably used. In Pr 16 33 the lot is said to be 'cast into the lap,' and it may be inferred that stones (marked in some way) were placed in the fold of a garment or, perhaps more often, in a vessel of some sort, and then the shaking of the garment, or vessel, would throw a stone out on the ground, according to which the decision was given. Hence the expressions 'the lot came forth' (Heb. 'came up,' or 'out'), or 'fell.'

Other methods, however, may have been employed, to which these same terms would apply. The lot was but one means of divination employed by the Hebrews. Others were the ephod (q.v.) and the Urim and Thummim (q.v.). The lot was used to determine such cases as the inheritances of the tribes (Nu 26 55; Jos 14 2, etc.), the courses of the priests, and Levites (I Ch 6 54 f., 24 5, 26 14), the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lv 16 8 f.), the discovery of one guilty of some sin (Jon 1 7); i.e., in cases in which Divine guidance was desired, or in which the decision was left to chance (cf. the two N T instances, Ac 1 26 and Mk 15 24 and ||s, where the Gr. is κλήρος). In a few cases the word is used to indicate one's fate or condition in life (Pr 1 14; Is 17 14; Jer 13 25). In other cases the term is used for the landed inheritance resulting from the lot (Jos 15 1; Jg 1 3; Ps 16 5, etc.). (2) In a few instances 'lot' renders the Heb. hebhel, 'line' (Dt 32 9; I Ch 16 18; Ps 105 11). See LINE.

LOTAN, lō'tan (לֹטָן, lōṭān): The ancestral head of a Horite (cave-dwelling) clan of the same name (Gn 36 20-29; I Ch 1 38). Some connection between Lotan and Lot, Abram's nephew, is likely (Skinner, ICC on Gn 11 27). Note that Lot dwelt in a cave (Gn 19 30). See LOT.

E. E. N.

LOT'S WIFE: The wife of Lot is said by the J document to have disobeyed the angelic command (Gn 19 17) while fleeing from Sodom, and to have looked backward, whereupon she became a pillar of salt (19 26). Christ refers to her fate as a warning against thinking of the safety of worldly goods at the advent of the Son of Man (Lk 17 32).

Salt formations are common near the S. end of the Dead Sea. Jebel Usdum, 'Mount Sodom,' is a ridge of rock salt 5 m. long and several hundred ft. high. Near its base are numerous detached pinnacles of salt, and at different times particular 'pillars' have been popularly identified with Lot's wife (Wis 10 7; Jos. Ant. I, 11 4; or by the modern Arabs with 'Lot's daughter'; cf. the frontispiece in Stanley's Sinai and Palestine).

LOVE: 1. Early Form of Conception. The idea of love occupies a central place in the religion of the Bible as a whole. In the earlier writings the conception is that of a human affection as between individuals of the same sex or of opposite sexes. David's tender feeling toward Jonathan and Jonathan's toward David is love ('ahābhāh, II S 1 26). But in the same passage the ideal of such love in its full strength and purity is recognized to be the love of a woman (cf. Gn 29 20; Ezk 16 8, 23 17). This is a conception which naturally does not disappear in later Biblical usage (Song 2 4 f., 3 5, 8 6 f.; Ec 9 6).

2. Love of God to Man. (1) In the O T. The prophets seize upon this conception, and use it as the figure of the particular feeling of J' toward Israel. The first to present God as loving His chosen people is Hosea (Hos chs. 1-3, and 11 4). But the thought is taken up by Jeremiah (2 2, 31 3), and becomes very common—in fact, characteristic—of the relation in which J' is represented as sustaining to His people (Is 63 9). He is the Shepherd, the Father, the Guardian, in all of which capacities He is actuated by the tenderest affection. (2) In the N T. At the very outset, the teaching of Jesus reveals love as the central and dominant affection of God. In fact, God's love is all-comprehensive, not being limited to any race, but extending beyond the bounds which the O T seers had seen as limiting it. In the Synoptics, the revelation is contained implicitly in the various phases of the doctrine of God's fatherhood. In the Johannine reports of the teaching of Jesus it is explicit (Jn 3 16). The conception is fully presented by Paul (Ro 5 5, 8 35, 39), and by John (1 Jn 4 8 f., etc.) as the basis of redemption from sin.

3. Love of Man to God. (1) Love to J' in the O T. The love of the faithful to God is even more clearly defined. It is a condition of the normal life, which results in blessing (Ex 20 6), and must reach the highest possible pitch of intensity and the largest fulness (Dt 6 5). This is the note that remains constant in the religion of Israel amidst its changing forms of thought and worship. From the Song of Deborah (Jg 5 31) to the Psalms of the latest period (Ps 145 20, 146 8) the love for J' is a characteristic of the Israelite, and the ground of the good pleasure of J' in him. (2) Love to God in the Teaching of Jesus. But tho this condition is at the root of obedience to the Law of God throughout the O T, it assumes a new significance in the teaching of Jesus, who fixed the eyes of His disciples upon it, as distinguished from its consequences. It was possible to entertain regard for these consequences and obey the Law outwardly from motives other than love. On the law of love the commandments and the prophetic teachings had grown as ripe fruit upon a living plant (Mt 22 40). Apart from this connection they would be futile. What it was necessary to strive for and attain was not obedience to commandments as such, but conformity to the will of God because of love to Him. The teaching of the N T throughout is simply the unfolding of this principle. Hence the idea of love is raised into the place of a new commandment (Jn 13 34). It is even called the 'law' (Ja 2 8).

4. Love Among Men. (1) Love the Basis of Ethics. The law of love is through the N T the basis of Christian ethics. What Jesus says of the fundamental and controlling place of love in the O T ethics He means to apply to all ethics, and both Paul and James make the application accordingly. Every commandment intended to govern the relations of men is fulfilled in the commandment of love (Gal 5 14; Ro 13 8). (2) Brotherly Love. But the law of love reaches its intensest and fullest expression in the peculiar bond which faith in Jesus Christ creates among its individual possessors. These constitute a brotherhood; and the love that brings and keeps them together is brotherly love (φιλαδελφία). When the affection is commended to them, it is done by the use of the same term (He 13 1). What distinguishes the believer's feeling toward God and Christ is, however, specifically ἀγάπη, 'the love of delight.' Christian love is thus the distinctive element of the fully developed religion of the Bible. As such it is made the subject of special treatment in two particularly significant passages (1 Co ch. 13; 1 Jn ch. 4) A. C. Z.

LOVE-FEAST. See CHURCH LIFE, § 2.

LOVING-KINDNESS: This is a predominantly Biblical word. It translates the Heb. hesedh, and this, in the main, when that word is used to express God's love to man. In many places, however, the same Heb. word, when used of God's love to man, was in AV rendered 'mercy' (Gn 19 19, 24 27, etc.), 'goodness' (Ex 34 6), 'kindness' (Ps 31 21), 'merciful kindness' (Ps 117 2). ERV, tho showing a preference for the distinctive term 'loving-kindness,' preserves in most of these passages the older term; but ARV introduces 'loving-kindness' throughout (cf. also Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v. רַחֲמִים, II). See also God, § 2. A. C. Z.

LOW COUNTRY, LOWLAND: The Heb. term sh'phēlāh (from shāphēl, 'to be low,' 'sink down') was given to the region between the central range of Palestine and the seacoast plain, which is partly highland, partly lowland, and, from the point of view of the highlander, continually 'falls' toward the sea. It is uniformly rendered 'lowland' in RV. The AV often renders it 'valley,' or 'vale' (Dt 1 7; Jos 9 1, 11 2, etc.), or 'plain' (1 Ch 27 28, etc.), only rarely 'lowland.' See PALESTINE, § 11, and cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 199-237. E. E. N.

LUCIUS, lū'shūs (Λούκιος): 1. Lucius of Cyrene, mentioned among the prophets and teachers in the church at Antioch (Ac 13 1). 2. Lucius, whom Paul calls his fellow countryman (συγγενής, Ro 16 21; cf. Ro 9 3). Possibly to be identified with 1. This is all the more likely if the Jason of Ro 16 21 and of Ac 17 5, 7, 9 are identical, and if the Sosipater of Ro 16 21 is the same as the Sopater of Ac 20 4. Origen (Hom. in Rom. 16 21) identifies L. with Luke (Λουκάς) the physician, but the names are philologically distinct. J. M. T.

LUD, lud (לֹד, lūdh), LUDIM, lū'dim (לֹדִים, lūdhīm): The name of apparently two races mentioned in the O T, a Semitic and an Egyptian. (1) The Semitic. According to Gn 10 22, Lud was one of the five sons of Shem. Commentators have very generally identified Lud with Lydus, the eponymous ancestor of the Lydians. The difficulty with this view is that the Lydians were not a Semitic race, and their civilization had no connection with that of Assyria. Possibly Lud was the name of a lost North Syrian tribe. (2) The Egyptian. The Ludim are said to be begotten by Mizraim, or Egypt (Gn 10 13—the phrase 'begot' denoting a geographical relation rather than actual descent). They appear as mercenaries in the Tyrian and Egyptian armies, and are famous as archers (Is 66 19; Jer 46 9; Ezk 27 10). Various conjectures have been made as to the identity of the Ludim. Some have cut the Gordian knot by emending the text and reading 'Libyans.' Others have regarded them as identical with Lud (Gn 10 22), i.e., Lydians. This conjecture is supported by the LXX. (Ezk 30 5), where 'Lud' is rendered 'Lydians.' According to this theory, Lydians were settled in NE. Egypt. Others have identified them with the Berber tribe Lewāta; still others with the Rebu=Lebu, who inhabited Cyrenaica (see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13). J. A. K.

LUHITH, lu'hith (לֹחִית, לֹחִית, lūhith): The 'ascent of Luhith' was in Moab, S. of the Arnon. According to Eusebius (Onom.), there was a place of that name between Areopolis (Rabbath-Moab) and Zoar. It was the way of escape for Moabites fleeing to Zoar (Is 15 5; Jer 48 5). C. S. T.

LUKE, LUKAS, (Λουκᾶς, probably pet name for Λούκιος): One of Paul's companions and fellow workers, identified by some, but improbably, with Lucius of Cyrene (Ac 13 1).

He is mentioned by name in only three passages, and all these are in the Epistles of Paul (Col 4 14; Phm ver. 24; II Ti 4 11). At the same time, the critical certainty of his authorship of the Third Gospel and the Book of Acts places at our disposal the so called diary passages in the latter writing (16 10-17, 20 5-21 18, 27 1-28 16) as additional sources for our knowledge of his life and work in the early Church. From the first passage (16 10-17) we learn that L. accompanied the Apostle from Troas to Philippi on his second mission journey. The second passage (20 5-21 18) tells us that some six years later, on the third mission tour, L. was again with Paul at Philippi, from which place he journeyed with the Apostle to Jerusalem. It may be that L. spent these intervening years in Philippi, carrying on, as the Apostle's representative, the work begun on the occasion of his first visit to the place. This would be the more likely if Philippi were L.'s home—as has been inferred (Renan)—tho the early tradition recorded by Eusebius (HE, iii, 4 6) and found in the ancient Argumentum Evangelii Secundum Lucan (c. 225 A.D.) makes him a native of Antioch or as belonging to an Antiochian family (see Ramsay, Luke the Physician, pp. 65-68). The third passage (27 1-28 16) shows him as Paul's companion on his voyage to Rome.

The references made to him by the Apostle are all in the Epistles written during his two imprisonments at Rome. In Col (4 14) he is mentioned simply as among those in Paul's company sending salutations to the Colossian Christians; similarly in Phm (ver. 24) he is among those greeting the Colossian Christians to whom the Apostle is writing; while in II Ti (4 11) he is spoken of as the only one who had remained faithfully by the Apostle as the fatal ending to his captivity drew near. While these items seem relatively unimportant, they show us that L.'s fidelity to Paul kept him at the Apostle's side through at least a portion of his first imprisonment—Col and Phm having been written previous to Ph which was composed near the close of that period. They also disclose him as with the Apostle at the end of his second imprisonment—II Ti being his last letter. It may well be, therefore, that he was with the Apostles during his brief return to his Eastern mission-field and his second journey as a captive to Rome.

The evidence gathered from the Third Gospel and from Ac that their author was a Gentile Christian is confirmed by the fact that in the Col passage L. belongs to the Apostle's fellow workers who are marked off from those 'who are of the circumcision' (ver. 11). That he was a Greek rather than a Roman is shown, not merely by his versatility, his appreciation of humor and his knowledge of the sea, but by his reference to the inhabitants of Malta as 'barbarians' (Ac 28 2-4), which was after the manner of a Greek. The reference to him in the Col passage as a 'physician' is amply borne out by the language of the Gospel and Ac (for full discussion see Harnack's Lukas d. Arzt [Eng. transl., pp. 175-198] and Plummer, Com., pp. lxiii-lxvi), while the literary quality of such portions of his writings as are most likely the products of his own style (e.g., the prolog of the Gospel and the diary sections of Ac) show him to have been a man of culture as well as of scientific education. For the theory that he had personal knowledge of the events given in his Gospel, whether or not his knowledge was dependable, see Cadbury, Expositor, 1922, pp. 401-420.

The legend which makes him a painter and assigns to him a picture of the Virgin found at Jerusalem is unreliable.

For discussion of his authorship of the Third Gospel and Ac, as well as his tendencies of theological thought, see articles on these books.

LUKE, GOSPEL OF: 1. Authorship. The third of the Synoptic Gospels (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 3). In common with all the narrative writings of the N T, it attaches to itself no name of author, tho, together with Ac, it states distinctly for whom it was written (1 3). In fact, this dedication is admittedly so like that of Ac that the reference in the latter to 'the former treatise' (1 1) is universally recognized as a reference to this Third Gospel; so that both books are acknowledged as being by the same author. This is confirmed by the significant continuity disclosed by the closing passage of the Gospel (24 44-53) and the opening passage of Ac (1 1-14) and by striking similarity in the general style and in the specific linguistic peculiarities of the two writings. (For a detailed display of these linguistic peculiarities cf. Plummer, in Int. Crit. Com., pp. xlviii-lxvi; Zahn, Introduction [Eng. transl.], § 61, notes 11-13.) This, however, is no help to a discovery of the author's identity, for Ac tells us nothing more of its author than does the Gospel. Our only recourse, therefore, is to a critical induction of the Gospel, with help from Ac, as to such indications as bear upon its origin.

(a) Outline. An outline of its contents presents the following narrative scheme:

Chs. 1 and 2 contain the introductory portion, consisting of the prolog (1<sup>1-4</sup>) and the preliminary history, i.e., the birth and early years of Jesus and the Baptist (1<sup>5-2</sup> 2<sup>52</sup>).

The remaining chapters are taken up with the narrative proper, which is divided into two parts: (I) The active ministry of Jesus (3<sup>1-21</sup> 22) and (II) His passion, resurrection, and ascension (22<sup>23-24</sup> 24<sup>53</sup>). (I) The active ministry is presented in a way which conceives of it somewhat differently from the way in which it is viewed by the other two Evangelists. After a preliminary narrative (3<sup>1-4</sup> 12), which gives the political situation at the opening of the Gospel events (3<sup>1, 2a</sup>), an account of the ministry of the Baptist (3<sup>2b-7</sup>)—to which is added an account of his death, later in the history (3<sup>19-4</sup>)—and an account of the induction of Jesus into His work, through His baptism (3<sup>21-4</sup>) and His temptation (4<sup>1-13</sup>)—between which is interpolated His genealogy (3<sup>32-38</sup>)—the Ministry in Galilee is taken up and presented as His popular work, i.e., His work among the people (4<sup>14-9</sup> 17).

In this, taking Mk's sequence of events as the standard, there are some displacements (e.g., 5<sup>1-11</sup> should precede 4<sup>21b-27</sup>, and 8<sup>1-18</sup> should follow 8<sup>19-21</sup>, while 11<sup>15-28</sup> has been placed in the later ministry, tho it should really precede 8<sup>19-21</sup>).

The reason for the first two misplacements may be due to document sources peculiar to the Evangelist; the reason for the latter will be apparent when we see that the period between the Galilean and the Jerusalem ministry is considered by the Evangelist as Jesus' Educational work, i.e., the work in which He gave Himself particularly to the instruction and training of His followers (9<sup>10-19</sup> 20); for this passage (11<sup>15-28</sup>) is looked at from this point of view, tho really it is part of the event recorded in Mk 3<sup>20-26</sup>, which occurred as the climax of the second preaching tour (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, § 6).

This educational work is represented as carried on (1) in regions near to Galilee (9<sup>10-30</sup>) and (2) in regions covered by journeys to Jerusalem (9<sup>31-19</sup> 20). The latter portion includes some significant discourses (e.g., those connected with the mission of the Seventy, 10<sup>1-24</sup>, with the request of the disciples concerning prayer, 11<sup>1-13</sup>, with the ceremonial criticism in the Pharisee's house 11<sup>17-12</sup> 12<sup>13</sup> [cf. 13<sup>10-17</sup>, 14<sup>1-14</sup>], with the request concerning inheritance 12<sup>18-21</sup>, and that concerning the signs of the times 17<sup>22-27</sup>) and a number of His more elaborate parables (e.g., the Good Samaritan 10<sup>25-37</sup>, the Rich Fool 12<sup>15-21</sup>, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Coin, and the Prodigal Son, ch. 15, the Unjust Steward and Dives and Lazarus, ch. 16, the Unjust Judge, 18<sup>1-8</sup>, the Pharisee and the Publican, 18<sup>9-14</sup>, the Ten Pounds 19<sup>11-27</sup>), and in its general contents is peculiar to the narrative of this Gospel, not being paralleled by either of the other Synoptics. The Jerusalem Ministry, with the public entry into the city, extends from 19<sup>28</sup> to 21<sup>38</sup>, consisting largely in controversies with the authorities, aroused by their challenging questions (20<sup>1-8</sup>, 20<sup>46</sup>), illustrated by parables (20<sup>9-19</sup>), and closed by His eschatological discourse (21<sup>5-38</sup>), all of which are paralleled by the other Gospels. (II) Then follows the narrative of the Passion (22<sup>1-23</sup> 24<sup>1-48</sup>), the Resurrection (24<sup>49-53</sup>), with the subsequent appearances to the disciples (24<sup>44-48</sup>)—which, in distinction from the other Gospels, are located in the neighborhood of Jerusalem—closing with the only account given by the Gospels of the Ascension (24<sup>51-53</sup>).

(b) Prolog. In the closer study of this outline it becomes at once apparent that the statements of the prolog are significant in their bearing upon the Gospel's origin; for they tell us (1) that there were in existence at the time of the Gospel's writing many written ordered narratives of the Gospel history (1<sup>1</sup>); (2) that these narratives were based, chiefly at least, upon oral tradition, handed down by those who participated in these events (ver. 2); (3) that these narratives, apparently not seeming satisfactory to the author, he had made an accurate investigation of all the facts from the beginning, on the basis of which he had written to Theophilus in chronological sequence (καθ' ἑξῆς), in order that he might know the certainty (ἀσφαλῆς) concerning the things (or 'words,' 'stories') in which he had been instructed (κατὰ ὃν κατηχήθης λόγον). As to the element of investigation in this process, however, see Cadbury in Expositor (1922), pp. 401-420.

These statements would seem to indicate that the author was not an eye-witness of the Gospel events, tho not necessarily outside of the Gospel generation; for his Gospel, while dependent upon an investigation of the facts, evidently accomplished that investigation through a personal examination of oral sources of information, rather than through a critical study of written documents. In addition, he states distinctly that these events occurred in the generation to which he himself belonged (cf. the γενεῶν of ver. 1).

(c) Literary Character. The fact that the author gave himself to such examination would seem to suggest that he was possessed of literary capacity, which is borne out by the classical character of the prolog itself and the essential superiority in style of the rest of the book over that of the other Gospels (cf. Plummer, as cited above). This is brought out conspicuously in Ac, where, in the portions which relate the author's personal experience (16<sup>10-17</sup>, 20<sup>6-21</sup> 18, 27<sup>1-28</sup> 16), he exhibits a literary style, which shows his ability to write when not constrained by the style of his sources (cf. these sections with the distinctly Aramaic style of the first half of the book). In fact, if it be claimed that the Aramaic style of the first part of Ac and of the chapters in the Gospel which immediately follow the prolog is due to the author's adaptation of his narrative to the distinctly Jewish events narrated, it simply shows in stronger light his literary versatility. From this it is natural to infer that the author was a Gentile Christian of Greek culture, which indeed has never been questioned by scholars.

(d) Pauline Character. A broader study of the Gospel's contents gives indication of a spirit and line of thinking which are strikingly like Paul's. Beyond a coincidence with Paul's Epistles in vocabulary and phraseology (cf. Plummer, pp. liv-lix for list), there is in the material peculiar to the Gospels such a breath of national view (e.g., 2<sup>32</sup>, 4<sup>25</sup> π., 9<sup>52-55</sup>, 10<sup>25-37</sup>, 13<sup>28-30</sup>, 24<sup>47</sup> [cf. Mt 6<sup>32</sup>, 10<sup>5</sup>, 13]) and such an emergence of characteristic Pauline doctrine (e.g., the graciousness of forgiveness, 7<sup>36-50</sup>, ch 15, 23<sup>39-43</sup>; the non-merit of mere works, 13<sup>24-30</sup>, 17<sup>7-10</sup>; the modifying influence of ignorance and unbelief, 12<sup>47</sup> f., 23<sup>34</sup>) that it seems reasonable to believe not only that the author was acquainted with Paul's teaching but that he selected his material in sympathy with it.

(e) Theophilus. As to the Theophilus addressed in these writings, he evidently was a Gentile, since the Gospel was written obviously for one who was not only unfamiliar with Palestine geography, but was not even acquainted with Jewish customs. He was also apparently a man of rank (κατάστατος; cf. author's use of this word in Ac 23<sup>26</sup>, 24<sup>3</sup>, 26<sup>25</sup>). There is no hint as to his residence, tho tradition places it at Antioch.

(f) Motive. The motive in sending him the Gospel is distinctly stated in the prolog to be in order that he might have certain knowledge of the matters regarding which he had been instructed (1<sup>4</sup>). From this it is evident that he was favorably inclined toward Christianity and had had some information, if not distinct instruction, regarding its claims. It was the author's purpose to win him fully to the new religion by placing before him in their full historical setting the Gospel stories (ἀγῶν) which had been told him.

(g) Time. As to the time when the Gospel was written, it must be clear from a comparison of 19 41-44 and 21 20-24 with parallels in Mt (24 15-28) and Mk (13 14-23) that the author is writing from a point of view taken when these events of the predicted catastrophe of Judaism had occurred. Both passages are peculiar to this Gospel and contain (especially 19 41-44) military terms, lacking in the other Synoptics, which would readily agree with the presence before the writer's mind of the actual events, while the announcement of the Parousia is connected, not so much with the definite event of the dountreading of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, as with the indefinite event of the times of the Gentiles being fulfilled (21 24), which would seem to place it further in the future, in the mind of the author, than in that of either of the other Synoptists (cf. the εὐθὺς of Mt 24 29 and the ἐν ἑξήναις ταῖς ἡμέραις of Mk 13 24 with the indefinite statement of Lk 21 25). If Luke was with Paul during his Caesarean imprisonment, he would have had abundant opportunity, both there and in Jerusalem, to secure information oral and written, tho if Mk was not written until near the close of Paul's Roman imprisonment (63 A.D., see MARK, GOSPEL OF), there would be no likelihood of his having known of that Gospel until his return with Paul to his final imprisonment, or of his having made use of it until after Paul's death (66 A.D.) and it had become established among the churches generally as the record of the Gospel history. Taking all things into consideration, therefore, it is not probable that it was written until after 70 A.D.; tho from its early currency in the post-Apostolic Church (see § 2 below) and much more from the early character of its thought (see § 4, below) it is not likely to have been much later than this date. Perhaps about 75 A.D. is most probable.

(h) Place. No information is given of its place of composition, tho perhaps, in view of the Gentile writer and the Gentile cast of the writing, it was more likely outside of Palestine than within it.

This induction leaves the Gospel a thoroughly possible product of the Apostolic age—in fact, in view of the statements of the prolog, makes it impossible later than the Gospel generation (see § 1 (b) above). It also discloses nothing which prevents its having been written by the man whose name it bears (see preceding article).

2. External Evidence. Both of these conclusions are borne out by the testimony of post-Apostolic literature. Its recognized currency in the Church can be traced back through Tatian (170 A.D.), who makes frequent and abundant use of it and Marcion (140 A.D.), by whom it was the only Gospel accepted and who held it in an abbreviated and corrupt form of text, showing that the original text was not a new production in history but had been long enough in use to undergo alteration, to Clement of Rome (100 A.D.), who seems to have had both the Gospel and Acts before him in his Epistle to the Corinthians. From the time of the Muratorian Canon (170 A.D.) onward the Gospel is distinctly referred to as Luke's, and this reference is made not as an individual opinion but as the accepted belief of the Church. For the selection of this name rather than that of an Apostolic eye-witness of the events, there must have been strong ground in the facts of the case.

The critical conclusion from the above internal and external study of the Gospel is that it was written by Luke, the companion of Paul (see preceding article).

3. Sources and Historic Value. That written narratives of the Gospel events were in existence when the Gospel was produced is distinctly stated in the prolog (1 1). It is most improbable, therefore, that tho Luke by preference made his investigation of facts through the personal sources at his disposal, he made no use whatever of the written sources at his hand. In fact, it is obvious that some of his material must have come from documents (e.g., the Genealogy, 3 23-38, the Annunciation narrative, 1 5-79, the Nativity story, 2 1-39, the Childhood record, 2 41-51. Note the evident conclusions of these documents, respectively at 1 80, 2 40, 2 52). Ramsay, however, as opposed to Plummer, considers that the character of the narrative points to an oral source (Was Christ Born in Bethlehem? p. 74 f.).

Beyond these individual cases it is clear that there are identities between this Gospel and the First Gospel which are so striking in character as to compel the conviction that a common document lies behind them (e.g., 3 7-10, 17=Mt 3 7-10, 12; 4 3-13=Mt 4 3-11; 6 41 f.=Mt 7 3-5; 7 6b-9=Mt 8 8-10; 7 22-28=Mt 11 4-11; 7 31-35=Mt 11 16-19; 9 58-60=Mt 8 19-22; 11 19 f., 23=Mt 12 27 f., 30; 11 24-26=Mt 12 43-45; 11 29-31=Mt 12 30-42). They can not be due to a mere use of the First Gospel by Luke, since they form only a portion of his parallels with this Gospel, the remainder showing such differences as to raise the question whether he had it before him at all when he wrote (but cf. Allen on Mt in ICC, pp. xlvii-lx). The fact that they are confined to the discourse parallels between these Gospels shows rather that behind them lay a collection of sayings of Jesus with more or less of narrative setting, from which collection these two Evangelists drew much of their discourse material in common, tho in distinctively different ways—Matthew making larger use of the original source as a whole and subjecting its contents to his arbitrary grouping plan, Luke using only excerpts of it—and with greater freedom of literary handling (cf. Allen, pp. lix ff., and for the origin and character of this source in general see SYNOPSIS PROBLEM, § 6.).

The historical value of the Gospel is in general supported by the historical accuracy of Acts, which is open at so many points to the tests of criticism and has so remarkably sustained its credibility. In fact, there have been but two specific objections lodged against the Gospel's historicity. The first has to do with the reference to the enrolment mentioned in 2 1 ff. It is claimed that Augustus never ordered a general enrolment to be made of the whole Roman world and that, even if he did, no enrolment was made in Judea until the governorship of Quirinius over Syria, 6-9 A.D. Egyptian papyri, however, disclose that in that country there were enrolments by households in periods of 14 years. If an enrolment was made in Syria in 6-7 A.D., a period of 14 years would place this 'first enrolment' to which Luke refers in 8-7 B.C., and the lack of disturbance on that occasion, as distinguished from the riot which marked the second (Ac 5 37), might have been due to the fact that it was an enrolment by households for the purpose of census enumeration, as Luke implies (2 3 f.), and not an enrolment of property for the purpose of taxation. It was this latter that characterized the enrolment of 6-7 A.D., when Judea had become part of the Roman province of Syria, and which brought about the disturbance. In addition, Herod, through caution, may have postponed the process a year or more, or, being the first enrolment, it may have been slow in getting under way. At all events, what Augustus had ordered was merely that the principle of enrolment-taking be established in the Roman Empire, Luke's reference being to its actual application in the province of Syria. Such delay, however, would give 7-6, more probably 6, B.C., as the year of Christ's birth. (See Chronology of N T, § 1). The second objection has to do with the governorship of Quirinius, mentioned in 2 2. It is claimed that his only governorship was from 6 to 9 A.D., when he ordered the enrolment referred to in Ac 5 37, and that Luke has ignorantly confused the dates. Apart, however, from the fact that there is inscriptional evidence to the effect that his governorship from 6-9 A.D. was his second governorship over Syria, it is shown from inscriptions discovered in 1912 and 1913 at Antioch in Pisidia, dating from 10-7 B.C. that he was engaged during that period in war in Cilicia, which belonged to the province of Syria, and that he held military rule in that province. Consequently, it would be quite possible that, while Varus, as is known, held the administrative governorship of Syria at that time, Quirinius held a special military rulership over that province, for which Luke would have no other word than ἡγεμὼν (or ἡγεμονεύων [ptēpl.]), 'governor.' The time of this rulership would give him a more exact date for Christ's birth than if he had connected it with the general period of Varus' administrative office. It would seem, therefore, that, far from opening himself to the charge of inaccuracy, Luke has given us information of specially historical worth. The old contention that Luke was dependent for his political dates and facts on Josephus, whose writings he misread, has been generally abandoned. In fact, when their statements can be tested, it is Luke who is more generally found to be accurate and Josephus more often guilty of exaggeration and error.

(For full discussion of these objections see Ramsay's Was Christ Born in Bethlehem? and Bearing of Recent Discovery on N T, pp. 238-275.)

4. View Point. The presentation which Luke makes of the teachings of Jesus and his selection among the incidents of the Gospel history bring to notice certain traits in his thinking which are worthy of consideration. (1) As to God: Luke represents Jesus as declaring not only the sovereign power (18 27) and absolute goodness of God (18 18 f.), but also His Divine Fatherhood—primarily toward Jesus' own disciples, involving a relation to them of care and protection in the outcome of their life of trust and obedience to Him (12 32). At the same time, as compared with Matthew, he makes but slight use of the term Father, tho he alone records the parable of the Prodigal Son (ch. 15), which, in agreement with his spirit of universalism, implies a Fatherly relation extending beyond the circle of actual discipleship; while, unlike Matthew, he makes no use at all of the title King in his representations of Jesus' ascription of power to God, and records but one of the parables of Kingship and then eliminates this King-element from it (e.g., cf. 14 16 with Mt 22 2). (2) As to Jesus Himself: Luke presents Jesus as referring to Himself as the Son of Man and as the Son of God, tho the latter title He never explicitly uses of Himself in any of the Synoptics. By the former title He designates His relation to the Kingdom of God not only as its Founder, in which relation it is His function to seek and to save the lost (19 10), to forgive sins (5 24), to determine the significance and use of the Sabbath (6 5) and the conduct of the natural life (7 34), but as its Servant, in which relation He has to surrender the comforts of life (9 58) and to submit to the sufferings of persecution and to the sacrifice of death (9 22, 44, 18 31, 22 22, 48), in return for which, however, is to come to Him at last the glory of His revelation and His exaltation in the consummation of the Kingdom (12 8, 40, 17 22-30, 21 27, 36, 22 69). In these passages the reference to the redemptive function (19 10) and to the betrayal at the hands of Judas (22 22, 48) are peculiar to Luke. Tho, as said above, the title Son of God is never explicitly used by Jesus of Himself and the relationship which the title involves is implicitly asserted only in a few passages (Lk 2 40, 10 22 [Mt 11 27]; Lk 22 29, 42, 23 34, 46, 24 49 and the parable of the Vineyard, Lk 20 9-18 and [19], yet in this relationship there is claimed a unique intimacy with God, involving a mutual knowledge of incomparable character (10 22), a mutual harmony of will in absolute devotion on the filial side (22 42) and in absolute acquiescence on the Father's side (23 34) a distinct representativeness by way both of commission from God to His people (20 9-18, 22 29, 24 49) and of being entrusted by God with a work to be accomplished (2 49; cf. the consciousness of its accomplishment in the cry 23 46 [Jn 19 30]). It is to be noted that the seemingly deprecatory passage (Mk 13 32) does not appear in Lk, nor does the apparently despairing cry on the Cross, 'My God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34), while the final word of intimate trustfulness and the intercessory plea (23 34, 46) on the Cross, and the childhood passage of whole-hearted devotion (2 49) as well as the less significant statements of 22 29, 49 are given by Lk alone. Altho Jesus is thus represented as but in a slight way referring to His personal relationship with God, He is at the same time shown as acquiescing in the application of this Divine title to Himself by others. This is significant in the two instances of the heavenly reference to Him as Son, where it is implied that He stands as the unique object of the Father's pleasure (3 22, 9 35), and in the Tempter's and in the Demoniac's reference to Him as the Son of God, where His possession of supernatural power is implied (4 3, 9, 8 23). Mark and Matthew record other occasions on which the title is given to Jesus, both by His friends and by His enemies; Luke, however, but twice records such references, and these are by the demons at Capernaum (4 41) and by the high priest at His trial (22 70), in both of which cases the title is used apparently in nothing more than a Messianic sense. While Mark consistently presents Jesus throughout his narrative as the Wonder Worker, whose ministry impresses the people with its marvel, Luke begins his narrative with a nativity story in which the wonder element is developed throughout the story; alone of all the Synoptists, he applies to Jesus the title Lord (5 17, 7 13, 10 1 39, 41, 11 39, 12 42, 13 15, 17 5 f., 18 6, 19 8, 22 61, 24 3 34); and alone closes his narrative with the wonder of the Ascension and the promise of the sending of the Holy Spirit (24 49-51). It is noticeable that this Evangelist frequently represents Jesus not only as Himself holding communion with God in prayer (3 21, 5 16, 6 12, 9 18, 23 f., 11 1, 22 32, 41, 44 f.), but as urging prayer upon His disciples as the need of their spiritual life (6 28, 11 5-13, 18 1 f., 21 36, 22 40, 46). (3) As to the Kingdom of God: While Luke represents Jesus as making use of the current theocratic phrase 'the kingdom of God' ('kingdom of heaven' in Mt.), he is particular to bring out Jesus' conception of its non-national and non-political character. It is Luke alone who records Jesus' address at the Nazareth synagog, in which He discloses the narrowness of the people's national idea of the Kingdom (4 16-30); it is Luke alone who has preserved the parable of the Good Samaritan (10 25-37), the incident of the Ten Lepers (17 11-16), and Jesus' rebuke of His disciples' national bigotry, when they desired to punish the Samaritans for not receiving them on their journey (9 51-56), in contrast with which is Matthew's record of Jesus' instruction to the Twelve (10 5 f.; cf. also 15 24); and it is Luke alone who records Jesus' reply to the Pharisee's inquiry as to when the Kingdom of God should appear (17 20 f.), emphasizing the distinctive character of this teaching by showing the slowness with which Jesus' own disciples apprehended it (24 21; Ac 1 6). It might seem that in his version of the Beatitudes Matthew brings out more distinctly the spiritual nature of the Kingdom in his description of the character of its subjects (cf. Mt 5 1 f. with Lk 6 20 f.); but that Luke's conception of the Kingdom is not a physical one is evident from his portrayal of its spiritual characteristics in the parables of Grace and Forgiveness, which he alone records (e.g., Lost Sheep, ch. 15 3-7; Lost Coin, 15 8-10; Prodigal Son, 15 11-32; Dives and Lazarus, 16 19-31; Pharisee and Publican, 18 9-14; cf. 7 36-50). He has also emphasized more than the other Synoptists the conditions of suffering and self-sacrifice necessary for entrance into it (cf. 9 61 f., 14 28-35, 16 1-13). In agreement with this spiritual conception of the Kingdom, it is noticeable that Luke does not record those parables of the Kingdom which represent it as an objective good to be appropriated by men (Hid Treasure Mt 13 44; Costly Pearl, Mt 13 45 f.; cf. the parable of the Great Supper, 14 16-24 = Mt 22 2-14; emphasizing the graciousness of the invitation rather than the material benefit of the feast). It is also in agreement with this spiritual idea that he brings out the universal purpose of the Kingdom (cf. the added citation in 3 6, the notes of universalism in the Nativity section, 1 7, 2 32, the historical statements, 4 25-27, the commission to the Seventy 10 1 f., the Gentile factor in the Kingdom's future 21 24). At the same time, it is strange that he makes no record of Jesus' ministry in the regions of Tyre and Sidon (cf. Mk 7 24-8 26 and Mt 11). See SYNOPSIS PROBLEM, § 7. (4) As to the Messianic Salvation: Luke seems to represent Jesus as assigning eternal life to the world to come (18 30), and yet he makes clear that the salvation which Jesus bestows upon His disciples covers the present as well as the future life (ibid.). It does not consist in material things (12 33); in fact, he shows in the parable of the Rich Fool in what glaring contrast to them it stands (12 16-21). At the same time, it more than makes up for the loss of these things (18 29 f.), and even seems to secure them in the best sense of their possession (12 22-31). As to the general conditions on which this salvation is bestowed, Luke presents Jesus as laying emphasis upon the significance of personal relations to Himself (10 16, 12 8; cf. 10 21-24). In the matter of the more definite conditions of repentance and faith, however, he makes but slight mention of the former of them, representing Jesus as speaking of repentance but twice—once in His earlier ministry (5 32) and again in His closing commission to His disciples (24 47). He gives more prominence to faith, mentioning it several times as referred to by Jesus (5 20, 7 9, 7 50, 8 48, 8 50, 17 19, 18 8, 42, which is natural in one so Pauline in his way of thinking as this Evangelist. (See § 1d, above.) At the same time it is remarkable that as to the means by which the bestowal of this salvation is made possible, he alone does not refer to the death of Jesus (cf. Mk 10 45 and Mt 26 28), beyond recording His general remark to the disciples on the way to Emmaus (24 25-29). On the other hand, it is noteworthy, as an early element in his thinking, to what an extent Luke—as James in his Epistle—connects poverty and humbleness of social rank with possession of the blessings of the Kingdom (cf. Parable of Dives and Lazarus, ch. 16; the Lukan version of the Beatitudes, ch. 6; the O T passage read by Jesus in the Nazareth Synagog, 4 18; and the following: 12 33 [cf. Mt 6 19], 3 11, 5 11, 28 [cf. Mt 4 22, 9 9], 6 27, 30, 38, 11 41, 14 12-14, 21, 33, 19 8). (5) As to Eschatology: Luke has blended many of the teachings of Jesus regarding the progress and development of His Kingdom with His announcement of its consummation at His Second Coming (e.g., cf. eschatological address, ch. 21, and the passage and parable, 17 20-18 8), tho, as said under (3) above, the spiritual character of this development and consummation is perhaps more conspicuous in Lk than in the other Synoptics (cf. 17 20-18 8). So also in the presentation of the Judgment Luke blends Jesus' teachings as to the process of judgment with those as to its final pronouncement; tho he is less inclined than the others to display the crisis element in it (cf. 13 25-27 with Mt 7 21-23, 6 43-45 with Mt 12 33-37), which also is in agreement with his conception of the definite spiritual character of the Kingdom. Along with these profounder ideas one should not lose sight of the fact that Luke seems to exhibit in his choice of material, particularly his Parables (6), a special appreciation of Prayer, (a) in its significance as observed by Jesus (3 21, 5 16, 6 12, 9 18, 29, 11 1, cf. 22 31 f.), (b) in the need of its observance by others (cf. Parables which enjoin persistence in prayer, 11 5-13, 18 1-8, and the value of real prayer 18 11-14, as also the admonitions to the Twelve, 21 36, 22 32, 40 (7) a peculiar tenderness toward the Sinful (Cf. the three Parables of ch. 15; also 7 36-50, 19 2-10, 23 39-43 (Note [1]); and (8) a marked sympathy with the poor (1 63, 2 24, 4 18, 6 20, 7 22, 14 13 f., 16 20, 25).

LITERATURE: Among the Introductions, those of Jülicher (Eng. trans., 1904) and Zahn (Eng. trans., second edition, 1917) best represent respectively the liberal and conservative elements in German scholarship. Moffatt, The New Test. Introduction, in the International Theol. Library (1911), pp. 261-282, represents the more critical English view-point. In addition to these the following shorter introductions should be consulted: Bacon, *New Test. LUNATIC: The AV rendering of Gr. σεληνιαζόμενος (fr. σελήνη 'moon') for which RV substitutes 'epileptic.' See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, III.

LUST: The rendering in verbal and substantive forms of several Heb. and Gr. words: (1) In the O T the noun does not occur in RV; on Ex 15 9; Ps 78 18, 81 12 (all AV), cf. the more correct rendering in RV. (a) 'āwāh, 'to desire,' or 'to wish'; the special sense is to be determined by the context (Nu 11 34; Ps 106 14, and in AV Dt 12 15, 20 f., 14 26). In Nu 11 4 we have ta'āwāh, lusting AV, from the same root. (b) hāmādh, 'to desire,' stronger than (1), usually rendered 'covet' (Pr 6 25). (2) In the N T. (a) The noun ἐπιθυμία, of frequent occurrence, is usually rendered 'lust.' In itself this term means simply 'desire,' and can be used of the noblest and purest sentiments (cf. Lk 22 15; Ph 1 23); but where it is rendered 'lust,' it indicates desires after mere material things, or the lower physical appetites and passions (Mk 4 19; Jn 8 44; Ro 1 24; Gal 5 16; II Ti 2 22, 3 6, etc.). In Mt 5 28; I Co 10 6; Gal 5 17; Ja 4 2 the related verb ἐπιθυμῶ, 'to lust,' and in I Co 10 6 the derivative noun ἐπιθυμητής, 'one who longs for,' occur. (b) ἡδονή (Ja 4 1, 3 AV) is rendered more properly by RV 'pleasure.' (c) The phrase ἐν πλάτῃ ἐπιθυμίας ('in the lust of concupiscence,' I Th 4 5 AV) is rendered literally by RV 'in the passion of lust.' (d) ἐρεξίς, in Ro 1 27 means properly 'sensual desire.' (e) In Ja 4 5 ἐπιποθεῖν is rendered more correctly by 'doth long unto' in RV.

LUTE. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (3), (b).

LUZ, luz (נֶלֶז, lūz): 1. A noted place in Canaan (Gn 35 6, 48 3), renamed Bethel (Gn 28 19; Jg 1 23) by Jacob, on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin (Jos 16 2, 18 13). In Jos 16 2 it is distinguished from Bethel. Perhaps Bethel was the original name of the sanctuary E. of Luz. See BETHEL. 2. A town N. of Canaan, founded by a refugee from Luz (Bethel), which was taken by Ephraim (Jg 1 23). Site unknown.

LYCIA, liśh'-i-ā. See ASIA MINOR, III, 7.

LYDDA, lid'-ā. See Lod.

LYDIA lid'-i-ā (Λυδία): One of Paul's early converts in Europe, a native of Thyatira (Ac 16 14), in the district known as Lydia. The omission of all mention of L. by Paul in his Epp. renders it probable, that Λυδία is an adjectival form = 'the Lydian,' and not the convert's personal name. Only Λύδη (Lyda) is found in inscriptions as a proper name (cf. CIG, Nos. 653, 6975). Perhaps, therefore, L. may be identified with one of those women who in Ph 4 2 are said to have labored with Paul in the Gospel. See EUODIA; and ASIA MINOR, III, 8.

LYE: The rendering of the Heb. nether (Jer 2 22 RV; 'nitre' AV), the equivalent of the Gr. νίτρον, Lat. nitrum, i.e., natron, or carbonate of soda (cf. Pr 25 20), a mineral alkali, which, at least in later times if not as early as in the time of Jeremiah, when mixed with oil was used as soap.

LYSANIAS, lai-sē'-ni-as (Λυσανίας): The tetrarch of Abilene, or the territory of the city of Abila, now Sak on the Abana river, nearly midway between Damascus and Heliopolis. The L. mentioned by Lk 3 1 was Lysanias II, and must not be confounded with Lysanias I, who in 40 B.C. inherited the throne from his father, Ptolemæus, son of Mennæus, and was executed by Antonius in 36 B.C. An inscription (Dittenberger, OGIS 606) of Abila dating from the reign of Tiberius speaks of a Lysanias (II) as tetrarch of Abilene at that time. It is thus clear that Abilene had been severed from the kingdom of Chalcis (that of Lysanias I) and that it formed a separate tetrarchy, at whose head stood Lysanias II. The name 'Lysanias' was probably a common one in the princely family. Lk 3 1 is correct.

LYSIAS, lis'-i-as (Λυσίας): 1. A general, appointed regent of Syria and guardian of his son and heir by Antiochus Epiphanes in 166 B.C. (I Mac 3 38 f.). He was defeated the following year at Bethsura by Judas Maccabeus (I Mac 5 34 f.; Jos. Ant. XII, 7 5). Two years later (163 B.C.), however, L. again invaded Judea and succeeded in reaching Jerusalem, Judas being unable to check him, and laid siege to the Temple-area in which Judas had taken refuge. Only the news of the arrival in Antioch of Philip, a rival, led L. to make terms with Judas and grant the Jews religious liberty (of which they had been deprived in 168 B.C.). L. returned to Antioch, defeated Philip, and continued to govern as regent and guardian of Antiochus V (I Mac ch. 6). Along with his ward, L. was put to death by order of Demetrius I in 162 B.C. (I Mac 7 2-4; Jos. Ant. XII, 10 1). 2. Claudius Lysias, a freedman of the Claudian gens, who was commander of the Roman cohort in Jerusalem at the time of Paul's arrest (Ac 21 31, 22 28). He permitted the latter to address the populace (Ac 21 39), protected him against their violence (Ac 22 24), and finally sent him under guard to Caesarea (Ac 23 23 f.).

LYSTRA, lis'trə (Λύστρα): A city of Lycaonia, with which province it passed, in 36 B.C., into the kingdom of Galatia, and on the death of Amyntas (25 B.C.)

into the Roman Provincia Galatia (see ASIA MINOR, III, 6). Of little importance historically, L. is known chiefly from Luke's mention of it in connection with the visits and preaching of Paul (and Barnabas). The site, now called Zaldera, 1 m. N. W. of Khatyn Serai (six hours' travel S. of Iconium) was first conjecturally identified with Khatyn Serai by Leake in 1820, a conjecture confirmed by Sterrett in 1885, through a Latin inscription on a pedestal (still in situ), which in the time of Paul supported a statue of Augustus (Divum Aug[ustum] Col[onia] Julia Felix Gemina Lustra consecravil d[ecreto] d[ecurionum]). Thus L. was a Roman colonia founded about 6 B.C., and coined money (only four coins are known). There are almost no remains of the old city and only a few inscriptions (chiefly Latin). L. was the home of Timothy (Ac 16 1), and Artemas, one of the seventy disciples, is said to have been first bishop of Lystra. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

MAACAH, mē'ə-ka, MAACHAH (מַאכָה, ma'ā-khāh): I. A district of Syria, near Mt. Hermon, and N. of Geshur (II S 10 4, 8; I Ch 19 6 f.), the home of the Maachathites (Dt 3 14; Jos 12 5, 13 11, 13; II S 23 34 [?]). See ARAM, § 4 (6). II. 1. A 'son' of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gn 22 24). As Nahor was an Aramean, this Maacah is probably the genealogical equivalent of I. 2. One of David's wives, the daughter of Talmi, King of Geshur, and the mother of Absalom (II S 3 3; I Ch 3 2). 3. The father of Achish, King of Gath (I K 2 39; but cf. I S 27 2); see MAOCH. 4. One of the wives of Rehoboam, King of Judah, and the mother of Abijah (I K 15 2; II Ch 11 20 f.); perhaps identical with 2. 5. The mother of King Asa (I K 15 13; II Ch 15 16); but there seems to be some confusion here with 2; see MICA, III, 6. 6. Caleb's concubine (I Ch 2 48), and probably the name of a clan rather than an individual. The term Maacathite, as used in II S 23 34; II K 25 23; I Ch 4 19 and Jer 40 8, may refer to members of this clan. 7. A Benjamite woman (I Ch 7 15 f.). 8. The wife of Jehiel, the 'father' of Gibeon (I Ch 8 29, 9 35). 9. The father of Hanun (I Ch 11 43). 10. The father of Shephatiah (I Ch 27 16).

MAADAI, mē'ə-dē'ai (מַדַּי, ma'ādhai): One of the 'sons' of Bani' (Ezr 10 34).

MAADIAH, mē'ə-dai'a (מַדְיָה, ma'adhyāh): The ancestral head of a priestly family (Neh 12 5; also called Moadiah in ver. 17).

MAAI, mē-ē'ai (מַאי, mā'ay): A Levite musician (Neh 12 36).

MAALEH-AKRABBIM, mē-al'i-ə-krab'im. See AKRABBIM.

MAARATH, mē'ə-rath (מַרְאֲתָה, ma'ārāth): A town of Judah (Jos 15 59). Site unknown.

MAAREH-GEBA, mē'ə-re-gī'bē (מַרְעֵי גֵבָה, ma'ārēh ghābha', meadows of Gibeah AV): A place near Geba (Jg 20 33). Probably the original reading was 'to the west of Geba'; cf. Burney, Judges, ad loc. For Geba see Map III, F 5. E. E. N.

MAASAI, mē'ə-sai (מַסַּי, ma'say, Maasai AV): A priest (I Ch 9 12), called Amashsai (Amashai AV) in Neh 11 13.

MAASEIAH, mē'ə-sī'ya (מַעֲשִׂיָּה, ma'āsēyāhū, and מַעֲשִׂיָּה, ma'āsēyāh), 'work of J': 1. A Levite appointed as singer when the Ark was brought from the house of Obed-edom (I Ch 15 18, 28). 2. A captain who joined Jehoiada against Athaliah (II Ch 23 1). 3. An officer under Uzziah (II Ch 26 11). 4. A son of Ahaz, slain by Ziehi of Ephraim (II Ch 28 7). 5. A governor of Jerusalem under Josiah (II Ch 34 8). 6. An officer of the Temple under Jehoiakim (Jer 35 4), probably the same as the following. 7. A priest in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 21 1, 29 25, 37 3). 8. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah (Jer 29 21). 9, 10, 11. Three priests who had foreign wives (Ezr 10 13, 21, 22). 12. One of the 'sons of Pahath-Moab' who had a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30). 13. The father of Azariah, who repaired the wall (Neh 3 23). 14. One who stood at the right of Ezra when the Law was read (Neh 8 4). 15. One who explained the Law (Neh 8 7). 16. One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 25 [26]). 17. A Judahite family name (Neh 11 5 = ASIAH, 4. 18. A Benjamite family name (Neh 11 7). 19, 20. Two priests (Neh 12 41 f.). Jer 32 12 and 51 59 AV have 'Maaseiah' for 'Mahseiah' RV. C. S. T.

MAASIAI, mē-as'i-ai. See MAASAI.

MAATH, mē'āfh (מַאֲתָה): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 26).

MAAZ, mē'az (מַאֲזָה, ma'atz): The head of a Jerahmeelite family of Judah (I Ch 2 27).

MAAZIAH, mē'ə-zai'a (מַעֲזִיָּה, ma'azyāh): The ancestral head of the 24th course of priests (I Ch 24 18), which was represented at the signing of the covenant (Neh 10 8).

MACCABEES, mak'a-biz, THE: The Maccabees, or Hasmoneans (sometimes Asmoneans), as they were also called, from Hashmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias, received their name from the title given to Judas, the second son of Mattathias. He was called Judas Maccabeus, i.e., Judas 'the Hammerer,' because, doubtless, of his vigorous assaults upon the Syrians. The title gradually included all the members of the family of Mattathias and their descendants. The attempt by Antiochus IV, Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) to force Greek worship upon the Jews brought on the crisis in which this

B.C. committed the leadership to (II) Judas. This vigorous young captain won victory after victory, and was able to restore the temple worship in three years after its defilement by Antiochus (Dec., 165 B.C.). The question of religious liberty being soon thereafter settled, the Maccabees, the tyranny of the Hellenistic party being intolerable, now set before themselves the larger ambition of political independence. For this Judas fought on against great odds, and at last fell in the battle of Elasa (161 B.C.). For seven years, with superb skill and unflinching zeal, he had defended the faith. The leadership was family came to leadership. The successors of Alexander the Great had taken up his policy of furthering Greek culture and customs among their subjects. Up to the time of Antiochus the Jews had been allowed religious freedom, but he, not content with the measure of Hellenization which had already been accomplished in Palestine, determined to make the Jews give up their religious rites and ceremonies, and adopt heathen practises. In the execution of his mad purpose he polluted the Temple, and sent his agents throughout the land to compel the people to worship idols. At the little town of Modin, where (I) Mattathias, an aged priest, and his five sons were living, the horror and anger of the Jews struck fire. The Syrian official who attempted to carry out the king's wish was slain, the idolatrous altar was overturned, and, with a call to all who wished to be faithful to the Law to come to them, Mattathias and his five sons fled to the mountains. The father lived but about a year after this, and at his death in 167 then given to his brother (III) Jonathan, whose successes were rather those of the politician than the warrior, altho he did not escape the disagreeable duties of war. He profited largely by the quarrels and intrigues of the Syrian court, and lost his life by a trap into which Tryphon, an aspirant for the Syrian throne, led him at Bethshan (143 B.C.). As John and Eleazar had both perished, there was only one son of Mattathias left, and the people called him heartily to lead them. His reign was short but brilliant. By his glowing zeal, unremitting energy, and clever diplomacy (IV) Simon achieved the independence of the nation (142 B.C.), and the troubles in Syria left him free to attend to the needs of his own government. He it was who drove the Syrians from the citadel in Jerusalem, where for twenty-six years they had disturbed the peace of the city. So completely did he free the land from the fear and trouble of war that 'every man sat under his vine and fig-tree, and there was none to make them afraid' (I Mac 14 12). In Sept., 141 B.C., the people in great assembly resolved that he should be civil governor, military chief, and high priest 'forever, until there should arise a faithful prophet' (I Mac 14 41). Thus his exalted position was made hereditary. Simon's reign was characterized by two important political acts—his embassy to Rome, and his coinage of money. It had been fitting that his prosperous career should end in a peaceful death; but, involved again in the turmoils of the court at Antioch, he was, with his two sons, treacherously murdered by his son-in-law at a banquet at Docus near Jericho, 135 B.C. (V) John Hyrcanus, the third son of Simon, by a timely warning, escaped the fate of his father, became his successor, and ruled the land for thirty-one years (135-105 B.C.). His reign is notable for its extension of the kingdom. Territory E. of the Jordan, also Samaria and Edom, were brought under his rule, and he was independent of the Syrian kings. His policy of conquest and employment of foreign troops awakened strong opposition. During his reign the Pharisaic party became a prominent factor in the life of the nation. The whole drift of his administration was away from their ideals, and their opposition caused him, near the end of his reign, to side with the Sadducees. On the whole, however, his rule was prosperous. Josephus pays him a high tribute of praise (Ant. XIII, 107). Hyrcanus left the government to his wife and the high priesthood to his eldest son (VI) Aristobulus. Trouble, however, came soon, for Aristobulus, ambitious to have full power, imprisoned his mother. Once at the head of the government, he showed his sympathy with the Sadducees, took the title of king, encouraged Hellenism, and carried on a war of conquest. He was called the 'Phil-Hellene.' A fatal illness ended his career in 104 B.C. Bad as this man was in the eyes of the Pharisees, he did not compare in shamelessness and infamy with his successor (VII) Alexander Jannæus, the third son of Hyrcanus. For twenty-six years (104-78 B.C.) this man fought, intrigued, and murdered in pursuit of his selfish ambitions, and won for himself a place among the reprobates of Jewish history. His reign was marked by fierce internal conflicts growing out of the opposition of the Pharisees. The outcome of his whole career was widened territory and external glory, but deep inner unrest and uncertainty. (VIII) Alexandra, his wife, succeeded him upon the throne, and her reign of nine years has been called the 'golden age' of Pharisaism. In every possible particular she reversed the policy of Jannæus. As Josephus says, 'while she governed other people, the Pharisees governed her.' The high priesthood was given to the indolent and incompetent Hyrcanus, eldest son of Jannæus, while the younger son, Aristobulus II, because of his shrewd, energetic and ambitious nature, was studiously kept out of power. He became the rallying center for the Sadducees, and used them for his own aims. The death of Alexandra in 69 B.C. brought (IX) Hyrcanus II to power, but his brother (X) Aristobulus II made him give up both his royal and high-priestly rank. At this time the Herodian house began to exert a dire influence on the affairs of Palestine. Antipater, father of Herod the Great, sided with the deposed Hyrcanus II, and Aristobulus II was shut up within the Temple enclosure. At this juncture there arrived in Syria Scaurus, Pompey's lieutenant, to whom both the rival parties appealed for aid. On this appeal (65 B.C.) Aristobulus II won the day. But Pompey himself came to Damascus in 63 B.C., and again the Roman authority was asked to decide. Aristobulus II, who foolishly determined to resist the demands of the Romans, was finally overcome and Judea became henceforth a Roman province. Her independence was taken away, and the Hasmonean rulership overthrown. Hyrcanus II was reappointed high priest, but he was simply a tool in the hands of the Idumean Antipater (q.v.) and the Romans. In the course of the succeeding years the Hasmoneans made desperate efforts to reinstate themselves in power. There was a charm about the very name which led the Jews to second these fruitless attempts. Thousands lost their lives in trying to put Alexander, the son of Aristobulus II, upon the throne in 57 B.C. Aristobulus II himself made another attempt in 56 and Alexander again in 55 B.C. All these attempts were frustrated by the Romans and Antipater. One last attempt did succeed, and for a while (40-37 B.C.) (XI) Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus II, was king of Judea. He accomplished this by calling in the help of the Parthians. His coins were stamped with the title 'King' on one side, and 'High Priest' on the other. He was, however, neither a statesman nor a general. In trying persistently to get revenge upon Herod, the son of Antipater, he wasted his energy and at last the Idumean overthrew him and put him to death in 37 B.C. Thus ended the dynasty of the Hasmoneans. Herod married Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, and by her had two children, Alexander and Aristobulus. All three were at last executed because of the cruel jealousy of Herod himself (see HEROD).

MACCABEES, BOOKS OF: Of the five books which bear this title only two (I, II) are usually included in the Apocrypha. The third is found in most MSS. and editions of the LXX.; the fourth in MSS.  $\aleph$  and A, and in MSS. of Josephus. The fifth is extant in an Arabic text printed in the Paris and London Polyglots, where it is accompanied by a Latin translation. These books differ greatly from one another in character and worth. Indeed, their worth is in general in accord with their order, the first being very valuable as a history and the fifth having no independent value whatever.

1. I Maccabees. (1) The Contents of I Maccabees. The brief, vivid narrative of this work begins with an account of the events which led to the Maccabean uprising (see MACCABEES, THE) and ends with the death of Simon. Its history covers thus the forty years between 175-135 B.C. In an introduction (1 1, 9) the author aims to show how the stream of Hellenism found its way into Judea, and then, taking up the story of the mad folly of Antiochus, he carries us on through the brilliant campaigns of Judas Maccabeus from 166-161 B.C. (chs. 1-9). While Judas is the real hero of the book, the narrative covers the successful administration of Jonathan (161-143 B.C.) and the prosperous reign of Simon (143-135 B.C.), to show how the aims of Judas were realized in both the religious freedom and political independence of the nation. In a simple, straightforward style it sets forth the heroic, triumphant patriotism of the brave souls who stood for the Law and God against fearful odds. It is the work of a true historian. Events are left to speak for themselves. In all that pertains to the struggle itself the account is trustworthy. It is only when it treats of foreign nations that mistakes are found (see Mac 1 2, 9, 8 2, 4, 6, 8 f., 15 f.). The work is in marked contrast to II Maccabees in its soberness and in its freedom from the miraculous. (2) Author, Place, and Date. All that can be said of the author is that he was a Palestinian Jew whose point of view is that of orthodox Judaism. His heart was with those who fought and planned so nobly for the nation's welfare. He wrote his work in Hebrew, and it has come down to us in a Greek translation. One singular fact, which all students of the book have marked, is the absence of the name of God. This is not due to an undevout spirit, but rather to a reticent faith. It is in the record of noble deeds that we must seek for the expression of faith. There are several hints which help us to the determination of the date, altho this can not be fixed within narrow limits (cf. 13 30, 16 23 f.). The friendly spirit toward the Romans (8 12-16) prevents us from dating the work as late as 63 B.C. The period of writing may be put at some time in the early part of the 1st cent. B.C. Some of the sources which the author has used are found in 8 22 f., 10 18-20, 25-45, 11 30-37, 12 6-15, 14 22-46, 15 16-21. These consist of letters and decrees. For the facts of the history he may have relied, in part, upon personal recollection, and, in part, upon the word of witnesses then living.

2. II Maccabees. (1) The Contents of II Maccabees. The narrative of II Mac begins with the attack upon the Temple by Heliodorus, the minister of the Syrian monarch Seleucus IV (175 B.C.), and ends with the victory of Judas Maccabeus over Nicanor (160 B.C.). For the few years which preceded the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes it is our sole authority. At the opening of the book are two letters (1 1-9 and 1 10-2 18), supposed to be written by the Jews in Judea to their countrymen in Egypt, inviting them to celebrate the feast of Dedication. These letters have no connection with the narrative, are from different hand, and are both forgeries. From 4 7 on, the account runs parallel with that of I Mac, and this parallelism affords opportunity for an easy comparison of the characteristics of each narrative. In II Mac is found a copiousness of detail which sometimes helpfully supplements the narrative of I Mac, but along with this is found an amount of exaggeration and inaccuracy which makes the whole work inferior. A notable feature, entirely absent from I Mac, is the miraculous element. The chief value of II Mac as a source of information to the historian is in those facts where it is not directly at variance with I Mac, and where additional and not improbable material makes more complete the picture of times or events. (2) Author, Date, and Aim. With the exception of chs. 1 and 2, the author claims that his work is an epitomization of a work in five books, written by Jason of Cyrene. Of him we know nothing more. Criticism of this epitome makes evident that Jason did not know I Mac, and that he gained his material largely from oral sources. In a work thus produced it is not easy to say how much in the way of style and method is due to the original writer and how much to the epitomizer. In two places (2 10-32 and 15 38-39) we have the writing of the latter, and these passages would seem to show that the rhetorical effects sought, after all, through the book are due to the epitomizer rather than to Jason. The original work was in Greek, as was this epitome, and the Greek of the latter is that of one who knew well how to use it. No certain date can be given to the work. It was known to Philo, and so must have existed before 40 A.D. Conjecture has put the time of its preparation in the last part of the 1st cent. B.C. Jason's work may have been written about 160 B.C. Like I Mac, this is also written from the point of view of orthodox Judaism. It is quite in accord with the spirit of the Pharisees. The writer is not content with simply setting forth the events of the stirring times between 175 B.C. and 160 B.C. He aims to give their religious value, and so to strengthen faith. God is behind and in the history, 'watching above His own.' Glorious is the Temple in Jerusalem, and to its sacred enclosure and service the writer would bind more closely the hearts of his brethren in Egypt and all lands. They could join with the home people in celebrating those Maccabean feasts which commemorated the death of Nicanor and the dedication of the Temple, and thus promote national unity. True to its religious tone, the book emphasizes the punishment of the wicked, the chastisement in suffering for those who are faithful, and the joyful hope of resurrection. The last doctrine is expressed with exceptional clearness.

3. III Maccabees. The third book has nothing whatever to do with the Maccabees, and may have got its name, as Fritzsche thinks, from being 'a sort of prolegomena to a complete history of the Maccabees.' The original language of the work was Greek, and it is found in most MSS. of the LXX., including A and B. (1) The Contents of III Maccabees. At Raphia (217 B.C.) Ptolemy IV defeated Antiochus the Great. Because of gifts and congratulations from the Jews, Ptolemy visited Jerusalem. While there, he insisted upon entering the sanctuary against the earnest and united opposition of both priests and people. Providence saved the Temple from desecration, for Ptolemy was stricken with a fit, as he was about to carry out his design. Returning to Egypt, he was bent upon revenge, and so sent out an edict that all the Jews should be shut up in the hippodrome at Alexandria and then murdered. Before this was done the name of every victim was to be secured. So immense was the number that the means of registration failed, and for a time the Jews were safe. Ptolemy then planned to turn loose upon the people 500 elephants made frantic with wine. Night and day the Jews prayed unto God and their prayer was heard. For two days the execution of the fatal order was delayed by the oversleeping of the king, and by his opportune loss of memory. The deliverance came through the sudden descent of two angels, who turned the elephants back upon the Egyptian army. Such a signal rescue changed completely the attitude of the king toward the Jews. They were set free, honored with a seven-days' banquet, and given favor throughout the land. In memory of this deliverance they ordained a festival to be annually observed 'for all the time

4. IV. Maccabees. (1) General Character of IV Maccabees. This work relates to the Maccabean times simply in that it uses the incidents of II Mac 6 18-7 42 as illustrations of its theme, which is the 'supremacy of pious reason over the passions.' It is a philosophical presentation, and can be divided into two main parts. Part I (1 1-3 19) contains a brief introduction, the statement of the theme, and an argument to show that the passions, severally considered, may be under the control of the reason. Part II gives illustrations of this theme and argument from II Mac. There is, however, no such sharp of their sojourn among strangers, from generation to generation.' At the same time they put to death more than three hundred of their nation, who had apostatized at the time of the trouble. (2) Author, Date, and General Character. The author was an Alexandrian Jew. The date of this work is uncertain. It may have been written near the close of the 1st cent. B.C., or in the 1st cent. A.D. The book as a whole is a fiction, altho some historical facts are undoubtedly embedded in its improbable story. Josephus (Contra Ap. II, 5) gives an account of imprisoned Jews attacked by elephants, and of a signal deliverance similar to this, but he connects it with Ptolemy VII. His tale, however, is quite as unlikely as that of III Mac. The yearly festival is probably a fact, and the character of Ptolemy IV is faithfully drawn. Farther than this we can not go. The inconsistencies and impossible situations show a legend, which has for its purpose the comforting of those in trouble by making clear God's fidelity to His own people.

division of the philosophical and historical as this partition of the book would seem to indicate. All through there are reflections which reveal the author's aim to edify and to inspire his readers with fidelity to the Law. (2) Author, Aim, and Date. Since all thought of Josephus as the author has been given up, there is no name which we can give to the writer of this work. He was a Jew, whose Hellenistic culture had in no way diminished his fidelity to the faith of his fathers. Rather, he seeks on the basis of his own Scriptures, but with the forms which Greek culture gave him, to hold his countrymen true to Moses. In general, the form of the whole is that of an address. It resembles a sermon, the main purpose being religious edification and impulse. Two of its teachings are noteworthy, viz.: the eternal existence of all souls after death—the good being in blessedness (9 8, 17 18), and the wicked in torment (9 9, 12 12)—and the vicarious atoning worth for the people of the death of the martyrs (6 29, 17 20). The style is exceptionally good, and the Greek of unusual excellence for a Jew. The work is, as a whole, a fine specimen of the best kind of Hellenistic literature. The date can not be determined with certainty. It is, of course, later than II Mac, and may be placed probably somewhere near the beginning of the Christian era.

5. V Maccabees. The last book, which is a compilation from I and II Mac and the writings of Josephus, aims to give a history of the Jews, from the time of Heliodorus (186 B.C.) to the last years of the reign of Herod the Great. Up to ch. 19 it follows, I and II Mac as well as Josephus; from ch. 20 to the the four eastern river basins and along the Thermaic and Strymonic gulfs was predominantly Greek, differing from the mixed population of the interior. Jewish synagogues were formed at Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, but probably not at Amphipolis and Apollonia (Ac 17 1). R. A. F.—E. C. L.

MACHBANNAI, mak'ba-nai (מַכְבְּנַי, makhbannay): A Gadite, one of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 13).

MACHBENA, mak-bī'na (מַכְבְּנָה, makhbēnāh, Machbenah AV): Probably the name of a place (I Ch 2 49), perhaps the same as Cabbon (q.v.).

end, it borrows from Josephus and consequently has no independent value as a history. Its date must be placed later than Josephus (70-100 A.D.).

MACEDONIA, mas'i-dō'ni-a (Μακεδονία): The name of a Roman province which in N T times was bounded by Thrace, Illyricum, the Adriatic, and Achaia, and traversed from Dyrrachium to Neapolis by the military Egnatian road. The kingdom of Macedon, created by Philip, fell under Roman control after the battle of Pydna in 168 B.C.—the four older districts into which it was then divided (Ac 16 12) being united later (146 B.C.), with portions of Illyricum and Thessaly, into the one province of Macedonia under proconsuls or propretors (the former in the time of Paul), with Thessalonica as its capital. MACHI, mē'kai (מַכִּי, mākhī): A Gadite, father of Geuel (Nu 13 15), whom Moses sent to spy out the land. C. S. T.

MACHIR, mē'kir, MACHIRITE, mē'kər-aīt (מַכִּיר, mākhīr): 1. The first-born son of Manasseh (Jos 17 1 f.); in Gn 50 23 and Nu 26 29 f. represented as his only son. His family took possession of Gilead (Nu 32 39 f.; Dt 3 15; Jos 13 31; cf. Nu 27 1, 36 1). According to Jg 5 14 (where Machir = Manasseh), the Machirites dwelt originally W. of the Jordan, and at a later time migrated to Gilead. In I Ch 2 21 f., 7 14 f. Machir is connected with Gilead. 2. A son of Ammiel in Lo-debar, E. of the Jordan, near Mahanaim, who gave protection to Mephibosheth, son of Jonathan (II S 9 4 f.), and ministered to David on his flight from Absalom (II S 17 27 f.). C. S. T.

MACHNADEBAI, mak-nad'ī-bai (מַכְנַדְבַּי, makhnaddēbhay): A Jew who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 40).

MACHPELAH, mac-pī'la (מַכְפֶּלֶה, makhpēlāh): 1. Biblical and Historical References. Mentioned in the Priestly document of Gn as a plot of land E. of ('before') Mamre, bought by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, after a series of typically Oriental negotiations (see Thompson, Land and Book, i, 246-249), in order that Sarah might be buried in the cave which was in the end of the partly timbered field (Gn ch. 23). According to P, this cave was afterwards the sepulcher of Abraham, Rebekah, Isaac, Leah, and Jacob (Gn 25 9 f., 49 30 f., 50 13). The signification of 'the Machpelah' (always with the article) is doubtful. It may mean 'double place,' and is thus translated in the ancient versions. Possibly the designation referred originally to the two chambers of the cave. Rabbinical literature contains curious conjectures as to the application of the term (see JE). But in Gn 'the Machpelah' seems to be used indifferently of the cave (23 9, 25 9), the field (23 19, 49 30, 50 13), or the entire property (23 17).

Outside of the P document in Gn the Machpelah is never mentioned in the Scriptures or in the Apocrypha. Ac 7 16 curiously places the tomb bought by Abraham at Shechem, where Joseph was buried according to E (Jos 24 32). A late tradition places the sepulcher of Joseph in Hebron, by that of his ancestors, where it is shown to-day. Josephus (BJ, IV, 9 7) speaks of the marble monuments of the patriarchs. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. II, 4) shows that the cult of the patriarchs at Hebron lasted down into Christian times. From the allusions of early pilgrims and historians it appears that the modern Harâm or sacred enclosure at Hebron has been identified with the Machpelah at least since the beginning of the Christian era.

2. Traditional Site. The Hebron Harâm ('sacred,' or 'forbidden,' place) is a fortress-like quadrangle, 197×111 ft., with walls of hard limestone, 40 ft. high, which date from at least as early as the time of Herod, but are considered by many to be much older than the Herodian period; e.g., Robinson, Stanley, Warren. These ancient walls are surmounted by modern ones, plastered and whitewashed. Lofty minarets rise at diagonally opposite corners, and flights of steps along the short sides of the quadrangle give access to the interior platform, which is about 18 ft. above the lowest ground adjoining. One end of the enclosure is entirely taken up by the mosque, whose clearstory can be seen above the exterior walls of the Harâm. This mosque was originally a Crusaders' church, built probably shortly after 1167 (see HEBRON). Most of the other structures within the enclosure are Moslem, of the 14th cent. and later. In front of the mosque a four-arched portico opens into a small court, beyond which a number of chambers fill the farther end of the platform. (See illustrations pp. 534-535.)

The six monuments to the patriarchs and their wives are supposed by the Moslems to be placed directly over the corresponding graves in the cave beneath. Each coffin-like cenotaph is covered with richly embroidered silk, and enclosed in a little chapel or shrine. The shrines of Isaac and Rebekah alone are within the mosque, those of Abraham and Sarah are in the portico, while the cenotaphs of Jacob and Leah are in the chambers adjoining the

NW. exterior wall. Non-Moslems are rigidly excluded from the entire enclosure, and the cave itself is held in such reverence and fear that perhaps no Moslem has entered it during the past seven centuries. Kaiser Wilhelm II was permitted to enter the mosque during his visit to Palestine in 1898; and when Hebron was hastily evacuated by the Turks and Germans before the allied advance in 1917, a German officer succeeded in penetrating to the cave beneath the mosque. Two supposed entrances in the floor of the mosque are covered with flagging and carpets. A third opening allows one to see down through a well-like shaft into a little whitewashed room, about 12 ft. square, whose floor is apparently on a level with the ground outside the Harâm. This room is an antechamber which, through a doorway in its S. wall, gives access to the sepulchers.

Back of the Christian era it is impossible to trace the tradition which identifies the Harâm with the Machpelah, and back of the Priestly Code (ca. 500 B.C.) there is no evidence of the tradition which places the tomb of the patriarchs near Hebron. It is certain, however, from early Hebrew sources that Hebron was a holy place in ancient times (II S 5 3, 15 7, 10), and its sanctity may have been due to the fact that it was the reputed burial place of the forefathers. The cult of ancestors was one of the most ancient and firmly established features of the pre-prophetic religion of Israel. (See BURIAL and MOURNING.)

In view of the many centuries before our era during which there was no allusion to the cave of Hebron, not to mention the unsolved critical problems relating to patriarchal history, the claim that the traditional sepulcher of the patriarchs is genuine (e.g., Warren in HDB, Stanley, Thompson, Robinson [?]) is unjustified.

LITERATURE: Stanley, Lectures on the Jewish Church, i, appendix ii, describes the epochal visit of the Prince of Wales's party in 1862. Later and more accurate observations are recorded in PEFS, 1882, 197-213; 1897, 53-61. For statement of early travelers and historians, see Ritter, Geog. of Pal., iii, 305-323; Warren in HDB; Robinson, BRP, ii, 77 f.; Le Strange, Pal. Under the Moslems, 309-327. MADIAN, mē'di-an. In Acts 7 29 (AV) for Midian (q.v.).

MADMANNAH, mad-man'a (מַדְמָנָה, madhman-nāh): I. A Calebite (I Ch 2 49), perhaps a genealogical statement of the origin of the town of the same name. II. A town in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 31), also called Beth-marcaboth (Jos 19 5; I Ch 3 31). Map II, D 3. C. S. T.

MADMEN, mad'men (מַדְמֵן, madhmēn): A town in Moab, connected with Heshbon and Horonaim (Jer 48 2). Possibly it is to be identified with Dibon (Nu 21 30), the modern Dibān, for which Dimon occurs in Is 15 9. Cheyne emends to Nimrim, which (Is 15 6) occurs after Heshbon and Horonaim.

C. S. T.

MADMENAH, mad-mi'na (מִדְמֶנָּה, madhmēnāh): A place in Benjamin, N. of Jerusalem, between Anathoth and Gebim (Is 10 31). Site unknown.

C. S. T.

MADON, mē'don (מִדּוֹן, mādhōn): A royal city of the Canaanites (Jos 11 1, 12 19), usually identified with Madīn near Hattīn, a few m. W. of Tiberias. The LXX.(B) of Jos 11 1 has Μαρόν, which suggests Merōn, two hours WSW. of Kedesh-naphtali (Map IV, E 5).

C. S. T.

MAGADAN, mag'a-dan (Μαγαδά, Magadā): A town visited by Jesus (Mt 15 30, Magdala [Μαγδαλέ] AV); in the || Mk 8 10 Dalmanutha, Δαλμανουθά. It can not, however, be identified with certainty under either name. Ewald's suggestion that Magadan is Megiddo is impossible, unless Megiddo be located, with Conder, near Beisan, instead of Lejjun (but see MEGIDDO). 'Dalmanutha' is probably a corruption of Delimnūtha (λίμνη, 'harbor'; see Herz in Expos. T., Sept., 1897, altho Conder derives it from Aram. De Almanutha, 'place of high buildings'), which points to Magdala as the modern Mejdel, a few miles N. of Tiberias on the shore of Lake Galilee. This town is said in the Jerusalem Talmud (Ta'anith, 4 s) to have been a prosperous one, but is nowhere else mentioned outside of the Gospels.

A. C. Z.

MAGBISH, mag-bish (מַגְבִּישׁ, maghbīsh): A place occupied by the returned exiles (Ezr 2 30). Site unknown. Perhaps the same as Magpiash, q.v. (Neh 10 20).

MAGDALA, mag'da-lā. See MAGADAN.

MAGDALENE, mag'da-līn. See MARY, 2.

MAGDIEL, mag'di-el (מַגְדִּיֵּל, maghdī'el): One of the 'dukes' of Edom (Gn 36 43).

MAGIC AND DIVINATION. 1. General Significance of the Terms. Altho variously defined, these words are so often used indiscriminately, or with the meaning of one shading off into that of the other, that accuracy of definition is difficult. Magic, however, properly has to do with the use of objects or actions to produce, through influence over the spirits or jinn, the physical results contrary to the natural order. It, therefore, in one respect resembles a crude form of science, while in another it approaches the sphere of religion; for magic rites are often but imperfect prayers or external forms through which deity is to be moved. Divination, on the other hand, is an effort, without disturbing the natural order of events, to learn what that order will be. It, therefore, is closely akin to prophecy, and in many of its forms, as it becomes more highly developed, we find it closely approximating to the work of the seer or true prophet. Yet the diviner may use magic arts to accomplish his purpose. The most fully developed systems of magic and divination were found in Egypt and Babylonia (cf. Gn 41 8 ff.; Ex 7 11 ff.; Dn 1 20, 2 2, etc.). It has been a question whether the Hebrews borrowed theirs from the one or the other. Tho there undoubtedly was influence from the Babylonians during the exile, the main source of Hebrew magic was probably Egypt. The only reference to Babylonian magic is in Dn, while the Pentateuchal references are exclusively to Egypt. Some Hebrew magic, of course, must have been indigenous. In divination there was Babylonian influence (cf. Ezk 21 21 f.). Correlative terms for magic and divination are sorcery and soothsaying. These two words usually imply a lower depth than the former and are generally used when the practises are prohibited. The word magic, which seems to come to us from Babylonia and perhaps from Persia, carries with it an element of superiority, just as divination might be regarded as legitimated by the results which it sought. Sorcery in every instance is resorted to when people desire the accomplishment of some purpose which is counter to morality or religion, and soothsaying pertains to an unholy desire to peer into the unseen world of the future. The soothsayer may be a sorcerer. Note how the term is used of Balaam (Jos 13 22; cf. Nu 22 7, 23, etc.), in connection with whose efforts victims were slain and sacrifices offered.

2. The Attitude of the Law Toward Such Practises. The Hebrew legislation was emphatic in its condemnation of all that pertained to these arts, and it prescribed the most condign punishment for them. Lv 20 27 condemns the witch or the wizard to death, and Dt 18 10 f., which is the classical passage on this subject, specifies, in an exhaustive summary, the different kinds of sorcery. In this attitude Hebrew law is in complete conformity with that of other nations. The Code of Hammurabi (c. 2100 B.C.), in its first paragraph, legislates against witchcraft. The reason for this lies in the fact that such practises were contrary to the common social welfare. The man who sought the sorcerer was endeavoring to gain an advantage over his fellow men, and consequently became a public enemy. The danger was that he would break up the clan or the tribal, or even the national, life by arraying unseen powers against it. Such an effort meant the forsaking of the national god, and, therefore, was to be classed with idolatry.

3. The Practise of Magic and Divination in Israel. Terms Used. When the people of Jerusalem once found themselves in the most serious straits, they turned to the powers of the unseen world for help (Is 8 19) and ignored their God. This, like all other efforts of the kind, testifies to the deep-seated desire of humanity to find some kind of a sympathetic response from a power greater than human, and as God often seems too far away to be a present help, lesser powers are turned to, who are felt to be more accessible and perchance more closely allied to humanity. In this respect Israel was at one with the larger world of its day.

The Heb. word which is most frequently used of magical methods is the verb qāṣam (together with the deriv. noun qeṣem, usually rendered divination, but witchcraft in I S 15 23), generally rendered to divine or to use divination, or as a ptcl. diviner, the root of which is found also in the Arabic kismet, 'destiny.' This, therefore, throws light upon the Hebrew conception. Magic or sorcery was an effort to determine fate, not so much by foretelling as by working out the destiny by means of charms, or spells, or potions, or the use of objects which in themselves are supposed to possess power, or into which the sorcerer himself has infused efficacy. Sometimes the arts may be practised by any individual and by simple methods, an instance of which occurs in Gn 30 14, where dūdā'im, 'love-apples,' rendered 'mandrakes,' are mentioned as possessing powers similar to those of a love-philter. The teraphim, which seem to have been often found in households, were probably used in connection with such arts (cf. Gn 31 30, 34; I S 19 13). The lot, Urim and Thummim (q.v.), and the ephod were also familiar, a staff as well (Hos 4 12). More often, however, the seeker must have gone to a person supposedly endowed with peculiar powers. The most striking illustration of this is found in Saul's experience (I S 28 3 ff.), who, altho he had expelled all who practised the black art, in his own extremity searched out a witch to help him, of whom he might inquire, or consult, i.e., learn the issue of the coming battle. The name by which she is called is a fairly common one in the O T, ba'alath 'ōbh, 'the possessor of 'ōbh,' rendered 'that hath a familiar spirit.' This Heb. term 'ōbh may signify a ghost (a 'control') or a subterranean spirit which speaks from a hollow in the heart (cf. Is 29 4). Gaster thinks the 'ōbh, the teraphim, and the yidd'ōnī are mummies used for necromancy (ERE, IV, p. 811 b). The word yidd'ōnī, translated wizard, however, probably refers to the spirit which was the sorcerer's familiar or 'control.' It is naturally derived from the root yādha, 'to know,' and would apply very well to the spirit that the medium most often called upon, or which dwelt within her. In Assyrian the spirit of soothsaying is called mudā. In the use of this term we see how sorcery and soothsaying are combined, for the arts necessary to call the spirit would be sorcery, while the response of the spirit itself would be soothsaying and in the realm of divination.

Dt 18 10 f., already referred to, contains two groups of terms which must indicate the popular conception of the relationship of different kinds of divination. At the head of the first group (ver. 10) we find denounced the one who makes his son or his daughter 'to pass through the fire.' This may have been a form of heathen sacrifice, or it may have been a drastic method of consulting omens, in which ordeal the child was in many cases killed. Fire oracles of various kinds are characteristic of the superstition of many primitive peoples. Another term, the ptepl. 'ōnēn or m'ōnēn, practiseth augury (observer of times AV, also rendered 'soothsayer' Is 26; Jer 27 9, enchanter AV; Mic 5 12, and 'sorceress' Is 57 3), is of doubtful origin. W. Robertson Smith suggests that it is from a root, 'ānan, signifying 'to murmur,' and that the diviner received his message through the murmuring of leaves as at Dodona (cf. also the 'sound of going in the top of the mulberry-trees,' II S 5 24), or the hum of insects (cf. the name of the prophetess Deborah, 'a swarm of bees' [?], and Baalzebub, 'the lord of flies'). More likely it is connected with 'ānān, 'cloud,' and means 'weather prophet,' not only in the sense of foretelling weather but also in the sense of controlling the elements.

The vb. nāhash (ptepl. enchanter, Dt 18 10), seems to have the general sense of 'practising divination' or 'observing omens.' (Lv 19 26; II K 17 17 etc.). It is used of hydromancy (Gn 44 5), and, in spite of its form, probably has no connection with serpent-charming. The word m'khashshēph, sorcerer (witch AV; cf. also Ex 22 18; II Ch 33 6; Mal 3 5), is akin to the Assyrian kaššapu, and is often associated with the astrologers (Ex 7 11) and wise men (Dn 2 2). It is probably of foreign origin, and perhaps to be regarded as a general term summarizing the preceding. The last word of the first group in the above-mentioned passage, Dt 18 10 f., is hōbhēr, charmer, which seems to contain the idea of 'binding,' and has been interpreted as meaning 'the one who ties magic knots.' But W. Robertson Smith's suggestion, that it means 'the weaver of a spell,' is far more acceptable. Gaster holds that it means 'one who is able to gather animals for good or evil purposes' (ERE, IV, p. 810 b). The second group of words (ver. 11) represents different ways of consulting the unseen world, ending with the term necromancer, literally, 'one who inquires of the dead.' The whole passage is, therefore, a comprehensive denunciation of those who use magical arts ('sympathetic magic') as well as those who assume to hold communication with the departed.

4. The Attitude of the Prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel. Besides several passages in the legal literature that forbid sorcery, the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel are very specific in their attacks upon such unholy practises. Isaiah singles out special classes, and in his condemnation of the daughters of Zion (3 16 ff.) he enumerates their ornaments, several of which from their names, must have had a magical use. In fact, it is probable that pendants and bangles were originally worn to keep off evil influences, as indeed is the case in many parts of the world at the present day. The most spiritual conception of the radical difference between the true and the false is found in Is 8 10 ff., where the hopeless people who are seeking 'familiar spirits' that chirp (peep AV) and mutter (ironical, probably suggestive of sounds made by the sorcerers) are exhorted to seek instead the living God.

Ezekiel, more than a century later, found the people saturated with the strange customs of the Orient. Lying divinations and false visions were the evils with which he had to contend. Wizards and witches preyed upon the superstitions of the populace. In 13 17-23 some peculiar kind of charm is referred to. The obscurity of the expressions, however, is great. The 'pillows' and the 'kerchiefs' (ver. 18) are probably amulets, possibly the predecessors of the phylacteries and frontlets which in later Judaism had a magical use, altho then they had been conventionalized and become a part of decent and orderly dress. The 'handfuls of barley' and 'pieces of bread' (ver. 19) have sometimes been supposed to be the fees paid the witch, but it is more likely that they were employed in some magical rite (cf. the use of a portion of the meal-offering in the test for adultery, Nu 5 26). One of the most interesting passages is Ezk 21 21, where the king of Babylon is represented as consulting the omens before deciding whether he should advance against Jerusalem or Rabbah of Ammon. The arrows may have been used as lots to be drawn from the quiver; or in shaking them the king may have been polishing them for use in self-hypnosis similar to crystal-gazing. Teraaphim were included in the augury used, and this gives us a clue to the employment of teraphim in general, and to the reason for their exclusion from legitimate rites. The last clause of ver. 21 is the only definite Biblical allusion to the consultation of the entrails, but the examination of the liver was one of the commonest Babylonian practises. In a cabinet in the British Museum there is a clay model of a sheep's liver, the surface of which is divided into small squares like the 'regions' of an astrologer's map of the heavens, and in each square are cuneiform characters evidently intended to explain how certain appearances in each region are to be interpreted.

5. Divination and Prophecy. The so called false prophets may in many cases have been soothsayers, and prophetism, starting with the more naive and innocent forms of divination, gradually rose to greater heights and more spiritual conceptions with the greater insight into moral needs. Samuel might give a response for a small fee (I S 9 7 f.), but his larger mission was to find a king and to hold both king and people to an undeviating path of rectitude. The trivial and the transient were divorced from the true prophet's occupation, and the man with the far-reaching vision of Israel's destiny scorned the frenzied demonstrations of the false prophets, and in the form of vision and parable declared the fate of king and people, like Micaiah (I K ch. 22). Yet how near the methods of the two classes were we see from II K 3 13 ff., where Elisha required the playing of a minstrel before he could attain the proper state of ecstasy. We need not wonder at this when we find how close we are to the most primitive notions of cause and effect among even fairly educated people at the present day. The Midianite who adorned his camel with chains and crescents for good luck in the time of Gideon (Jg 8 21-26) would find his successor to-day in Syria or Italy.

6. Divination by Dreams. Another point of contact between the true and the false appears in dreams. The will of God might be thus revealed. Jacob claimed to receive Divine messages by this means (Gn 31 11). Joseph dreamed of future greatness (Gn 37 5 ff.), and to him as well as to Daniel came the power to interpret (Gn 40 8, 12, 41 25 ff.; Dn 1 17, etc.). Incubation-places were esteemed; perhaps Jacob's at Bethel (Gn 28 11-17), certainly the shrine at Gibeon, where a king might meet God in the visions of the night (I K 3 5 ff.). Yet the leading prophets did not greatly esteem dreams. The vision was a higher medium of communication, and even this often gave place to forms in which the fancy had less play.

7. Practise of Magic in Postexilic Israel. A recrudescence of sorcery must have taken place during or toward the close of the Exile. This was due to Babylonian influence and the large and elaborate system there displayed. The second part of Isaiah is a witness to this, and the magicians of different orders are there presented in antithesis to true seekers after God, while Babylon herself, in the day of her downfall, was to have no profit from those practises upon which she depended (Is 44 25, 47 12 ff.). Astrologers, star-gazers, and monthly prognosticators are the names given those who sought, not in the chance omens of trees or birds or entrails, but from the aspects of the heavens, a more sure word of prophecy and even they are discredited. The Book of Daniel is another witness of the power of sorcery over the mind, altho the tone of the narrative shows it not to be a contemporary description of the Babylonian system. The wise men, the Chaldeans, the soothsayers, and the magicians (ḥarṭummīn, the Aram. equivalent of the Heb. ḥarṭummīm, spoken of as the 'magicians' attached to the court of Egypt in Gn 41 8; Ex 7 11, etc.) seem in Dn to be great bands or guilds, who appear before Nebuchadrezzar and Belshazzar somewhat as the false prophets of Micaiah's time (cf. I K 22 10 ff.), tho in more ceremonious guise. Daniel by superior endowment triumphs over them and becomes himself their chief (Dn 5 11). But from the beginning to the end of the O T the sin of witchcraft is classed with idolatry and teraphim as the enemy of true religion (cf. I S 15 23).

8. Survivals of Magical Customs in the Legitimate Cultus. It is an interesting, altho difficult, task to discover what traces of old magical customs were preserved in the religion and carried over into the rites. Yet what was once an incantation may often have been purified and retained in a ritual. In this question is involved the whole problem of the origin of religious forms. Certain peculiar laws in Lv and Nu show the influence of early superstitions. The jealousy ordeal (Nu ch. 5) is a good example of this. In the first place, the fact that it is an ordeal connects it with the entire series of practises into which magic enters as a large factor; and, secondly, the details of the test are decisive. Holy (i.e., pure) water was to be mingled with the dust from the floor of the Tabernacle, and when a portion of the meal-offering had been burned, the woman was to drink the water, meanwhile assenting to the consequences of the curse pronounced by the priest if she were really unfaithful. This is in all essential respects identical with ordeals among other early people. The dress of the high priest was doubtless symbolical in character, altho much of the early significance must have been obscured and forgotten. Yet the bells suggest the idea of a counter-charm by which evil influences were to be driven away. Naturally such notions disappeared in course of time, and the ornamental purpose was the only one thought of. The phylacteries and frontlets, the sacred words fastened on the door-post (the m'zūzōth of to-day), and the cabalistic use of the Divine name testify to the persistence of old superstition. The Book of Tobit gives us some insight into the views of early Judaism concerning the unseen world. The strange custom preserved in the ritual of the Day of Atonement, viz., the sending away of the goat Azazel (Lev 16 8 ff.), seems to be a survival of early beliefs in the necessity of propitiating demoniac powers. Among all ancient peoples the processes of life were considered mysterious and awful, and it is possible that circumcision, performed generally at the period of puberty, had its origin in the desire to propitiate the unseen powers, which presided over life and death. Ex 4 24 ff., obscure as it is, must refer to such a conception. The circumcision of the child, made to apply in a vicarious manner to Moses, was a propitiatory act. In a similar way the period of a woman's uncleanness was regarded as tabu, and her separation was due to the feeling that in some way the powers of the unseen world were involved. Sacrifices at the time of childbirth had a similar origin. The peculiar law in Lv 19 23-25, about the period before a fruit-bearing tree might be used, is only a further extension of the same idea that unseen powers must be considered and placated before human beings could come in for their share of the fruits of the earth, or into the full participation of the rights of life. It would seem probable that the art of physicians suffered often from the imputation of sorcery. Asa's recourse to them for his malady (II Ch 16 12) is reprobated. Undoubtedly the medical means used were of a kind which resembled a witch's brew, and the list of unclean beasts (Lv ch. 11) probably included some which were neither totems nor sacred, but whose use was forbidden because associated with magical practises.

9. Magic in the N T. In the N T there are sundry allusions to magic and sorcery. The form then most prevelant was that of exorcism (Ac 19 13 and cf. Mt 12 27), in which the main feature was the pronunciation of magic formulas, or incantations, or the use of certain names to expel demons from human beings. Josephus (Ant. VIII, 2 5) says that the incantations discovered by Solomon were still in use in his time and appears to have had great faith in their efficacy. There seems to have been a question whether exorcism was a strictly legitimate practise. Christ's miracles in connection with demons were met with the sneer that He was in league with the powers of darkness (Mt 12 24). It is significant that the word Beelzebub ('Beelzebul' EVVmg.) which we find here, according to some MSS., is the name of the oracle from which responses were sought in Elijah's time (II K 1 2), the one that gave answers through the droning of flies. In Ac 19 13 we have a record of the proceedings of certain exorcists who endeavored to imitate Apostolic methods, and found themselves routed by the unfortunate demoniac in a burst of grim satanic humor. This happened at Ephesus, the home of curious arts (περίεργα, Ac 19 19, magical arts RV), and resulted in the wholesale destruction of the apparatus of sorcery (Ac 19 18 f.).

Two masters of this art are prominently named in the Apostolic narrative, Simon Magnus (q.v.) (Ac 8 9 ff.), and Bar-Jesus, surnamed Elymas (q.v.) (Ac 13 8 ff.), the latter title being of Semitic origin and testifying to his reputation for occult wisdom. Lastly, the girl possessed of 'a spirit of divination' (Ac 16 16; Gr. 'a spirit, a Python'; so RVmg.) should be mentioned. She is the N T equivalent of the one that hath a 'familiar spirit' of the O T. Serpent superstition and clairvoyance seem combined in the description of this girl, and, if we knew more of the details of her case, such an example might cast some light on certain words which occur in Dt 18 10 f. Sorcery comes in for final denunciation in Rev, where its identification with spiritual wickedness is complete. Sorcerers are among those who are to be forever shut out from the heavenly city (22 15). As a sorcerer was the representative of that which militates against the unity of the body politic, the aider and abetter of treason and treachery; so he could have no consideration when the city was cleansed of everything that loveth and maketh a lie.

MAGICIAN. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7.

MAGISTRATE: A term for a civil official. In Ezr 7 25 it is equivalent to the ordinary Heb. term for 'judge.' In Lk 12 58, the language of which is apparently molded by Gr. usage, it translates the term ἄρχων, an officer higher than the 'judge' (cf. Mt 5 25); in Ac 16 20 ff. it renders the word στρατηγός, which is the ordinary Gr. equivalent for the duoviri, the two chief municipal officers of a Roman colony; called by courtesy pretors (cf. RVmg.), before whom political charges were brought. On Jg 18 7, Lk 12 11, Tit 3 1, cf. RV. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

MAGOG, mē'geg. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13, and also GOG.

MAGOR-MISSABIB, mē'gōr-mis'a-bib (מַגּוֹר מִסַּבִּיב, māghōr-misṣābhīb), 'terror on every side': A phrase coined by Jeremiah (Jer 6 25, 20 10), and (in 20 3) given by him as a name to Pashhur in prophecy of the fate which awaited him (cf. 46 5, 49 29). C. S. T.

MAGPIASH, mag'pi-ash (מַגְפִּיָּשׁ, maghpī'āsh): The name of a family whose representative signed the covenant (Neh 10 20). Perhaps the same as Magbish (q.v.).

MAHALAH, mā-hē'la. See MAHLAH.

MAHALALEL, mā-hal'a-lel (מַחֲלָאֵל, mahālāl'ēl, Mahalaleel AV), 'praise of God': 1. One of the antediluvian patriarchs in the Sethite genealogy (Gn 5 12 ff., etc.). 2. A descendant of Judah (Neh 11 4). 3. The N T form is Maleleel (in Lk 3 37 AV).

MAHALATH, mā-ha-lath (מַחֲלָת, mahālāth): 1. The wife of Esau (Gn 28 9). 2. The wife of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 18). See also PSALMS, § 3 (5).

MAHALATH LEANNOOTH, mā-ha-lath le-annōth. See LEANNOTH.

MAHALI, mē'ha-lai. See MAHLI.

MAHANAIM, mē'ha-nē'im (מַחֲנַיִם, mahānāyim): A place of some importance. The earliest reference to it is in Gn 32 2 (E). Here Jacob, as he was returning from Mesopotamia, met the angels of God, and gave to the locality the name Mahanaim, i.e., 'two camps,' or 'companies.' Mahanaim became the capital of N. Israel under Ish-bosheth (II S 2 8, 12, 29). It was David's headquarters during the revolt of Absalom (II S 17 24), and became the seat of one of Solomon's prefectures (I K 4 14). The exact location has never been determined; it was certainly trans-Jordanic, and lay to the N. of Jabbok and the S. of Penuel. Driver advocates an identification with Deir

'Allā, situated on the route which passes N. and S. along the Jordan Valley. Following Jos 13 26, G. A. Smith is satisfied with locating it on the borders of Gad (See Map III, J 2.) J. A. K.

MAHANEH-DAN, mē'hā-ni-dan' (מַחֲנֵה דָן, māhānēh-dhān), 'camp of Dan': A name given to the place where the Danites encamped (Jg 13 25, 18 12). Perhaps two places are thus named, one between Zorah and Eshtaol (13 25), the other on the border of Benjamin, behind (west) of Kiriath-jearim.

C. S. T.

MAHARAI, mē-har'a-ai (מַהֲרָאִי, māhārāy): One of David's heroes (II S 23 28; I Ch 11 30, 27 13).

MAHATH, mē'hāth (מַהֲאִת, māhath): A Kohathite Levite of Hezekiah's time (I Ch 6 35; II Ch 29 12, 31 13). See AHIMOTH.

MAHAVITE, mē'hā-vait, THE (מַהֲוִיט, māhāvīm): Eliel, one of David's heroes, is called 'the Mahavite' (I Ch 11 46). The term is obscure and probably a scribal error for some other word.

MAHAZIOTH, mē-hē'zi-ōth (מַהֲצִיּוֹת, māhāzī'ōth), 'visions': One of the names in the peculiar verse (I Ch 25 4; see JOSHBEKASHAH), later taken as the name of an individual (I Ch 25 30).

MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ, mē'hār-shē'lal-hash-baz' (מַהֵר שָׁלַל הָשָׁבַז, māhēr shālāl hāsh baz), 'the booty hastens, the spoil speeds': The symbolic name given to one of the sons of Isaiah, the prophet (Is 8 1), indicative of the impending doom of Damascus and Samaria. E. E. N.

MAHLAH, mā'la (מַחֲלָה, māhlāh): 1. The eldest (?) of the five daughters of the Manassite Zelophehad (Nu 26 33), who obtained the right to inherit their father's property (as he had no son, 27 1), on the condition that they marry sons of their father's brother (36 11). Their story gives the origin of the later law, which modified the earlier law of inheritance by males only (see FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, §§ 3, 8). 2. A Gileadite name (I Ch 7 18 Mahalah AV). C. S. T.

MAHLI, mā'lai (מַחֲלִי, māhlī): 1. A son of Merari (Ex 6 19, Mahali AV; Nu 3 20; I Ch 6 19 [4]), and the founder of the Levitical family of Mahlites (Nu 3 33, 26 58; Ezr 8 18), descended from his two sons by the marriage of the daughters of one to the sons of the other (I Ch 23 22). 2. The son of Mushi, and grandson of Mahli (I Ch 6 47 [32], 23 23, 24 30). C. S. T.

MAHLON, mā'lōn. See CHILION.

MAHOL, mē'hol (מַחֲוִל, māhōl): The father of the three wise men, Heman, Calcol, and Darda, with whom Solomon is compared (I K 4 31 [5 11]). His origin is unknown. C. S. T.

MAHSEIAH, mā-sī'ya (מַחֲשֵׁיָאֵה, māhšēyāh, Maa-seiah AV), 'J' is a refuge': The grandfather of Baruch (Jer 32 12, 51 59).

MAID, MAIDEN, MAID-SERVANT. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 7; also SLAVE AND SLAVERY, §§ 2, 3; and MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 3.

MAIL, COAT OF. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 9.

MAIMED. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5; and DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 6.

MAINSAIL. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

MAJESTY: The translation of (1) gā'ōn (root idea 'to raise oneself'), indicative of elevation, superiority; often translated 'pride.' Used of God in Is 2 10, 19, 21, 24 14; Mic 5 4; (2) of the related term gē'ūth, cf. Ps 93 1; Is 26 10; (3) of hādhār (root idea, 'adornment,' 'distinction'), often rendered 'beauty,' 'honor,' 'excellency.' Used of God in I Ch 16 27; Ps 29 4, 96 6, 104 1, 111 3, 145 5, 12; (4) of hōdh (root idea uncertain), e.g., I Ch 29 11, 25; Job 37 22; (5) of several other terms, in both the O T and N T—all meaning 'greatness,' e.g., Est 1 4; Dn 4 36, 5 18; He 1 3, 8 1; II P 1 16. E. E. N.

MAKAZ, mē'kaz (מַקָּז, māqatz): A town near Shaalbim and Beth-shemesh (I K 4 9). Site unknown.

MAKHELOTH, mak-hī'leth (מַקְהֵלוֹת, maqhēlōth): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 25 f.). Site unknown.

MAKKEDAH, mak-kī'da (מַקְקֵדָה, maqqudhāh): A Canaanite stronghold in the Shephelah, mentioned by the J document in connection with Joshua's victorious campaign (Jos 10 10-27), and by D and P in the list of places captured with the subsequent allotment of the conquered city to Judah (Jos 10, 28 f., 12 10, 15 41). According to P, it was near Gedereth, Beth-dagon, and Naameh, and apparently on the natural route from the valley of Ajalon southward. Not far from the city was a cave, in which the five 'kings' hid from their pursuers (Jos 10 16 f., J). According to Warren (PEF, Surv. Mem., II, 411 ff., 427) these conditions are satisfied by the modern el-Mughār, a large, mud-built village, situated upon a kind of promontory, which extends into the valley of Sorek (Wādī Šurār) from the north (Map III, C 5). It is undoubtedly an ancient site, as is shown by the rock-quarrying and the existence of rock-cut tombs with loculi running in from the sides of the chambers. So far as a careful examination by the PEF surveyors could show, this is the only site in the plain where caves occur, and here they are numerous. The houses are built over and in front of caverns of various sizes, and small caves exist in the face of cliffs N. of the village. The Syriac of Jos 10 10 renders 'Makedah' as Mokor, which approaches closely the Arabic mughr (pl. mughār), 'a cave.' See PEFQ (1875), 165-167. This identification, however, is very doubtful.

MAKTESH. See JERUSALEM, § 36.

MALACHI, mal'a-kai (מַלְאֲכִי, mal'ākhi), 'my messenger'; possibly originally Malachiah, 'the messenger of J'.'

1. Contents. The name of the last book in the prophetic collection. It consists of two parts. The first part (1 1-2 17) opens with a declaration of J''s love for Israel, and hatred of Edom (1 2-5); this is followed by a rebuke of the priests, who violate the prescriptions of the ritual law (1 6-14), and a threat of a heavy curse (2 1-3). This leads to the rehearsal of J''s ideal covenant with Levi (2 4-9), and the denunciation of the special sin of faithlessness to the law of marriage (2 10-17). The second part begins with the prediction of the coming of J''s messenger (3 1-6), and once more condemns the violation of J''s commandments (3 7-15). The prophecy then closes with a vivid forecast of the judgment which shall separate between those who work wickedness and those who fear J'' (3 16-4 3), and with the promise of the sending of Elijah (4 4-6).

2. Date. The date of the book is not definitely fixed by anything within it, but the general conditions reflected point to a time subsequent to the restoration of the Temple worship under Zerubbabel (17, 10, 31). The evils denounced are similar to those met and rebuked by Ezra and Nehemiah (violations of the marriage law, 2 10-16; cf. Ezr 9 2, 10 3, 16-44; withholding the tithes 3 7-12; cf. Neh 13 10 f.). A governor is alluded to (1 8), but, as he is one who may receive presents, it can not be Nehemiah, for Nehemiah repelled the possible charge of doing so (Neh 5 14-18). From all these facts, it may safely be inferred that the prophecy belongs to the Persian period, and more especially to the time immediately preceding the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, i.e., about 460-50 B.C.

3. Authorship. Whether the name of the book is the name of the prophet who wrote it is an open question. The title 'The burden of the word of Jehovah' (cf. Zec 9 1 and 12 1) indicates the appearance of a new type of superscription for prophecies. If the two sections in Zec are to be regarded as prophetic discourses anonymously published and later appended to the Visions of Zechariah, it is not unlikely that another anonymous prophet of the same general period should have published his message under the generic appellation of 'messenger' or 'messenger of J'', This view of the use of mal'akh seems to be supported by 3 1 and the tradition that Malachi was none other than Ezra himself (Targ. Jon. b. Uzziel, which adds to the name 'Malachi': 'whose name is Ezra the scribe,' an opinion adopted by Calvin). Against these considerations the reason for taking 'Malachi' as a proper noun is that it seems to be so translated in the LXX. In addition to this it is alleged 'that every other book of the Minor Prophets opens with the name of its author.' But this is a mere assumption (cf. JONAH; see also Driver, LOT<sup>2</sup>, p. 321 f.).

4. Literary Features. In literary form the book is characterized by a quasi-dialectic type of discussion. This consists in the laying down of a general proposition which provokes contradiction leading to counterstatements, and ending with a vindication of the main position, perhaps more fully elaborated (cf. 1 2 f., 2 17 f., 3 8 f., 13 f.). By some this has been taken to be a sign that the prophecy was from the first circulated in writing. A better explanation of the fact is that the author adopted a method of teaching which was just coming into use and which later became a favorite in the schools and synagogues of Judaism. As to the book itself, it is more than probable that it represents a collection of sayings from a number of addresses delivered at different times.

5. Type of Thought. The type of thought represented in M. points to a new development. While the prophet's great ideal is, like that of earlier prophecy, the law of righteousness laid down by J'' for His people, he lays great stress on the ritual. He also sees the great and terrible day of J'' as about to break upon the familiar order of things, and bring unsparing judgment. But while the coming of this consummation is to be abrupt, preparation is to be made for it by the return of Elijah.

6. Summary. Thus by its style of composition, and by its system of thought, the book puts itself at the end of one order of things, and points to the beginning of another. It was an accurate instinct, therefore, and not a mere arbitrary impulse, that led to its being placed at the very end of the O T Canon (Prophetic Section), altho not the latest in the date of the O T books.

MALCAM, mal'kam (RV), MALCHAM (AV) (מַלְכָּם, mal'kām): I. The eponym of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 9). II. A deity of the Ammonites (Jer 49 1, 3; Zeph 1 6), the same as Milcom. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 26.
C. S. T.

MALCHIAH, mal-kai'a, MALCHIAH, mal-cai'ja (מַלְכִּיָּהוּ, mal'kiyyāh, mal'kiyyāhū), 'my king is Jah': 1. A descendant of Gershom (I Ch 6 40 [25]). 2. A priest, the father of Pashhur (I Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12; Jer 21 1, 38 1). 3. The head of the fifth course of priests (I Ch 24 9, perhaps=preceding). 4, 5, 6. Two of the 'sons of Parosh' (Ezr 10 25) and one of the 'sons of Harim' (Ezr 10 31) who had married foreign wives; the last also repaired the wall (Neh 3 11). 7. A son of Rechab who repaired the dung-gate (Neh 3 14). 8. A goldsmith who repaired the wall (Neh 3 31). 9. One who stood at Ezra's left while he read the Law (Neh 8 4). 10. One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 3 [4]); perhaps the same as 2. 11. A priest who assisted in dedicating the wall (Neh 12 42).

MALCHIEL, mal'ki-el (מַלְכִּי־אֵל, mal'ki'ēl), MALCHIELITE, -ait, 'God is king': The ancestral head of the Malchielites, one of the clans of Asher (Gn 46 17; Nu 26 45; I Ch 7 31).

MALCHIAH. See MALCHIAH.

MALCHIAH, mal'kaiah (מַלְכִּיָּהוּ, mal'kiyyāh), 'my king is exalted': A descendant of David (I Ch 3 18).

MALCHISHUA, mal'kai-shū'a (מַלְכִּישׁוּא, mal'ki-shū'a), 'the king is noble' (?): A son of Saul, slain at the battle of Mt. Gilboa (I S 14 49, 31 2, Melchishua AV, etc.).

MALCHUS, mal'kus (Μελχους): One of the mixed company of Roman soldiers and officers of the Sanhedrin who arrested Jesus (Jn 18 3). He seems to have been a slave belonging to the household of the high priest. In the mêlée that preceded the arrest his right ear was partially severed by Peter, and healed by Jesus (Jn 18 3, 10). Luke also records the incident, but not the name (Lk 22 49 f.).

J. M. T.

MALEFACTOR: The English translation of two Gr. words having practically the same meaning. (1) κακοποιός (κακὸν ποιών, in some MSS.) (Jn 18 30 AV, 'evil-doer' RV). But in I P 2 14 (AV) it is rendered 'evil-doer.' It is possible that κακοποιός in I P 4 15 may mean 'astrologer' (cf. Artemid. Oneir. IV, 59). (2) κακοῦργος (Lk 23 32 f.; II Ti 2 9, 'evil-doer' AV). J. M. T.

MALELEEL, mā-lī'el (Μαλελεήλ): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 37 AV). See MAHALALEL.

MALLOTHI, mal'o-thai (מללתי, mallōthī), 'I have fulfilled': Taken as a proper name (I Ch 25 4, 20), but more probably part of an ancient hymn. See JOSHBEKASHAH.

MALLOWS. See PALESTINE, § 22.

MALUCH, mal'uk (מלך, mallūkh), also MALLUCHI, mal'lu-kai: 1. The name of a postexilic family and of several of its representatives (Neh 10 4, 12 2), called Malluchi in 12 14 (Melicu AV). 2. A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 44). 3. One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 29). 4. One of the 'sons of Harim' (Ezr 10 32; Neh 10 27).

MAMMON (μαμωνάς, the Gr. form of an Aram. word for 'riches' [Mt 6 24; Lk 16 9, 11, 13]): The origin of the word is quite obscure. The following explanations are proposed: (1) Mammon was a deity of wealth; but there is no trace of belief in such a deity. (2) The word comes from the root āman, 'to trust' (mā'mon, 'that which is made secure' or 'deposited'). (3) It comes from maṣmōn, 'that which is treasured.' The 2d is probably the correct derivation (cf. Dalman, Aram. Gram.<sup>2</sup>, p. 170, and PRE<sup>3</sup>, Vol. XII, p. 153 f.). A. C. Z.

MAMRE, mam'rī (ממרה, mamrē): I. In J, in the combination, 'the oaks' ('plains,' AV, 'terebinths,' RVmg.) of Mamre, which are in Hebron' (Gn 13 18, cf. 18 1): The site of Abraham's camp, which is placed by early Christian and modern Jewish tradition at er-Rāmeḥ, 2 m. N. of Hebron. Near this is a ruin called 'The House of the Friend (i.e., Abraham),' and a second ruin, which is probably the basilica erected by Constantine in the neighborhood. Since the 12th cent., however, the Christians have located Mamre 1½ m. NW. of the city, where at the present time a very ancient tree is revered as 'Abraham's Oak.' Both of these sites, however, seem too far from Hebron. (See HEBRON.) The meaning of the name is unknown.

II. In P, in the combination, 'the cave of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, that is, Hebron' (Gn 23 17-19, 25 9, 35 27, 49 30, 50 13). The elimination of the holy trees, and the substitution of the patriarchal tomb, are significant for the age of P. (See MACHPELAH.)

III. An Amorite chief, owner of the 'oaks' mentioned above, and confederate with Abraham (Gn 14 13, 24). (See AMRAPHEL.) L. G. L.—L. B. P.

MAN: The original Heb. and Gr. terms rendered 'man' are numerous, and each has its distinctive meaning. Only the briefest discussion can be given here. (1) The most generic term is ādām, properly collective for 'man' in general, the genus Homo, mankind (Gn 1 26 f., 2 7, etc.), in distinction from God (Nu 23 19), or from other creatures (Gn 6 7, etc.). An individual is a 'son of man' (Ezk 2 1, etc.). This word has no plural; 'men' is literally 'sons of man.' (2) ish indicates man as an individual, the male, the husband, the man of affairs, the citizen, etc. (Gn 2 23 f., 4 1, 13 16, 41 33; Hos 2 16, etc.). (3) enōsh, a collective, like ādām, and used much in the same way (Dt 32 26; Job 28 4, 32 8; Is 51 7, etc.). The Aramaic equivalent enāsh is used in Ezr 4 11; Dn 2 10, etc. (4) ba'al, 'owner,' 'master,' is often rendered 'man' (pl. 'men') (Gn 20 3; Jos 24 11; Jg 9 2 f., etc.; see also BAAL; and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 3). (5) gebher, properly man as 'strong,' 'vigorous,' 'brave' (Ex 10 11; Jos 7 14; Jg 5 30. Often used in poetry in a more general sense; cf. Job 3 3, 14 10; Ps 34 8, etc.). The Aram. equivalent is gibhar (Ezr 4 21; Dn 2 25, etc.). (6) gibbōr, properly an adj., 'strong,' 'powerful,' but also, especially when referring to warriors or heroes, used as a substantive. In either case it is generally rendered mighty man (Gn 10 9; Jos 10 2; Ru 2 1; II K 5 1, etc.). (7) zākhār, 'male' (Lv 15 33; Nu 31 17 f., etc.). (8) In a number of passages 'man' stands for the Heb. ben, 'son of,' thus, in I K 1 52 'worthy man' is lit. 'son of worth'; in II K 2 16 'strong men' is lit. 'sons of strength,' etc. (9) ānērōpos in the N T corresponds to the O T ādām, as the most generic term, which is used in a great variety of senses. (10) ānēr corresponds to the O T ish, 'man' as an individual, etc., but its use is very general (Mt 7 24; Mk 6 20; Jn 1 13, etc.). (11) ānērōs or ānērōs, 'male,' is used in Ro 1 27; Rev 12 5. (12) The adjectives anthrōpōnos ('human,' 'of man') and τέλειος ('perfect,' 'full-grown,' 'adult') are found in I Co 2 13, 4 3, 10 13; Ro 6 10; I P 2 13; Ja 3 7, and I Co 2 6, 14 20. E. E. N.

MAN, DOCTRINE OF: 1. General Features. The term 'man' (the rendering of the following Heb. and Gr. terms: ādām, ish, enōsh, gebher, ānērōpos, ānēr) is used of the human race, or human nature generally, or else of the individual. It is in the former sense that it becomes a doctrinal term. Whether the Bible has a distinctive science of man (anthropology) is a question that must be answered upon the whole in the negative. This means that each large period of Biblical thought (that of the O T, or that of the N T) incorporates within itself the scientific ideas of its time, and that these are used as the vehicles for the communication of the essentials of religion. Inasmuch, however, as the latest stages of this development are controlled by the earlier, and do not at the end present radically contradictory tenets, the subject may be said to possess at least a relative unity.

2. The Origin of Man. As to the origin of man the Bible contains two accounts (Gn 1 27 [P], and Gn 2 7 [J]). In both, man is the creature of God. P puts this in a generic, J in a specific, form, i.e., according to P, God created man as a part of the world; according to J, He fashioned him out of the dust of the ground, and then breathed into him the breath of life. The essential truth to be taught in both was that man owes his being to God, and has a spiritual affinity with Him. The mode of his coming into existence is a subordinate question to be answered by natural science.

3. The Image of God in Man. The Biblical account of man's creation includes also statements implying that man is endowed with the image (form) of God. This may mean that God has a bodily form, which serves as the pattern for that of man; or the image of God may be man's moral nature; or it may consist in simple lordship over the other creatures. None of these views is satisfactory. Yet the frequent repetition of the statement (Gn 5 1, 9 6; Ja 3 9; Col 3 10) forbids the dismissal of it as a mere rhetorical embellishment. The image of God is better understood to be that which brings man into relation with God; in other words, to be his personality (Ps 8 5).

4. The Distinction of Sex. The same account includes a statement that God created man, male and female, which, however, is not to be associated with the mythological notion of an androgynous first man, but with the idea dominant throughout the Bible that the two sexes are on an equal footing, as far as relationship to God is concerned (Gal 3 28). This is in contrast with some forms of heathenism, in which woman is of inferior origin and occupies a lower place than man.

5. Unity and Complexity of Man. According to the prevalent representation of the Bible regarding man's constitution, he is a unitary being. In every relationship he acts as one, both in the present life and in that after death. A separation of body from spirit is not held in view. And yet the complexity in unity of the human being is not ignored. On the one side, man is in contact with the material world, and possesses a nature which can be expressed only in terms of matter; on the other, he has powers that go beyond the world of matter. From this point of view, man is a twofold being. This doctrine is found in its simplest form in the idea of the inner man (Ro 7 22; II Co 4 16; Eph 3 16). It is implicit in Gn 27, and constantly comes to the surface in the designation of the superphysical in man, by the phrase the inward parts (Ps 5 9, 51 6).

6. Trichotomy. A still more exhaustive way of speaking of the whole man is resorted to by Paul. It consists in specifying body, soul, and spirit as parts of a complete human nature (I Th 5 23). This appears also in expressions in which a distinction between soul and spirit is alluded to (I Co 15 44, 46; He 4 12). Some apparent support for this distinction is further found in the O T use of two separate words to designate soul and spirit respectively (nephesh and ruah). But on closer examination, this usage of the O T does not appear to be based upon a consistent psychological theory, but is rather a conventional one. So far as the distinction is observed, the word 'soul' stands for the principle of life as embodied in individuals, while spirit is the same principle as cause underlying the constituted life. In the N T, with its tendency toward keener analysis, spirit and soul are more clearly discriminated from each other. The former is used of that specific side of human nature which allies man to God; the latter is restricted to the secular exercises of the inner man.

7. The Physical Man. The non-ethical side of man is concretely associated with the physical. The body is in the O T the seat of weakness, while in the N T it receives a more and more detached conception, until at times it is thought of as the mere residence of the spirit (II Co 5 1). At other times it is the 'vessel,' or instrument (II Co 4 7), or the 'temple' (I Co 6 19). The word flesh itself, ordinarily applied to the body, is found in several very broadly distinct meanings: (1) The material body (bāsār, Gn 2 23), (2) human nature in general (Jn 1 14), (3) relationship by marriage (Gn 2 23; Jg 9 2; Ro 9 5, 8), (4) the seat of all weakness ('All flesh is as grass,' Is 40 6; 'The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak,' Mt 26 41), (5) moral turpitude (Ro 8 3 ff.; Gal 5 19).

8. Localization of Faculties in the Body. Individual members or organs of the body are identified with special functions of the mind. (1) The heart is the organ of thought (Pr 23 7; Mk 2 6; Lk 24 32), but not exclusively of the reasoning powers; for it is also the seat of the affections and appetites (Ps 104 25), e.g., of joy (Is 30 29), anger (Dt 19 6), hatred (Lv 19 17), and, in fact, of the whole personal life, including all the moral impulses, both the discriminative and the directive. 'Heart' is thus synonymous with 'conscience' (Job 27 6). (2) The bowels are more consistently the seat of the emotions, especially of those which, on account of their intensity or suddenness, produce a more perceptible reflex condition in the body (Is 16 11 AV, 63 15. La 1 20 ARV, however, renders more according to the sense). (3) The liver less frequently (La 2 11), and (4) the kidneys (Ps 7 9, 26 2, etc., reins AV and ERV; ARV here also renders, according to the sense, mind) appear as seats of feeling.

9. Psychological Notions. The more purely psychological data of the Bible are scanty and more or less elastic. The conception of mind, except where it has been introduced by ARV in renderings according to the sense, is almost altogether a characteristic of the N T. And here it appears predominantly in the synonymous terms νοῦς, βούλη, the first of which denotes the deliberative reason, as applied to the moral life, with a bias either toward good or toward evil (Ro 7 23; Col 2 18; Rev 13 18); while the second denotes the act or state of intelligence, rather than a separate power or faculty.

10. Will. The Biblical conception of will must be gathered from what is said incidentally of willing as a phase of human activity. A name for the so called faculty of will is nowhere given. Neither is there a question of the freedom of the will, or of its determination. Practically, will arises in appetency, or strong inclination, and culminates in a wish (θέλημα [Ac 13 22; Eph 2 3] and ἐπιθυμία [Ro 6 12]). An inclination of a weaker nature, however, may show itself first in the form of a deliberation (βούλημα [I P 4 3]). The power of choice involves the power to accomplish what is chosen (Jos 24 15, 22; cf. also the appeal of Elijah, I K 18 21; cf. also Ph 1 22; He 11 25). Hence arises the idea of responsibility underlying the choice. Will worship (Col 2 23) is not the rendering of Divine honors to one's own will, but the introduction into religion of arbitrary elements, according to one's own choice. These may be well-intended, though unnecessary

(or supererogatory), or hypocritical and harmful (cf. Lightfoot on Col 2 23).

MAN OF SIN. See ANTICHRIST, § 6.

MAN, SON OF. See JESUS CHRIST, § 15 (c).

MANAEN, man'a-en (Μανᾶν=Heb. M'nahēm): A prophet in the church at Antioch, when Paul and Barnabas undertook their first missionary journey (Ac 13 1). He is also called a σύντροφος of Herod the Tetrarch. While this may mean that he was the 'foster-brother' of Herod (cf. CIG, 3109), more probably it is simply a court title meaning 'friend' or 'associate' (see especially two Delos inscriptions reported in Bulletin de Correspondance hellénique [1877], I, 285, and cf. Deissmann, Bible Studies,<sup>2</sup> 310 f.). There is no established connection between this M. and Manaen the Essene referred to in Jos. Ant. XV, 10 5. J. M. T.

MANAHATH, man'a-hath (מנחח, mānahath): I. A son of Shobal, and the eponym of a Horite clan of Edom (Gn 36 23; I Ch 1 40). II. A place on the border of Judah, to which certain Benjamite clans were carried captive (I Ch 8 6). Site unknown. C. S. T.

MANAHATHITE, man'a-hath-ait (מנחחית, mānahith, Manahethite AV): A Calebite clan descended from Salma (I Ch 2 54). We should read the same word for Menuhoth (I Ch 2 52), which was also a Calebite clan and likewise inhabited Manahath, which ultimately became a city of Judah. C. S. T.

MANAHETHITE, man'a-hefh-ait. See MANAHATHITE.

MANASSEH, mā-nas'ē (מנשה, m'nashsheh=Gr. Μανασσῆς, Manasses): I. The ancestral head of one of the tribes of Israel; see TRIBE, TRIBES, § 3 f. II. 1. The son of Hezekiah, King of Judah (695-641 B.C., II K 21 1). He succeeded his father at the age of twelve. As Hezekiah had hearkened to the teachings of the prophets and had carried on a drastic system of reforms in religious worship, based on their principles (II K 18 4), one of the first steps of the anti-prophetic party when he died was to start a violent reactionary movement. In this they succeeded so far as to enlist the young king in their cause. His policy was accordingly molded quite early in his reign by the leaders of this faction. Hezekiah's reformation was arrested, and the cruder forms of worship practised in the reign of Ahaz were restored. Things went even further; for the king thought to strengthen himself against the prophetic party by winning over to his side the adherents of other religious systems, through the establishment of a syncretistic national religion in Judah. For this purpose he introduced from Assyria the astral system (the adoration of the 'host of heaven,' II K 21 3), and caused 'his son to pass through the fire' (ver. 6), i.e., he practised human sacrifice. In fact, he completely reversed his father's policy, and even persecuted the prophetic party, especially the prophets. Many who resisted him were actually put to death (II K 21 16, 24 4; Jer 2 30). The syn-cretism thus introduced seems to have survived as late as the days of Ezekiel (Ezk 8 16). At all events, Jeremiah, after Manasseh's death, was full of prophetic indignation and horror at Manasseh's sins, and looked for their expiation as still in the future (Jer 15 4). Politically, Manasseh's reign was prosperous and free from petty warfare with the surrounding nations. Judah's relation to Assyria had been defined under Sennacherib as that of tribute-paying vassalage. This condition continued under Esarhaddon (687-662 B.C.), who names Manasseh as one of twenty-two tributary vassal princes (Menasē, Minsē, Schrader, COT, II, 58-60); but Manasseh rebelled against Asshurbanipal and was probably reconquered and taken for a time to Assyria as a prisoner. No extra-Biblical account of such an occurrence, however, has been preserved. The Chronicler who relates this incident attributes the misfortune to Manasseh's disobedience to the prophetic voice (II Ch 33 11). It is further added that this experience brought Manasseh to his senses, that he humbled himself before God, was restored to Jerusalem, reenacted his father's reforms, and strengthened the fortifications of the city. Later tradition attributes to him the composition of a prayer in his distress (see MANASSES, PRAYER OF). 2. One of the 'sons of Pahath-moab' who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30). 3. One of the 'sons of Hashum' who also married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 33). A. C. Z.

MANASSES, mā-nas'siz. See MANASSEH.

MANASSES, PRAYER OF: An apocryphal document, based upon the reference in II Ch 33 12 f. In the foregoing passage no prayer is given, but we are told (ver. 18) 'that the rest of the acts of Manasseh and his prayer unto his God . . . are written among the acts of the kings of Israel'; also (ver. 19) that 'his prayer . . . is written in the history of Hozai (the 'seers' AV).' The so called Prayer of Manasses purports to be this prayer. It is found among the Canticles appended to the Psalter in some MSS. of the LXX.; also in Apost. Const. II, 22, but it never had a regular position in the LXX. Some scholars have favored the view that our Greek version of the prayer is connected, through the Hebrew, with the lost original referred to in II Ch. This, however, is not the generally accepted opinion. The prayer is rather a composition (date uncertain) emanating from later Judaism, and stands much in the same relation to II Ch 33 12 f. as does the Prayer of Azariah to Dn 3 24 f. It has been divided into three parts: (1) an invocation of the Deity; (2) a confession of sin; (3) an entreaty for forgiveness; it sets forth God's infinite compassion and the efficacy of repentance. In such a short piece (15 vs.) it is difficult to decide, but probably the original language was Greek. It has never been recognised as canonical, but is included in our EV among the Apocrypha. J. S. R.—W. G. J.

MANASSITE, mā-nas'ait: The gentilic of Manasseh, meaning a member of the tribe of Manasseh. See TRIBES, §§ 2, 4.

MANDRAKE. See PALESTINE, § 22; also DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

MANEH, mē'ne. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

MANGER: The Gr. φάτνη properly means 'feeding-place' (from παρῖσθαι, 'to eat'), and should be thus rendered in Lk 13 15 (stall' AV and RV), as it is correctly rendered in 2 7, 12, 16.

MANIFEST, MANIFESTATION (φανεροῦν, φάνεσις): In their general meaning these terms do not materially differ from 'reveal' and 'revelation'; but they are found in a more specific usage in the N T, underlying which usage there is the idea of a sharp separation between spiritual and material realities. The breaking of the spiritual into the sphere of the material is designated a 'manifestation,' i.e., the bringing into visibility of what is real but invisible. The terms are favorites in the Johannine writings (Jn 2 11, 17 6; I Jn 3 2, etc.), altho also used in the Pauline Epistles (I Ti 3 16). They are still more specifically applied to the second coming of Christ, as a spectacular revelation of Himself, emerging from His present invisibility (Col 1 26, 3 4; I Jn 2 28).

A. C. Z.

MANNA (לֶחֶם, mān): The food miraculously provided for the Israelites during their desert wanderings. According to the J document of the Hexateuch (Nu 11 6-9), the manna fell with the dew in the night, it looked like coriander seed (about a sixth of an inch in diameter, whitish, globular, and aromatic), or like bdellium (see BDELLIUM); it was gathered daily, ground, boiled, and made into cakes, which tasted like cakes baked with oil; the Israelites wearied of it during the sojourn in the desert. According to E (Ex 16 4), J' rained bread from heaven, and the people gathered it daily, that he might test them, whether they would keep his tōrah. According to P (Ex 16 5-36), it appeared on the ground every morning, when the dew had evaporated, except on the Sabbath; it looked like hoar-frost; when the people saw it, they exclaimed mān hū, 'what is it?', hence its name mān, 'manna'; no one could gather more or less than a full omer-daily, and it would not keep over night, except on the day before the Sabbath, when one could gather two omers; it ceased on entering Canaan (Jos 5 12). The embellishment of the tradition in the later P document is obvious. Ps 78 25 calls manna 'food of the mighty,' i.e., of 'celestial beings.' The sweet, sticky gum exuding from a species of tamarisk is called mannā by the modern Arabs (Ritter, Geog. Pal. I, 271-292), and attempts have been made to identify this with the Biblical food. Exudations from other shrubs have also been suggested, and the scales of various lichens; but none of these has any practical food-value (all being medicinal rather than nutritive), or occurs in sufficient quantities, or possesses the other requisite qualities to satisfy the Scriptural descriptions. The 'manna' of the American Pharmacopœia is an exudation from a species of ash, and comes chiefly from southern Italy and Sicily.

MANNER: In the majority of instances this is an adequate, altho not literal, rendering of original terms meaning 'word,' 'way,' 'judgment,' etc. A few cases need comment. In Is 5 17 'manner' AV should be 'pasture' as in RV. In Is 10 24, 26 the references are historical, in the first instance (ver. 24), to the rod of the Egyptian taskmaster, in the second (ver. 26), to the rod of J', with which Moses smote the Red Sea. In Am 4 10 Egypt as the home of pestilence is meant, while in 8 14 ('way') RV it may refer to the (sacred) road to Beersheba. On Lv 20 23 cf. RV. In II S 7 19 the text is doubtful, and in any case 'way' or 'manner' is an incorrect rendering.

MANOAH, mā-nō'ā (מָנוֹחַ, mānōah), 'rest': The father of Samson (Jg 13 2 ff.), described plainly as a man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites. From this it has been conjectured that his name was the eponym of the Manahathites (q.v.), of which it might be a corruption. The only thing certain seems to be that one-half of the clan of the Manahathites were Zorahites, viz., residents of Zorah, Manoah's town.

MAN SERVANT. See SLAVERY, § 2 f.

MANSION(S). Etymologically, this is a correct rendering of Gr. μονα, 'abiding-place(s)' (both from the same root). But in common use 'mansion' suggests the size or elegance of the 'dwelling,' which is not the emphatic idea in Jn 14 2 (cf. ver. 23).

MAN-STEALING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2.

MANTELET. See BESIEGE.

MANTLE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 4; also RUG.

MAOCH, mē'ek (מֶאֶךְ, mā'ekh): The father of Achish, King of the Philistine city of Gath (I S 27 2), called Maacah in I K 2 39.

C. S. T.

MAON, mē'on (מֵאֵן, mā'on, 'dwelling'), MAONITES, mē'onaites: A city in the hill-country of Judah near Ziph and Carmel (Jos 15 55, P; I S 25 2), represented (genealogically) as a descendant of Hebron and father of Beth-zur (I Ch 2 45). It is now Khurbet Ma'in, a conical hill with caves and extensive ruins, which rises 200 ft. above the site of Carmel. Map II, E 3. (See Buhl, Geog., p. 163, with literature.) E. of Ma'in a waste pastureland slopes down toward the Dead Sea. This is apparently the Wilderness of Maon in which David took refuge (I S 23 24 ff.). The Maonites (Heb. mā'on; Jg 10 12) are possibly the same as the Meunim (q.v.), and the home of the tribe seems to have been in Arabia (I Ch 4 41; II Ch 20 1 ARV mg.; 26 7), possibly at Ma'an, 13 m. SE. of Petra. Others identify them with the Minæans of S. Arabia, and still others emend the text and read 'Midianites.' (See G. F. Moore, in ICC on Jg 10 12.)

MARA, mē'ra (מָרָא, mārā), 'bitter': A name given by Naomi to herself, because of her bitter experience (Ru 1 20).

C. S. T.

MARAH, mē'ra (מָרָה, mārāh), 'bitterness': The name of a bitter spring made sweet by Moses (Ex 15 23 ff.), the site of which constituted the first station of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea (Nu 33 8 f.). Not yet located. C. S. T.

MARALAH, mar'-a-la (מַרְאֵלָה, mar'ālāh): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 11). Site uncertain, but see Map IV, C 7.

MARANATHA, mar''s-nath'a: An Aramaic expression found in I Co 16 22. According to Dalman (Aram. Gram.<sup>2</sup> pp. 152, 357), the Gr. μαράνα θά= the Aram. מָרָנָא, 'our Lord, come.' It was probably a widely current expression, a watchword of the early Christians, indicative of their fervent hope in the speedy reappearance of the Lord Jesus.

E. E. N.

MARBLE: A stone capable of polish, and therefore, for its brightness, called in Gr. μάρμαρος ('glistening'). The Heb. shayish is of uncertain derivation. Marble was often used in costlier buildings (Est 1 6; Song 5 15), and especially in the Temple (I Ch 29 2; Jos. Ant. VIII, 3 2). The pillars of Herod's Temple were of marble (BJ, V, 5 2).

MARCUS, mār'kus. See MARK (JOHN).

MARESHAH, mā-rī'sha (מַרְשֵׁה, mārē'shāh), called Marisa in Jos. and II Mac: I. A city of Judah (Jos 15 44), fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 8). It became the battle-field in a war between Asa and Zerah of Ethiopia (II Ch 14 9 f.). It was later sacked by Judas Maccabeus (Jos. Ant. XII, 8 6), and figured in the wars of the Maccabees generally (II Mac 12 35; Jos. Ant. XIII, 9 1; XIV, 4 4, 13 9). Map II, D 2.

II. The father of Hebron (I Ch 2 42) and the son of Laadah (I Ch 4 21).

A. C. Z.

MARINER. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

MARISH: An old English form of 'marsh' (Ezk 47 11 AV).

MARK: The rendering of (1) 'ōth, 'sign' (Gn 4 15 AV). The sign was placed on Cain to protect him, not to mark him as a murderer. (2) maṭṭārāh, from mātar, 'to watch,' and hence the object on which the eye is fixed when shooting (I S 20 20; Job 16 12; La 3 12). (3) miphgā', 'that against which one strikes,' the obstacle in the way (Job 7 29). Job complains that God (purposely) strikes against him continually. (4) tāw, the last letter of the Heb. alphabet, the old form of which was T (Ezk 9 4, 6). Here the word seems to mean simply a mark or brand, not necessarily the letter itself. (5) qa'āga' in Lv 19 28 probably refers to barbarous customs of tattooing. (6) σκοπέ (Ph 3 14 AV), is 'goal,' as in RV. (7) στίγματα (Gal 6 17), 'imprints,' or 'brands,' mean the scars of the wounds Paul had received for his loyalty to Christ. As slaves were branded to show to whom they belonged, so Paul calls these marks the 'brands' showing to what Master he belonged. (8) χάραγμα, a 'stamp' imprinted on a surface, is used in Rev 13 16 f., 14 9, etc., of the mark branded or stamped on the foreheads of the followers of Antichrist. E. E. N.

MARK, mār'k, JOHN (Μάρκος): Of the life of M., the supposed author of the Second Gospel, but few notices are contained in the N T. His Jewish name was John, but like many Jews of the day he had a Gentile surname, Mark (Marcus, Gr. Μάρκος). Presumably, he was a native of Jerusalem, where his mother had a large house (Ac 12 12) and was apparently a woman of some means. How M. and his mother became identified with the primitive Christian Church of Jerusalem we do not know. Some have thought that the peculiar episode related in the Gospel (14 51 f.) refers to him and is, as it were, his signature to his Gospel. In any case, we may be sure that by 44 A.D.—i.e., less than fifteen years after Pentecost—both M. and his mother were prominent members of the Christian community in Jerusalem. The mother of M. was sister to either the mother or father of Barnabas, since M. is called the latter's ἀνεψιός (Col 4 10 'cousin' RV, not 'nephew' as AV). When Paul and Barnabas returned to Antioch, after their visit to Jerusalem with alms from the Church Antioch, they took with them 'John whose surname was Mark' (Ac 12 25). A year or two later M. was selected to accompany them on their first missionary journey as a helper, ὑπηρέτης (not a menial servant, nor, on the other hand, a colleague; Ac 13 5). M. remained with them while they evangelized Cyprus. But when they crossed over to the mainland, to Perga of Pamphylia, and planned to go thence into the interior of Asia Minor, M. withdrew and returned to his home in Jerusalem (Ac 13 13). Paul was much displeased at this, altho he appears to have had no objection at M.'s presence in Antioch after he and Barnabas had returned from their journey. Possibly M. returned to Antioch in their company after the Apostolic Council of 49 or 50 A.D. But when Paul and Barnabas planned a second journey and the latter wished to take M. along again, Paul refused (Ac 15 37 ff.). The disagreement was so positive that Paul and Barnabas parted, and Barnabas with M. visited Cyprus once more (Ac 15 39), c. 50 A.D. After this time the history of M. is involved in obscurity. In Col 4 10 (c. 60 or 61 A.D.) Paul writes to the Church of Colossæ that in case M. comes to them, they should receive him, stating also that they had had some communications regarding him. It is evident that during the preceding ten years M. had been restored to the Apostle's favor, but when and how is not known. Col was probably written from Rome and would imply that M. was then with Paul at Rome, and was about to start thence on a journey to the East, expecting to visit Colossæ. The letter to Philemon, ver. 24, shows that this was the case. M. did leave Rome, but whether he visited Colossæ we do not know. He was in the East when Paul, at the time of his second imprisonment, wrote to Timothy and asked him to come to him and bring M. with him, since 'he is useful to me for ministering.' Presumably M. was in Rome with Paul when the latter was executed.

In I P 5 13 there is a reference to M. which only adds to the perplexity of the problem concerning the latter part of his life. If I P was written at Babylon (as Weiss holds) and some years before the execution of Paul, M. must have been associated with Peter after his visit to Cyprus with Barnabas, and then later transferred himself from Peter to Paul. But if I P is late and was written from Rome, M. may have joined Peter after the death of Paul. Other solutions are, of course, possible, but no one of them can be considered more than a conjecture.

The earliest Christian tradition, outside of the NT, associates M. with Peter as his ἐμνηστεύς, a term capable of several renderings. The more common rendering, 'interpreter,' would signify that M. may have been used by Peter to interpret his Aramaic discourses into Greek, such as people in Rome, for example, might more readily appreciate. Papias, to whom we owe this notice, thinks of M. as the constant companion of Peter and consequently well fitted to compose a Gospel in which Peter's teaching was accurately reproduced even if not correctly arranged (see MARK, GOSPEL OF, § 1 [h]). Later traditions connect M. with Alexandria, of which city he is reputed to have become the first Christian bishop. His supposed remains were taken thence by the Venetians in the 9th cent. and thus St. Mark became the patron saint of Venice. But nothing certain is known of his later career, altho many legends exist in the apocryphal literature of the early Christian centuries.

MARK, GOSPEL OF: The second of the so called Synoptic Gospels (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 3).

1. Authorship. As is the case with all the narrative writings of the NT there is no one named as the author of this Gospel; tho the incident given in 14 51 f. is held by some scholars to be the author's reference to himself, largely on the basis of what is generally assumed to be the Fourth Evangelist's indefinite expression of self-reference (cf. Jn 18 15 f., 20 1-10). But even so, there is no way of identifying the person there referred to.

As a matter of fact, it is only by a careful study of the contents of the Gospel that we can come to any conclusions as to the directions in which its authorship lies, and these conclusions must at the best be tentative, until subjected to the testimony of the external evidence.

(a) Contents. The material of the narrative is arranged in an order which not only follows the recognized general development of Jesus' ministry, but is practically chronological in its sequence of individual events.

After an Introductory Statement, containing the title of the Gospel (1<sup>1</sup>), the record enters at once upon the Public Ministry of Jesus (1 2-13 37).

This is opened with a preliminary narrative (1 2-13), consisting of a brief account of the ministry of the Baptist (1 2-8) leading up to Jesus' induction into His work through His baptism (1 9-11) and His temptation (1 12-13). The Ministry proper is then taken up from the aspect of Jesus' work among the people, viz.:

A. His Popular Ministry (1 14-8 20).

This popular work is described:

(A) As it covered the region of Galilee proper (1 14-7 23), prefaced by a statement of His coming into Galilee and the theme of His message (1 14 15), and then taking up the action of the ministry, beginning with the call of the four fishermen (1 16-20) and the opening day of the Capernaum work (1 21-29) and recording the tours out from Capernaum which, while spoken of as for the purpose of preaching (κηρύσσειν, 1 28), are reported practically in their characteristic activity of events.

I. The first tour is through the smaller villages near by Capernaum (1 30-45). This is followed by an account of the return to Capernaum and the work in that neighborhood (2 1-3 19a).

II. With 3 19b-32 is given an incident in Capernaum which evidently marks the return from a second more extended preaching-tour (cf. Mt 11 2-30; Lk 7 11-8 3 as giving the incidents probably occurring on this tour). This is followed by a further incident (3 21-35)—presented as a sequence of the former—and by what Mark records of the parables by the sea (4 1-34), and then by what may be considered as a

III. Third tour—across the sea into the country of the Gerasenes (4 35-5 20). This is followed by a return to Capernaum, with subsequent miracles and a visit to Nazareth (5 21-6 6a), after which is recorded a

IV. Fourth tour—this time, however, apparently representative as well as personal through the sending out of the Twelve over a much larger region of the country, while Jesus Himself continued the more local work (6 6b-23). This is closed with the events which ended His work in Galilee proper (6 24-45), to which is added a ceremonial criticism by the Pharisees and Jesus' answering discourse (7 1-23).

(B) This popular ministry is then interrupted by what is practically a period of retirement from public activity, located in the region of Northern Galilee and the Decapolis (7 24-8 23), tho some miracles are incidentally accorded, also a controversy with the Pharisees and a few remarks to His disciples (7 24-30, 32-37, 8 1-10, 22-25, 8 12-13, 14-21).

B. At the close of this period He calls forth from His disciples a confession as to the spiritual character of His Messiahship (8 27-30) and then begins what the Evang. makes the second main feature of His narrative—His instructional Ministry (8 31-10 52). This includes His remarks connected with the announcement to His disciples of His approaching Passion (8 31-9 1), His Transfiguration (9 2-13), and His last journey to Jerusalem (9 14-10 42).

C. There is then given the final feature of the narrative in His Ministry in Jerusalem (chs. 11-13), including the Eschatological Address of ch. 13.

D. This leads up to His Passion and Resurrection (14 1-16 7 [vs. 1-20 being by a later hand]).

(b) Nationality of Author. A careful study of these contents makes clear that the author was a Jewish Christian, not because of any Jewish cast in the narrative, for this seems to be altogether lacking, but (1) because of the author's familiarity with Jewish customs (cf. 1 44, 2 18, 11 15, 14 1) and beliefs (cf. 12 18) and his ready ability to explain them (cf. 7 2 ff., 14 12, 15 6, 42), and (2) because of his acquaintance with the Aramaic language, which he translates for his readers' sake (cf. 3 17, 5 41, 7 11, 34, 9 43, 10 46, 14 36, 15 22, 34).

(c) Readers. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the readers were Gentile Christians, not simply because they were unacquainted with the language and customs of Palestine, for so were the Jewish Christian readers of Mt [q.v., § 1 (d)], but because, in addition to the explanation of Aramaic terms, there are some Latin terms (e.g., 2 4, 6 55 κράβαττος, 6 27 σκευόλατρω, 7 4, 8, ξέστης, 15 30, 44 f. κεντυρίων 15 15, τὸ ἐκένδη τοῖς ἐν), which are used only by him, and some which seem to be used not so much from the writer's habit of speech as from his desire to be understood by the readers (cf. 12 42, 15 10). At the same time, there is, apart from the remarks of others, an almost total absence of OT quotations.

(d) Place. There is no indication as to where the Gospel was written, tho perhaps from what has just been said a Latin country both for the readers and the writing might be more likely than a Greek or Hebrew one would be—in other words, the Western rather than the Eastern region of the early Church.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Were we sure as to the identity of the Rufus mentioned in Ro 16 13 with the Rufus referred to in the Gospel (15 21), we might infer that the author's inclusion of the children of Simon of Cyrene in his recital of the incident was due to the fact that his readers lived in Rome and would naturally be interested in this detail. Possibly the emphasis which he places on things clean and unclean (7 1-10) might be due

(e) Time. As to when it was written, the general tendency of modern scholarship is to place it before the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.). This would seem to be justified, for there is here the same naive unconsciousness that we find in Mt (q.v., § 1 f.) regarding the unfulfilment of Jesus' announcement of His return to earth immediately upon the soon impending catastrophe predicted in ch. 13, cf. vs. 28-37), while there is an absence even of the things which in Mt might seem to betray a more developed church organization or doctrinal thought. If the apocalyptic elaboration of ch. 13 [see note on (i) p. 550] is justified, it would bring the time of composition necessarily to a date not long before the catastrophe of 70 A.D. And yet, if Mt also was written before 70 A.D., time enough would have to be allowed for Mark's Gospel to become widely enough current as giving the recognized record of Jesus' ministry to be reproduced so largely in Mt's Gospel (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, § 5). Perhaps the earlier years of the sixth decade would best suit all the conditions in the case—making its composition shortly before Peter's martyrdom in 64 A.D. All this would be confirmed by any evidence which might be forthcoming from a study of its literary relation to the other Synoptics, showing that Mk was used by Matthew as well as by Luke in the writing of their Gospels. (See SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, § 5).

(f) Motive. As far as this Gospel has a distinctive motive, it is to present Jesus to its readers in the actual reality of His wonderful life (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 3). It is a thoroughly objective narrative which is given. The discourses of Jesus are largely omitted, while there are brought out into strong prominence not simply His wonderful deeds, but the wonderful effects which they produced (cf. 1 22, 27 f., 37, 45, 2 12 f., 3 6-12, 4 1, 5 14-21, 42 [contrastive unbelief 6 2 f., 8a and Herod's opinion 6 14], 6 31-33, 54-56, 7 36 f., 12 17, 34—naturally more evident during His popular than His instructional work).

(g) Results of Internal Evidence. While the results obtained from this internal study of the Gospel are not indicative of anything beyond its being a possible product of the Apostolic Age and of the person whose name it bears, more definite conclusions are reached by a full and impartial comparison of these results with the external evidence regarding the Gospel furnished by the post-Apostolic Age.

(h) External Evidence. This evidence uniformly ascribes the origin of the Gospel to Mark and to M. as in some way connected in the writing with Peter. That M. could have been associated with the Apostle is of course evident from the glance at the N T notices of him (see previous article). The difficulty is simply to determine just what was this association from a literary point of view.

Gathering from Jerome back to Papias such statements as have a bearing upon the problem, and to the discussion as to the distinction between them prevalent in the Roman Church (Ro ch. 14). While, if the identifying of the Last Supper with the Passover (14 12) was due to the fact that the later Roman custom of regarding the Eucharist as a reproduction of the Paschal Meal had already begun, it might confirm the tradition that Mark wrote his Gospel at Rome (Bacon, Gospel Story, pp. xxix ff., 195-198; Burkitt, Sources, pp. 92-94).

considering their respective values in the way of evidence, it becomes quite clear that, as in the case of Mt, Papias furnishes the point of departure for all the succeeding tradition, not merely because he was the earliest witness, but because we can understand how the other statements by those who came after him have been developed from his.

The statement of Papias is as follows: 'Mark, who had been Peter's interpreter, wrote down accurately, tho not in order, whatever he remembered of the things said or done by Christ. For he did not hear the Lord, neither did he follow Him, but at a later time, as I said, followed Peter, who delivered his discourses according to the needs [of each occasion], but not with the idea of making a complete arrangement of the Lord's sayings. So that Mark erred in no respect, thus writing down such things as he remembered; for of one thing he made great care, not to omit anything of what he had heard, or falsely to state anything in them [as he gave them].'<sup>2</sup>

From this it would seem that the literary relation between M. and Peter was connected with Peter's fragmentary Gospel preaching. This, however, raises the question as to how M. could get from desultory discourses such a connected narrative as our Second Canonical Gospel gives us.

In turning to Papias' statement for more detailed investigation we find that it tells us that M., who had been with Peter as his interpreter (ἐρμηνευτής, 'translator'—a relation not altogether easy to define, tho possibly referring to such services as might be rendered the Apostle when he was confronted with audiences whose language he could not use well enough for public discourse), committed to writing what he could remember of Peter's Gospel discourses (διδασκαλ(α)ι), which were delivered, not with the purpose of making a completely arranged presentation (σύνταξις) of the Lord's sayings, but in a way to suit the needs of each occasion (πρὸς τὰς χρείας), and that the writing of them itself was not in order (οὐ μέντοι τάξει).

The query is, of course, how such a description suits the contents of our Gospel. It might be possible that the statement of Peter's purpose in his discourses not completely to present the sayings of the Lord was intended to explain the fragmentary appearances of such sayings in our Gospel; but it is not so easy to explain the criticism of M.'s own writing as being not in order; for whatever may be said of the Gospel's bringing together into immediate connection events more probably separated in time or its piecing together into one discourse sayings uttered on different occasions (cf. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel, pp. 30-33), it not only presents a consistently developed plan of Jesus' ministry, but it is in the main current of its narrative chronological in its sequence of sayings and events. When we consider the expression used in Papias' statement, however, it becomes evident that this lack of order in M.'s writing was a lack of orderly arrangement (τάξις), rather than of orderly sequence (καθεξής)—a condition we could easily understand as applying to our Gospel providing Papias had in mind some other Gospel writing up to whose standard arrangement of material M. had not, in his opinion, come.

As such a standard each one of the Gospel narratives has been suggested (Mt—Holtzmann, Taylor; Lk—Salmon; Jn—Jülicher, Harnack, Zahn), including the Logian document (B. Weiss).<sup>3</sup> Whether, however, it is possible to decide among them or not, it is clear that, with the above understanding of his statements, there is no reason to doubt that Papias was talking about our Second Canonical Gospel, substantially as we have it before us to-day, and not about some hypothetical fragmentary writing by M., which possibly may have formed the basis for our Gospel but which has been hopelessly lost.<sup>4</sup>

(i) Sources. That the sources M. may have had for his narrative were confined to these Gospel discourses of Peter is not likely, whether he wrote during the Apostle's lifetime, when he could freely consult with him and gain from his personal reminiscence such purely individual incidents as 1 30 f., 35-38, 3 16, 8 32 f., 14 30, 66-70, 16 7, which may not have entered into his public discourses, or whether he wrote after Peter's death and gathered from the current tradition of the early Christian community such incidents as the above (note that Mt 14 28-31, 15 15, 16 17-19, 17 24-27, 18 21; Lk 5 3 f., 12 41, 22 31 f. are omitted in Mk, which alone gives 11 21; cf. also 14 30, 37 with ||s) and such collections of Jesus' sayings as may be evident in chs. 4, 9, and 13.<sup>5</sup> In any event it is most probable that what M. has given us in his Gospel is a reproduction of the common Apostolic preaching in the Early Church, based perhaps in general on Peter's presentation of it, but at the same time modified by his own wider experiences in company with Paul (cf. such Pauline traits as 13 35-37 [=Ro 13 12], 14 36 [=Ro 8 15; Gal 4 6], 1 15 [=Gal 4 4]) and Barnabas.

This might account for the absence from Mk of the Nativity stories and the Genealogies given by Mt and Lk, which would not be part of such preaching, and even for the absence of the preaching of the Baptist, the Sermon on the Mount (excepting small fragments, 4 21, 24, 9 43, 47, 50, 10 11, 11 25), the discourse to the Twelve (excepting the brief saying 6 10 f.), with the whole incident of the Seventy and the parabolic and discourse material peculiar to Lk (chs. 9-19 [excepting scattered sayings in Mk ch. 10]). The fact that generally speaking the sayings of Jesus find their way into Mk only in scattered fashion shows perhaps that he gave them only as they found their way fragmentarily into the common preaching (note examples of this in Paul's speech at Miletus, Ac 20 35). In truth, the fact that Mk has practically but one so called collected discourse, and this the one on the coming catastrophe and the Parousia (ch. 13), shows how the thought of the primitive disciples was forward rather than backward (cf. Burkitt, The Gospel History and its Transmission, p. 264 f.), and how when they preached 'Jesus and the resurrection' they were likely to give, not so much His teachings as the facts of His ministry culminating in His death and resurrection as the basis of their personal experience of Him as the Savior of the world. It is the later Gospels, whose plan and purpose were less objective—as Mt with its Messiahship of Jesus and Lk with its universalism of Jesus' religion—which incorporated the teachings of Jesus as a preponderating element in their record of His life and work.

2. Historical Value. Clearly the Gospel lies before us, not as a collection of unrelated anecdotes of the Gospel story, but, on the whole, as an intelligible outline of a consistently developed life and work. Here and there we find in it inaccuracies of statement, born of the thirty or more years by which it was removed from the events which it records (e.g., 1 39, where 'throughout all Galilee' is manifestly inconsistent with the restricted region of the tour; 2 26, where 'Abiathar' is given instead of Abimelech [cf. I S 21 1]; 7 3 f., where the ablutions are stated to have been practised by 'all the Jews'; 14 12, which identifies the Last Supper with the Passover feast [see note (1) under § I (d), above]). There are also colorings of the narrative, evidently due to later doctrinal and apocalyptic points of view (e.g., 1 4, where the content of the Baptist's preaching is phrased in terms of the Gospel preaching of the Early Church [cf. Ac 2 38, 10 43, 13 38 f.]; 4 10-12, where the reason given by Jesus for His use of parables is made to accord with the later Apostolic explanation of the puzzling reaction to Jesus' mission by the Covenant People [cf. Ac 2 23, 4 28; Ro 11 7 f., 25; I P 2 8]; 7 19b-22, where Jesus' words are interpreted and the list of evils is determined in the light of such controversies as arose in the Apostolic Age [cf. I Co 6 12-20, ch. 8, 10 23-33; Ro ch. 14; Gal 5 19-21; Ro 1 29-31]; particularly ch. 13, where in such passages as 5-10, 12-14, 17-20, 22-27, 33, 37 we have

<sup>4</sup> When one realizes the primary position of Mt. as the first Gospel in the N T collection, and the characteristic grouping of its material—both discourses and events—the comparison of M.'s sequential order of events with such topical arrangement of contents might have been what was in Papias' mind.

<sup>5</sup> Upon a careful study of the Eschatological Address of ch. 13 it is clear that its unusual length—so different from Mark's general brief record of Jesus' remarks—is due to the fact that Mark incorporated it into his narrative as a written document, an individual apocalypse (see evidence for such a written document in the phrase of ver. 14 'let him that readeth understand'), which had become current in the Church, and that it had come to this written form in which it was current through accretions from apocalyptic folk lore to Jesus' original remarks, the purpose of which remarks was ethical rather than predictive to warn and encourage His followers in the time of their perplexity and distress rather than to give them beforehand a program of events. This elaboration of Jesus' remarks (which is clearly observable in such passages as vs. 5-10, 12-14, 17-20, 22-27, 33, 37) was due doubtless to the prominence in the Early Church of the hope of the Kingdom's consummation which these remarks had aroused, and was most likely the reason why Mk. departed from his habit of a purely narrative record and incorporated it as a whole. (See Jacobus, Mark, p. 138 f.)

amplification and modification of Jesus' eschatological discourse, influenced by the apocalyptic ideas present in the Church under the stress and strain of the impending catastrophe with which the Jewish war came to its close [see note 5 under § 1 (i) above]. There is also a tendency to group the material topically (e.g., 3 1-8, where the healing of the withered hand on the Sabbath, which in view of its resulting combination of Pharisees and Herodians against Jesus must have occurred much later, has been brought forward and placed with the only other incident of Sabbath controversy this Gospel contains; 3 22-30, where the presence of Jerusalem Scribes may indicate that this attack has been interpolated into the incident of the anxiety of Jesus' family for His welfare [3 19b-21, 31-35], because of the association of the Beelzebub charge with the family's illusion as to Jesus' sanity; 9 38-41, which may have been interpolated because of the common reference to ministry in Jesus' name, the thought of ver. 37 being clearly resumed at ver. 42. But none of these blemishes affects the historical consistency of the narrative as a whole. Grouping may have been a feature of Peter's preaching; inaccuracies may have been due to misunderstanding and carelessness on the part of an early copyist; while the dogmatic and apocalyptic coloring was present in the thought of the Church of Mark's own day. In truth, when we recognize this Gospel as a sober record of the facts of Jesus' message and ministry as they occurred, we begin to understand why it occupied so relatively small a place in the estimation of post-Apostolic literature. It lacked, not merely those elements of literary style which characterized its Synoptic companions, but those features of doctrinal interpretation which claimed the interest of the post-Apostolic Age. It was nothing but the simple story which long ago had been known and told abroad—the natural product of those early years when the Church lived in the vivid memory of the facts it had experienced. But it is this that gives it its supreme historical worth, especially when we realize that these facts came from the personal participation in them of one of Jesus' intimate disciples: for if the story of this Gospel was not the product of the ideas of the Church, much less was it the product of one of the Church's members, however prominent he may have been, for then his ideas must have created, not only their own historical illusions, but the historical illusions on which rested the belief of the Church at large: for this Gospel became the accepted history for the Christian discipleship of the Apostolic Age.

3. The Text. The only important question as to the text of the Gospel is raised by the fact that in the ancient MSS. and Versions the concluding ch. appears in three different forms. In the larger number of these documents we have the longer form presented to us in the so called Received (Greek) Text; in the smaller number we have the shorter form given in the Revised (Greek) Text, which omits everything after ver. 8; in a few we have an intermediate form which substitutes for vs. 9-20 of the longer form a short paragraph of two sentences.<sup>6</sup> Among these forms it is however not difficult to decide. The intermediate form has no MS. evidence of value and is discredited by its character; while the longer form, tho it has in its favor an overwhelming majority of MSS. and some of the Fathers, has against it the testimony of the two oldest Uncial MSS. (Sinaitic and Vatican) and one of the two earliest forms of the Syriac Version (Sinaitic Sryiac), all of which close the chapter at ver. 8. In addition to this, is the very significant silence of Patristic literature as to anything following verse 8. This is confirmed by a study of vs. 9-20 of the longer form, which, in language and style have very little in common with the rest of the Gospel. Whether the short form was the ending given the Gospel by Mark, or whether when it left his hand it had a longer ending which was early lost is not easy to decide.

4. View-Point. When we come to study in detail the thought of Mk, it becomes at once clear that we have relatively little material at our disposal. The objective character of the Gospel has resulted in a characteristic failure to preserve for its readers the teachings of Jesus. It contains few of His discourses. Its presentation of Jesus lies more in what it represents Him as having done than in what it records Him as having said. A statement of its thought, therefore, must necessarily be meager.

(1) As to God: While M. represents Jesus as ascribing to God absolute goodness (10 17 f.) and unlimited power (10 27, 12 24, 14 36), he has not preserved in these ascriptions either the title King or, with four exceptions (8 38, 11 25, 13 32, 14 36), the title Father. In but one of these excepted passages is His Fatherhood presented as related to Jesus' disciples, and in no case is it even inferentially considered as in a general way related to all men; while but one lordship parable is preserved by this Gospel, viz., that of the Vineyard (12 1-11). (2) As to Jesus Himself: M. represents Jesus as using of Himself the title Son of Man, which tho not a current Messianic title, was employed by Him to designate His authoritative right, as Head of the Messianic Kingdom, to forgive sin (2 10) and to determine the meaning and use of the Sabbath (2 28). Its almost exclusive presentation, however, is in connection with Jesus' announcements of His coming Passion and the exaltation and glory which were to follow it. In this connection it designates Jesus' consciousness of His necessary relation to the Salvation which His Messianic rule was to offer to the world. As Son of Man he was to be delivered into the hands of His enemies (9 31, 10 33, 14 21 [his] 41), through whom He was to suffer many things and be killed (8 31, 9 12, 31, 10 33), and in this death was to give His life a ransom for many (10 45). From this death, however, He was to be raised again (8 31, 9 9) and to be exalted to the right hand of God (14 62), whence He was to come in glory to judge the world (13 26; cf. 8 38). Associated with this title is the more significant one of the Son of God which, however, M. does not represent Jesus as explicitly using of Himself. At the same time he presents Him as accepting its explicit ascription to Himself by others and as implicitly ascribing it to Himself. M. restricts this ascription of it to Jesus by others to four occasions: on the occasions of Jesus' baptism (1 11) and His transfiguration (9 7), when its use designates Him as the unique object of the Divine love and as gathering up in Himself and the mission He was accomplishing the Divine satisfaction; on one occasion of demoniac healing (5 7), when it shows Him as regarded by the demons as possessed of supernatural powers (to which is prefaced by M. a general statement to the same effect in connection with His Capernaum work following His first preaching tour, 3 11), and at His trial, where the challenge of the High Priest ('Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' 14 61), as far as it can be considered as employing this title, is made in nothing more than a technical Messianic sense, though Jesus' reply transforms it into the title Son of Man, in which He assumes the possession of a Divine glory and power (the confession of the centurion at the Cross [15 39], tho employing this specific title, in all likelihood represents nothing more than a pagan idea of a superhuman hero). The implicit ascription to Himself by Jesus of this title is recorded by M. in but three passages—once when He is speaking of the final acknowledgment by the Son of Man before His Father of those who have been His true followers on earth (8 38); again in His agony in Gethsemane, where He surrendered Himself in loyal obedience to the Father's will (14 36); and finally, in His eschatological discourse, where He confesses that the time of His Parousia is known not even to the Son, but only to the Father (13 32). The one parable in which this relationship is implied is that of the Householder and the Vineyard (12 1-11). Few as these passages are, they disclose a consciousness on Jesus' part of a relationship to God involving a mutual harmony of will (14 36) and an acknowledgment by God of Jesus' exalted right and authority to pronounce judgment upon men at the consummation of His Kingdom (8 38, 9 1), and yet, at the same time, a subordination on Jesus' part, at least so far as the determination of the time and season of this consummation were concerned (13 32). (3) As to the Kingdom of God: M. does not represent Jesus as using the peculiar phrase 'kingdom of heaven,' but as employing the general Messianic term 'kingdom of God.' The passages recorded are few in number, and in the picture of the Kingdom which they present emphasize the fact that its membership is determined by character and conduct (9 47, 10 23-25, 12 29-34), involving humility as its test of greatness (10 14 f.) and perhaps for this reason it is destined to go through a process of development before its consummation is reached (4 26-30, 30-32)—a development, however, which will be marked by great crises (cf. 9 1 with the general statements of the eschatological discourse, ch. 13). To this consummation Jesus is represented as looking forward as the realization of His mission (14 25). There does not seem to be any emphasis laid upon the universalism of its scope (tho cf. the phrase peculiar to Mk in 11 17; cf. also 14 9), or upon the non-nationalism of its plan and purpose (tho M. denounces the ceremonialism of the Pharisees, 7 1-23, 12 38-40); apart from the character-condition of its membership, its spirituality does not appear to be specially brought out (but cf. the passage peculiar to Mk 12 32-34). (4) As to the Messianic Salvation: M. represents Jesus as apparently confining eternal life to the future world, yet at the same time portraying the rewards of His discipleship as realized in the present life (10 29 f.). As to the character of this salvation, this passage is the only one in which it seems to be described, and here the impression is that it makes good the loss of material things which may come through following Him. As to the general conditions on which this Salvation is possible, Jesus is represented by M. as emphasizing the need of personal relations to Himself (8 34 f., 38, 10 29, 14 5-9); while of the specific conditions, both faith (1 15, 2 5, 5 34, 10 52; cf. 6 5 f., 9 42) and repentance (1 15; cf. 6 12) are mentioned, tho special attention seems to be called by M. to the enduring of persecutions (13 9-13). The death of Jesus is presented as the means by which this Salvation is secured (10 45, 14 24 [cf. the more specific statement in Mt 26 28]). (5) As to Eschatology: M. merges the ideas of development and consummation in the Kingdom (cf. the eschatological discourse, ch. 13). At the same time, besides the parables of the Sower and the Lamp (4 21-25), the only parables by the sea which he has given are those which emphasize the development through which the Kingdom is to go (4 6-32). On the other hand, he does not seem to have entered into any presentation of the idea of judgment beyond the simple statements attached to the parable of the Lamp (4 21-25), to the announcement of His Passion (8 38), to the remarks on humility and forgiveness (9 43-49), and the pronouncement of national doom contained in the parable of the Householder and the Vineyard (12 1-11).

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE. 1. The Legal Character of Marriage in the O T Betrothal. In the O T marriage belongs within the sphere of individual law; that is, it took place through a commercial contract which was concluded between the man who wished to marry and the man who had control over the woman who was sought in marriage. It concerned to a certain degree also the family or the local community, but the larger public, the people or the state, had no interest in the marriages of individual Israelites. The legal character of marriage is nowhere specifically described in the O T, but presupposed as understood. For example, the Book of the Covenant (Ex 21 9) speaks of the (known) rights of daughters, the prophet Ezekiel (16 33-41) of the (known) law concerning the adulteress. The carefully guarded position of the first-born son (Dt 21 15-17) necessarily presupposes fixed regulations concerning marriage, and the married woman is spoken of as b'ulah ba'al (Dt 22 22; Gn 20 3; cf. Dt 24 1; Is 54 1; Pr 30 23), i.e., as 'acquired by a husband,' 'taken into possession.' The prescriptions concerning marriage were not by any means all of Israelitic origin. Many regulations may have been retained by Israel from ancient usage, but others were probably taken over from the Canaanite civilization. If a comparison is made between the Israelitic law concerning marriage and that of the Code of Hammurabi, many distinctions as well as remarkable points of agreement will be found. The latter can not be explained otherwise than as due to the fact that Babylonian law (c. 2000 B.C.) had exercised an influence upon Israel through the medium of the Canaanite civilization. In addition, there are also found such regulations as correspond to the higher spirit of the Israelitic religion.

So far as the steps preparatory to a marriage are concerned, the matter of first importance was the choice of a bride. In antiquity the youths and maidens mingled more freely than has come to be the case to-day in Oriental countries, under the influence of Islam. The drawing of water at the springs or wells, the work in the field, or the care of the flocks furnished opportunities where they could see and speak to one another (Ex 2 18 ff.; Gn 29 9-11; I S 9 11-13; cf. Dt 22 25-27). The young man who wished to marry was consequently easily in the position to seek out for himself, among the maidens of his age and station, the one whom he would prefer for his life companion; but custom demanded that it should be the father, or one who represented him as head of the family, who picked out the wife for the son who was in position to marry. Thus Abraham selected the wife for Isaac (Gn 24 2 ff.), Isaac for Jacob (28 1 ff.), Judah for Er (38 6), Hagar, the mother, for Ishmael (21 21). Of course, there was nothing to prevent the wish of the son being the occasion of the father's suit (Gn 34 4, 6; Jg 14 1 ff.), or that the inclination of the daughter should be respected (I S 18 20). Indeed, cases are narrated of sons who took strange wives against the will of the parents (Gn 26 34 f., 27 46; Jg 14 1-10). But the rule was that the will of the father or of the parents was decisive. This decision was determined mainly by the fact that in every marriage two important conditions, relating intimately to the life of the times, had to be considered: (1) the size and limits of the families or clans involved, and (2) the assurance or certainty that the family estate would be kept in the possession of the proper family line. One did not willingly permit his daughter to pass over into a strange family, because there she would be deprived of the protection of her own family or clan (Gn 29 10), and one was not inclined to allow the share of the family in the promised land which was inherited from his fathers to be broken up and pass into strange hands (Nu 36 1 ff.). These interests could be better conserved when the knowledge of the parents regarding the prospective wife of the son was determinative rather than the irresponsible inclination of the son himself. The ultimate ground for this law was, without doubt, the complete, unlimited authority which a father possessed over the members of his own family.

2. Marriage Negotiations. The Wedding. The second transaction preparatory to the completion of the marriage contract related to the determination of the price through which the bridegroom acquired his prospective bride from her father. This was arranged between the parents (or their representatives) of the young people and was called the mōhar (dowry, Gn 34 12; Ex 22 16; I S 18 25, still called mahr by the natives of Palestine). Its amount, also its kind, differed according to the position and desirability of the bride: when David declared that he was without the means to procure the mōhar for a king's daughter, Saul fixed upon two hundred foreskins of slain Philistines as the price (I S 18 20-27); and in order to show the ardent character of Shechem's love, the narrator of Gn 34 11 f. represents him as declaring himself ready to meet any conditions (cf. also the case of Jacob, Gn 29 15 ff., and of Othniel, Jos 15 16 f.).

From a comparison of Ex 22 15 and Dt 22 28 f. it may be inferred that the average price paid for a bride to her father was 50 shekels (so also Cod. Ham. 138 f.). It was always understood in such cases that the father gave over to the bridegroom the bride as an inviolate virgin; for the Law (Dt 22 20 f.) prescribed that if this was found not to be the case the bride was to be publicly stoned. It is true that in Israel young women were sold in marriage who were no longer virgins; but in such cases the price was reduced. Thus, it appears, Hos 3 2 may be taken as indicating that 30 shekels was the usual price of a slave (cf. Ex 21 32). The same passage shows also that there were various ways of making the payment, these being probably so arranged for beforehand. The bridegroom paid over the contract price to the father of the bride or his representative, as is evident from such passages as Gn 29 18, 28; I S 18 27; Gn 34 11 f.; Dt 22 29 (so also Cod. Ham.). The same custom holds to-day among the inhabitants of Palestine. Custom did not allow the father to do with the mōhar as he pleased. The bride still had the right to expect of the father that he would devote a part of it to her, or at least to her benefit. Only in this way can the dissatisfaction of the daughters of Laban be explained over the fact that he, as a genuine miser, had used the gain he secured through Jacob's service exclusively for himself (Gn 31 15). It is not contradictory to this that at their marriage he had given to Leah and Rachel each a slave as a handmaid (29 24, 29), for there are other references to a gift (brākhāh) which a father might give his daughter at the time of her marriage (Jos 15 18 f.). All such gifts are not to be understood as the dowry which the woman brought to her marriage, but they ever remained as the individual property of the wife. It is in the postexilic times that we first hear of an inheritance brought by daughters from their parental estates to their husbands (To 8 12; Sir 25 22) as also of inheritances of daughters in general (Nu chs. 27, 36). As distinct from the mōhar we are also to consider those presents of all kinds which the bridegroom gave the bride before the marriage (Gn 24 53, 34 12) which are expressly distinguished from the mōhar by being termed matān (cf. Cod. Ham. 159 f.). These were the private property of the bride and could be viewed as an assurance that the marriage price would be paid. It was only through the actual payment of the mōhar that the young man came to acquire any authority or claim upon the prospective wife. Consequently, the Hebrew expression 'ērēs (espoused II S 3 14; Hos 2 21; Dt 20 7) is to be understood as something different from 'to be betrothed to one.' The bride was thereby designated as one upon whom no longer the father but another had the claim (me'ōrāsāh, Ex 22 15; Dt 22 23). Whoever violated such a (prospective) bride was liable to the same punishment as the adulterer (Dt 22 23-27; so also Cod. Ham. 130); from these regulations it is evident that with the payment by the bridegroom the marriage was legally established. On the other hand, whoever violated a virgin who was still free had to pay her father the mōhar and marry the woman (Ex 22 15; Dt 22 28 f.). Recently Dr. J. Neubauer has denied that Israelitic marriage should be viewed as 'purchase.' By the help of the regulations in the Talmud concerning marriage he comes to the conclusions: In Israel originally (Gn 29 18 f.) the marriage consisted in the giving of the bride to the bridegroom and the consummation that immediately followed. Later this came to consist of two separate transactions, viz., (a) the promise of marriage (betrothal) made legally binding through some kind of a gift by the bridegroom, and (b) the consummation or wedding itself. Finally a 'writing' (ktūbhāh) took the place of the payment demanded from the bridegroom. If the maiden were of age she made the arrangement on her own responsibility. If she were under age her father represented her in the affair. According to Israelitic law regarding purchase and sale, the mōhar can not be considered as the purchase-price of the maiden. It corresponds rather to a pretium pudicitiae (like the 'Morgengabe' of Germanic Law).

The marriage was completed by the bride being led from the house of her parents into the house of the bridegroom or that of his parents. This transaction, the espousal proper (Song 3 11), signified not only that now the father had released the bride from his authority and handed her over to the control of her future husband (cf. To 7 12), but also that the bride had now entered into the family or clan of her husband (Ps 45 10). Nowhere do we find any mention of any covenant or formalities of a religious-juridical sort, as an appeal to God or the like. This is easily understood if one but keeps in mind that marriage was not considered as going beyond the domain of individual law. What we find in Mal 2 14 has to do only with the mode of expression chosen by the prophet, and the case of Ru 4 11 f. is particular, not general. The Cod. Ham. (128) holds that a marriage contract was necessary for the genuineness of a marriage, but the oldest Israelitic notices say nothing of this. In To 7 15 we find the first mention of such a custom, in order to set forth the pious care and wise forethought of Raguel. Unfortunately, we do not possess a complete description of the procedure at a wedding. Only a few details are occasionally mentioned: the elaborately clothed bridegroom (Is 61 10), surrounded by his friends, υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφώνος, sons (children AV) of the bridechamber (Mt 9 15; cf. Jg 14 11), betook himself toward evening (Mt 25 1 f.) to the house of the bride. She was then led thence, veiled (Gn 29 23, 25, 24 65), and decked with rich ornaments (Jer 2 32; Is 49 18), surrounded by her friends (Ps 45 14), accompanied by music and song, with lights (Mt 25 1 f.), to the house of the parents of the bridegroom, into the bridechamber (To 7 15 f.). Now began the wedding 'week' (Gn 29 27 f.; Jg 14 12; doubled in To 8 18), participated in by those who were bid, which was filled with eating and drinking, joking, singing, and dancing, the guests being clothed in wedding-garments. J. G. Wetzstein in his essay, Die syrische Dreschtäfel (Zeitschr. für Ethnologie, 1873, pp. 270-302), has made a collection of the marriage usages and marriage songs of the modern peasants east of the Jordan and of Lebanon, and in comparison therewith has recognized the Song of Solomon as a collection of wedding-songs. K. Budde has carefully worked out this conception in The New World, March, 1894. According to this theory, we have in the Song of Solomon a small collection of such songs as were sung by the youth in the neighborhood of Jerusalem at wedding-feasts. In these the friends of the bridegroom (thirty in Jg 14 11; sixty in Song 3 7) played the chief part, their leader being termed in Jn 3 29 ὁ φίλος τοῦ νυμφίου, the friend of the bridegroom.

In the O T there are also found cases in which the husband enters the family or clan of the wife. So Jacob, who indeed later, with the departure of his wives, severed his connection with Laban, had good ground to fear that Laban might take away his wives from him (Gn 31 14-16, 31). Further, we find in Nu 27 1-11 the regulation that any one who married an heiress did so in order that the name of the father might not disappear from his family (ver. 4). And in To 10 7-10 the question comes up for special discussion whether the young Tobias should remain with Raguel or should return with his wife to his father. Here also belongs, in a certain sense, the case of Samson's marriage (Jg ch. 14 f.), which was so arranged that Samson's wife remained in the house of her parents and was visited by Samson only from time to time (cf. § 8, below). In all such cases the bride was not brought to the parental house of the bridegroom, and the joyous wedding-week was held in the house of her parents.

3. Polygamy. Israelitic marriages were regularly polygamous, in remarkable distinction from the regulations of the Cod. Ham., which holds fast to monogamy as fundamental. According to the terms noted in § 2, an Israelite could marry as many wives as his means would allow, consequently the rich, and especially princes, are mentioned as having a large number (cf. the case of Gideon, Jg 8 30; of David, II S 3 2-5, 5 13; and of Solomon, I K 11 1-4). Poor people contented themselves with one wife, altho that cases were not rare in which a man had two wives is evident from the fact that the law in Dt 21 15-17 deals particularly with such cases. Theoretically, all these wives stood on an equal footing among themselves and with reference to their husband. Actually, however, the relationship was generally different. Barrenness, loss of youthful charms, or a blemish of some sort not only easily robbed a wife of the love of her husband, but also drew upon her ridicule and abuse on the part of the other wife who was still able to bind the husband to herself. Consequently, the Law calls the one s'nū'āh (i.e., 'set aside,' 'neglected'), the other 'āhūbhāh (i.e., 'the loved,' 'cared for') (Dt 21 15-17), both expressions being from the view-point of the husband. How such wives were accustomed to treat each other is expressed in the term tsārāh, that is, 'enemy,' 'adversary,' with which Peninnah, the rival wife of Hannah, is designated from the view-point of the latter, in I S 1 6. Alongside of these legitimate wives the O T also recognizes concubines (Heb. pīlaghshām) (cf. Gr. παλλαί, and the Arab. belkīs), that is, female slaves (handmaids, maid-servants) who belonged to the husband and were subject to his authority (II S 15 16, 16 21 f.), or were the property of his wives, and had been given over by these to the husband (e.g., on account of their own childlessness) and yet continued to be under the authority of the respective wives so that these remained their mistresses (g'bhārāh, Gn 16 4) and could at any time reduce them again to the position of slaves (Gn 16 6). So, e.g., Bilhah, the female slave of Rachel (Gn 29 29), was made the concubine of Jacob (35 22). Such concubines could either belong to another people or be Israelites. With the former the law of Dt 21 10-14 is concerned, with the latter that of Ex 21 7-11 (cf. Dt 15 12-13; Jer 34 8 f.).

4. Adultery and Fornication. Between the prescriptions regarding adultery in the case of men and those in the case of women there were marked differences. For men they were lax, for women, strict. The prohibition of the Seventh Commandment (Ex 20 14; Dt 5 17) is indeed general; but it leaves open the question of what constitutes adultery for a man and what for a woman. The rigidity of the prescriptions relating to the virginity of the woman who was sought in marriage (Dt 22 13-21, 23 f.; cf. § 2, above) shows that a chaste life on the part of a woman before marriage was to be the rule. And since the woman was obtained by the man as his wife under fixed regulations, it is easily understood that absolute fidelity was to be expected of her. If she were convicted of guilty conduct, in earlier times she was burned (Gn 38 24), in later times she was brought out naked (Hos 2 5) before the assembled people of the locality and by them stoned to death (Ezk 16 38-40, 23 45-47; cf. Dt 22 20 f.; Jn 8 6). Presumably, the same punishment was meted out to the man who had seduced the wife of his neighbor (Dt 22 22; Lv 20 10). That in other cases, not made public, the private vengeance of the injured husband was to be feared is evident from Pr 6 34. On the other hand, intercourse with the concubine of another was not viewed as adultery, but probably only as injury to his property (Lv 19 20). That wives were jealously watched by their husbands is evident, not only from the provisions of Dt 22 13-16, but also from the law regarding the drinking of the bitter curse-water ('water of jealousy,' Nu 5 11-31), whereby the guilt or innocence of the suspected wife was supposed to be established. Even if this law belongs to the latest strata of the Pentateuch, it certainly deals with an ancient custom, traces of which are also to be found among other peoples. To the husband was granted much more liberty. Altho he also was forbidden to commit adultery with another man's wife, he was allowed to increase the number of his own wives and concubines, according to his desires and means, and also to have intercourse with women outside of his own house, provided only that these were not already bound by a betrothal or by a completed marriage. In case he violated a still free virgin, he was dealt with according to the law in Ex 22 15, Dt 22 28 f. What a wife was entitled to demand from a husband is told in Ex 21 10. We nowhere read anything to the effect that he was forbidden extramarital intercourse with other women. There was abundant opportunity for this not only in pre-Israelitic Canaan, but also after the Conquest. Harlots (q.v.), zōnāh, zōnōth (πόρνῃ, I Co 6 15) were to be found not only in the cities (Is 23 15 f.; Pr 7 6-23), but also in the country districts (Gn 38 15). The expression nokhriyyāh ('foreigner') for 'harlot' (Pr 2 16, 5 20, 6 24, 7 5, 23 27) implies that this practise was carried on in Israel originally by foreign women. Married women sometimes made a long absence of their husbands from home the occasion of having dealings with other men (Pr 7 18-20). The house of a harlot was a sort of inn where any one, even an enemy of the land, might stop (Jos 2 1 f.).

In particular, that characteristic of the Canaanite cultus whereby men and women yielded themselves at sanctuaries, in honor of the deity, was a great incentive to unchastity. Such persons (masc. q'dhēshīm, fem. q'dhēshōth, i.e., 'dedicated to deity,' hence not permitted to marry) were to be found at the sanctuaries of J'', as is evident not only from Am 2 7, Hos 4 13 f., but also from the measures of kings Asa and Jehoshaphat of Judah (I K 15 12, 22 4a), and the prohibition in Dt 23 18. Between such 'holy' women and harlots there was often very little difference (cf. Gn 38 12-18). Such uncleanness at the sanctuaries was always denounced as contrary to the religion of J''. To have intercourse with harlots was, even in ancient Israel, an offensive matter. The narrative in Gn ch. 38 attempts to excuse the conduct of Judah (vs. 12-15, 20-23). The Book of Proverbs is fully cognizant of the dangers of such conduct and emphatically warns against it (5 3 ff., 6 20 ff., 7 4 ff., 22 14, 23 27 f., 29 3 f., 30 20). The demands of Jesus and the Apostles are remarkable not only for their incisiveness, but above all for their new religious basis (Mt 5 27-32; I Co 6 9-20; Eph 5 3-5; Col 3 5-8; Tit 2 2-6; Ja 4 4-8).

5. Divorce. In accordance with the fundamental principles involved in the contraction of a marriage (cf. § 2, above), the husband alone had the right to dissolve the marriage, and since in such a case he did not receive back the mōhar paid for the wife, so he also voluntarily renounced his right to his property when he sent away (Heb. shillāh, Gr. ἀπολύνειν, Mt 5 32, 19 3) his wife. Probably the husband's right to drive (Heb. garash, Lv 21 7) his wife out of the house was in ancient Israel unlimited, as it is to-day in Islam. The wife went back to her family, with whose wrath the husband, at least usually, had to reckon, and had the privilege of marrying again. But in case the husband was compelled by the wife's family to divorce her, and she was given to another man, the first husband had the right, as the case of David (II S 3 14-16) shows, to demand back his wife. Dt attempts to regulate such matters in the direction of making divorce more difficult. For example, it stipulates that the husband must give the wife a 'bill of divorcement' (Heb. šēpher kēritūth, Dt 24 1; Jer 3 8; Is 50 1), and further that something immoral or unseemly must be the ground of the divorce (Heb. erwath dābhār, Dt 24 1), and, finally, that the divorced wife, in case she in the meantime has married another man, can not again become the wife of her first husband (Dt 24 1-4; cf. Jer 3 1). The expression erwath dābhār was indeed variously understood by the learned Jews. In the time of Christ the stricter school of Shammai took it to mean unchaste, shameless conduct on the part of the wife. The milder school of Hillel, on the other hand, understood it to signify some contrariness of disposition or fault on the part of the wife. The latter view, which was also approved by later rabbis, harmonizes well with the meaning of the lawgiver, who uses the expression in 23 15 in the broader sense (cf. also Cod. Ham. 141, 143).

There could be two cases, according to Dt, when a man lost the right to dismiss his wife: (1) When he had done her the injustice of wrongly charging that she entered the married state not as a virgin (Dt 22 13-19), and (2) when he was compelled to marry a virgin who, while yet unbetrothed, had been violated by him. Mal 2 10-16 goes beyond Dt when it denounces him as dealing 'treacherously' who divorces 'the wife of his youth.' Nevertheless, the later times held to the regulation of Dt (cf. Mt 5 31 f., 19 3-12). The provisions of Cod. Ham. 134 ff. are more favorable to the wife.

6. Widowhood and the Levirate Marriage. Throughout the O T widows appear as needing assistance. Their condition must, therefore, have been sad. Legally, they belonged to the private property of the husband (§ 2, above), and could, like this, be inherited. So Absalom played the rôle of the heir of his father David when he took possession of the concubines left behind in Jerusalem by David (II S 16 20-22; cf. 20 3). A similar meaning is implied in the conduct of Abner (II S 3 7 ff.), and in the demand of Adonijah (I K 2 13-22; cf. Gn 35 22). Furthermore, this was the ground of the custom that a son should marry his stepmother, which indeed is forbidden in Dt 22 30, 27 20; Lv 18 8, 20 11; but nevertheless was usual even down to the time of Ezekiel (Ezk 22 10). On the other hand, we find instances of widows living by themselves with their sons or other dependents (II K 4 1 ff.; cf. II S 14 5 ff.; Ru 1 6 ff.; also in the case of the widow of Zarephath, I K 17 8 ff.). Such instances may be in part cases in which the widow sought to conserve the property of her husband for her minor sons. A widow herself had no right of inheritance to the property of her husband. There seems to have been no fixed regulation in ancient Israel concerning the care of widows, but, on the other hand, their defenseless position was used by many men as the occasion for advancing their own interests (II K 8 1 ff.; Is 10 2; Mic 2 9). The prophets came forward, therefore, as their champions (Is 1 17; Jer ch. 6). Dt provides that the gleanings of the field and the vineyards should be left for them (24 19, 21; cf. Ru 2 2), and includes them among those who should have a share in the tithes of the third year and be invited to take part in the sacrificial meals (14 28 f., 26 12, 16 11, 14). In later times (as earlier in the Cod. Ham. 171 f.) widows were better cared for. Tobias, e.g., received his full inheritance from Raguel only after the death of his mother-in-law (To 8 20).

The position of the childless widow was particularly sad, since even during the lifetime of her husband she usually enjoyed no consideration (I S 1 6 f.; Gn 16 4). In case a husband died without leaving behind a son even by one of his concubines, the ancient custom demanded that his surviving brother should marry the widow in order to preserve the name and inheritance of the dead. Then the first son born of this marriage was counted as the descendant and heir of the dead brother. This attempt to give to one already dead a son by means of the 'levirate marriage' (from levir [Lat.], 'husband's brother') is evidently to be traced back to the prehistoric worship of ancestors which demanded that the worship due a father should be assured through his son after the father's death. For a widow this preserved a valuable right for which Tamar contended with the greatest cleverness against Judah (Gn ch. 38), who had promised her his third son. In Dt 25 5-10 this custom is sanctioned, and yet it is allowed to the brother-in-law to refuse to enter upon such a marriage. The custom therein prescribed of drawing off (hālats) the shoe (cf. also Ru 4 7) signified probably the renunciation of the inheritance of the brother (cf. the opposite in Ps 60 8). The attempt in Lv 18 16, 20 21 to forbid such marriages was not successful. In Mt 22 24 the usage of Dt. ch. 25 is presupposed as in vogue and made the basis of the discussion. Since daughters, in case there were no sons, had the right of inheritance (Nu 27 1 ff.), the levirate marriage was probably limited to such cases in which the father had left behind no children at all. The later law (Nu 27 4) provided that the name of the father could be preserved in the family through the daughters (cf. § 2, above).

7. Prohibited Marriages. Under this heading belong, in the first place, the mixed marriages, i.e., unions with Canaanite or other heathen peoples, which are forbidden in Dt 7 1-4, 23 4-7; Ex 34 15 f., because thereby the worship of other gods would be introduced into Israel. This prohibition marked a sharp distinction against the earlier customs which saw nothing irregular in marriage with the native population of Canaan. When, after the occupation of Canaan, the unity of the local community found place alongside of the tribal unity and in part supplanted it, it was impossible to avoid marriages between Israelites and Canaanites. Numerous passages show that this actually took place (Jg 3 5 f.; II S 11 3, 23 34; I K 7 14, etc.; Dt 21 10 ff.). The prohibition of Dt evidently found its reason in the religious or, more correctly, cultus view-point of the party of reform of those days (7th cent.). After the Exile it cost Nehemiah and Ezra anxious care to carry through the prescriptions of this law among the Jewish families in and about Jerusalem (Neh 13 23 ff. Ezr ch. 9 f.; Mal 2 14, where 'esheth b'erithēkh means 'your wife of the Jewish faith'). Furthermore, in Dt and in PC marriages with persons of the following degrees of relationship are forbidden: with the wife of a father (Dt 22 30, 27 20; Lv 18 8, 20 11); with one's own sister or step-sister (Dt 27 22; Lv 18 9, 11, 20 17); with the mother-in-law (Dt 27 23); with a niece (Lv 18 10); with an aunt on the father's or mother's side (Lv 18 12 f., 20 19); with the wife of the father's brother (Lv 18 14, 20 26); with a daughter-in-law (Lv 18 15, 20 12); with the wife of a brother (Lv 18 16, 20 21); with mother and daughter (or niece) at the same time (Lv 18 17, 20 14; cf. Dt 27 23); with two sisters at the same time (Lv 18 18). Such marriages were, however, in the earlier times not rare (cf. the cases of Abraham, Jacob, etc.; also Ezk 22 10 f., and § 6, above). The prohibition in regard to these marriages was probably worked out in connection with the opposition against Canaanite cults (cf. Lv 18 3, 24 ff.).

8. Historical Development in Reference to Marriage Customs. The regulations concerning marriages were of the greatest importance to the Israelites, since the social organization of the people rested altogether upon the family. For clan and tribe were nothing else than expanded families. The head of a family was the master of all its branches; through the means of the family, custom and laws were regulated. The family also was the primary cultus organization (I S 1 1 ff.; 29 6, 28 f.; Ex 13 8, 14; Dt 12 7, 12, 18, 16 11, 14). An Israelitic family was founded by the father, who wished to continue the existence of his clan. The father was the master of the wives and children. Of matriarchy only a few traces survived in Israelitic customs. One may compare the marriage of Sampson (Jg ch. 14 f.; cf. § 2, above). Marriages between brother and sister (not of the same mother; cf. Gn 20 12; II S 13 13), as also marriages with a step-mother or a daughter-in-law (Ezk 22 10 f.), presuppose that the relationship was not reckoned according to the father.

Polygamy, which it is evident from Jos. (Ant.

XVII, 1 2) was a prevalent custom, involved a lower status of woman, altho her position in general was not so unfortunate as we might suppose. She was indeed purchased by the husband, and yet could not be sold by him as a slave, presupposing, of course, that she was herself not a slave (Ex 21 7-11; Dt 21 10-14). At the same time, a father could, in case of necessity, sell his still unmarried daughter as a slave. It was only on the basis of her union with a husband that she could become free after a six-year period of servitude (Ex 21 2 f.). Consequently, a woman materially bettered her condition through marriage. On the other hand, the women of antiquity, as is the case to-day in the Orient, sighed by reason of the hard labor which fell to them day by day in the villages, in caring for household affairs and the farms. Nevertheless, there was no lack in ancient Israel of clever and energetic women whose influence extended far beyond their own household (cf. Ex 15 20 f.; Jg 4 4 ff., 17 ff.; I S 25 14 f.; II S 14 1 ff.; II K 11 2 f., 22 14 ff.), a conclusive proof that in those days women had more liberty, and stood on a much higher level than is the case to-day in Islam. The fact that the position of woman in Cod. Ham. is a high and responsible one speaks well, without doubt, for the advanced state of the ancient Babylonian civilization, and if we look for the same thing in vain in the O T, this is partly to be explained from the fact that Israel came in the first place out of the uncivilized desert, and in part also from the fact that the civilization of Canaan was on a lower level than that of Babylonia. At the same time, a finer appreciation of the significance of marriage and the worth of woman is evidenced in the later portions of the O T. It is sufficient here to refer to Gn 2 18, to the prophets who compared the union between Jehovah and Israel with marriage (Hos, Is, Jer, Ezk, etc.), to Pr 12 4, 19 14; Ps 128 3, and especially to the eulogistic 'description of a worthy woman' (Pr 31 10-31). With this agrees also the purpose of the legislation, especially of Dt, which was to improve the condition of women. At the same time, the growing estimation of the worth of women, the increasing individualizing of spiritual life, together with the deep horror of unbridled sexual license, led to the judgment that only lifelong monogamy with absolute prohibition of divorce corresponded to the Divine ideal of marriage (Mk 10 2-12; I Co 7 10 f.). On a lower level than the formulation of Jesus (Mk 10 5-9) is to be placed the judgment of Paul, who saw the ideal in absolute celibacy and considered marriage only as a lesser, altho often wholesome, evil (I Co 7 1-7, 38; cf. I Ti 3 2, 12, 4 3-5, 5 9, Tit 1 6; Rev 14 4) than license.

MARROW. The rendering of (1) the Heb. noun mōāh (Job 21 24) and ptepl. m'muḥāyīm (Is 25 6), both derived from a root meaning 'to be fat,' contain marrow'; (2) hēlēbh, the ordinary word for fat (Ps 63 5); (3) shiqḡūy, 'drink,' i.e., refreshment (Pr 3 8); and (4) of the Gr. μυελός, 'marrow' or 'pith' (He 4 12).

MARSENA, mār-sī'na. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN

MARSHAL: The rendering of šōphēr (Jg 5 14, 'scribe' RVmg., 'writer' AV) and ṭiphšār (Jer 51 27, 'governor' AV), an Assyr. loan-word (cf. Assyr. tupsharru). The two passages into which RV introduces the word are both obscure; and the text, as reflected in ancient versions, is quite doubtful. But the functions of scribe and a military office (marshal) are often united in the same person (cf. šōphēr = 'enumerator,' 'muster-officer,' probably the meaning in Jg 5 14, as in II K 25 19, etc.). MARS HILL. See AREOPAGUS.

MARTHA, mār'fha (Μάρθα = Aram. מרת, mār-thā), 'lady': The name occurs twice: (1) As that of a woman identified only as a resident of an unnamed village, as having a sister named Mary, and as 'cumbered about much serving' and slow to understand and sympathize with her sister's more contemplative temperament (Lk 10 38-42); (2) as that of a sister of Mary of Bethany and of Lazarus whom Jesus raised from the dead (Jn 11 1 ff.). According to some the similarities between these two in character (cf. Jn 12 2, 'M. served'), in relationship (each had a sister Mary), and in setting (both lived in villages), should lead to their identification. On the contrary, others are impressed by the differences which would place the two accounts in different parts of the ministry of Jesus and in different geographical locations, and assume that there were two women of the name. A. C. Z.

MARTYR: The original meaning and use of the word μάρτυς were legal, i.e., 'witness' (cf. Mt 18 16). It is also used in the sense of 'spectator' (cf. Herod. 12 1). In the NT it is used chiefly of those who testify what they have seen and heard concerning Jesus (cf. Ac 1 8). Since loyalty in this testimony often incurred violent treatment (cf. Rom. 17 2), the word came ultimately to mean one who was put to death for the sake of the gospel. J. M. T.

MARVEL, MARVELS, etc. See in general MIRACLES.

MARY (Μαρία, Μαριάμ, the Gr. form of the Heb. miryām, Aram. maryām, Miriam EV): The name of at least six women in the NT. In the OT 'Miriam' occurs only as the name of the sister of Moses (Ex 15 20; Nu 12 1; Mic 6 4) and of the daughter (or son?) of Jether (I Ch 4 17). The frequency of its Greek equivalent in the NT can be easily accounted for as a result of the popularity of 'Mariamme' (Μαριάμμη and less correctly 'Mariamne' Μαριάμνη), the granddaughter of Hyrcanus II, the last Hasmonean ruler of the Jews and the favorite wife of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. XIV, 12 1; BJ, XII, 1 3). 1. Mary the mother of Jesus. See MARY, THE VIRGIN.

2. Mary Magdalene. Among the women who accompanied Jesus and the Twelve on the tour through Galilee one named Mary bore the surname Magdalene, Μαγδαληνή, 'of Magadan,' q.v. (but cf. Schmiedel in EB, art. Mary, § 26. For variant explanations of the surname cf. also Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mt 27 56). This Mary is singled out as one from whom Jesus had cast out 'seven demons' (Lk 8 2; Mk 16 9). As demoniac possession was at the time assumed to be the general cause of ailments and disorders, this means that she was cured of a serious disability; but exactly what this was is disputed. According to some, the ailment was mainly moral aberration, possibly complicated with physical and mental disease. Those who thus explain the case allege that Jewish usage confused certain forms of immorality with demoniac possession (cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Lk 8 2; Jer. Vit. Hil. Erem.; the latter specifically names possession by an amoris daemon). If this be the true description of the evil from which Jesus delivered Mary, it becomes at once extremely probable that she is the same as the 'sinner' who anointed His feet at the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7 36 ff.). Some have gone further and identified her with Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus of Bethany (cf. David Smith, In the Days of His Flesh, 1905, pp. 206-211). Of this Mary, too, it is said that she 'anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped His feet with her hair.' The identification of Mary Magdalene, however, with Mary of Bethany upon this ground is quite precarious. Anointing, altho not frequently mentioned, when spoken of at all, is assumed to be a not unusual act of courtesy, and could easily have occurred twice during the career of a personage such as Jesus Christ. All that is known otherwise of Mary of Bethany is inconsistent with her being the sinful woman of Simon's banquet. Whether Mary Magdalene was the same as the sinful woman of Lk 7 36 must depend on the nature of her aberration and cure. If this was moral, the two designations may refer to the same person; if only mental, they must belong to different individuals. The reasons for identifying the two which are derived from the alleged linguistic usage (as given by Lightfoot, cited above) lose their force when closely scrutinized; and apart from these reasons there is no ground for the view that Mary Magdalene was the 'sinner.' The nature of the ailment described as possession by 'seven demons,' must be largely a matter of speculation and conjecture. The number itself may be taken in a twofold sense. It may refer to the unusual violence of the attacks of the malady, making the cure a permanent source of the greatest relief and gratitude. But the 'seven demons' may also be conceived as possessing the sufferer not simultaneously but successively. It is not unusual after a mental ailment has been cured by suggestion for it to return. This recurrence may have been counted as a second demon, and each subsequent lapse following a temporary cure an additional one. This ingenious suggestion, made by Schmiedel (EB, art. Gospels, § 144), would imply that the cure of Mary by Jesus consisted not in one permanent act, but in many successive treatments, a view which to say the least, is not the prima facie meaning of the Gospel narrative. Mary's discipleship seems to belong to the latter part of Jesus' ministry. Apart from Lk 8 2, she appears by name only in the story of the Passion and Resurrection (Mt 27 56, 28 1, and ||). But even if late, her attachment to Jesus was none the less strong, as is evidenced by the fact that she was found visiting His tomb, apparently alone, at the earliest opportunity offered after His burial (Jn 20 1). The Magdalene of tradition and art is almost altogether a creature of the imagination. She derives her name from Mary of Magdala, her interest as a penitent from the assumed identity of this Mary with the sinful woman of Lk 7 36, and what remains is pure fancy.

3. Mary the Mother of James and Joseph, Wife of Clopas. Another Mary, 'the mother of James and Joseph,' is named in the Synoptics (Mt 27 56, 28 1; cf. Mk 15 40) as one of those who witnessed the Crucifixion. In Mt 28 1 this same Mary is called 'the other Mary.' When the parallels Mk 16 1 and Lk 24 10 are brought into comparison, no doubt is left that 'the other Mary' is 'the mother of James and Joseph.' In the Johannine report of the Crucifixion, however, the place of the mother of James and Joseph in the list of the women who witnessed the Crucifixion is occupied by 'Mary the wife of Clopas' (Jn 19 26). At first sight this identification also appears to be beyond doubt, but considerable difficulty is experienced on account of the confused data regarding Clopas. This name is certainly not to be identified with Cleopas in Lk 24 18. It may be regarded as the same as Alphæus, since both represent the same Aramaic Ḥalḥay (cf. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 256; but, per contra, cf. Schmiedel in EB, art. Clopas). In such a case James 'the less' (Mk 15 40) must have been like Matthew (Levi) a son of Alphæus, and, as patristic tradition has it, a 'tax-collector' (cf. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. 23, 'two tax-collectors, Matthew and James'). If true, this identification would place Mary's interest in Jesus in a clearer light. But Clopas may be altogether independent of any one of the persons mentioned in the Synoptic narrative. If so, he was either the father or the grandfather of James and Joseph, the former if Mary was the wife, the latter if she was the daughter of, Clopas. But neither of these methods of identifying the mother of James and Joseph with the Mary of Clopas is convincing, and it is possible to suppose, since the name is common enough otherwise, that the author of the Fourth Gospel may have had some other Mary in mind regarding whom nothing else is known. (See BROTHERS OF THE LORD.)

4. Mary of Bethany. Mary, the sister of Martha, appears in Lk 10 38-42 as an eager listener at the feet of Jesus. The residence of the two sisters is in this passage given as 'a certain village.' In Jn 11 1 f. Martha and Mary again appear as the friends and hosts of Jesus, but this time more definitely located at Bethany. The characterization of the two sisters, as well as their names, is the same as in the Lucan story, and whatever difficulty may exist about identifying the household of the 'certain village' with that of Bethany is altogether overbalanced by these obviously common characteristics. Mary of Bethany takes a place among the disciples of Jesus as a distinct type of the mystic and contemplative believer. The view that she was the same person as Mary Magdalene, or the 'sinner' of Lk 7 37, is not supported by sufficient evidence.

5. Mary the Mother of Mark. 'Mary the mother of John whose surname is Mark' (Ac 12 12) was the owner of the house in which the disciples assembled for prayer when Herod put James to death and cast Peter into prison. The latter upon his deliverance from prison immediately hastened to this meeting-place. Besides these details no further information is given of her in the N T. That she was a widow is clear from the fact that her name instead of that of her husband is given as that of the owner of the house. She also must have occupied a prominent place in the Christian community. The fact that Barnabas was a 'cousin' (Col 4 10, 'sister's son' AV) of Mark shows her to have been related to Barnabas. In later Christian literature her house is located on Mt. Zion (the SW. hill, according to later theory). The house also is said to have served as the meeting-place of Christ and the disciples at the time of the Last Supper, of the Ascension, and of Pentecost. See JERUSALEM, §42.

6. Mary the Friend of Paul. The 'Mary' who bestowed much labor on the Roman Christians ('you,' Ro 16 6, 'us' AV) was apparently an active Christian in Rome. About her life and services, however, nothing more is known than is given in this brief salutation by Paul. The condition of the text leaves it somewhat uncertain whether the services for which she is singled out were rendered to Paul (εἰς ἡμᾶς), among the Romans (ἐν ὑμῖν) or to the Romans (εἰς ὑμᾶς). A. C. Z.

MARY THE VIRGIN. 1. Mary as Represented in the N T. In the N T the Virgin Mary is represented as a descendant of the house of David (Lk 1 27; cf. Ro 1 3; but these may be references to the genealogy of Joseph). Her kinswoman Elisabeth, however (Lk 1 36), was 'of the daughters of Aaron' (Lk 1 5). But this relationship, too, may have been established some generations earlier by marriage. In the evangelic narratives, Mary appears quite rarely. Of her personal history before her betrothal to Joseph the N T gives no hint. In the accounts of the birth of Jesus, she naturally stands in the foreground (Mt 1 18, 20; Lk 1 27 ff., 2 5 ff.), and in general these accounts are so framed as to harmonize with the extraordinary character of the circumstances recorded. They throw a poetic halo about the person of Mary as well as about the mystery of the Nativity. In the story of the life and work of Jesus, however, the personality of His mother is not put into a prominent place. His words as a child of twelve in the Temple (Lk 2 49) are just as full of mystery for her as they are for Joseph. When she is again mentioned (altho this time the report is found in the characteristically different account of the Fourth Gospel, Jn 2 1-12) she seems to have some intimation of His possessing more than natural powers. Yet there is something about her notion, at least as to the use of these powers that stands in need of correction. But in the matter of the failure of His brothers to believe in Jesus (Jn 7 5; cf. Mk 3 21), the evidence, altho negative, indicates that Mary was more sympathetic and expectant in her attitude than they. Jesus, on His part, is represented as placing more stress on the spiritual relationship to Him involved in obedience to His Father's will than on relationships of a merely earthly and physical character (Mt 12 46-50 and ||s). Yet at His crucifixion, which Mary witnessed in a womanly and motherly spirit, Jesus also showed His appreciation of the earthly filial relation through the committal of His mother to the care of the beloved disciple (Jn 19 25-27). After the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Mary appears as a devout member of the first company of believers (Ac 1 14), but without any discernible preeminence among them. In these few and simple allusions to her the N T gives in a restrained and chastely rational picture all the authentic materials we possess regarding Mary.

2. Mary in the N T Apocrypha. Soon after the close of the Apostolic Age, the process began of embellishing and expanding these authentic data. The result is shown best in the Protevangelium Jacobi (cf. Tischendorf, Ev. Apoc.<sup>2</sup> 1876), and individual traces of this mythologizing tendency are to be found as early as Justin Martyr and Tertullian. According to the document named, the parents of Mary were Joachim and Anna, a childless pair, who like Hannah (I S ch. 1) vowed that in case their prayer for offspring should be answered, they would consecrate the child to a life of service in the Temple. Mary was born and Anna at once placed her under the care of pure virgins. One year later, her father secured her special consecration by priests with the accompaniment of a sacrificial banquet. At the end of her third year, she was led in a procession of torchbearers to the Sanctuary, and there 'grew like a dove which builds her nest in the Temple.' Her nourishment came through the hands of angels. When she reached the age of twelve, it became necessary that she should be removed from the Temple. The question how to accomplish this was answered by an angel directing that all the widowers should be assembled together into the presence of the high priest Zachariah and that each should bring a staff in his hand. The high priest took the staves into the Holy Place, where he offered his prayer. Coming out thence, as he returned them to their owners a dove flew out of the staff of Joseph, the carpenter of Nazareth, and alighted on his head. This was recognized as the sign of Joseph's being chosen to take charge of Mary (not as his wedded wife but as a ward entrusted by the Temple officials to his care). Presently it became necessary to weave a new curtain (veil) for the Temple. Seven virgins were appointed to do this work, and Mary was added to the number. It was during the making of the curtain that the angel of the annunciation appeared to her (as in Lk ch. 1). Mary, being found pregnant, was called with Joseph before the Sanhedrin, and at the instigation of the learned Rabbi Hannas, both she and Joseph were made to undergo the ordeal of 'bitter water' as prescribed in Nu 5 18 ff. This they stood, proving their innocence. On the way to Bethlehem (as in Lk 2 4), the time for the birth of her child having arrived, she took refuge in a cave. The universe, visible and invisible, lapsed into a profound silence of expectation. Joseph hastened to bring a midwife, but found the cave overshadowed by a cloud which presently lifted, revealing a great light and the infant Jesus was seen resting on the bosom of His mother. When Salome was informed by the midwife of the wonder of a virgin giving birth to a child, she disbelieved and was punished by having her hand burned; but upon taking the child into her arms as directed by an angel, she was at once healed. From this point onward the apocryphal narrative coalesces with the canonical, recounting the visit of the magi, the murder of the children at Bethlehem, and other details, with the exception that instead of representing Jesus as saved from Herod's murderous intentions by flight into Egypt, it states that He was taken into a cleft in the mountain and there concealed until the danger was past.

Another class of additions to and embellishments of the biography of Mary are those which relate the manner of her leaving the earthly life. These are of a somewhat later origin. Two apocryphal Greek writings now extant in Latin translations (De Transitu Mariæ) of the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century contain the legend of the transportation of the soul of the Virgin to heaven by Christ and His angels, followed subsequently by the transportation also of her body in a cloud. In the earlier centuries it was more commonly believed, upon the basis of Lk 2 35, that she had suffered martyrdom. Epiphanius is uncertain as to whether or not Mary died and was buried. The current tradition finally settled down to the negative of this question.

3. Mary the Virgin. The title 'Virgin' has been attached to the name of Mary in all Christian literature because of the firm belief that the birth narratives (Mt 1 18-25; Lk 1 26-2 21) record exact historical facts. The position of traditional Christianity on this point was in ancient times met by Jews and opponents of Christianity among the heathen (Celsus) with the allegation that Jesus was the unlawful son of Mary and Pandarus (Πανδῆρ, Πανδῆρας, corrupted from παρθένος, 'virgin,' the distinctive title of Mary among Christians). The Talmud (cf. Laible's essay, Jesus Christus im Talmud, in Schriften des Instituts für Judaicum in Berlin, 1891, pp. 9-39), in addition, represents Mary as a professional braider of women's hair, a calling which was not considered very reputable. The animus of all this, however, is too transparent to admit of its being allowed weight as historical evidence. In modern times, doubts regarding the virgin birth have been based on historical-critical and scientific-philosophical grounds. (1) The birth narratives in Mt and Lk, the only portions in which explicit mention of the virgin birth is made, are said not to belong to the earliest tradition of the life and work of Jesus. (2) The idea of the virgin birth was, it is alleged, first deduced from a misinterpretation of Is 7 14, and then constructed into a historical statement and inserted in the evangelic narrative. (3) The notion of virgin birth for extraordinary men is quite common among the peoples of the earth, even those most developed intellectually (Hindus, Greeks, etc.), and was imported into the story of Jesus. (4) the notion is an outcome in the historical sphere of the dogma of the essential divinity of Jesus. Per contra, the defense of the traditional conception is conducted partly upon the presumptive truth of the evangelic narrative, whose early date and genuineness are strenuously contended for, partly upon the a priori fitness of such an earthly origin for the Savior of mankind, and partly upon the harmony between it and the church doctrine of Christ's person and work. (For a full discussion, see Saltau, Birth of Jesus Christ, 1903; Lobstein, Virgin Birth of Christ, 1903; Sweet, The Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 1906; Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1907). Historically, the question whether Mary is the sole human parent of Jesus must stand or fall with the acceptance or rejection of the evangelic infancy-narratives as absolutely credible testimony, issuing from Mary herself. In the absence of strong grounds for their rejection, their general apparent sanity, their freedom from objectionable features on a subject of such delicacy, and the early and implicit credit given them in the Christian community entitle these narratives to be believed as true accounts of fact.

4. Mary in Ecclesiastical Literature and Dogma. The thought of the virginity of Mary at the time of the birth of Jesus has led to further developments. These, however, for the most part possess a historical rather than a Biblical interest. They are traceable to diverse motives. The predominance of ascetic ideals and the belief in the superior merit inherent in the celibate and virgin state led to the notion that the mother of Jesus must be not only a virgin before and in the process of giving birth to her Divine Son, but must have remained a virgin ever afterward (perpetual virginity). Accordingly, Jesus could have had no brothers or sisters in the strict and true sense of the terms. Hence to explain the occurrence of the phrase 'brethren of the Lord' it was proposed to construe it as meaning either cousins, or children of Joseph by a previous marriage (the Hieronymian and Epiphanian views; see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). Another interest centering about the personality of Mary was the dogmatic one of the sinlessness of Jesus. If she was the mother of the sinless nature of Jesus she must herself have somehow been purged of original sin. The idea legitimately worked out led, altho only as late as the middle of the 19th cent., to the dogma of the immaculate conception of Mary. Still another interest finds its starting-point in the respect that Mary had earned as the mother of the Savior of mankind. In the Biblical narrative, this natural deference to her as a privileged character appears in the addresses of the angel and of Elisabeth (Lk 1 28, 42). From natural felicitation to veneration and from veneration to adoration, first akin to that due to God and afterward identical with it, were inevitable steps, altho many generations passed before the last one was taken. The controversy whether Mary should be called the 'mother of God,' involving the story of Nestorianism with all its sequels, leads to subjects which are altogether outside the field of Biblical interest even in its broadest and most indirect associations.

MASCHIL, mas'kil. See PSALMS, § 3.

MASH, mash. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

MASHAL, mē'shal. See MISHAL.

MASON. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 4.

MASREKAH, mas'ri-ka (מַסְרֵקָה, masrēqāh): The home of Samlah, who once reigned over Edom (Gn 36 36; I Ch 1 47). Site unknown.

MASSA, mas'a (מַסָּא, massā): An Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 14). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13; and LEMUEL.

MASSAH, mas'a (מַסָּה, massāh), 'testing'; cf. 'temptation' AVmg., 'tempting,' or 'proving' RV mg.: The name given the place where the children of Israel tempted J<sup>h</sup> by doubting His presence with them (Ex 17 7). Massah is also named in Dt 6 16, 9 22; Ps 95 8; but it is uncertain whether this is independent of the Massah where Levi was tested (Dt 33 8 f.). A. C. Z.

MAST. In Pr 23 34 the Heb. hībāl is of uncertain meaning. It can mean 'mast' only through some connection with the ropes or tackling (hābhal, the root, meaning 'to bind' or 'tie'). Possibly it refers here to 'the lookout basket at the masthead' (BDB, sub. voc.).

MASTER: This term is used to render: (1) 'ādhōn, especially when this refers to persons other than God (Gn 24 9 ff., etc.). (2) sar, 'prince,' 'chief' (I Ch 15 27); (3) ba'al, 'owner' (Ex 22 8; Jg 19 22 f.; Ec 12 11; Is 1 3); (4) 'ēr (Mal 2 12, 'him that waketh' RV), and (5) rabb (Jon 1 6; Dn 1 3, 4, 5 11); (6) διδάσκαλος (mostly in the Gospels in AV, 'teacher' RV); (7) δεσπότης, 'sovereign master' (I Ti 6 1 f.; II Ti 2 21; Tit 2 9; I P 2 18); (8) ἐπιστάτης, 'overseer' (Lk 5 5, 8 24, 45, 9 33, 49, 17 13); (9) καθηγητής, 'guide,' 'leader' (Mt 23 10); (10) κύριος, 'lord' (Mt 6 24; Eph 6 5; Col 3 22, etc.); (11) καπερνήτης, 'steersman,' 'ship-master' (Ac 27 11; Rev 18 17); (12) ραββί, 'rabbi' (q.v.). MATHUSALA, mā-ḥū'sā-lā. See METHUSELAH.

MATRED, mē'tred (מַתְרֵד, matrēdh): The mother of Mehetabel (Gn 36 39; I Ch 1 50).

MATRI, mē'trai (מַתְרֵי, matrēi), MATRITES: The ancestral head of a Benjamite family, or clan, to which Saul belonged (I S 10 21).

MATTAN, mat'an (מַתָּן, mattān), 'gift': 1. The priest of the temple of Baal in Jerusalem, who was slain under Jehoiaada (II K 11 18=II Ch 23 17). As Queen Athaliah was a daughter of Jezebel, he may have been a Phœnician. 2. The father of Shephatiah (Jer 38 1). C. S. T.

MATTANAH, mat'a-na (מַתָּנָה, mattānāh), 'gift': A station in the wilderness wandering, between the Arnon and the plains of Moab (Nu 21 18 f.). It is likely that the words 'from the wilderness to M.'

constitute the last line of the preceding poem, in which case M. is not to be taken as a proper noun, but should be rendered 'gift.' E. E. N.

MATTANIAH, mat'-a-nai'a (מַטַּנְיָהּ, mattanyāh), 'gift of J': 1. The original name of King Zedekiah (II K 24 17). 2. A descendant of Asaph (I Ch 9 15; Neh 11 22) and leader of the singers (Neh 11 17, 12 8). 3. A Levite of the sons of Asaph, and a contemporary of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 20 14) (=preceding?). 4, 5, 6, 7. Four who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 26 f., 30, 37). 8. A doorkeeper in the Temple (Neh 12 25). 9. An Asaphite (Neh 12 35) = 2 (?). 10. A treasurer in the Temple (Neh 13 13), also translation of מַטַּנְיָהּ, mattanyāhū. 11. A Hemanite (I Ch 25 4, 16). 12. An Asaphite in the reign of Hezekiah, who helped cleanse the Temple (II Ch 29 13). C. S. T.

MATTATHA, mat'-a-tha (Ματθαῖος): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 31).

MATTATHIAS, mat'-a-thai'as (Ματθαῖος, Heb. mattithyāh, 'gift of J'): This name, common in the late O T times (cf. Neh 8 4), occurs also in the Maccabean period. 1. A priest in Modein, the father of the five Maccabean brothers (I Mac 2 1). See MACCABEES, THE. 2. One of the captains in the army of Jonathan Maccabeus (I Mac 11 70). 3. A son of Simon the high priest (I Mac 16 14-16). 4. An envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabeus (II Mac 14 19). 5, 6. The name is twice found in Luke's genealogical table. In 3 25 M. the son of Amos, the seventh removed from Joseph, and in 3 28 the son of Semein, the thirteenth from Joseph. J. M. T.

MATTATHAH, mat'-at-ta (מַטַּתָּה, mattattāh, Mattathah AV): One of the 'sons of Hashum' (Ezr 10 33).

MATTENAI, mat'-i-nē'ai (מַטֵּנַי, mattēnay): 1. One of the 'sons of Hashum' (Ezr 10 33). 2. One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 37). 3. A priest (Neh 12 10).

MATTAN, mat'-then (Ματθάν): An ancestor of Joseph (Mt 1 15).

MATTHAT, mat'-thet (Ματθαῖος and Ματθάρ): The name of two ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 24, 29).

MATTHEW, math'-iu (Ματθαῖος, abbr. of Mattathias): One of the Apostles. His name is given in all the lists (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3; Lk 6 15; Ac 1 13) in two of them (Mk and Ac) he is paired with Bartholomew and in the other two (Mt and Lk) with Thomas. Outside of this record of Apostolic appointment he is mentioned but once in the Gospel history, viz., in connection with his call by Jesus to His discipleship (Mk 2 13 f.; Mt 9 9; Lk 5 27), where his name is given by Mk and Lk as Levi (Λευί), Mk adding his father's name Alphaeus, and implying Capernaum as his home (cf. Mk 2 1 with ver. 13 f.). There is a possibility that he was a brother of the James of the apostolic circle, whose father was Alphaeus.

From the record of his call we learn that he was one of those Jews whose nationalism was weak enough to allow him to enter the execrated service of tax-gathering, altho this service was carried on apparently with less friction in the tetrarchy of Antipas than it was in the rest of Palestine. M.

was a customs-officer, and it was while he was seated at his 'place of toll' on the customs-route between Damascus and the Mediterranean, which passed outside of Capernaum along the Sea of Galilee, that Jesus called him to His following.

This call was evidently intended by Jesus as a further object-lesson to the scribes and Pharisees, before whom He had just healed the paralytic in proof of His right to forgive sins without resort to ceremonialism; for along with all his class M. was unchurched by the religious leaders of the people, so that no more practical evidence of Jesus' independence of ceremonialism could be given than to call M. to His discipleship. It is evident that before his call M. must have been familiar with Jesus and His gospel message and mission, since the promptness of his response implied an intelligent understanding of what was involved in the call. The 'great feast' which, following his call, M. made to his new Master (Lk 5 29 ff.) was, therefore, of special significance; for it was given not only with an understanding of what his call involved for himself, but apparently with some idea of what his acceptance of it involved for Jesus. Its guests, apart from Jesus and His disciples, were made up mainly of M.'s fellow publicans and the general class of the 'sinners' (i.e., the ceremonially outlawed, not the morally corrupt), to which the publicans belonged, and the Pharisaic criticisms and Jesus' answering remarks were quite to be expected (Mt 9 10-13 and [18]).

As to his authorship of the First Canonical Gospel and his general position in the theological thought of the Early Church, see the following article.

M. W. J.

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF: The first of the group of the so called Synoptic Gospels (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 3).

1. Authorship and Historical Character. This Gospel, in common with the others, fails to name any one as its author, or even to hint, as some of the others do, at a more or less possible identification. Consequently, whatever knowledge is to be obtained of its authorship and its historical relation to the events which it records must come from a critical study of its contents, and a comparison of the results thus secured with the early traditions of the post-Apostolic Age.

(a) Contents. Its contents are peculiarly arranged. After the preliminary history, comprising the genealogy (1 1-17) and the Nativity story (1 18-2 19) and a brief statement of the preaching of the Baptist (3 1-12), the record of Jesus' public ministry is introduced with an account of His induction into it through His baptism (3 13-17) and His temptation (4 1-11), and a statement of the beginning of His work in Galilee (4 12-23). This public ministry, while it discloses a certain geographical arrangement (5 1-15 20, covering His own country of Galilee; 15 21-17 21, the outside regions of Tyre and Sidon; 17 22-20 34, Galilee and the regions beyond the Jordan; and chs. 21-28 His final ministry in Jerusalem, with His Passion and Resurrection), nevertheless is presented in such topical groupings of its teachings and its events as really to control the whole disposition of its material. There comes first:

- A. The Galilean Ministry (5 1-15 20), consisting of
  - I. A group of representative discourses treating of the Messianic Kingdom (5 1-7 29); then
  - II. A group of representative miracles, typical of Messianic times—showing Jesus' popularity (8 1-9 34)—an alternation which is then repeated with

- III. A group of representative discourses treating of the Messianic Kingdom—showing a growing opposition against Jesus (9<sup>35-13<sup>36</sup></sup>), and
- IV. A group of representative miracles, illustrating Messianic times (14<sup>1-36</sup>)—followed by an apparently isolated discourse treating of the Messianic Kingdom (15<sup>1-20</sup>). Then follows
- B. The Retirement into the regions of Northern and Eastern Galilee (15<sup>21-17<sup>20</sup></sup>), presented in
- V. A group of miracles illustrating in outlook the future missions to the Gentiles (15<sup>21-39</sup>), then
- VI. A group of discourses treating of the rejection of Israel and announcing the coming Passion (ch. 16), and
- VII. A group of miracles illustrating the glory of the Messiah and the weakness of the disciples' faith (17<sup>1-39</sup>).
- Then, after a statement of the return to Galilee, with a discourse in Capernaum (17<sup>21-18<sup>35</sup></sup>), and of the final departure from Galilee into the regions beyond the Jordan (19<sup>1-4</sup>), with discourses on the way (19<sup>5-20<sup>30</sup></sup>), is given
- C. The Closing Ministry in Jerusalem—showing His final presentation of Himself as Messiah (chs. 21-25), which is arranged as follows: First,
- VIII. The triumphal entry into the city, with its connected incidents and remarks (21<sup>1-17</sup>), and then
- IX. A group of representative discourses treating of the rejection of Israel (21<sup>18-25<sup>40</sup></sup>).

Then there is given the concluding narrative of

- D. The Passion and the Resurrection, closing with the Final World Commission to the Disciples (chs. 26-28).

(b) Nationality of Author. It is obvious from even a cursory study of these contents that the author was a Jewish Christian. (1) The whole narrative is cast so in the Messianic mold that any other conclusion is quite impossible. (2) Further than this, a detailed study will show that Jesus is not only presented definitely as the Jewish Messiah (e.g., 1<sup>1</sup> [cf. 9<sup>27</sup>, 12<sup>23</sup>, 15<sup>22</sup>, 21<sup>9</sup>, 15], 1<sup>16-18</sup>, 2<sup>4</sup>, 27<sup>17</sup>, 22 [cf. 2<sup>2</sup>]), but His birth, the events of His life and His death are connected with O T specific predictions, and are displayed in a perfectly Jewish spirit as the necessary outcome of the Divinely prearranged plan (e.g., 1<sup>22</sup> f., 2<sup>15</sup>, 17 f., 23, 4<sup>14-16</sup>, 8<sup>17</sup>, 12<sup>17-21</sup>, 13<sup>35</sup>, 21<sup>4</sup> f., 27<sup>9</sup>). (3) Finally, there is a distinct tendency in the narrative to revert to theocratic terms and points of view (e.g., Palestine = 'the land of Israel,' 2<sup>20</sup> f.; Jerusalem = 'the Holy City,' 4<sup>5</sup>, 27<sup>53</sup>, 'the city of the Great King,' 5<sup>35</sup>; God = 'the God of Israel,' 15<sup>31</sup> [which is different from Lk's LXX. citation 1<sup>68</sup>]; the Apostles are sent to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel,' 10<sup>6</sup>, 15<sup>24</sup>; Gentiles are held to be outside the immediate field of Christ's mission, 15<sup>23</sup>, 26 f., and as people of outside life and religion, 5<sup>47</sup>, 6<sup>7</sup>, 32, 18<sup>17</sup>); the permanency of the Law is emphasized, 5<sup>17-19</sup>; while the Sermon on the Mount is brought into comparison with the teachings of the Pharisees and also with the O T, as it is not in Lk (cf. chs. 5-7 with Lk 6<sup>20-49</sup>).

(c) His Gentile Point of View. At the same time, it is evident that the author is not a narrow-minded Jew: (1) He not only recognizes, but is in perfect accord with the Gentile element in the Church—in spite of his recording (a) such an episode as that of the Syro-Phenician woman in ch. 15, in which, however, Jesus' purpose was really to disclose to the disciples where their own narrow nationalism would lead them, and (b) such commands as those to the disciples in 10<sup>5</sup> f. (cf. 10<sup>18</sup>, 12<sup>18</sup>, 21, but cf. also Jesus' announcements of the nation's impending doom, 8<sup>11</sup> f., 21<sup>43</sup>, 22<sup>7</sup>, alone reported by Mt);

(2) He records the Baptist's rebuke of the Jerusalem Jews, ch. 3. (3) He alone records Jesus' denunciation of the Pharisees and scribes, ch. 23; cf. also 15<sup>13</sup> f.; 21<sup>28-32</sup>. (4) He is the only one to give Jesus' commission to go into all the world and make disciples of all the nations (28<sup>19</sup> f.).

(d) Readers. As to the readers, it is clear from the foregoing §§, (1b) and (1c), that the Gospel was intended for Jewish Christians; while from the Gospel itself it is evident that they were, (1) not only outside of Palestine, (2) but without familiar knowledge of many Jewish things; otherwise it would not have been necessary to interpret (a) such Heb. words as 'Immanuel' (1<sup>23</sup>), or (b) such Aram. words as 'Golgotha' (27<sup>33</sup>), or (c) the sentence from the Ps (27<sup>46</sup>), or to explain (d) such a custom as the Passover amnesty (27<sup>15</sup>), or (e) such a belief as that of the Sadducees (22<sup>23</sup>).

(e) Motive. Obviously, the distinctive motive of the Gospel is to present Jesus as the consummation of theocratic history and the fulfilment of theocratic principles, and yet not as answering to the national Messianic hopes, but as standing out against them and disclosing the falseness of Judaism, in consequence of which the Kingdom of God was to be world-wide in its scope.

(f) Time. As to the time when the Gospel was written, little of a positive nature can be said. There are some things that would seem to indicate a late date (e.g., the use of the baptismal formula, 28<sup>19</sup> [tho cf. the use of a similar formula in the benedictory conclusion of II Co]; the use of ἐκκλησία in an organized sense, 16<sup>18</sup> f., 18<sup>17</sup> [altho cf. the same use of this term in the speeches of Stephen, Ac 7<sup>38</sup> and of Paul, Ac 20<sup>28</sup>; also in the early Pauline Epistles to the Corinthians (I Co 7<sup>17</sup>, 11<sup>16</sup>, 14<sup>33</sup>; II Co 11<sup>28</sup>) and the still earlier Ep. of James (5<sup>14</sup>); the employment of such an expression as 'to this day,' 27<sup>8</sup>, 28<sup>15</sup>). On the other hand, the naive unconsciousness of the non-fulfilment of the prophetic discourse of ch. 24 in its apparent reference to an immediate advent (cf. the distinctly different presentation in Lk chs. 19 and 21) would seem to betray a time of writing at least before the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.). Such an earlier date would be in agreement with any evidence to the effect that this Gospel was known to Luke in the writing of his narrative about 80 A.D. (See LUKE, GOSPEL OF, § 3, and cf. in general on this point, Allen in Int. Crit. Com. p. lxxxiv f.)

(g) Place. As to place of composition, it is impossible to make any statement of fact, and conjecture is fruitless.

(h) Results of Internal Evidence. Such an induction of the internal evidence produces, of course, no proof of authorship, altho the breadth of national view disclosed by the Gospel is in significant agreement with what we might naturally expect would be the liberal standpoint of such a man as the publican Matthew, whose name has been from the beginning assigned to this Gospel. A Jew who could become a tax-gatherer among his people is not likely to have been a narrow nationalist; while, as far as we know anything of his life and work, a Jewish Christian readership outside of Palestine and a time of writing before 70 A.D., would have been perfectly possible in his case.

(i) External Evidence. The question is whether such a possible authorship is confirmed by the testimony of external evidence. This evidence is, in brief, that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb. (Aram.). Our Canonical Gospel, however, not being a translation (see § 1 (k), below), this would seem to make it one of two things—either another Gospel by a later (non-apostolic) hand, or a second Gospel by the same (apostolic) hand. Against this second alternative there is no antecedent objection, altho it is not a usual literary procedure. The first, however, is difficult to reconcile with the fact that external evidence itself holds our Canonical Gospel to be of apostolic origin.

This dilemma would seem to call for a more detailed study of what external evidence really means by its statement that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb. From such study emerge the following results: (1) An evident tradition from Papias to Jerome that Matthew wrote in Heb. a Gospel writing of some sort—called λόγια by Papias and εὐαγγέλιον from Irenæus onward—which tradition must have been based on some sort of a Gospel writing under Matthew's name existing at the earliest time. (2) An evident existence in the time of Origen and Jerome of an apocryphal Gospel in Heb. claiming to be Matthew's. (3) An evident tendency on the part of Jerome to identify the tradition and the apocryphal Gospel existing in his day.

Manifestly, these results necessitate the further question: Was this apocryphal Gospel the basis of the tradition from the beginning, or did a genuine Heb. Matthew writing exist at the first and then in some way disappear, leaving only this apocryphal Gospel to account for the tradition?

In answer to this question further investigation discloses the fact that the Apocryphal Gospel of Jerome's day was the Heb. Gospel under Matthew's name possessed by the sect of the Nazarenes and known as the Gospel According to the Hebrews. The existence of this Nazarene Gospel can be traced back to the 2d cent.—apparently to Papias' own time. Inasmuch, however, as its apocryphal character and consequently false claim to Matthean authorship was evidently not discovered till the day of Origen and Jerome, it may have constituted the basis for Papias' statement that Matthew composed τὰ λόγια in the Heb. dialect and that each one interpreted it as he was able (Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν τὰ λόγια Ἑβραϊδὶ διαλέκτῳ συνεγράψατο, ἡρμήνευσε δ' αὐτὰ ὡς ἦν δυνατὸς ἕκαστος), upon which statement all subsequent tradition concerning this Heb. Matthew Gospel is based. This would, in fact, seem to be the necessary conclusion, in spite of the use by Papias of the term τὰ λόγια, instead of τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, were it not for facts which disclose themselves upon a more detailed investigation of the contents of the Canonical Mt., in comparison with the contents of Mk and Lk.

(j) Sources. This investigation shows that the Canonical Mt had two main sources for its material. The first and more comprehensive was the Canonical Mk, whose contents have been practically reproduced in Mt's narrative, the phraseology often being altered to suit the author's linguistic taste (for display of alterations cf. Allen in Int. Crit. Com., pp. xix-xxxi, and Hawkins; Horæ Synopticæ, 2d ed., Part III A and B) or his theological ideas (cf. Allen, pp. xxxi-xxxiv and lxxi-lxxix), the sequential order being largely broken to suit the author's topical plan of arrangement. The other source was a document apparently used in common with Lk, which lay behind the discourse material of their narratives (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, § 6, and LUKE, GOSPEL OF, § 3), and which must have contained, with more or less narrative setting, something approaching a collection of the sayings, or teachings, or discourses of Jesus. Such a document, whatever its specific character and make-up, lends significance to Papias' statement, since at once the reason for his usage of the term τὰ λόγια becomes apparent and his reference to a genuine Matthew Gospel-writing most probable.

Assuming some such document as referred to in Papias' statement, we can account for the confusion in the subsequent tradition; since having been more or less incorporated into the Canonical Gospel, this original writing would most likely have disappeared from use and knowledge, leaving as the only Heb. document under Matthew's name this apocryphal Gospel of the Nazarenes, which, known as it was only at second hand till later times, might be thought to be the writing to which Papias referred. This in its turn might account for the substitution by Irenæus of the term τὸ εὐαγγέλιον for Papias' τὰ λόγια and its retention from his day onward.

This external evidence, therefore, that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb. reduces itself to this statement of Papias which seems to indicate that the writing in question was not a Gospel, but some collection of words or sayings uttered by Jesus in connection with incidents in His ministry as made it different from the ordered narrative of a Gospel and so justified the usage of the title τὰ λόγια, in distinction from the title τὸ εὐαγγέλιον.

(k) Historical Value. The only remaining question is as to who compiled this primary Matthean document with the Canonical Mk into our Canonical Mt. Manifestly, it is a matter of secondary importance how this question shall be answered; since the discourses of Jesus in the Canonical Gospel are so vitally connected with a first-hand report of Jesus' utterances through this early Matthean writing and the substance of the narrative is so reproductive of the primary record of Mk. Matthew may have written nothing more than his primary document, yet our Canonical Gospel is too closely and intimately connected with eye- and ear-witness reports of Jesus' life and teachings to give us anything less than an essential history of His ministry. In other words, nothing is gained in the way of historical reliability by insisting upon the rather unusual literary procedure which would make the Apostle both the writer of the primary document and the compiler of the canonical narrative.

The apparent uncertainty of modern scholars as to the origin and contents of this Matthean document (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, § 6) does not essentially affect its value as a source for the ministry of Jesus; since whatever the facts as to these points may ultimately prove to be, it shows itself where it appears in the Gospels so primary in its characteristics that its reliability as a source must remain beyond question.

The claim that the statement of Papias refers to an original narrative Gospel written by the Apostle in Heb. and afterward translated by him into Gr.—making our Canonical Mt a Gr. translation of the original Heb. and not an original Gr. writing (Zahn, Introd. § 54) overlooks the fact that it is obviously inconceivable that the Gr. of Mark's Gospel should have been originally translated into the Heb. of this original Mt Gospel and then retranslated into the Gr. of our Canonical Mt, with such fidelity to the Markan original. The identities of word and phrase which the Canonical Mt shows to the Canonical Mk betray a contact at first hand and not through such a double process as this theory involves.

2. View-Point. When we study the character of the thought in the First Gospel we see at once that it moves in a distinctively O T atmosphere. Jesus is presented to the readers as in Himself, His Kingdom, and its accompanying salvation the direct fulfilment of Messianic predictions and as thus specially accredited to the Jewish Christian circle to which the Gospel was sent. In any detailed consideration of the main themes the following facts will emerge: (1) As to God: M. represents Jesus as ascribing to God absolute goodness (19 16 f.) and unlimited power (10 28). At the same time, His application to God of the title 'King' is in the theocratic sense of the O T term rather than with the idea of creative rule (5 35 [cf. 15 31] and the king and lordship parables of the Unmerciful Servant, 18 23 ff. [peculiar to Mt], the Householder and his Vineyard, 21 33-45 [cf. espec. ver. 43], and the Marriage Feast, 22 2 ff.). Similarly, His ascription to God of the title 'Father,' while it shows this rule exercised beneficently over all His creation (5 45, 6 26, 10 26), displays His peculiar relation to Jesus' own disciples, and in this sense is used conspicuously by M. (5 16, 45, 48, 6 1, 4, 6, 8 f., 14 f., 18, 26, 32, 7 11, 21, 10 20, 13 43, 18 14, 23 9).

(2) As to Jesus Himself: While M. does not represent Jesus as explicitly using the title 'Son of God' of Himself, he does make clear that He accepts its explicit application to Himself by others (e.g., in the Divine declaration at His baptism, 3 17, and His transfiguration, 17 5, in the Tempter's approach to Him, 4 3, 6, in the demon's appeal, 8 29, and in the high priest's challenge, 26 63), and that He implies it of Himself (e.g., in His remarks connected with the upbraiding of the Galilean cities, 11 25-27, in His eschatological discourse, 24 36, in the parable of the Householder and his Vineyard, 21 33-45). At the same time, it is noticeable to what extent M. alone represents Jesus as implying the title of Himself (e.g., 7 21, 10 32 f., 12 50, 15 13, 16 17, 18 10, 19, 35, 20 23, 25 34, 26 53, 28 19 f.), altho His acceptance of its explicit application to Himself by others is really confined to the confession of the disciples, 14 33, 16 16 f. (The use of the title by the railing mob, 27 40, 43, and the impressed centurion, 27 54, can hardly be considered in this connection.) In the implicit use of the title by Jesus there is the assertion of a relation of unique intimacy with God, involving the consciousness of a mutual knowledge (11 25-27; and yet see the apparently contradictory statement, 24 36); a mutual harmony of will (26 39, 42, 53) and a commission of peculiar revelatory and representative character (7 21, 10 32, 12 50, 15 13, 16 17, 18 10, 19, 35, 20 23, 25 34, 28 19). In the explicit application of the title to Jesus there is implied, in the Divine declarations, 3 17 and 17 5, the fact that He is the peculiar object of the Father's pleasure; in the use of it by the Tempter, 4 3, 6, and the Demoniac, 8 29, the possession of supernatural power; and in the confession of the disciples, 14 33, 16 16, and the challenge of the high priest, 26 63, a Messianic claim.

M. represents Jesus as making frequent application to Himself of the title 'Son of Man' (e.g., 8 20, 9 6, 11 19, 12 8, 32, 16 27 f., 17 9, 12, 22, 20 18, 28, 24 30b, 26 24 [bis], 45, 64), altho the instances in which he alone places it on Jesus' lips are noteworthy (e.g., 10 23, 12 40, 13 37, 41, 16 13, 19 28, 24 27, 30a, 37, 39, 44, 25 31, 26 2). In no case is this title applied to Jesus by others, while Jesus' own use of it involves the conception of a relationship to the Kingdom not only as its Founder (e.g., in the revealing of truth, 13 37, the forgiving of sin, 9 6, the determining of the conduct of life, 11 19, and of the use of the Sabbath, 12 8), but as its Ministering Servant (e.g., in the resigning of the comforts of life, 8 20, in submission to the persecutions of foes, 17 12, in yielding to the sacrifice of death, 12 40, 17 22, 20 28, 26 2, 24, 45, in return for which is to be the final exaltation to a throne of judgment and eternal glory, 13 41, 16 27 f., 19 28, 20 18 f., 24 27-44, 25 31, 26 64).

Throughout his references to Jesus' life and teachings, it is evident that M. takes a Messianic point of view, for he omits few opportunities of connecting both the words and the acts of Jesus with the Messianic forecasts of the Scriptures, e.g., His birth (1 22), His childhood (2 15, 17, 23), His Galilean work (4 14-16), His healing ministry (8 17), His avoidance of publicity (12 17-21), His method of teaching (13 35), the manner of His triumphal entry (21 4 f.), the disposal of the betrayal money (27 9), and at times represents Jesus Himself as so connecting the experiences of His ministry and the events of His life, e.g., the misconceptions of His teachings (13 14), His betrayal (26 24), His desertion (26 31), His arrest (26 54, 56).

(3) As to the Kingdom of God: For this phrase M. represents Jesus as using almost exclusively the phrase 'Kingdom of Heaven'—seven times where the other phrase is reproduced by Mk (3 2, 4 17, 8 11, 13 11, 31, 19 14), eight times where it is reproduced by Lk (5 3, 7 21, 10 7, 11 11, 12, 13 33, 18 3, 23 13), and eighteen times in passages peculiar to himself (5 10, 19 [bis], 20, 13 24, 44, 45, 47, 52, 16 19, 18 1, 4, 23, 19 12, 20 1, 22 2, 25 1). In four passages the other phrase is represented as used (12 28, 19 24, 21 31, 43). At the same time, we find reproduced other phrases peculiar to M.—e.g., 'my Father's kingdom' (26 29), 'the kingdom of their Father' (13 43), 'thy kingdom' (6 10 [=God's], 20 21 [=Jesus's]), 'his kingdom' (6 33, 13 41, 16 28), and the simple term 'kingdom' (4 23, 8 12, 9 35, 13 19, 38, 24 14, 25 34). While it may not be possible to determine the reason for the peculiar phrasings of this common term which M. presents, it is clear that the frequency of his reproduction of the Kingdom idea is due to his O T conception of the Messiah's mission as embodying God's sovereignty and rule. (For detailed discussion of the term see Allen, in Int. Crit. Com., pp. lxvii-lxxi.). M. represents Jesus as making strong its distinction from the national and political kingdom conceived of as the Messianic promise to the Covenant People; altho he brings out particularly that its membership is based on character and conduct (5 3-10, 19, 20, 7 21, 13 41, 18 1-3, 19 14, 23 f.), the test of greatness in it is humility (18 4), and its realization is to be in the perfect doing of God's will (6 10); while he portrays its special value as an objective good (13 44-46)—because of which perhaps there will be by some a counterfeiting of real connection with it (13 47-50), and its progress will meet with hinderance and embarrassment (13 24 f.). While the Jews are represented as by right its 'sons' (8 12), their rejection of their privileges will cause them to be cast out (8 11 f.) and the Kingdom to be given to others who will satisfy its conditions (21 43). In this sense, M. understands that the Kingdom is to be universal (8 11 f., 21 31), and portrays it as conceived of by Jesus as a present fact (11 12, 12 28, 21 31 f., 23 13), as well as a future consummation (8 11 f., 13 40 ff., 47 ff., 24 30 ff., 25 31 ff.) and as thus characterized by a constant element of growth (13 31 f., 33).

(4) As to the Messianic Salvation: M. represents Jesus as conceiving of the Messianic Salvation as a thing not merely of the future, but of the present life (19 29), altho the details gathering around its future consummation are given special prominence by M. (13 30, 39-43, 47-50, 19 28, 25 31-46). This Salvation does not consist in material good (6 19 f.), altho it replaces the loss of such good a hundredfold (19 29), and secures it in the true sense of its possession (6 33). M. represents Jesus as emphasizing in general the need of personal relations to Himself in order to the bestowal of this Salvation (10 34-39, 11 29), and as presenting as its specific conditions both repentance (4 17, cf. 11 20 f., 12 41, 21 32) and faith (8 13, 9 2, 22, 29, 15 28). M. represents Jesus as referring to His death as the means by which the bestowal of this Salvation is secured (20 28; cf. the additional passage 26 28, peculiar to Mt.).

(5) As to Eschatology: M. merges the announcements of Jesus regarding the crises in the Kingdom's development with those regarding its final consummation (cf. the eschatological address, ch. 24), altho he gives prominence to the distinctive element of progress in the development (cf. Parables of the Leaven, 13 33, and the Tares, 13 24-30, 36-43; cf. also Parable of the Drag-net, 13 47-50—all peculiar to Mt.). So also in the announcements of the judgment, M. follows the general tendency to merge the ideas of its processes with those of its final declaration—tho, unlike his custom in the matter of the Kingdom's development, he makes prominent the element of the final pronouncement of the judgment (cf. 7 21-23 with Lk 6 46; 12 33-37 with Lk 6 43-45;

cf. also, as peculiar to Mt., 25 1-13, 31-46). This is doubtless due to the peculiar influence upon his thought of the O T idea of the Messianic rule, which, whatever its hidden and confused development, is fully to reveal itself in its final judgment. See the similar element characterizing the Baptist's announcement of this rule (3 11 f.).

LITERATURE: Of the various N T Introductions available to the English reader those of Jülicher (Eng. transl. 1904) and Zahn (Eng. transl. 1917) represent respectively the liberal and the conservative schools of modern German scholarship. To their exhaustive presentations of the Synoptic criticism may be added the critical introductions to the following leading Commentaries on Matthew: Allen in JCC series (1908); Bruce in Expos. Gr. Test. (1897); Weiss in Meyer's Krit.-exeget. Kom. ab. d. N T (1898); Holtzmann in Hand Com. z. N T (1901), and Zahn in his own N T series (1903). For the Theology of the Gospel see Stevens, N T Theology (1899), and Holtzmann, Lehrb. d. n'tlichen Theologie (1897), espec. I, pp. 425-438. Special works: Burton, Short Introd. to the Gospels (1904); Robinson Study of the Gospels (1902). The following Lives of Christ may be consulted: Weiss (Eng. transl. 1894); Holtzmann (Eng. transl. 1904) representing respectively the evangelical and purely critical German view-point; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah (one vol. ed. 1890), giving the Jewish background; Smith, In the Days of His Flesh (1905), a more popular presentation; Headlam (1924), scholarly, tho incomplete in the ground covered. MATTHIAS, mat-thai'as (Μαθθαίᾱς, 'gift of J''') [cf. the Gr. Theodore], abbr. from Ματθαῖος, which was common in the Maccabean age; cf. I Mac 2 1 ff., 11 70, 16 14; II Mac 14 19; also Lk 3 25): One of the little company of Jesus' followers, who was chosen by lot to take the place of Judas among the Twelve (Ac 1 23-26), on the ground that he had 'compained with' them and was, therefore, competent to witness to the teaching and work of Jesus. The historicity of the transaction is denied (Zeller, Acts), but on insufficient grounds. The method of the choice by lot has been challenged (Stier, Words of App., i, 1; also David Smith in HDB, one vol. ed.). But he was recognized as such (Ac 6 2), altho nothing authentic of his life and ministry is known. Eusebius considered him one of the Seventy (HE, I, 12); Clement (Strom., IV, 6 35) identifies him with Zacchæus; the Clem. Recog. (I, 60) with Barnabas; Hilgenfeld (N T Extra Can., 105) with Nathaniel. His name soon became the center around which apocryphal writings clustered. These include a Gospel, a group of Traditions, and some Discourses. (Cf. Harnack, Chronol., 597 ff.). There are also apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Matthias (cf. Revue de Théologie Apoc., 2, 1, 1888). A. C. Z.

MATTITHIAH, mat-ti-thai'a (מַתִּיתִיָּה, matithyāh), 'gift of J''': 1. A Levite (I Ch 9 31). 2. A musician (I Ch 15 18, 21, 16 5). 3. Another musician (I Ch 25 3, 21). 4. One of the 'sons of Nebo' (Ezr 10 43). 5. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 4).

MATTOCK: The term renders the following Heb. words: (1) maḥārēshāh (I S 13 20), which, however, is somewhat uncertain. It means the 'plowshare'; but as this is already named in the first part of the verse, probably another term (one of those in ver. 21) originally stood at the end of ver. 20. See FILE. (2) ma'dēr (Is 7 25), 'a chopping instrument,' probably similar to a pickax. (3) ḥerebh (II Ch 34 6 AV), but the text is uncertain; cf. RVmg. E. E. N.

MAUL. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 5.

MAZZAROTH, maz'a-reth. See ASTRONOMY, § 4 (4).

MEAH, mi'a. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

MEAL. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 1.

MEAL-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12.

MEALS: 1. The Regular Daily Meals. Two regular daily meals are mentioned in the Bible, besides which there was doubtless in the early morning a slight and informal repast of bread, with some relish. (1) The simple 'breakfast' (Lk 11 37 mg., dinner AV), or lunch, was eaten during the heat of the day, probably shortly before noon (Ru 2 14). (2) The principal meal, or supper, took place at about sunset, after the labor of the day was over (Gn 19 1 ff.; Jg 19 16-21; Lk 14 16-24; Jn 12 2). This was the meal at which meat would usually be served (cf. Ex 16 12). Guests were sometimes entertained, however, at the midday repast (Gn 43 16, 25; Lk 11 37 f.; cf. I K 13 7).

The word 'meal' occurs only in Ru 2 14 (literally 'at food time'). The O T gives no special names to the different meals. In Gn 43 16 to 'dine' is really 'to eat bread,' as in ver. 26. 'Dinner' (Pr 15 17) is better 'a portion' (ARVmg.). The N T ἀπρωτὶν and ἀπρωτον are always rendered dine and dinner by AV; but ARV sometimes calls this meal a 'breakfast' (Lk 11 37 f. mg.; cf. Jn 21 12, 16; 'dinner' is retained, however in Mt 22 4; Lk 14 12). The terms 'breakfast,' 'dinner,' etc., are inevitably somewhat misleading, as the meals thus named vary in hour and in formality, even in different sections of the same country.

2. Customs at Meals. The early Hebrews sat at meals (Gn 27 19; I K 13 20; I S 20 25, etc.), either on chairs, or squatting in Arab fashion. But in spite of the invectives of the prophets (Am 3 12, 6 4; cf. Ezk 23 41), by N T times it had become the usual custom among the better classes, as among the Greeks and the Romans, to eat reclining<sup>1</sup> luxuriously upon low couches. These were ordinarily arranged around three sides of the table, the fourth being left open for convenience in serving. Each person rested upon his left elbow, with the body at such an angle to the table that the head was near the 'bosom' (Jn 13 23) of the person next behind. Certain places on these couches were considered more honorable than others (Mt 23 6; cf. Lk 22 24). For the position at the Last Supper, see Edersheim, ii, 492 ff.

The meals were naturally prepared and served by the women (Mt 8 15; Lk 10 40), who ordinarily ate with the men of the family (Dt 16 14; I S 1 4; Job 1 4), but in early times, as among the Arabs, the preparation (and the eating) of meat was the function of the men (Gn 18 7 f.). There was little cutlery, except for carving, and but few dishes, perhaps only one (cf. Lk 10 42a), into which each dipped his hand (Mt 26 23). The modern Syrians sop a piece of bread in the gravy, oil, or sauce; or fold it around a piece of meat, which can thus be taken out of the stew without soiling the fingers (cf. Ru 2 14; Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20; Jn 13 26; cf. also Pr 19 24).

3. Special Meals, Banquets, etc. Meals to which friends were previously invited (Lk 14 16), or feasts held upon special occasions—such as birthdays (Gn 40 20; Job 1 4; Mt 14 6), marriages (Gn 29 22; Est 2 18; Mt 22 2), funerals (II S 3 35; Jer 16 7), laying of foundations (Pr 9 1-5), vintage (Jg 9 27), sheep-shearing (I S 25 2, 36), and the numerous religious festivals—were, of course, more formal and elaborate. A second invitation was often sent when all was prepared, or a servant conducted the guests to the feast (Est 6 14; Lk 14 17; Mt 22 2 ff.). These customs still prevail in the Lebanon region. The host welcomed the guests with a kiss (Lk 7 45), after which the feet were washed, because of the dust of the journey (Gn 18 4; Jg 19 21; Lk 7 44). The head was anointed (Ps 23 5; Am 6 6; Lk 7 46) and sometimes crowned with garlands (cf. Is 28 1). The guests were then seated according to their respective rank (I S 9 22; Lk 14 8; cf. Jn 13 23), the hands were washed (II K 3 11), and grace was said (I S 9 13; Mt 15 36; Lk 22 17, etc.). These last two ceremonies were elaborated into a confusing and burdensome ritual by the Pharisees (Mk 7 1-23), and were repeated after the meal (cf. Dt 8 10, which was cited in support of the blessing after eating). An honored guest received the largest, or choicest, portion of food (Gn 43 34; I S 9 23 f.), and portions were sometimes sent to friends not attending the feast (II S 11 8; Neh 8 10; Est 9 19, 22). During the meal entertainment might be provided in the form of instrumental music (Is 5 12; Am 6 5), singing (II S 19 35; cf. Ec 2 8), dancing (Mt 14 6; Lk 15 25), or riddles (Jg 14 12). One of the guests was sometimes appointed 'ruler of the feast,' to regulate the drinking and the entertainment (Jn 2 9). A great banquet occasionally continued for several days (Jg 14 12; cf. Est 1 3 f.), but excess in eating and drinking is unsparingly condemned by the sacred writers (Ec 10 16 f.; Is 5 11 f.; Am 6 1-8; cf. I Co 6 13; Ph 3 19). See also in general FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS.

MEARAH, mi-ē'ra (מֵעָרָא, mē'ārāh), 'cave': The name of a cave region, not taken by Joshua (Jos 13 4), belonging to Sidon, somewhere in the Lebanon country, E. of Sidon. C. S. T.

MEASURES. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

MEAT: The use of this term is much more restricted in RV than in AV where, according to Eng. usage of the 16th cent., the word 'meat' means food in general. 'Meat' is (1) The AV rendering of several related terms (derived from 'ākhāl, 'to eat'), 'ākhālāh, 'okhlāh, 'okhel, and ma'ākhāl, all meaning 'food' or 'eating' (I K 19 8; Gn 1 29; Lv 11 34; I S 20 5, etc.) and usually rendered 'food' in RV. (2) lehem, 'bread,' but frequently used broadly for food in general (Lv 22 11, 13; Nu 28 24; I S 20 24, etc.; cf. RVR. (3) bārūth and biryāh (from bārāh, 'to eat,' especially to strengthen oneself when sick or weak, as in La 4 10), food suitable for a sick one (Ps 69 21; II S 13 5, 7, 10, all AV). (4) tereph (Ps 111 5; Pr 31 15; Mal 3 10, all AV). (5) māzōn (Gn 45 23; Dn 4 12, 21 AV). (6) path (from pāthath, 'to break in pieces'), a 'bit,' or 'morsel' (for food) (II S 12 3 AV). (7) tsēdhāh, 'provisions for a journey' (Ps 78 25 AV).

<sup>1</sup> Thus AV 'sit at meat' ἀνακλισάτω, ἀνακλίστω, etc.) is usually explained as 'recline' by ARVmg. (e.g., Mt 9 10; Lk 13 23; Jn 12 2). These verbs are sometimes used, however, where it seems hardly likely that the actual position was a reclining one (e.g., Mt 14 19).

(8) βρώμα, 'food,' βρώσιμος, 'eatable,' and βρώσις, 'eating,' frequently rendered 'food' in RV (Mk 7 19; Lk 24 41; Jn 4 32; Ro 14 15, etc.). (9) προσφάγιον, 'anything eaten with' [bread or other food] (Jn 21 5 AV). (10) τράπεζα, 'table' (Ac 16 34). (11) τροφή, 'nourishment' (Mt 3 4, 6 25, 10 10, etc. AV, 'food' RV). (12) φάγετε, 'to eat' (Mt 25 35, 42; Lk 8 55 AV). (13) 'Meat' is used also in rendering the the ptcl. ἀνακλιμενος, 'to recline' (i.e., at a meal) in the phrase 'sit at meat' (Mt 9 10, etc.). See also FOOD, §§ 8-10. E. E. N.

MEAT-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12.

MEBUNNAI, mī-bun'nai (מִבְּנַי, mēbhunnay): One of David's heroes (II S 23 27), called Sibbecai in I Ch 11 29, 27 11.

MECHERATHITE, mī-kī'rāth-ait (מִכְרָתִי, mēkhērāthi): Probably a scribal error in I Ch 11 36 for MAACATHITE (cf. II S 23 34).

MECONAH, mī-kō'nā (מִכְנָה, mēkhōnāh), Meconah AV): A town in Judah, near Ziklag, occupied in postexilic times (Neh 11 28). Perhaps the same as Madmannah (Jos 15 31) (q.v.).

MEDAD, mī'dad (מִדָּד, mēdhād): An elder who had the gift of prophecy (Nu 11 26 f.). See also APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 3.

MEDAN, mī'dan. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

MEDABA, med'i-ba (מִדְבָּה, mēdhēbhā): A town in the 'plain' ('tableland' RVmg.) E. of Jordan, originally a possession of Moab. It was conquered by Israel (Nu 21 24 ff.), and assigned to Reuben (Jos 13 9, 16). After the disruption under Rehoboam it once more passed into the hands of the Moabites and is mentioned in the Mesha Stone (see MESHA) as captured by Omri (line 7 f.) and recaptured by Mesha and fortified (line 29 f.). It figured largely in the struggles of the Maccabean period (I Mac 9 36 ff.; Jos. Ant., XIII, 1 2, 4, 9 1, etc.). According to I Ch 19 7, the Syrians who came to assist the Ammonites against Joab encamped at the spot. The modern site is Mādābā, 6 m. from Heshbon (Map II, J 1). It has been colonized by Catholic Christians and contains important ruins. A mosaic map of Palestine discovered here in 1896, formed part of the floor of a church, built in the 5th cent. A full description with plates is given by Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra (1905), vol. i, chap. xii, and Appendix. A. C. Z.

MEDES, mīdz, MEDIA, mī'di-ə, MEDIAN: Media (מִדְיָה, mādhay) was a mountainous country, bounded on the N. by the Caspian Sea, on the E. by a great desert, and on the S. by Susiana and Persia, and on the W. by Assyria and Armenia. This territory, about 600 m. in length and 250 m. in breadth, is approximately covered by the provinces Ardelan and Irak Ajemi of modern Persia. In ancient times M. had two capitals: namely Rhague and Ecbatana (q.v.). It began to attract the attention of the warlike Assyrian kings as early as the middle of the 9th or the beginning of the 8th cent. B.C. At that time, to judge from the names of its leading inhabitants in the Assyrian lists, its population was of Indo-European or Aryan stock, an inference which is confirmed by the nature of the names reported in the classical writers. This affinity of the Medes with the Aryan race is also reflected in Gn 10 2, which represents Madai as the son of Japheth. According to Herodotus (I, 95 ff.), M. was made into a kingdom by Deioces, who was succeeded by his son Phraortes; but of these two monarchs nothing is known except what the Greek historian reports. The real power of M. began with Kyaxares (584 B.C.), the conqueror of Nineveh; but the glory of the monarchy was short-lived. The successor of Kyaxares, Astyages (the Ishtuvegu of the cuneiform inscriptions), being defeated by Cyrus (550 B.C.), Median independence came to an end, and Persia took the leadership in the Mesopotamian valley. The Medes never came into direct contact with the Hebrews. Sargon did indeed deport some of the conquered Israelites of the Northern Kingdom into their cities (II K 17 6, 18 11), and the prophets of Israel (Is 13 17, 21 2; Jer 51 11) name Media among the scourge in the hands of J' for the punishment of Babylon; but these are indirect relationships. In the later books of the O T (e.g., Est 1 3, etc.) M. appears second to Persia, tho still recognized as a large and almost coordinate portion of the great monarchy. Dn 5 31 contains the statement that 'Darius the Mede' ('Median' AV) received the kingdom,' but this is not as yet historically confirmed. A. C. Z.

MEDIATOR (μεστωρ), 'middleman': One who by his friendly offices establishes cordial relations between two natural hostile or estranged persons, or parties. The term 'mediator' occurs only in Gal 3 19 f.; I Ti 2 5; He 8 6, 9 15, 12 24. The synonym 'umpire' ('daysman' AV) is found in Job 9 33. The idea of mediation, however, is not only common, but regulative in the religious thought both of the O T and the N T (cf. in the O T the verb pāgha, 'to make intercession,' Is 53 12).

1. Intercession. The basis for the idea of mediation is that of intercession before a monarch by one who enjoys his favor in behalf of one who, either because he has lost it or because he never had it, seeks it. In this sense mediatorship is common in human relations. Jonathan makes intercession for David before Saul (IS 19 4); Abigail for Nabal before David (IS 25 18-31); the king of Syria for Naaman before the king of Israel (II K 5 6). But it is preeminently in the approach to God that mediation is necessary. Abraham intercedes for Abimelech (Gn 20 7, 17); also for Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 18 23); Moses for Pharaoh and the Egyptians (Ex 8 8, 30, 9 28-33, 10 17 f.) and also for Israel (Ex 17 11, 33 13; Dt 9 18). Other cases of intercession are those of Samuel (IS 8 21, 12 19, 23; Jer 15 1) and Job (42 8).

2. Priestly Mediation. This mediation in behalf of the inferior before the superior (for man before God) is in principle identical with the priestly function, and is carried through the priestly ritual. In the Apocrypha and in the apocalyptic literature instances of mediation include the intercession of angels, who take the prayers of men before the throne of God (To 3 26). Enoch is besought by the fallen angels to plead for them (Eth. En. 13 4-7). In the Assumption of Moses, Moses makes intercession for the people of Israel (11 17, 12 6); while Enoch attempts to correct the common belief that there is any efficacy in such intercession (Slav. En. 53 1). The idea survives, and is carried into the NT (ἐντυγχάνειν, ἐντευξίς). Here it is, however, connected with the work of Christ for His people (He 7 25), or the work of the Holy Spirit in behalf of the praying believer (Ro 8 27), or the sympathetic plea in prayer by believers for their fellow men (1 Ti 2 1).

3. Angelic Mediation. Mediation by creatures, especially angels before the throne of God, became obnoxious to later Jewish thought, on account of the great risk involved of raising the mediating creatures into objects of worship. Accordingly in the Rabbinical schools the idea was discountenanced, and Moses alone was given the title mediator (Pešiq. Rab. 6). Among Christians the belief in the intercession of saints, of angels, and of the Virgin Mary was largely developed between the 3d and 6th centuries A.D.

4. Prophetic Mediation. The counterpart of mediation in behalf of man before God is the presentation of God's word and will to men by an intermediary. The twofold ground for such mediation is (1) the necessity of communicating God's will to men, and (2) the incapacity, or unwillingness, of men to receive it directly from Him. Moses becomes God's mediator to Pharaoh and the Israelites (Ex 4 10 ff.). Later, in the giving of the Law on Mt. Sinai, at the express request of the people all communications from God are made to them through Moses (Ex 20 19). Hence the later uniform representation that Moses was the mediator of the old covenant (He 8 6; Philo, Vita Moys. 3 19; Ass. Mos. 1 14, 3 12). But even Moses being supposed incapable of receiving the Law directly, the idea arose that it was delivered to him through angels (Jos. Ant. XV, 5 3; cf. also Hermas, Simil., VIII, 3 3, who names Michael as the individual angel; cf. Ac 7 53; Gal 3 19). A. C. Z.

MEDICINE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

MEDITERRANEAN SEA (also called Great Sea [Nu 34 6; Jos 1 4, 15 12; Ezk 47 10], Hinder, or Western Sea [Dt 11 24; Jl 2 20; Zec 14 8]): The inland ocean lying between Europe, Western Asia, and Africa, 2,320 m. long by 100 to 600 m. broad, and, between Sicily and Africa, divided into two basins by a submarine ridge. Its main divisions were the Phœnician (Levant), the Ægean, the Adriatic (including the Ionian; see ADRIA), and the Tyrrhene Seas. During the summer months the prevailing winds ('Etesian') in the E. portions are from the NW. In the winter, fierce gales ('Levanters') sweep down from ENE., and in the western portions violent storms from the NW. and the NE. The Syrtes (quicksands Ac 27 17) on the shores of Africa, the straits of Messina, between Sicily and Italy, and Cape Malia on the S. of Greece were regarded by ancient mariners with dread. The commerce of the Hebrews was chiefly by land, and they regarded the sea with some fear. Their coast-line, almost harborless, except N. of Carmel, was unfavorable to the growth of maritime trade; but they had intercourse with 'the Isles,' and had the Western world opened up to them by the Phœnicians. In NT times the Mediterranean was surrounded by the civilization of the world, and its great islands were very productive; so that there was a constant traffic in every direction, tho most of the trade converged on Rome from Spain, Sicily, Africa, the Ægean, the Black Sea, and even India through Egypt—the grain-ships of Alexandria also supplying the capital with most of her food (cf. Ac 27 6, 28 11). Through Joppa, Cæsarea, and Ptolemais (q.v.), Palestine was in constant communication with the coasts of Asia Minor, Cyprus, Rhodes, Greece, and the West.

MEEK, MEEKNESS: In the O T there is a small group of words, 'ānāh, 'ānī, 'ānāw, 'anwāh, and 'ānāwāh, all derived from the root ענא, the primary significance of which seems to be 'to be bowed down, brought low.' The verb 'ānāh may mean (in the active) 'to bend,' 'to oppress,' or 'to afflict,' or (intransitively) 'to be humble,' especially before God or His law, or (in the passive) 'to be bent,' 'oppressed,' 'afflicted.' The derivative 'ānāw is considered intransitive, and generally rendered 'meek,' 'humble,' or 'lowly,' and the nominal forms, 'anwāh, 'ānāwāh, are rendered 'meekness' or 'humility,' while 'ānī is taken as passive and rendered 'poor' or 'afflicted.' Since those who 'humbled themselves' before God and were loyal to Him were also frequently the oppressed ones whose cause was championed by prophets and psalmists (Ps 22 26, 25 9; Is 61 1; Am 2 7, etc.), the terms 'ānī and 'ānāw came to have somewhat of a technical religious sense, indicative of loyalty to J' as well as of lowly station in life. The significance that thus came to be read into these terms in the course of Jewish history explains the important use in the N T of the corresponding Gr. adjectives πραῖος and πραῦς (Mt 5 5, 11 29, 21 5; I P 3 4) and the nouns πραότης and πραῦτης (I Co 4 21, 'gentleness' RV; II Cor 10 1; Eph 4 2, etc., frequently in Paul; Ja 1 21, 3 13; I P 3 15). When Jesus says, 'I am meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11 29), He must be understood as using the word in its acquired sense, in which whole-hearted submission to the will of God was the dominant note. E. E. N.

MEGIDDO, mi-gid'dō (מִגִּדּוֹ, mēghiddō), MEGIDDON (in Zec 12 11): A very ancient Canaanite stronghold (Jos 12 21, D; 17 11, J), captured by Thotmes III (ca. 1500 B.C.), and mentioned in the Tell el-Amarna tablets (ca. 1400 B.C.), as well as in Assyrian inscriptions of the 8th century. The ruins of el-Lejjān (Latin, Legio), 4½ m. N.W. of Taanach (q.v.), mark the site of the city in Roman times, but the ancient citadel was on the neighboring Tell el-Mutesellim (Map IV, C 8). This fortified city (I K 9 15) commanded the mouth of the chief pass from Sharon, as well as the road from En-gannim to the sea, and was so important a strategic point that the whole plain of Esdraelon was called 'the valley of Megiddo' (II Ch 35 22; Zec 12 11). 'The waters of Megiddo' (Jg 5 19) are apparently those of the Kishon, one of whose tributaries rises near el-Lejjān. See also HAR-MAGEDON.

The excavation of Megiddo was undertaken by the German Palestine Society in 1903, and was continued until 1905; and important archeological remains were found of every period from 2500 B.C. onward. See G. Schumacher and K. Steuernagel, MEHETABEL, mi-het'a-bl (מֵהֶתֶבֶל, mehē-tabh'el) and MEHETABEEL, bil, AV, 'God benefits': 1. The wife of Hadar, King of Edom (Gn 36 39; I Ch 1 50). 2. The father of Delaiah (Neh 6 10).

MEHIDA, mi-hai'da (מֵהִידָא, mehīdhā): The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 52 = Neh 7 54).

MEHIR, mī'hār (מֵהִיר, mehīr): A small Judahite clan inhabiting the neighborhood of Eshton (I Ch 4 11).

MEHOLATHITE, mi-hō'la-thait (מֵהוֹלָתִי, mehō-lāthi): A native of Abel-meholah, the birthplace of Elisha (I K 19 16), situated on the border of one of Solomon's prefectures (I K 4 12). Adriel, the husband of Merab, Saul's daughter, is thus designated (I S 18 19). In II S 21 8 his father Barzillai. C. S. T.

MEHUJAEI, mi-hū'ja-el (מֵהוּיָאֵל, mehūyā'el), perhaps 'smitten of God,' or 'God gives life': A great-grandson of Cain, the fourth in the Cainite genealogy (Gn 4 18). Same as MAHALALEL (5 12) of the Sethite line. C. S. T.

MEHUMAN, mi-hū'mən. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

MEHUNIM, mi-hū'nim. See MEUNIM.

MEJARKON, mī'jār'kon (מֵיִרְקוֹן, mehayyar-qōn), 'green water': A place in Dan (Jos 19 46). But one should read (w. LXX.) 'and on the west (w. 'the sea') Jarkon, with the border,' etc. Rakkon is only a textual duplicate of Jarkon. Site unknown. E. E. N.

MEKONAH, mi-kō'nā. See MECONAH.

MELATIAH, mel'a-tai'a (מֵלַטְיָה, melatyāh), 'J' delivers': A Gibeonite (Neh 3 7).

MELCHI, mel'kai (Μελχι), The name of two ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 24, 28).

MELCHISEDEC, mel-kiz'i-dek. See MELCHIZEDEK.

MELCHISHUA, mel'kai-shu'a. See MALCHISHUA.

MELCHIZEDEK (מֶלְכִּי־צֶדֶק, malki-tsedheq, Melchisedec, He 5 6, etc. AV), 'king of righteousness': M. appears abruptly in the narrative of Gn 14 18, as priest of God Most High, and king of Salem, and, in his priestly capacity, by the symbolical use of bread and wine bestows a blessing on Abraham. Such a person combining in himself the priestly and royal offices was afterward seen in the ideal king of Israel, to whom, therefore, a priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek' was ascribed (Ps 110 4). In He 5 6, 7, this is elaborated in its application to Christ. Of the historicity of Melchizedek doubts have been expressed. But as it is admitted that Gn ch. 14 contains a historical kernel, such doubts are not justified. A. C. Z.

MELEA, mī'li-a (Μελεά): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 31).

MELECH, mī'lek (מֶלֶךְ, melek), 'king': A grandson of Jonathan, son of Saul (I Ch 8 35, 9 41).

MELICU, mel'i-kiū. See MALLUCHI.

MELITA, mel'i-ta: An island in the Mediterranean, the scene of Paul's shipwreck (Ac 28 1), the modern Malta (the identification with Meleda, on the Dalmatian coast, is baseless). It lies 58 m. S. of Sicily and 180 m. N. of Cape Bon in Africa, and has an area of 95 sq. m. Occupied in turn by the Phenicians and Carthaginians, it came under the Romans in 218 B.C. and formed part of the province of Sicily. Paul's ship, after drifting from Cauda near Crete for a fortnight, close-hauled on the starboard tack under an ENE. gale, reached what is now called St. Paul's Bay, 8 m. NW. of Valletta, and struck a shoal formed, it would appear, between the island of Salmonetta and the shore on the W. side of the bay. The vessel went to pieces, but the ship's company all escaped to the beach (Ac 27 14-44). The inhabitants of the island ('barbarians' means simply that they were not Greeks) probably spoke Punic, tho Publius, 'the chief man of the island,' and his family apparently knew Greek as well as Latin. This title for the governor is confirmed by early inscriptions from the neighboring island of Gozo. The 'viper' episode has been questioned, but the fact that to-day in a very thickly populated island there are no poisonous serpents is no evidence as to its condition in the 1st cent. After three months of great hospitality on the part of the inhabitants, and doubtless of more or less missionary work on the part of Paul, he and his companions sailed to Syracuse on an Alexandrian ship which had wintered at Melita. Nothing certain is known of Christianity in the island until the middle of the 5th cent., but some persons hold that Christian inscriptions of the 2d cent. have been discovered.

MELON. See PALESTINE, § 23; and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 3.

MELZAR, mel'zār. See STEWARD.

MEMORIAL: In most cases the occurrence of this term in the Bible needs no explanation. That through which a person or an event, or even God Himself, is to be remembered is a 'memorial' (Ex 3 15, 12 14; Jos 4 7; Mk 14 9, etc.). The term 'azkārāh, used as a technical term in the manual of offerings (Lv 2 2, 9, 10, 5 12, 6 15) and in other places in the Priest's Code (Lv 24 7; Nu 5 26), is rendered 'memorial' as if derived from zākar in the sense of 'to remember.' The term is used of the portion of the vegetable offering that was burned on the altar as incense and of the frankincense that was sprinkled on the showbread (Lv 24 7), and the idea seems to have been that it was the fragrance of the incense that caused it to serve as a 'memorial.' E. E. N.

MEMPHIS, mem'fis (Μέμφις), only in Hos 9 6, where Heb. is mōph; and Noph in the AV of Is 19 13, Jer 2 16, 44 1, 46 14, 19, and Ezk 30 13, 16, where the Heb. is nōph: The capital of Egypt. In the sacred texts it is called Hat-ka-ptah ('house of the Image of Ptah'), the name applied to 'the whole land (Aṭ-yu-ptōs, 'E-gy-pt'). The secular name of the city was, however, Men-nefert ('the fine residence'), and was abbreviated into Mennefe and Menfe (Men is supposed to be the first part of the name Mena, i.e., Menes, the founder); hence the Greek form, which has prevailed in later historical times. The city was situated on the W. bank of the Nile, 12m. S. of modern Cairo, and covered a large area of territory, probably shifting and changing its boundaries as the kings of the several dynasties chose new sites for their palaces. According to tradition, it was built by Menes of the first dynasty, and held a place of prime importance to the days of the Ptolemies, altho other cities, especially Thebes, rivaled and at times surpassed and supplanted it as a political center. It was the seat of a temple of the god Ptah ('the world creator'), who was thought to be embodied in the Apis bull; but there were also many foreign deities worshiped in the city, especially Astarte. With the exception of the necropolis with its pyramids, the ruins of Memphis, which even to the 12th cent. A.D. were said to extend half a day's journey, have totally disappeared. A. C. Z.

MEMUCAN, mī-miū'kən. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

MENAHAM, men'a-hem (מנחם, m'nahēm), 'comforter': The son of Gadi (II K 15 14) and military governor of the earlier capital of Israel, Tirzah. When Shallum usurped the throne, Menahem refused to submit, made an attack on Samaria, where the king was holding court, captured the city, put the usurper to death, and was himself proclaimed king (circa 744 B.C.). His rule, however, was at first opposed, and it was necessary to suppress a rather formidable rebellion. This Menahem did, evidently with a strong hand, inflicting cruel revenge upon the disaffected. In order to maintain himself in power, he placed himself under vassalage to Pul, King of Assyria (II K 15 19 f.), better known as Tiglath-pileser III. But to secure this alliance, he was compelled to pay a large sum of money (1,000 talents) to the Assyrian king, which he in turn exacted from the wealthy men of his realm. The alliance turned out to be a serious disaster for Israel; since it offered the Assyrians the occasion for a hold upon the nation, destined to end in its annexation. Menahem's policy was resisted in Israel by an anti-Assyrian party. But altho in constant peril, the king ended his reign in peace (ca. 736 B.C.), and was succeeded by his son Pekahiah. A. C. Z.

MENAN, mī'nən. See MENNA.

MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN, mī'nī, mī'nī, tī'kel, ū-fār'sin (מֶנֶה מֶנֶה טֶקֶל וּפְרָשִׁין, m'nē, m'nē, t'qēl, ūpharšīn): The words that appeared on the wall at Belshazzar's feast (Dn 5 25). As Belshazzar and his lords were desecrating the sacred vessels that Nebuchadrezzar had brought from Jerusalem, the form of a hand appeared writing upon the plaster of the wall these mysterious words. The king's wise men failing to interpret them, Daniel was called, and after a lengthy exordium, presented his interpretation (vs. 26-28), altho it took no account of the repetition of the first word of ver. 25. The words as now given are Aramaic, and by Daniel's interpretation were to be paraphrased as in ARV, while the marginal rendering of the four words is 'numbered, numbered, weighed and divisions.' There is almost endless discussion as to their rendering, many of the proposals being very fanciful. Daniel's own interpretation takes enough liberty with the four words, as he interprets the first and third, and changes the fourth from upharsin to peres, to warrant us in questioning the meaning of the entire inscription, as well as its proper pronunciation. There seems to be nothing better than Daniel's rendering of the first and third words, while the last may be either 'divisions,' 'divided,' or 'assessed' (Margoliouth), or 'Persians.' According to Driver (Camb. Bible, ad loc.) the words are the names of weights, and should be read: 'A m'na, a m'na, a shekel and half-shekels.'

I. M. P.

MENNA, men'a (מנא, Menan AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 31).

MENUHOTH, mī-nū'hōth. See MANAHATHITE.

MEONENIM, mī-en'i-nim (מֵעֲנִימִים, m'e'ōnēnim); with 'ēlōn ('oak'), 'soothsayer's oak': The seat of an oracle near Shechem, perhaps the same as 'oak of Moreh' (Jg 9 37; cf. Gn 12 6; Jg 7 1). C. S. T.

MEONOTHAI, mī-en'o-thai (מֵעֲנֹתַי, m'e'ōnōthay): A Kenizzite clan (I Ch 4 14).

MEPHAATH, mēf'a-ath (מֵפְתָח, mēpha'ath): A place in Reuben, assigned to the Levites (Jos 13 18, 21 37; I Ch 6 79), later reoccupied by the Moabites (Jer 48 21). Site unknown; but it was somewhere between Medeba and Dibon.

MEPHIBOSHETH, mī-fib'o-sheth (מֵפִיבֹשֶׁת, mē-phībōsheth), 'he who scatters shame' (?) (II S 4 4, 9 6 f.); originally Meribbaal, 'Baal is advocate,' or 'hero of Baal' (so Gray, Proper Names, p. 201) (I Ch 8 34): 1. A cripple, son of Jonathan. A realistic account of the accident that crippled him is given in II S 4 4. When David was recognized king, M. promptly made his submission to him and received as a reward the private estate of Saul and an honorable place at court (II S 9 6 f.), together with the services of Saul's steward Zibah. Later, during the rebellion of Absalom, Zibah slanderously accused his master of secretly joining the rebels and obtained his estate, which was adjudged forfeited (II S 16 1-4). But when M. protested his innocence David restored half the estate to him and gave him back his place at court (II S 19 24 f.). In the affair of Rizpah M. was spared for the sake of Jonathan (II S 21 7). 2. A son of Rizpah (II S 21 8). A. C. Z.

MERAB, mī'rab (מֵרָב, mērabh): The eldest daughter of Saul (I S 14 49), promised to David (18 17), but given to Adriel (18 19). Their five sons were delivered by David to the Gibeonites to be put to death (II S 21 8, where 'Merab' should be read for 'Michal'). C. S. T.

MERIAH, mī-rē'ya (מֵרִיָּה, mēryāh): The head of the priestly house of Seraiah in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 12 12).

MERIAOTH, mī-rē'yōth (מֵרִיָּוֶת, mēryōth): 1. A priest in the ancestry of Ahitub (I Ch 6 6 f., 52; Ezr 7 3). 2. A son of Ahitub (I Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11). 3. By mistake in Neh 12 15 for Meremoth, q.v. (cf. ver. 3).

MERARI, mī-rē'rai (מֵרָרִי, mērārī), MERARITES: The third and youngest son of Levi (Gn 46 11; Ex 6 16). His importance lies chiefly in the fact that he was the ancestor and eponym of one, altho the smallest, of the Levite clans (Nu 3 17, 4 29; I Ch 6 1, 9 14). As a gentile the name is preceded always by the article (Nu 26 57). There were two subdivisions of the Merarite Levites, called respectively Musshi and Mahli. In the allocation of cities of residence, they were placed in Zebulun, Gad, and Reuben (Jos 21 7, 34-40). The family of M. was prominent in the train of Ezra at the restoration (Ezr 8 19), altho it is barely possible that this may be another clan of the same name A. C. Z.

MERATHAIM, mer'ā-thē'im (מֵרָתַיִם, mērāthayim), 'double rebellion' (?): An enigmatic name, apparently for Babylonia (Jer 50 21). Possibly it represents the Babylonian name for the 'sea country,' i.e., S. Babylonia.

MERCHANT, MERCHANDISE. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

MERCHANT SHIP. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

MERCURY, mūr'kiū-rī, MERCURIUS (AV), mār-kiū'ri-us. After healing the cripple at Lystra, Paul and Barnabas were viewed by the populace as celestial visitants and acclaimed, B. as Jupiter and P. as Mercury (Gr. Hermes) (Ac 14 11 f.). According to the popular mythology, Mercury was the attendant of Jupiter 'Father of Gods and Men' and the spokesman and messenger of the gods, the same place as was assigned in Semitic religion to Nebo.

MERCY: This term is the translation in AV of derivatives of several Heb. roots: (1) hesedh, 'goodness,' 'kindness,' in most passages, of God; for which RV has usually 'loving-kindness,' sometimes 'kindness,' also 'goodness.' The only verbal form is translated 'show thyself merciful' (II S 22 26=Ps 18 25 [26]). The adj. hāsīd, denoting the active practise of hesedh, is used twice of God (Jer 3 12, 'merciful'; Ps 145 17 'holy' AV, 'gracious' RV), twice of men and then rendered with 'merciful' (II S 22 26=Ps 18 25 [26]); elsewhere it is used of men as exhibiting 'duteous love' toward God, hence rendered 'pious,' 'godly.' (2) rahāmīm, 'bowels,' as the seat of tender compassion, is rendered 'mercies,' but according to many this word is a denominative from rehem ('womb'), and means 'brotherhood,' 'brotherly feeling,' i.e., of those born of the same womb. It is usually used of God, whose mercies are 'great' or ' manifold.' The verb rāham, in the pi'el (active) is used mainly of God and rendered 'be merciful' AV, in RV often 'have compassion,' and in the pu'al (passive) of men. The adj. rahūm, used only of God, is rendered 'merciful' (AV and ERV), also 'full of compassion' (Ps 78 38, etc.), but ARV has uniformly 'merciful.' (3) hānan, 'show favor,' 'be gracious,' usually of God in bestowing favors on men or deeming them from various ills. It is rendered 'be gracious,' 'merciful' or 'favorable,' 'have mercy' or 'pity.' (4) hemlāh, an inf. from a vb. meaning 'to spare,' 'have compassion,' is rendered 'being merciful' (Gn 19 16), also 'pity' (Is 63 9). (5) kipper, 'cover over,' 'propitiate' (in Dt 21 8, 32 43, 'be merciful' AV; 'forgive,' 'make expiation' RV), elsewhere 'make atonement,' or 'reconciliation.' It is characteristic of the O T revelation that so much emphasis is found to be laid upon the great truth of God's mercy to sinful man and the correlated truth of the duty of man to be merciful and compassionate toward his fellow men (cf. Mic 6 8). In the N T both of these truths have a flood of light thrown upon them by the revelation in Christ. God's mercy revealed in Christ only makes more evident the primary place mercy must hold in the Christian's attitude toward his fellow men. C. S. T.

MERCY-SEAT. See ARK.

MERED, mī'rad (מֵרֵד, mēredh): A clan of Judah (I Ch 4 17, 18).

MEREMOTH, mer'ī-mōth (מֵרֵמוֹת, mērēmōth): 1. A priestly family (Neh 10 5, 12 3, 15; here Meremoth should be Meremoth). 2. A priest in Ezra's day (Ezr 8 33; Neh 3 4, 21). 3. One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 36).

MERES, mī'rīz. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

MERIBAH, mer'ī-bā (מֵרִיבָה, mērībāh, 'strife': The name of two places where similar occurrences are reported to have taken place during the course of the Exodus. (1) The first is in the region of Mt. Horeb, N. of Mt. Sinai, and in connection with the murmuring ('striving' RV, 'chiding' AV) of the children of Israel (Ex 17 1-7; see also MASSAH). (2) Meribath-kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin in the neighborhood of Kadesh (Ezk 48 28; cf. also Nu 27 14; Dt 32 51, where the rendering is 'Meribah of Kadesh'). Here also the people found no water and 'strove' with ('chode' AV) Moses. By smiting the rock Moses caused water to gush forth. The similarity of these accounts has led many to assume that they are different versions of the same story. There is valid reason, however, for believing that the same circumstances, repeated in two different places, gave the same name to the places. This is especially likely because the Meribah of Rephidim is only incidentally spoken of under that name. Its more distinctive designation is Massah, 'temptation.' The waters of Meriboth-kadesh in Ezk 47 19 ('strife in Kadesh' AV) are given as the S. limit of the ideal land of Israel. For a radical critical reconstruction of the narrative in Ex and Nu, see Bacon, Triple Tradition of the Exodus, pp. 80 ff. A. C. Z.

MERIBATH-KADESH, mer'ī-bāth-kē'desh. See MERIBAH.

MERIB-BAAI, mer'īb-bē'al. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

MERIBOTH-KADESH. See MERIBAH.

MERODACH, mē-rō'dak. See SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 15, 24, 32.

MERODACH-BALADAN (II) (מֵרֹדַךְ בַּלְדַּאן, mērō'dakh bal'ādhān; Assyr. Marduk-apal-iddin(a), 'Marduk has given a son'); the most ancient form of Marduk was Maruduk, from which the Hebrew seems to have been taken; He was king of Babylon (II K 20 12 ff. [Berodach]=Is 39 1 ff.) from 722 to 710 B.C. and for about nine months in 703-702. M.

was a Chaldean and head of the people of that name, whose capital was at Bil-Iakin, near the head of the Persian Gulf. He was a sworn enemy of Assyria, and gradually pushed northward until, with the aid of the Elamites, he seized Babylon in 721 B.C. After the embassy sent to Hezekiah (Is ch. 39), M. was defeated by Sargon II (710), and driven back to his native city, whence, to avoid capture, he fled to Elam. In 703-702, under Sennacherib's reign in Nineveh, he secured the throne of Babylon for about nine months, but was forced to retire to his homeland, whence, after a period of defense, he fled, and is thought to have died in the city of Nagitu, on the western border of Elam.

MEROM, WATERS OF, mī'rom (מֵרוֹם, mērōm):

A place noted for the great victory of Joshua over King Jabin of Hazor and his allies (Jos 11 5). It is usually identified with the modern Bahrat el-Huleh, the northernmost of the three bodies of water through which the Jordan flows (see JORDAN). But the identification is strongly contested on the grounds (1) that the word yām, 'sea,' would have been used if such a large body of water had been meant, and (2) that the situation does not harmonize with the geographical data of Jos 11 8. If these objections be valid the Waters of Merom must be found in a locality in upper Galilee abounding in springs, near the modern village Merom, or Marun er-Ras, a little W. of Safed, Map I, E 4 (so Buhl, Geog. Pal., p. 234). It is possible, however, that the phrase designates not any particular spot, but a district (as suggested in the Vulgate regione Merome of Jg 5 18). Such a district is in general that which, including the lake Huleh, stretches northward and is traversed by a stream, to which the phrase Waters of Merom is more strictly applicable. (Cf. Schenkel, Bib. Lex., 1869-75).

MERONOTHITE, mī-rēn'o-thait (מֵרוֹנֹתִי, mērōnōthī) 'man of Meronoth': The designation of two men, Jehdeiah (I Ch 27 30) and Jadon (Neh 3 7). No other reference to Meronoth occurs. Site unknown, but it was probably near Gibeon. E. E. N.

MEROZ, mī'rez (מֵרוֹז, mērōz): A place mentioned only in the song of Deborah (Jg 5 23). The extreme bitterness of the curse against this otherwise unknown village has been accounted for on two hypotheses: either Meroz was so near the battlefield that its inaction was tantamount to a declaration of hostility to the Israelite cause, or else the fleeing Sisera was suffered to pass through the village unmolested. The position of this curse, just preceding the blessing upon Jael, seems to lend weight to the second hypothesis. The name Meroz may survive in el-Muruşuş, a small, mud-built village 5 m. NW. of Beth-shean. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

MESECH, mī'sek. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13, under Meshech.

MESHA, mī'sha: 1. (מֶשָׁא, mēsha). A king of Moab conquered and made a vassal of Israel by Omri (885-874 B.C., II K 3 4). He is spoken of as a 'sheepmaster,' who paid an annual tribute consisting of the wool of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. Some time near the end of Ahab's reign he renounced his allegiance to Israel and secured his independence. After Ahab's death Jehoram, his successor, attempted to recover the territory lost, and with the aid of Judah and Edom obtained a considerable victory over Mesha's army (II K 3 22-24). But he was led to abandon the campaign on account of Mesha's desperate deed of sacrificing his son and heir as a propitiation to Chemosh in plain view of the allies (II K 3 27). Mesha's capital city was Daibon (Dibon) which was strongly fortified, as recent investigations show (see DIBON). Mesha, Stone of. Besides the Biblical data in II K 3 4 ff., a memorial pillar of black basalt 3½ ft. high by 2 ft. wide, erected by Mesha, gives information about the events of his reign. This stele was discovered in 1868 among the ruins of Dibon (Dibān), by Rev. F. A. Klein, a Prussian missionary. A rough squeeze was made for Clermont-Ganneau in 1869, with a copy of lines 13-20. When the Arabs of the neighborhood realized that the stone was valuable they broke it into fragments in the hope of selling the pieces separately to greater advantage. Two large fragments together with a large number of smaller ones were ultimately recovered and by the aid of the squeeze the stone was completely restored and taken to the Louvre in Paris. The inscription consists of thirty-four lines, and recounts how Mesha wrested back the cities Medeba, Nebo, and Jahaz, which Omri and his son Ahab succeeded in taking from Moab, together with Ataroth, formerly inhabited by Gadites. The inhabitants of these cities he 'devoted' (made herem, 'devoted to deity') to Chemosh, and carried on a campaign southward to Horonaim. The victorious campaign here commemorated was probably the same as that alluded to in II K 3 4 f. The stone is of special interest and value, since it is the oldest extant inscription in Hebrew (in the broad sense). It throws much light upon the history of the Hebrew alphabet and also on the grammatical and lexical characteristics of the ancient Hebrew speech. The stone reveals the fact that the Israelites and Moabites (as well as the other neighboring Semitic peoples) spoke practically the same language. There are also remarkable affinities of thought between the Moabite Stone and many passages of the O T. For a facsimile reproduction of two lines of this inscription see ALPHABET.

The following is the translation of Dr. Driver in EB, vol. iii, col. 3041 f.:

1. I am Mesha, son of Chemosh [kān?], King of Moab, the 1 Daibonite.
2. My father reigned over Moab for thirty years, and I 2 reigned
3. after my father. And I made this high place for 3 Chemosh in KR[H]H, a [high place of salvation,
4. because he had saved me from all the assailants (?), 4 and because he had let me see (my desire) upon all them that hated me. Omri,
5. King of Israel, afflicted Moab for many days, because 5 Chemosh was angry with his land.
6. And his son succeeded him; and he also said I will 6 afflict Moab. In my days said he [thus:]
7. but I saw (my desire) upon him and upon his house, 7 and Israel perished with an everlasting destruction. Omri took possession of the [land]
8. of Mēhēdeba, and it (i.e., Israel) dwelt therein, during 8 his days, and half his son's days, forty years; but Chemosh [restored]
9. it in my days. And I built Ba'al-Me'on, and I made 9 it the reservoir (?); and I built [t]

10. Kiryathën. And the men of Gad had dwelt in the 10 land of 'A'aroth from of old; and the king of Israel
11. had built for himself 'A'aroth. And I fought against 11 the city, and took it. And I slew all the people [from]
12. the city, a gazingstock unto Chemosh, and unto Moab. 12
And I brought back (or, took captive) thence the altar-hearth of Dawdoh (?), and I dragged 13. it before Chemosh in Keriyyoth. And I settled therein 13 the men of SRN, and the men of 14. MHRT. And Chemosh said unto me, Go, take Nebo 14 against Israel. And I
15. went by night, and fought against it from the break 15 of dawn until noon. And I took 16. it, and slew the whole of it, 7,000 men and male 16 strangers and women and [female strangers]
17. and female slaves: for I had devoted it to 'Ashtor- 17
Chemosh. And I took thence the [vessels]
18. of Yahwë, and I dragged them before Chemosh. And 18
the king of Israel had built
19. Yahash, and abode in it, while he fought against me. 19
But Chemosh drave him out from before me; and 20. I took of Moab 200 men, even all its chiefs; and I led 20 them up against Yahash, and took it
21. to add it unto Daibon. I built KRHH, the wall of 21
Ye'arin (or, of the Woods), and the wall of 22. the Mound. And I built its gates, and I built its 22 towers. And
23. I built the king's palace, and I made the two reaser- 23
[voirs (?) for water in the midst of
24. the city. And there was no cistern in the midst of 24 the city, in KRHH. And I said to all the people, Make
25. you every man a cistern in his house. And I cut out 25
the cutting for KRHH, with (the help of) prisoner[s] 26. of Israel. I built 'Aro'er, and I made the highway 26
by the Arnon
27. I built Beth-Bamoth, for it was pulled down. I built 27
Beqer, for ruins
28. [had it become. And the chiefs of Daibon were fifty, 28 for all Daibon was obedient (to me). And I reigned 29. over an hundred [chiefs] in the cities which I added to 29
the land. And I built
30. [Mêhê]dê[b]a, and Beth-Diblahên, and the Beth- 30
Ba'al-Me'on; and I took thither the nakadh-keepers, 31. . . . sheep of the land. And as for Horonën, there 31 dwelt therein . . .
32. . . . And Chemosh said unto me, Go down, fight 32 against Horonën. And I went down . . .
33. . . . [and] Chemosh [restored] it in my days. And . . . 33
34. . . . And I . . . 34
2. (משח, mēshā). A son of Caleb (I Ch 2 42).

A. C. Z.

MESHA, mī'shə (משח, mēshā): I. A son of Sharaim, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 9). II. A place on the boundary of the region occupied by the sons of Joktan (Gn 10 30).
A. C. Z.

MESHACH, mī'shak (משח, mēshakh): A name given by Nebuchadrezzar to Mishaël, one of Daniel's companions in Babylon (Dn 1 7). He was appointed over the province of Babylon (2 49). For refusing to worship the golden image he was cast into the fiery furnace, from which he came out uninjured (3 14 ff.).
C. S. T.

MESHECH, mī'shek. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND
ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

MESHELEMIH, mī-shel'ī-mai'a (משלמיח, mēshelemiyāh). 'J' has recompensed': The ancestral head of a division of Korahite Levites, entrusted with caring for the gates of the Temple (I Ch 9 21, 26 1, 2, 9). Also called Shallum (I Ch 9 17, 19, 31), Shelemiah (26 14), and Meshullam (Neh 12 25).

MESHEZABEL, mī-shez'a-bel (משעזבאל, mēshēzabēl, Meshezabēel AV), 'God is Savior': The name of a family of postexilic Jews (Neh 3 4, 10 21, 11 24).

MESHILLEMITH, mī-shil'ī-mīth. See ME-SHILLEMOTH.

MESHILLEMOTH, mī-shil'ī-mōth (משלמח, mēshillemōth): 1. An Ephraimite (II Ch 28 12). 2. The head of a priestly family (I Ch 9 12, here called Meshillemith; Neh 11 13).

MESHOBAB, mī-shō'bab (משובב, mēshōbbāb), 'returned': The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 34).

MESHULLAM, mī-shul'am (משללם, mēshullām), 'reconciled?': 1. The grandfather of Shaphan, the scribe, in the reign of Josiah (II K 22 3). 2. A son of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 19). 3, 4, 5. Three Benjamites
(I Ch 8 17, 9 7=Neh 11 7; I Ch 9 8). 6. A Gadite (I
Ch 5 13). 7. The father of Hilkiah, the priest (I Ch
9 11=Neh 11 11). 8. A priest (I Ch 9 12). 9. A Kobathite, overseer of the repairs on the Temple, under Josiah (II Ch 34 12). 10. A 'chief man' in Babylon, who helped Ezra to procure Levites to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezr 8 16). 11. One who opposed Ezra in the matter of foreign wives (Ezr 10 15). 12. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 29). 13. A son of Berechiah, who assisted in repairing the wall (Neh 3 4, 30) and whose daughter was the wife of the son of Tobiah, the enemy of Nehemiah (6 18). 14. A son of Besodeiah who helped to repair the old gate (Neh 3 6). 15. One who stood at the left of Ezra when the Law was read (Neh 8 4). 16, 17. A priest and a chief who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 7, 20). 18. A prince in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 33).
19, 20. Two heads of priestly houses in the time of Joiakim, the high priest (Neh 12 13, 16). 21. A porter under Joiakim (Neh 12 35). See also MESHE-LEMIH; SHALLUM; and SHELEMIH. C. S. T.

MESHULLEMETH, mī-shul'ī-mēth (משלמח, mē-shullemeth): The wife of King Manasseh and the mother of King Amon (II K 21 19). C. S. T.

MESOBABITE, mī-sō'ba-ūt. See MEZOBAITE.

MESOPOTAMIA, mes'o-po-tā'mi-a. See ARAM,

MESSIAH (משח, māshāh), 'anointed,' from
māshāh, 'to anoint.'

1. Name. In the N T generally translated into Χριστός, 'Christ,' i.e., anointed (Jn 4 25, etc., Messias AV). In the O T, M. is used in conjunction with J' ('Jehovah's anointed') as a title of promise for the king (I S 24 6, etc.). It is applied, however, poetically to the patriarchs (Ps 105 15) and to Cyrus (Is 45 1). Priests, as well as kings, and occasionally prophets, were anointed as a sign of their elevation to high functions.

2. Earliest Conception. The Messianic idea in its breadth is not to be limited by the meaning of the word Messiah. It includes all the aspirations of Israel to the world-wide influence from the very first. Long before the hope was fixed in a single person who should carry out God's plan of righteous rule on earth, there had existed as an expectation that J' would impart such a blessing to Abraham's posterity that all nations would 'bless themselves' in Abraham and his seed (i.e., ask such a blessing for themselves) (Gn 12 3), and that a succession of prophets would communicate God's will to Israel (Dt 18 18). The hope vaguely expressed in Gn 3 15 that the 'seed of the woman' should [eventually] 'bruise' the 'head of the serpent' contains a forward look to a great blessing for humanity. It is an expression of hope that the ills infecting the race will be overcome by a power within the race. That this shall be accomplished through the agency of Israel is not, however, indicated in any way.

The empire established by David and brought to its highest glory in Solomon enabled the idea of a 'Kingdom' in which the rule of J<sup>h</sup> on earth was visibly represented by the Davidic dynasty (cf. II S 7, especially vs. 12, 13, and 18 ff.) to gradually become a fixture, especially in prophetic thought.

3. The Messianic King. But it is with Isaiah that the prospect of the birth of an ideal king first becomes clear (9 2-7). His reign is to be one of universal and endless peace and prosperity (11 1-9), tho he was to appear in circumstances least promising. This thought is dwelt on specifically by Micah in the announcement that, when the house of David had been reduced by the national misfortunes to the lowest condition and driven to its ancestral residence at Bethlehem, then the Deliverer ['Prince'] should appear (5 2, 5). Similarly, Jeremiah (23 5) foretold the springing up of a 'Branch' from the fallen trunk of David, a king with the significant name 'Jehovah our righteousness' (ver 6). During the period of the Exile, Ezekiel developed and enforced the hope (34 11-15, 23-31, particularly ver. 24; cf. also 37 24), giving the name David to the expected King (cf. also Hos 3 5 and Am 9 11, both of exilic or postexilic date).

4. The Servant of God. Quite a different aspect of the Messiah's person and work is presented by Deutero-Isaiah. In a series of passages he gives the picture of a deliverer for Israel who accomplishes his work by sacrifice, suffering, and death (42 1-4, 49 1-6, 50 4-9, 52 13-53 12) and is known as the 'Servant of Jehovah,' because his whole-hearted loyalty is in significant contrast to the stiff-necked disobedience of the people as a whole; and it is precisely because of this perfect devotion and obedience unto death that he is raised to a high reward. It has been said that the Servant of Jehovah is a personification of the faithful remnant of Israel, by whose vicarious sufferings the people are redeemed; but inasmuch as a nation could only be organized under a Head as the specially anointed of God, this Head (King), under whom the people is integrated, certainly has a real place in the conception of the servant. Here belong, too, Ps 22 1-11, 28 31. In Ps 2 the personal Messiah is represented as enthroned in Zion, and in Ps 110 (which may, however, be of Maccabean date) as combining in Himself the office of Priest with that of King.

5. Postexilic Development. This agrees so completely with the conception of Zec 3 8 ff., where the Messiah is given the name of 'Branch' (as in Jer), as to make it clear that in the postexilic period the appearance of an ideal king had become an ineradicable element in Israelitic thought. From Zec 4 6 f. it might be inferred that Zerubbabel was by some regarded as the Branch; but altho the prophet encourages confidence in him, he seems to designate Jeshua, not Zerubbabel, as the 'anointed one' (6 9-15; cf. 4 14). In the Maccabean age the name 'Son of Man' was given to the Messiah (Dn 7 13). And in the apocalyptic literature the ideal figure, altho naturally clothed in the symbolic garb characteristic of that type of writing, is constantly kept in view. In the Sib Or. (III 97-807), issuing from the middle of the 2d cent. B.C., there is an unmistakable description of him. In Eth. En. (chs. 36-72, the Book of Similitudes) he is portrayed under the figure of a white bull. In addition, in the judgment of many scholars, Enoch adopted from Dn the title 'Son of Man.' In two of the Psalms of Solomon (17 36, 18 6-8) even the title 'Messiah' is clearly fixed. Finally, the titles 'elect' and 'Son of God' are applied to him.

6. Diverse Outgrowths. Throughout its long history the conception of the Messiah became the subject of a variety of side developments, some of which are mere variants of the same fundamental type, and some are mutually exclusive. Of the latter class are the contradictory ideas, on the one hand, that the Messiah was Himself to be the deliverer of the people, and, on the other, that He was to be only the king who should rule it after it was delivered; also the view, on the one hand, that He was to deliver through His sufferings (carrying out the thought of Is 52 13-53 12), and, on the other, that He was to reign in glory. That a preparation should be made for Him was commonly accepted. Malachi's 'messenger of Jehovah' and the second appearance of Elijah furnished the ground for this. The signs immediately preceding and ushering in His reign were to include the dolores (δόλαι) Messiah, a phrase that refers, not to the experiences of the Messiah Himself, but to the experiences of the world in preparation for His coming; namely, the convulsions in nature and society foreshadowed in prophetic passages, such as Joel 2 28-32.

7. N T Messianism. In the N T Jesus of Nazareth is identified as the Messiah (Mt 16 16, 20; Lk 4 18; Ac 2 36, 10 38), and is uniformly called 'the Christ.' What Jesus Himself thought the Messiahship was must be learned partly from His use of the title 'Son of Man' as His own self-designation. By the choice of this title He excluded from the Messiah's character the main elements of the popular ideal, i.e., that of a conquering hero, who would exalt Israel above the heathen, and through such exclusion He seemed to fail to realize the older Scriptural conception. The failure, however, was only apparent and temporary. For in the second coming in glory He was to achieve this work. Accordingly, His disciples recognized a twofoldness in His Messiahship: (1) They saw realized in His past life the ideal Servant of Jehovah, and spiritual Messiah, the Christ who teaches and suffers for the people, and (2) they looked forward to the realization of the Davidic and conquering Messiah in His second coming in power and glory to conquer the nations and reign over them. But Jewish and Christian ideals part from each other at this point.

8. Later Jewish Messianism. The later Jewish Messianic ideal was differentiated upon the ground of this distinction. Under the influence of the N T departure, Jewish thought took up the idea of a dying Messiah, but put it into a preparatory character (Mashiah ben-Joseph), who was to give his life in the defense of the nation as a warrior, but with no reference to sin or atonement. His death would simply pave the way for the second Messiah, the Everlasting King (Mashiah ben-David). Cf. Dalman, Der leidende u. sterbende Messias, 1888.

9. Christian Messianism. The Christian idea, on the other hand, took into itself all the spiritual elements of the Hebrew thought as revealed in the O T, blended them into a unity, grouped them under the one head of anointing from above, and traced them to Jesus, who was thenceforth considered preeminently the Anointed. With the Greek name 'Christ' the conception passed from its Jewish to its universally human stage. See also ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 28, 33 f.

METALS: 1. Gold. The geological strata of Syria and Palestine being of recent sedimentary formation are wanting in metals. A limited amount of brown and granular iron ore is found, but the nature of the formation forbids the presence of other metals, which consequently were known to the Israelites only through importation from outside. Gold (zāhābh, poetical hārūts, kethem, paz) finds mention in the earliest times. It came into Palestine chiefly through the agency of the Phenicians (Ezk 27 22). Arabian merchants brought it to the market of Tyre from Sheba and Ra'ma. Solomon is said to have obtained it through the expeditions of his navy to Ophir. It was used for gilding the roofs, walls, and doors of palaces and temples, for plating idols, for all kinds of vessels, bowls, and cups, for ornamentation, etc. Minted gold coins were unknown in pre-exilic days, but bars, round, flat disks, rings, and wedges (cf. Jos 7 21) of gold were in use, as media of exchange.

It is evident that the Israelites learned how to work gold at an early date, since the oldest prophetic writings contain many figures of speech derived from the goldsmith's art. Gold and silver were 'refined' (tsārāph) by melting, i.e., the dross was separated from the pure metal. To hasten the purifying process use was made of an alkali (bōr, Is 1 25). We find mention made of a number of the instruments and utensils of the goldsmith, viz., the hammer, the anvil, tongs, chisel, graving tool, bellows, crucible, and melting-oven. That they understood soldering is clear from Is 41 7, while other passages show that they knew how to smooth and polish the metal. They were also acquainted with the art of plating metals, an industry always of great importance in Western Asia. In Ex 28 6 f. we read of small threads, which evidently were cut from thin gold-plate, being woven into expensive cloth.

2. Silver. Far more common was the use of silver

(keṣeph), which also probably was brought into the country by the Phenicians, who obtained it from the mines of Tarshish, i.e., Spain. From the earliest times it served as a medium of exchange, altho not in the form of coins, but of bars, which were weighed. Silver was put to much the same use as gold, e.g., for decorating palaces and sanctuaries, for idols, for musical instruments, etc.

3. Bronze. Of almost greater importance was the Cyprian bronze (as Cyprium), i.e., copper (n'hōsheth). Since pure native copper was found but rarely in the countries known to the ancients, the ore had first to be smelted (cf. Job 28 2). Through this process it was discovered that, if the copper was alloyed, especially with tin, it became nearly as hard as steel. Such alloyed copper was called brass (n'hōsheth). From this were made pots, cups, pans, ladles, knives, etc. (Ex 38 3; Lv 6 21; Nu 16 39 [17 4]; Jer 52 18). Of the same metal weapons were also made: helmets, coats of mail, greaves, coverings for the legs, and shields (I S 17 5 f., 38); spear tips and bows (II S 21 16, 22 35); also chains (Jg 16 21) and mirrors (Ex 38 8; Job 37 18). Great quantities of brass were used in the construction of the Temple: the altar and its network, the basins, the sea that rested on twelve brazen oxen, the two pillars that stood before the Temple, etc.—all were of brass (II Ch 4 1). That Solomon had to employ the Tyrian Hiram-abi (Hiram) to cast these things shows that as late as the period of the early Kingdom the Israelites were still ignorant of the art of casting the metal. They learned it from the Phenicians.

4. Iron. Iron (barzel) was not equal in importance to brass. Israel became acquainted with it somewhat late. Their knowledge was gained probably through the Philistines, who had long known how to work the metal, and even in the early times had possessed chariots protected with iron (cf. Is 13 19-22). As peasants the Hebrews had been accustomed to make their own clothing, utensils, weapons, etc., as is partly the case in Palestine to-day. In the cities division of labor first took place, and only in these could craftsmen exist at a time when trade was so little developed. The raw material was brought in by Tyrians, mainly from Spain, tho it was also found in the Lebanon range (Jer 11 4; Dt 4 20, 8 9; I K 8 51). Out of iron the blacksmiths (hārāshē habbarzel) made axes and hatchets (Dt 19 5; II K 6 5), sickles, knives, swords, and spears (I S 17 7), bars (Is 45 2), chains and fetters (Ps 105 18, 107 10), nails, hoes, and pens (Jer 17 1; Job 19 24). Iron was also used for plows, threshing-wagons, and sledges (Am 1 3; I S 13 20; II S 12 31).

5. Tin. Tin (b'dhāl) was brought by the Phenicians from Tarshish (Ezk 27 12). It seems to have been used almost entirely as the alloy with which to harden copper.

6. Lead. Lead ('ōphereih) was also brought in by Phenicians in connection with their naval expeditions to Tarshish (Ezk 27 12; cf. Pliny, III, 7). The metal came mainly, however, from the so called Tin Islands (the Cassiterides), usually identified with the coast of Cornwall, which still constitutes the main source of tin and lead for Europe (cf. Pliny, IV, 36; VII, 57). According to Job 19 24, lead was used for monumental tablets. In Am 7 7 we read of the plummet of lead. From Ezk 22 20 it may be inferred that the use of lead as an alloy was known to the ancients.

METE-YARD. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

METHEG-AMMAH, mi'theg-am'a (מֶתֶג אֲמָהָ, metheg hā'ammāh), 'the bridle of the mother-city' (so RV): The text where this term occurs (II S 8 1) is difficult, if not corrupt, and the Greek versions give no help. The meaning seems to be that David captured the Philistine metropolis. Most expositors have felt it necessary to find here an equivalent for Gath and its towns.

METHUSHAEL, mi-thu'sa-el. See METHUSHAEL.

METHUSELAH, me-thu'si-lā (מֶתוּשֶׁלָּא, methū-shelah), 'man of the dart'; perhaps a variation of a Babylonian name, 'man of Shelah' (the name of a deity): A Sethite, the father of Lamech (Gn 5 25) = Methusael in the Cainite genealogy (Gn 4 18); in Lk 3 27 AV Mathusala.
C. S. T.

METHUSHAEL, mi-thū'shā-el (מֶתוּשָׁאֵל, methūshā'el, Methusael AV): One of the antediluvian patriarchs in the Cainite list (Gn 4 18), corresponding to Methuselah of the Sethite list (5 21). The name is Babylonian, meaning 'man of God.' See METHUSELAH.
E. E. N.

MEUNIM, mi-ū'nim (מְעֻנִּים, me'unīm, Meunim AV): A tribe residing to the S. of Judah, near Edom, probably to be identified with the Arabians of Ma'an. It is first mentioned in Jg 10 12 (under the name Maonites), as an ancient enemy of Israel. In the days of Jehoshaphat the M. joined with Moabites and others in an unsuccessful attack on Judah (II Ch 20 1; cf. RVmg.). Later, Uzziah had trouble with them (II Ch 26 7). In Hezekiah's day they suffered severely at the hands of the Simeonites (I Ch 4 41 RV). It may be that descendants of captive Meunim are referred to in Ezr 2 50 = Neh 7 52. Recently, it has been thought by some that the preceding passages (except the last) refer to the N. Arabian Minæans, but the reasons given are inconclusive. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11.
E. E. N.

MEZAHAB, mez'a-hab (מֶזָּהָב, mēzāhābh), 'waters of gold' (?): The grandfather of Mehetabel (Gn 36 39; I Ch 1 50).

MEZOBAITE, mi-zō'bā-ait (מֶזֹבַיִת, me'zōbhā-yāh, Mesobaite AV): An obscure term designating, apparently, the home of Jaasiel (I Ch 11 47). The text is probably corrupt.

MIAMIN, mai'a-min. See MIJAMIM.

MIBHAR, mib-hār (מִבְּחָר, mibhār): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 38), but in the || (II S 23 36) we read 'of Zobah' (very similar in Heb. letters to Mibhar), which is probably the true text.

MIBSAM, mib'sam (מִבְּשָׁם, mibhsām): 1. An Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 13; I Ch 1 29). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 2. A clan of Simeon (I Ch 4 25). Curiously, in both cases after Mibsam a Mishma is mentioned, indicating a possible connection between Simeonite and Ishmaelite clans.
E. E. N.

MIBZAR, mib'zār (מִבְּצָר, mibhsār): A clan-chieftain, probably a clan also, of Edom (Gn 36 42; I Ch 1 53). It may be also a place-name.

MICA, mai'ka, MICAH, mai'ka, MICAHIAH, mai-kē'ya (מִיכָאֵל, mikhāyāh[ū], also מִיכָאֵל, mīkhāyāhū, מִיכָאֵל, mīkhāh, and in some MSS. מִיכָאֵל, mīkhā; cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex.): A name very common in the O T, from mī, 'who,' kh, 'like,' and Yāh, 'Jehovah,' 'who is like J', abbreviated often to Mica, but more usually to Micah and Micaiah.

I. Mica (Micha AV). 1. A Levite, the son of Zichri (I Ch 9 15). 2. The son of Mephibosheth, see below II, 3. 3. One of the signatories of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 11). 4. The son of Zabdi, a Levite (Neh 11 17, the same as 3 ?).

II. Micah. 1. An Ephraimite (Jg 17 1 ff.), who restored some money he had stolen from his mother. This money was then dedicated to the service of J', and spent in the making of a graven image and the employment of a Levite priest, both ultimately taken from Micah by the Danites. 2. A son of Joel, the head of a family of Reubenites (I Ch 5 5). 3. A great-grandson of Saul through Mephibosheth (Meribbaal) (II S 9 12; I Ch 8 34; cf. I, 2, above). 4. The son of Uzziel, a Kohathite priest (I Ch 23 20). 5. The father of Achbor (or Abdon) (II K 22 12; II Ch 34 20; see III, 2, below). 6. The Morashite prophet Micah (Mic 1 1; see MICAH, BOOK OF).

III. Micaiah (Michaiah AV). 1. The son of Imlah (I K 22 8 f.; II Ch 18 2 f.), a prophet of the time of Ahab, who was summoned at the request of Jehoshaphat to Samaria, and there foretold the impending defeat of Ahab at Ramoth Gilead. For this he was put into prison. 2. The father of Achbor (II K 22 12, the same as II, 5, above). 3. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (II Ch 17 7). 4. A priest, father of Mattaniah (Neh 12 35). 5. Son of Gemariah, a leading man of Judah in the days of Jehoikim (Jer 36 11, 13). 6. The mother of Abijah, King of Judah (II Ch 13 2), and daughter of Uriel, but in II Ch 11 20, 'the daughter of Absalom' (I K 15 2, 'Abishalom'), called Maacah.

MICAH, BOOK OF: One of the minor prophetic writings of the O T.

1. The Prophet. The personality of the author of this book, like those of most of the minor prophets, is hidden in obscurity. He was a resident of Moreseth-Gath, an obscure town in Judah, and bore the very common name of Micaiah (see MICA, II, 6). The time in which his prophetic ministry falls is given as 'the days of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah,' or between 745 and 700 B.C. In the early part of this period, the Northern Kingdom was still standing, but the signs of its downfall were in clear view, and Micah joined with Hosea and Amos in denouncing its sins. His mission, however, was not to the Northern Kingdom alone, but also to the Southern, and he views the sins of both kingdoms as summed up and brought to their climax in the capital cities of Samaria and Jerusalem respectively (1 5).

2. Divisions and Contents. The Book of Micah is usually divided into three sections, each introduced with the formula 'Hear ye.' I. The first section comprises the first two chapters of the book, and begins by describing the coming of J' for judgment upon Samaria and Jerusalem (1 1-9). This visitation is figured under the image of the march of a devastating army through the country (1 10-16). It is a judgment based on violence and greed of the wealthy, who do not scruple to crush the poor and defenseless (2 1-13). II. The second section (chs. 3-5) opens with a repetition of the charges against the leaders of the people, enumerating judges, priests, and prophets as guilty of avarice and injustice. For these sins Zion should be 'plowed as a field' (3 1-12). But the prophet looks forward to the effect of the chastisement of the nation as it shall come in a grand Messianic age of restoration and comfort (4 1-5 1), and goes on to picture the Deliverer, who is to issue from the house of David, even tho this house had been compelled by adversity to withdraw into its rural domain of Bethlehem (5 2-15). III. The third section is a simple series of exhortations to repentance and warnings against sin (chs. 6, 7).

3. Critical Questions. The foregoing outline, however, follows the thought of the book only in a very general way, overleaping certain abrupt transitions and serious obscurities. Upon the basis of these it has been argued that the book is not a unit. Moreover, the allusion in 4 10 to Babylon seems meaningless as addressed to the generation of 745 to 700 B.C. If the name Babylon has been substituted for another in the process of copying, this only illustrates the corruption of the text throughout the book. Chs. 6 and 7 also fit better into the age of Manasseh than into the last quarter of the 8th cent. B.C. In fact, in 7 7-20 signs of a postexilic date have been discerned, such as the scattering of the exiles far and wide through the world (7 12), the expectation that the walls of Jerusalem will be rebuilt (7 11), etc. All that can be said safely is that chs. 1-3 are certainly the work of Micah, and that the rest of the book has been more or less subjected to editorial revision, and to the incorporation of fragments of a later date.

MICHA, mai'ka. See MICA.

MICHAEL, mai'ka-el (מִיכָאֵל, mīkhā'ēl), 'who is like God': 1. The father of Sethur, one of the Spies (Nu 13 13). 2. Two Gadites (I Ch 5 13 f.). 3. A Levite (I Ch 6 40); 4. A man of Issachar (I Ch 7 3). 5. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 16). 6. A Manassite (I Ch 12 20). 7. The father of Omri one of David's officials (I Ch 27 18). 8. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 21 2). 9. The father of Zebadiah (Ezr 8 8). 10. M. the Archangel. See ANGEL, § 4.

MICHAIAH, mai-kē'yā. See MICA, III.

MICHAL, mai'kal (מִיכָל, mīkhal), an abbreviated form of 'Michael': The name of the younger daughter of Saul, the only instance where the name is given to a woman. Her first appearance presents her as anxious to become the wife of David. This is an unparalleled instance in the Bible of a woman openly avowing her love for a man and her desire to marry him (I S 18 19-21). Saul's remark upon deciding to abet her desire indicates that he judged her to be a person of peculiar disposition. When she next appears it is in a ruse by which she saves the life of her husband (I S 19 12 f.). The third time she is mentioned it is as restored to David (II S 3 13), and the last, as a mocker of his uncontrolled enthusiasm in a religious dance (II S 6 16). 'Michal' in II S 21 8 is evidently a mistaken reading for 'Merab' (q.v.). A. C. Z.

MICHMAS, mik'mas (מִיכְמָשׁ, mīkkmāš): The form in Ezr 2 27 = Neh 7 31 of a name which is spelled elsewhere as in the next article. C. S. T.

MICHMASH, mik'mash (מִיכְמָשׁ, mīkkmāš [not מִיכְמָשׁ, mīkkmāsh, as generally read]): A place in Benjamin, 7 m. N. of Jerusalem, the modern Mukhmās, 2,000 ft. above sea-level on the hill, N. of the narrow and deep Wādī es-Suwēnīt, a part of the pass which leads from Bethel on the table-land of Ephraim down to Jericho. Jonathan had driven the Philistines from Geba (I S 13 3) on the height S. of this pass, and with Saul and their followers had encamped there, over against the Philistines in Michmash (I S 13 16). The valley between is called the 'pass of Michmash' (I S 13 23). This height is represented by Isaiah as being taken by the Assyrians in his prophetic description of the coming attack on Jerusalem (Is 10 28). By descending from Geba and ascending the southern side of Michmash, Jonathan and his armor-bearer surprized the Philistines and put them to flight (I S 14 1 ff., cf. Driver, HTS [1913], p. 106, with map of the region). After the Captivity members of the Jewish community lived in M. (Ezr 2 27; Neh 7 31, 11 31). It was the residence of Jonathan Maccabeus, 156-152 B.C. (I Mac 9 73). Map III, F 5. C. S. T.

MICHMETHAH, mik'mi-tha (מִיכְמֶתָחַ, hammikh-mithāh): The article shows it is not a proper name, but an appellative. A place on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh, E. of Shechem (Jos 17 7, 16 6), not yet identified. C. S. T.

MICHRI, mik'rai (מִיכְרִי, mīkhrī): A Benjamite (I Ch 9 8).

MIDYANITES, mid'yān. See MIDIAN, § 2.

MIDDIN, mid'din (מִדְיָן, midḏīn): A city in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15 61). Site unknown.

MIDIAN, mid'i-en, MIDIANITES, mid'i-en-aits: According to Gn 25 2, מִדְיָן, midhyān, was one of the sons of Abraham by Keturah, i.e., Midian was one of a number of tribes in NW. Arabia who were supposed to be closely related and descended from a more remote ancestral tribe, Keturah. A variant tradition (Jg 8 24) classes them as Ishmaelites. And in the story of Joseph he is sold, according to J, to Ishmaelites (Gn 37 25-27, 28b), but in E the Midianites carry Joseph to Egypt (Gn 37 28a, 36). The references to the Midianites in the O T all imply the same general locality, NW. Arabia, as their home, altho they seem to be viewed as made up of a number of clans (Gn 25 4) who ranged over a wide extent of country, from the region E. of the Sinaitic Peninsula (Ex 2 16 f.) northward as far as the territory E. of Gilead (Nu ch. 22; Jg ch. 6 f.). The references reflect popular views of different periods. In Moses' day the relations between Israel and Midian were most friendly. It was among a small tribe or clan of these people that Moses found refuge when he fled from Pharaoh, and one of the daughters or Reuel or Jethro, the 'priest' and chief of the clan became his wife (Ex 2 16 ff.). This same person Jethro (or his son?), called also Hobab (Nu 10 29 ff.; Jg 1 16, 4 11), is also called a Kenite, so that the Kenites were possibly a Midianite clan. When the Israelites were dwelling in Moabite territory the attitude of the Midianites, according to one line of tradition, was hostile (Nu 22 4, 7, 25 15, 18), tho the story in Nu ch. 31 is certainly of no historical value (cf. Gray in ICC, ad loc.). This hostility manifested itself again in later years after Israel had gained possession of Canaan (Jg chs. 6-8). The Midianites are variously represented as a peaceful pastoral people (Ex 2 16 ff.), as traveling merchants (Gn 37 28, 36), and as marauding Bedouin (Jg chs. 6-8). In all this there is nothing inconsistent with the well-known habits of large Arabian tribes. They seem to have lost their identity at an early period. Cf. Skinner on Genesis in ICC (p. 349 f.) and see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETYMOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

MIDWIFE: In the Orient the help of a medical expert is not always required at childbirth, the place of the physician being taken either by experienced women relatives or friends, or by a special class of semiprofessionals called 'midwives.' In ancient times this class must have been even more extensively resorted to (Gn 35 17, 38 28; Ex 1 15 ff.) than is the case at present. A. C. Z.

MIGDAL-EL, mig'del-él' (מִגְדַּל־אֵל, mighdal'él) 'tower of God': A city of Naphtali (Jos 19 38). Site unknown.

MIGDAL-GAD, mig'del-gad' (מִגְדַּל־גָּד, mighdal-gādh), 'tower of Gad': A city of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jos 15 37), which has not been identified. There is a Mejdel about 2½ m. N.E. of Ashkelon, with foundations, cisterns, and rock tombs. C. S. T.

MIGDOL, mig'dol (מִגְדוֹל, mighdōl), 'tower': The name of one or more places in Egypt where there was a fortress. We should use the marginal reading of Ezk 29 10, 30 6, where Migdol is on the northern boundary of Egypt. Jewish refugees were found in M. and in two other frontier cities. The best-known M. (Gr. Μάγδαλος) was 12 m. S. of Pelusium. Probably another M. is mentioned in Ex 14 2; Nu 33 7, near the border of Egypt, where the Israelites left the country. C. S. T.

MIGHTY MEN. See MAN.

MIGHTY ONE: This term is a rendering of (1) gibbōr, a human being of exceptional physical stature and strength (Gn 10 8; Jer 46 5; Jl 3 11); (2) 'addār, 'honorable,' of a superhuman being (Is 10 34); (3) 'Ēl, 'God' (Ezk 31 11); (4) 'abbār (Jg 5 22, AV 'strong ones,' RV); (5) tsūr, 'rock' (Is 30 29 AV).

MIGHTY WORK. See WONDER.

MIGRON, mig'ren (מִיגְרֹן, mighrōn): 1. The name of the place where Saul encamped in or near Geba (I S 14 2). It should probably be translated 'threshing-floor.' 2. A place between Aiath and Michmash, on the line of march the prophet lays out for the approach of the Assyrian army (Is 10 28). It is perhaps the modern ruin Makrān, N. of Michmash. Map III, F 5. C. S. T.

MIJAMIN, mij'a-min (מִיָּאִמִּין, mīyāmīn): 1. The ancestral head of one of the great priestly families, constituting the sixth course of priests. The term is also used for representatives of this family (I Ch 24 9; Neh 10 7, 12 5. Miniamin in vs. 17 and 41). 2. One of the 'sons of Parosh' (Ezr 10 25, Miamin AV). E. E. N.

MIKLOTH, mik'loth (מִקְלוֹת, mīqlōth): 1. The ancestor of a Benjamite family living near Gibeon (I Ch 8 32, 9 37 f.). 2. An officer under David (I Ch 27 4).

MIKNEIAH, mik-ni'ya (מִקְנֵיָאֵחַ, mīqnēyāhū): A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18, 21).

MILALAI, mil'a-lai (מִלָּלַי, mīlālay): A Levite musician (Neh 12 36).

MILCAH, mil'ka (מִלְכָּה, mīlkāh), 'queen': 1. Counted as a daughter of Haran and wife of Haran's brother Nahor; but according to the genealogical mode of writing history, her name in reality represents a tribe. Such amalgamations are probably represented by these references: Gn 11 29, 22 20, 23, 24 15, 24, 47. 2. One of the 'daughters of Zelophehad' (Nu 26 33, 27 1, 36 11; Jos 17 3). In fact, these 'daughters' were towns. Milcah has not been identified (see ZELOPHEHAD). E. E. N.

MILCOM, mil'kōm. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 25.

MILDEW. The rendering of yērāqōn, 'paleness' (fr. yāraq, 'to be green'), always in conjunction with shiddāphōn, 'blasting' (from the heat) (Dt 28 22; I K 8 37; II Ch 6 28; Am 4 9; Hag 2 17).

MILE. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

MILETUS, mai-li-tos (Μίλητος, Miletum in II Ti 4 20 AV): A town on the Carian coast of Asia Minor. It was colonized by Ionian Greeks under Neleus. At an early period it became a flourishing seaport and commercial center, its ships visiting every part of the Mediterranean and particularly the Euxine Sea, on the coasts of which it founded seventy-five cities. After the Persian victory off the island of Lade (494), Miletus was sacked, its male citizens slain, the rest transported to Susa and Ampe (at the mouth of the Tigris). Later, it regained some of its prosperity. In 479 it joined the Athenian league, from which it afterward revolted, and defeated the Athenian fleet off Miletus in 412. It was captured by Alexander in 334, from which time its importance waned, tho in the time of Paul it had recovered some prosperity. It did not cease to exist until several centuries after Christ. It was here that the Apostle bade farewell to the elders of the Ephesian Church (Ac 20 15-17), and at a later visit left behind his companion Trophimus (II Ti 4 20). The alluvial silt deposited by the Meander has changed the whole coast line of the Latmic Gulf (now an inland lake), so that the fever-stricken site of Miletus (now Palatia) is several miles inland. Extensive excavations have been made on the site by the Germans, and several inscriptions of great interest have come to light. The most striking ruin is the open theater (largest in Asia Minor). Ruins also of the Town-Hall and the Delphinium have been unearthed. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

MILK. See Food, § 6.

MILL, MILLSTONE: In olden times the mill (rēhayim, late Heb. ṭhōn, ṭahānāh) was an indispensable household utensil. Since the meal needed for baking was prepared daily, the sound of the mill was heard regularly wherever there was a dwelling (Jer 25 10; Ec 12 4). The mill consisted of two stones of heavy porous basalt, 17-19 ins. in diameter, and when new about 4 ins. thick. The lower stone (pelah ṭahṭāh, Job 41 24 [16]), which was generally extra hard and somewhat convex on top, had in the middle a small round peg of very hard wood. The upper stone (pelah rekhebh, Jg 9 53, or simply rekhebh, i.e., 'rider,' Dt 24 6) was concave on the under side. It had in the middle a funnel-shaped hole in which the peg of the lower stone fitted loosely. Into this hole the grain for grinding was poured. The upper stone was revolved by means of an upright pin near the rim. The grinding was done usually by female slaves (Ex 11 5; Is 47 2), probably also by prisoners (Jg 16 21; La 5 13). The meal, which poured out at the rim of the lower stone, was gathered in a cloth spread out under the mill. Whether anything like the durra mill of the Arabs was used by the Israelites in Palestine is doubtful, tho probably this may have been the case when they lived in the desert. This mill consisted of two stones, the lower concave, the upper one round. The grain was shaken into the lower stone and crushed by the rolling of the upper one. In later times, large mills worked by an ass came into use (cf. the μύλος ὀνικός of Mt 18 6). W. N.—L. B. P.

MILLET. See PALESTINE, § 23.

MILLO, mil'ō (מִלּוֹ, millō): 1. The Millo (always with the article), in Jerusalem, seems originally to have been a part of the Jebusite fortifications of Zion, the E. hill of Jerusalem (II S 5 9=I Ch 11 8).

If the word is Hebrew, it apparently means a 'fill [of earth],' and referred to some important earthwork guarding the N. approach to the citadel. This 'fill' was extended by David and Solomon (II S 5 9; I K 9 15). See also JERUSALEM, § 20, and cf. the report of Excavations on Ophel in PEFQ, April, 1924. 2. The house of Millo ('Beth-millo' ARVing.). An unknown place (or family?) near Shechem (Jg 9 6, 20). It is possibly the same as 'the tower of Shechem' (Jg 9 47 ff.). 3. The house of Millo, where Joash was slain (II K 12 20), was presumably in Jerusalem and connected with 1, above. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

MINA. See MONEY, I, 1.

MIND. See MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 9.

MINE, MINING: The term 'mine' (referring to metals) is used in EV but once (Job 28 1 vein AV). Here it renders mōtsā, 'outgoing.' For the knowledge and use of metals among the Hebrews, see METALS.

MINGLED PEOPLE: The rendering of the Heb. 'ērebh (from 'ārābh, 'to mix') in I K 10 15; Jer 25 20, 24, 50 37; Ezk 30 5. The same word is rendered mixed multitude in Ex 12 38 and Neh 13 3. In Ex 12 38 the reference is to the non-Israelite people of uncertain or mixed descent who accompanied the Israelites in the Exodus from Egypt. In Jer 25 20 and Ezk 30 5, the mixed populations of, or dependent upon, Egypt are meant. In Jer 50 37 the various nationalities represented in Babylon are intended. The reading in Jer 25 24 is probably a late gloss, while in I K 10 15 'kings of Arabia' should probably be read (according to the || in II Ch 9 14). E. E. N.

MINIAMIN, min'i-a-min (מִינְיָמִין, minyāmīn): 1. A Levite under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 15). 2. See MIJAMIN, 1.

MINISTER, MINISTRY: In the O T the nouns 'minister' and 'ministry' are usually used in the religious sphere. The Heb. verb shārāth, rendered 'minister,' means 'to serve,' but is rarely used of the service of slaves. A 'minister' was thus one who 'served' in attendance on the sanctuary, whether a priest or one of the lower orders. See CHURCH, §§ 6 and 7; and SYNAGOG, § 2. E. E. N.

MINNI, min'ai (מִנִּי, minnī): A kingdom mentioned in connection with those of Ararat and Ash-kenaz by Jeremiah in his denunciation of Babylon (Jer 51 27). The Minni of this passage corresponds to the Mannā of the Assyrian inscriptions. The kingdom lay between the lakes of Urumiah and Van. The people were probably Indo-Europeans, and closely related to the Medes. Their capital was Zirtu, or Izirtu. The later Assyrian kings frequently invaded this territory, but held it with difficulty.

J. A. K.

MINNITH, min'ith (מִנִּיחַ, minnith): The northernmost city taken during Jephtha's Ammonite campaign (Jg 11 33). Its exact situation is unknown, but could scarcely be so far S. or W. as the PEF map indicates. If the text of Ezk 27 17 is correct (but see Davidson, in Camb. Bible), M. was famous for its wheat.

L. G. L.—L. B. P.

MINSTREL: This term is applied to professional musicians (ἀόληταις, Mt 9 23 AV, but 'flute-players' RV) employed at funerals (cf. MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5). In more ancient usage, minstrelsy (cf. m'naggēn, 'player' ['minstrel' EV], from nāgan, 'to play,' e.g., a harp [as in I S 16 16], II K 3 15) was associated with the art of divination, furnishing an accompaniment of plaintive melody to the process of self-excitation. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 2 (b).

MINT. See PALESTINE, § 23; and TITHE.

MIPHKAD, mif'kad, GATE OF. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

MIRACLES. 1. Meaning of the Term. The development of thought in the twentieth century has notably influenced the general attitude toward miracles. New and less dogmatic interpretations of nature and of natural law; wider knowledge of the history of religions, with a new understanding of its psychological development; fuller appreciation of the distinction between fact and value and the relative significance of each for religion have done much to justify the statement of Prof. Samuel Harris, in 1887, with respect to the objection to miracles as interrupting the uniformity of nature. 'To this objection,' he said, 'there are four answers. It is founded on erroneous ideas as to what a miracle is; of what God is; of what nature is; and, lastly, of what the universe is.' (The Self-Revelation of God, p. 477.)

Understanding of this newer attitude will be aided by an examination of the content of the general term miracle. Its etymology has done not a little both to obscure and restrict its real meaning.

Miracle, then is a general term used to designate a certain group of phenomena of human experience all of which contain three elements which may roughly be characterized respectively as the scientific, the psychological, and the logical. Unless an event includes all three of these elements it can not, except in a loose sense, be called a miracle.

(a) Scientific Element. The first element is essentially negative in character. The event is unusual, extra-ordinary. It appears as something different from the usual and expected phenomena of human experience, a divergence from the 'uniformity of nature' as observed. Its positive interpretation as intrinsically super-natural does not rest on the character of the event itself; but on the logical element in its interpretation. The overstress on the intrinsic non-naturalness, unpredictability, of the event has brought confusion into much of past discussion of miracles. Both the proponents and the opponents of this idea have found themselves assuming omniscience as to the range of human experience in respect to the 'natural' world. One has confidently asserted the known limits of this range, and concluded to the intrinsic non-naturalness of certain events. The other with equal confidence has asserted the known limitlessness of this range and concluded to the intrinsic naturalness of all events. One is psychologically the child of a prescientific age, and the other the child of a scientific age. Psychologically both can be understood; but logically both are guilty of the same fallacy of a presupposed omniscience as to the range of human experience. A miracle as 'absolute,' and a miracle as 'impossible' are both absolutely impossible judgments, logically.

(b) Psychological Element. But a miracle is not simply an extra-ordinary event. It is an event which produces in the beholder, or in the one who hears of it second hand, a characteristic psychological reaction. It awakens wonder, surprise, perhaps also gratitude, fear, self-examination. It is this characteristic response that has determined the word for the event itself. This response is something characteristically different from curiosity. It does not quicken to investigation, but to an attitude akin to awe, rising to reverence, which tends to suppress rather than invite inquiry. The scientific sophistication of our day accustomed to 'the fairy-tales of science' has tended to diminish the characteristic psychic reactions to extraordinary events, and to make them more closely approximate intellectual curiosity. Whether the tendency, in the presence of extraordinary events, to eliminate the reactions of awe, reverence, gratitude, self-examination, is or is not a mark of spiritual progress it is not necessary to discuss. It is only necessary to note the fact.

(c) Logical Element. The third element included in the idea miracle has been called the logical, or possibly better the causal or metaphysical. This is the explanation, or interpretation, of both the event and the psychic reaction to it as indicating something, at least, as to the nature of the efficiency by which the event is produced. The logic of the super-natural explanation seems very simple. All phenomena of experience are the expression, manifestation, explication, of some sort of power. The event called a miracle is of such an extraordinary nature, and the psychic reaction to it of such a special sort, that the power at work, in order adequately to explain these effects, must be extraordinary. And since the results in both the outer and inner realm seem to be superior to those that express themselves ordinarily in nature they must be due to a super-natural power; a power other than that which works uniformly in nature. Such a conclusion suggests the dualistic notion of two powers at work in the field of human experience, one controlling the usual, ordinary, natural sequence of events, and another, so far superior to it, that into the natural sequence of events are interjected other events which are out-of the ordinary, supernatural, unpredictable. Whether such a conclusion is logically justifiable it is not now purposed to discuss. Attention is called simply to the fact that some such explanatory logic as this constitutes a characteristic element in the group of historic phenomena generalized by the word Miracle. In other words the miracle is an event interpreted as meaning something with reference to the power by which it is wrought.

2. Miracles as Facts. That miracles in the sense of events in human experience containing these scientific, psychological, and logical elements have occurred is beyond possible doubt. Human history can not be made intelligible without the recognition of the influence in it of religion, and the history of religion can not be intelligently written without the recognition of the occurrence of such events. Just how far the occurrence of such events provided the original stimulus to the conviction of the existence of deity, somehow conceived (Pratt in his 'Religious Consciousness' calls it 'ruler of destiny'), which is an essential element in the religious consciousness, it is impossible to say. That such events have been a powerful influence in determining what men have thought as to the qualities of deity, and as to what correct human attitudes should be toward a deity possessing such qualities, can not be denied.

3. Miracle a Religious Term. It is just this inference as to the character of deity, and of the appropriate personal response, that constitutes miracle a positive religious term, as distinguished from a negative scientific term. The failure to recognize this distinction has brought confusion into much, if not most, of the earlier discussion of Christian miracles.

Undoubtedly one of the inferred characteristics of the agency effectuating the miracle has been power, and a power conceived as great in direct proportion to the extraordinariness, non-naturalness, of the event. This accounts for the manifest tendency in the description of past miracles to magnify the power by increasing the extraordinariness of the described event, sometimes to the point of grotesqueness, and to quicken the play of the mythological imagination, as in the case of the apocryphal miracles of Christ's youth. With a somewhat expanded knowledge of nature the emphasis on the power of the agent led to defining miracle as 'a violation of the laws of nature,' with the logically infelicitous presupposition of human omniscience referred to above. And a still more widely expanded knowledge of nature has, with a similarly infelicitous logic, led to the denial of the occurrence of such events. It can not be too strongly emphasized that the significance of miracles as a religious, and especially as a Christian concept, does not lie solely, or even chiefly, in the sheer 'supernaturalness' of the event and the more or less correct conclusion to the stark power of the effectuating agency as divine. Its value as a religious concept does not lie in proving the existence of God, or the divinity of the agent exhibiting supernatural power; but in manifesting the attitude of God, already conceived to exist, toward man, and indicating the consequent response that should be made by man toward God. Religion and revelation are reciprocal terms. As religious phenomena, miracles are not to be viewed as proofs of God; but as revelations about God.

4. Interpretation of Miracles. The modern distinction between facts and values, with the metaphysical implications of this distinction, with which Philosophy and Theology have been so largely concerned during the past generation, puts the interpretation of miracles in a new light, and one much more in accord with the view of them which appears in both the Old and New Testaments. The essential question is not as to the precise accuracy of the description of the event, or as to the existence of a power other than that operating in nature; but as to the meaning and value of the event in its bearings on the mutual relations of God and man.

That the appearance of a non-natural event, i.e., an event outside previous experience, proves the operation of a divine, supernatural agency is psychologically true—men have widely interpreted it that way—but logically false. That the appearance of a non-natural event, in the above sense, proves either the operation of an unknown 'natural law,' or the unobserved operation of a known 'law' is, similarly, psychologically true and logically false. Both rest back on metaphysical presuppositions as to the nature of ultimate reality, more or less religious. From the theistic point of view we find a Christian theologian as early as Augustine quoted in the first edition of this work<sup>1</sup> asserting the ultimate 'naturalness' of miracles. The decision turns as Prof. Harris, quoted above, said, on the meaning of nature and the meaning of God. That uniformity in method of action, as observed by men, necessarily follows from the conception of the unity of God simply shows paucity of metaphysical imagination. Undoubtedly the effort of the older theologians to draw accurate distinctions between 'providence,' 'special providences' and 'miracles' and to interpret each in dynamic terms as essentially different modes of the divine activity, brought into the older discussion of miracles elements that are unnecessarily confusing to the modern mind.

5. O T Miracles. The record of miracles in the Bible and their progressive interpretation as clarified by modern historical scholarship not only illustrates what has been said concerning the general attitude toward miracles, but also indicates that modern thought with respect to them is moving more nearly into accord with the Bible view. Take for example the O T miracles associated with the deliverance of the Hebrews from Egypt. They were brought out 'with strong power and with a mighty hand.' It is evident that the narratives themselves show, as they recede in time from the event, a marked increase in marvelous, extra-ordinary accessories to the occasion, as in respect to the crossing of the Red Sea (cf. Ex 14 21a [J] and 14 22 [P]), or the poetic statement in 15 8). But it is not simply as marvelous events associated with the departure from Egypt and the wanderings in the wilderness that they are through all Hebrew history lauded and sung. They are the lore of the folk; but they are not simply folk-lore. Their significance is profoundly religious. They are rehearsed as a revelation of the gracious attitude of J<sup>h</sup> toward his chosen people which it is both the privilege and the duty of the people to discern, and which ought to awaken in them the response of loyal hearts and obedient conduct. As the idea of God widens and becomes clearer in ethical content, the due response is carried beyond the obligation to perform certain rites and obey specific commands, on to the purification of character. The real significance of the specific event, it becomes increasingly clear from the history of the religious development of the people does not lie in its eccentricity as an event in the realm of nature; but in its meaning and religious value as respects the mutual relations of God and man. That which for them chiefly constitutes these events miracles, is not primarily their extra-ordinariness, or their marvelousness, or the logical conclusion to a supernatural power. Something of all these is there, but the distinctive thing is that in them and through them is the realized manifestation of the meaning of God for his people. The reality and the vital significance of these personal relations as testified to by the religious consciousness and illuminated by experience is primal. This for them is the very heart of religion, and religion is the fundamental determiner of life.

6. The Miracles of Jesus. It is with this religious attitude of O T thought at its best that Jesus starts. It is this that He 'fulfils.' As a revealer of religious truth He is concerned with conveying to those with whom He comes in contact true value-judgments in respect to God and man and their relations, and the implications involved in the personal relations of men to one another (the divine Fatherhood, the Kingdom of God, the twofold law of love). The reality of God, the necessity and validity of the judgments of the religious consciousness, or the religious intuition, of those who are not 'blind' He not only takes for granted but demands shall be accepted by those to whom He ministers. One misreads the story if he does not feel the immense effort Jesus makes to lead men to 'see' the truth—to believe Him and believe in Him. This not by syllogistic reasoning and logical demonstration, but by direct vision of truth. He reasons, to be sure, with critical acumen, but His logic is used to clear the way for vision. He evidently does not conceive of His miracles as scientific proof of His extraordinary supernatural power; but rather as dramatic parables—not in the sense of mythologized discourses—revealing, as did the parables to those that had 'ears to hear,' the spiritual realities of the universal kingdom of personal relations. He undoubtedly represented that God's power worked through Him. He recognizes and approves the cogency of the logic of the Scribes in accusing Him of blasphemy because He assumed, in the case of the paralytic let down through the roof (Mk 2 4 ff.), the divine prerogative of forgiving sins, and He justifies Himself by manifesting the Divine power of healing. And when in connection with the 'casting out a demon that was dumb' (Lk 11 11) His deed is accounted for by spectators on the principle of the naturalistic diabolism of the day, He astutely argues from their premises to the unsatisfactoriness of such an explanation, and then faces them with the counter-implication 'if I by the finger of God cast out demons then is the Kingdom of God come among you.' But in both cases He is not so much directing toward them a demonstration as challenging their spiritual vision.

From this initial point of view it is possible to appreciate (1) Why Jesus performed miracles at all; (2) Why He made faith the precondition of miracles and could say in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16 20 ff.), 'if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded if one rise from the dead'; (3) His obvious contempt for mere wonders (τέρατα) as stimulating curiosity or producing astonishment—like Huxley's typical miracle of a centaur trotting down Piccadilly; (4) His refusal to give the signs (σημεία) desired, because, to the discerning spirit, signs enough had already been given, and the signs desired would be wrongly interpreted; (5) His abandonment of miracle-working when it became apparent that further miracles would lead to false evaluation of the content and purpose of His message.

7. Modern Interpretation. The current effort to appraise miracles, and especially the miracles of Christ, in terms of their meaning as manifestations of the character of the worker and of the power by means of which they were wrought, seems much closer to the attitude of Jesus, and less like that of the religiously 'blind' of His day than does the attitude of a generation ago. The crux of the question of miracles is not whether or not an 'absolute miracle' is conceivable, or whether or not the records of miraculous events are scientifically precise in their historic details, or whether or not they involve a dualistic view of the universe. It really lies in the validity of the value-judgments of the religious consciousness as interpretative of a certain class of events in the natural world as revelations of the character of God.

It is worthy of note how the religious consciousness of the primitive church, so far as our records go, laid so little stress on the sheer marvelousness of the supreme miracle of the Christian faith—the resurrection of Christ—and emphasized so profoundly its religious significance as bearing on the mutual relations of God and man, and of men to one another, and found therein the cosmic significance of the risen Christ.

LITERATURE: Most of the recent discussion of miracles is scattered through various volumes and reviews dealing with Theology and Philosophy of Religion. Mention should be made of the excellent work by Johannes Wendland, translated by H. R. Macintosh, on Miracles and Christianity (1911). As to the fact of Miracles recorded in the Gospels, Geo. P. Fisher's Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief, chs. 8 and 9, contain a suggestive summary (rev. ed., 1902). Abp. Trench, On Miracles (1846) still retains its value as a scholarly retrospect of opinion on the miracles of the N T. Cf. also Bruce, The Miraculous Element in the Gospels (1886); and Galloway, Religion and Modern Thought (1922), ch. 10; Hastings, Enc. of Religion and Ethics (1919), vol. viii, pp. 766-690.

MIRIAM, mir'i-əm (מִרְיָם, miryām): 1. The sister of Moses and Aaron (Ex 15 20). Like her two brothers, her sense of Divine things was keen, and her zeal for Jehovah, His cause and people, intense. The passage Ex 2 4 f. shows that she took part in the saving of Moses' life. A psalm of victory over the safe crossing of the Red Sea is ascribed to her (Ex 15 20 ff.). Later, she claimed equal honor with Moses, and was smitten with leprosy, from which, however, she was restored by his intercession (Nu 12 1-16). Her death occurred at Kadesh (Nu 20 1). 2. Another of the name, from the tribe of Judah (I Ch 4 17). A. C. Z.

MIRMAH, mōr'ma (מִרְמָה, mirmāh, Mirma AV): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 10).

MIRROR: This is the rendering of the following Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) mar'ah (Ex 38 8); (2) ṣe'ar (Job 37 18); (3) gillayōn (Is 3 23); (4) ἑσπεριον (I Co 13 12; Ja 1 23). In these passages the RV has 'mirror,' the AV 'glass,' looking-glass. The ancient mirror was made of polished molten metal, usually from an alloy of copper and tin. Later, silver mirrors came into use. They were round, oval, also square, and often provided with decorated handles and backs. The mirrors used by the Hebrew women (Ex 38 8) were of brass. In Job 37 18 the firmness and glitter of the molten mirror are included in the comparison with the sky. The reflection in a metallic mirror was indistinct (I Co 13 12). The verb κατοπτρίζω is used in the middle voice (II Co 3 18) and means 'reflect as in a mirror' (so ERV, ARVmg.) or 'behold as in a mirror' (the Gospel) the glory of Christ' ARV. The meaning of gillayōn (Is 3 23) is uncertain; the LXX. renders 'transparent garments.' See also GLASS. C. S. T.

MISCARRY. The Heb. shākhāl is so rendered in II K 2 19, 21; cf. Hos 9 14. Elsewhere it is often rendered 'cast the young.' In both renderings the reference is to untimely birth. In II K 2 19, 21 the idea is that the water was the cause of the 'land' (i.e., the people and animals living on the land) suffering from untimely births (cf. Burney, HTK, ad loc.). See also DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7.

MISGAB, mis'gab (מִשְׁגָּב, misgābh): Apparently a town in Moab (Jer 48 1); but the text seems to be corrupt, and probably the original reading was quite different. E. E. N.

MISHAEL, mish'a-el (מִישָׁאֵל, mishā'el), 'who is what God is': 1. The head of a Kohathite family (Ex 6 22; Lv 10 4). 2. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 4). 3. The Heb. name of one of Daniel's companions to whom the Babylonian name Meshach was given (Dn 1 6 ff.).

MISHAL, mai'shal (מִשָּׁל, mish'al, Misheal AV): A town of Asher (Jos 19 26) assigned to the Levites (21 30). Probably the same as the Mashal of I Ch 6 74. Map IV, B 6.

MISHAM, mai'sham (מִשָּׁם, mish'am): A Benjamite (I Ch 8 12).

MISHEAL, mish'al. See MISHAL.

MISHMA, mish'ma (מִשְׁמָה, mishmā): 1. The ancestral head of an Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 14; I Ch

1 30). 2. The ancestral head of a clan of Simeon (I Ch 4 25 f.). See also MIBSAM.

MISHMANNAH, mish-man'na (מִשְׁמַנָּה, mishmannāh): A Gadite, one of David's soldiers (I Ch 12 16).

MISHRAITES, mish'ra-uits (מִשְׁרָאִי, mishrā'i): A postexilic family of Kiriath-jearim, which traced its ancestry to Caleb, son of Hur (I Ch 2 53).

MISPAR, mis'par (מִשְׁפָּר, mispar, Mizpar AV, called Mispereth in Neh 7 7): One of the leaders of the Return under Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2).

MISREPHOTH - MAIM, miz'ri-feth - mē'im (מִצְרֵפּוֹת מַיִם, mizr'phōth mayim): A place apparently near Sidon (Jos 11 8), and viewed as marking the boundary of the land of Israel (13 6). Site unknown.

MITE. See MONEY.

MITER. See PRIESTHOOD, § 9 (b), and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

MITHKAH, mith'ka (מִיתְקָה, mithqāh, Mithcah AV): One of the stations on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 28 f.). Site unknown.

MITHNITE, mith'nait (מִיתְנִי, mithnā): The designation of Josphat, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 43), pointing to Methen or Mathan as the name of his home, altho no such town is mentioned in the O T.

MITHREDATH, mith'ri-dath (מִיתְרֵדָת, mithr-dhāth), 'given by Mithra': 1. The treasurer of the Persian realm who, at the command of Cyrus, delivered to Sheshbazzar the vessels taken by Nebuchadrezzar from the Temple of Jerusalem (Ezr 1 8). 2. An officer of Artaxerxes (Longimanus) who joined with others in a protest against the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezr 4 7).

MITYLENE, mit'i-lī-nī (Μιτυλήνη): Mentioned incidentally in Ac 20 14. The most important city of the island of Lesbos, situated on a promontory once itself an island. In the earliest times its people were highly cultured. It was the seat of science, art, and letters, having produced such persons as Pittacus, Alcæus, and Sappho. Its climate was soft and salubrious. It possessed two harbors, and strong fortifications. It submitted to Persia in 546 B.C. and joined the Ionian revolt. It later belonged to the Athenian confederacy, from which it revolted in 428 and was punished by Athens in a way that permanently crippled the island.

MIXED MULTITUDE. See MINGLED PEOPLE.

MIZAR, mai'zār (מִיזָר, mits'ār), 'littleness': In Ps 42 6 M. seems to be the name of a hill situated somewhere between Hermon and the upper Jordan, and G. A. Smith (HGHI, p. 477, note) finds reminiscences of the name in several localities near Bāniās. It is possible, however, that the word is an appellative (EVmg.), in which case, if we drop from the Heb. text one letter (which may have been accidentally repeated in copying), we may translate 'I remember thee, thou little mountain' (i.e., Zion), from . . . the Hermons.' L. G. L.—L. B. P.

MIZPAH, miz'pa (מִצְפָּה, mīspāh; also, interchangeably, MIZPEH AV), 'watch tower': A term originally applied to places where a watch (garrison) was set up. Hence the name of several towns and regions. The original meaning is clearly preserved in II Ch 20 24 and Is 21 8, which are rendered 'watch tower' both in the LXX. and in EVV. Between the two forms of the name (in -āh and -eh) it is impossible to distinguish, except that 'Mizpah' is everywhere accompanied by the article (except in Hos 5 1). The places named Mizpah and Mizpeh are: 1. In the Shephelah (Jos 15 38), probably the locality named in Onom. 279, 139, N. of Eleutheropolis (Map II, D 2), the modern Tell es-Safiyeh, a small village in the midst of cliffs of white limestone. 2. In Benjamin (Jos 18 26), called preeminently 'the Mizpah.' This place became the boundary-line between the Northern and Southern Kingdoms, and was fortified by Asa with stones carried from Ramah (I K 15 22; II Ch 16 6). It served also as the assembly-ground of the Israelites before the separation of the two kingdoms (Jg 20 1, 3, 21 1; I S 7 5, 10 17), was one of Samuel's stations as judge (I S 7 16), and later the residence of Gedaliah (Jer 40 6 ff.; II K 25 25). After the Exile it was the capital of a district (Neh 3 15), and in the Maccabean age the headquarters of the uprising against the Seleucids (I Mac 3 46). It was situated on the way from Jerusalem to Shechem, and is to be identified with the modern Nebi-Samwil, where a Crusaders' church is supposed to stand over the tomb of Samuel. Map III, F 5. 3. A land occupied by Hivites in the vicinity of Mt. Hermon, probably westward from the base of the mountain, mentioned in Jos 11 3 in connection with the confederation of the kings defeated by Joshua near the waters of Merom, placed by Buhl (Geog. Pal. p. 240) at Kala'at es-Subebeh, on the slopes of Mt. Hermon, 2m. E. of Banias. Map IV, F 4. 4. The Valley of Mizpeh, W. of Hermon, also mentioned in connection with the defeat of the allies, but as a place whither they fled (Jos 11 8). It was in the same general locality as 3. 5. In Gilead, the residence of Jephthah (Jg 11 29, 34), an ancient sanctuary whose origin is traced back to patriarchal times. According to Gn 31 49, Jacob gave it the name it bears in commemoration of the compact with Laban [JE]; but the sense in which the word is used in this connection is slightly different from that in other places. Instead of an outlook-point, it indicates a place where God is invoked as a watcher (witness). Accordingly, it was a place invested with sacredness, and, on this ground, perhaps, was resorted to in making covenants between clans, such as that of Jephthah with the eastern tribes when they combined against the Ammonites. The location of the spot is fixed by the fact that Jacob on his way to Canaan crossed the Jabbok after the covenant with Laban. This would place Mizpah N. of the river Jabbok. Suf, NW. of Jerash, is supposed by many to be the exact spot, but the identification is not quite certain. Map III, K 3. 6. In Moab, probably the town where David placed his parents under the protection of the king of Moab (I S 22 3). Site unknown.

MIZPAR, miz'pār. See MISPAR.MIZPEH, miz'pe. See MIZPAH.

MIZRAIM, miz'ra-im (מִצְרַיִם, mīsrāyim): 1. The Heb. name of Egypt, or sometimes, more strictly, of Lower Egypt; see EGYPT, § 1. 2. The second son of Ham (Gn 10 6, 13), the eponym ancestor of the Egyptians. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 12. J. F. McC.—L. B. P.

MIZZAH, miz'a (מִצָּח, mīzzāh): A clan chieftain of Edom (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37).

MNASON, nē'son (Μνάων): A native of Cyprus and an early Christian disciple (Ac 21 16). According to the commonly accepted reading and interpretation of the verse, the house of M., in which Paul and his companions lodged, was in Jerusalem. But according to Codex Bezae, he lived in a village between Caesarea and Jerusalem, perhaps in Samaria, and here Paul lodged with him on the journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem. J. M. T.

MOAB, mō'ab: 1. Name. The name 'Moab' (O T מוֹאָב, mō'ābh; Mesha Stone, מוֹאָב; Assy. ma'ab, ma'aba, mu'aba) is derived, by one of the popular etymologies so common in the O T, in Gn 19 37 (cf. LXX.) from mō (= min), 'from,' and 'ābh, 'father.' But this can not be the real origin of the word, the etymology of which is no longer known. In the O T the name is pretty generally used of the people rather than of their land, and since the name passed out of use in the Greek period it is likely that it was always understood to be the name of a people, not a geographical term.

2. The Land of Moab. The territory that was occupied by the Moabites was the region immediately E. of the Dead Sea. On these fertile, but well-drained uplands, extending N. from the wādīs that empty into the low country at the S. end of the Dead Sea to the southern borders of Gilead, and E. to the desert, the Moabites maintained themselves as a distinct people for over one thousand years. Their territory at no time much exceeded 60 m. in length and 30 m. in breadth, or about 1,500 sq. m. in area. Within this small compass was a population of probably at least 500,000 souls in its most flourishing days. Cities were numerous immense flocks of sheep and goats grazed on the rich pastures, grain was raised in abundance, and the people were easily able to live off their land, asking little from the outside world. For a description of the topographical features, etc., see PALESTINE, § 13 (c).

3. The Earliest History. The early history of M. is very obscure. In Israel's tradition the Moabites were viewed as a kindred people, descended from Lot, the nephew of Abraham (Gn 19 37; Dt 2 9, 18). M. therefore was one of the group of closely related 'Hebrew' peoples (Israel, Edom, Moab, Ammon), all of whom had a common ancestry, and had this also in common, that they pressed in from the desert upon the cultivated land occupied by the Canaanites and altho becoming dominant, each in its own locality, adopted the language and absorbed much of the civilization of the people they conquered. The more ancient predecessors of the Moabites in some portions of their territory were called the 'Emim' and 'Zuzim' (Gn 14 5; Dt 2 10), but the racial connections of these peoples are unknown. The representations in Nu (chs. 21 ff.), Dt (2 8 ff., etc.), Jg (11 12-23), etc., imply that the Moabites had been well-established in their territory E. of the Dead Sea some time before Israel conquered Canaan, perhaps as long as a century. A short time before the Israelites appeared on the SE. border of M., on their way from Horeb to Canaan, the Moabites had suffered severely at the hands of Sihon, an Amorite king, perhaps from W. of the Jordan, who had conquered the N. half of Moab's territory (the portion N. of the Arnon), driving the Moabites out of their chief cities (Heshbon, Medeba, etc.), and founding an Amorite kingdom with his capital at Heshbon (Nu 21 21-30).

4. Moab and Israel in Moses' Time. The Israelites thus found M. restricted to the S. half of the territory they called their own, the Arnon now forming their N. boundary (Nu 21 13). Israel traversed the eastern border of M., unmolested and probably even welcome by the Moabites, who may have hoped to find in the Israelites allies who would assist them in regaining their territory from the Amorites. In this they were doomed to disappointment; for after the Israelites had conquered Sihon they proceeded to take possession of this territory for themselves. This brought about an estrangement on the part of Moab. Tradition preserved notices of various phases of this hostility, such as the attempt of Balak, King of Moab, to secure the aid of the soothsayer Balaam (q.v.) to place Israel under a curse (Nu chs. 22-24), or the attempt to entice Israel away from loyalty to J' by means of the degrading worship of Baal-peor (Nu 25 1-5). There is no record of actual war between the two peoples at this time. M. as the weaker was compelled to submit to the stronger confederation of Israelitic tribes and to see its choicest pasture-lands and many of its cities taken possession of by the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Nu 32 1-5, 34 ff.; Jos 13 15-28). The accounts of this occupation are not entirely clear and harmonious, but the general fact is well substantiated, both by Jg 5 15 ff. and by the Mesha inscription, line 10 (see MESHA). It is probable that it was mainly the Reubenites who settled in Moab's old territory, the Gadites locating originally farther to the N. Later, but perhaps not for a century or more, the Gadites seem to have supplanted the Reubenites, the latter having in some way lost their tribal identity.

5. Moab in the Period Between Moses and David. After the main body of Israel had crossed the Jordan and was again broken up into separate tribes, each busy securing possession of its portion of the W. Jordan land, the Moabites seem to have succeeded in regaining control of their old territory N. of the Arnon and at last, under their king, Eglon, ventured to cross the Jordan and attack the Israelites in the region W. of the lower Jordan. For a while this portion of Israel was held in subjection, but at length Eglon was assassinated by the Benjamite Ehud, under whose leadership the Moabites were defeated and compelled to retire to their own land. This put an end forever to attempts on the part of M. to occupy any territory W. of the Jordan.

Somewhat later, in the period of the 'Judges,' Jephthah the Gileadite appears to have conquered the Moabites, probably because of their attempt to control the region occupied by the Gadites (Jg 11 12-23, which seems to contain a separate account, from a different source, from that of the rest of the chapter; so recently also Burney, Judges (1918), pp. 298 ff.). In the summary account of Saul's wars (IS 14 47) he is said to have fought successfully against M., but no particulars are given. To this same general period may be assigned the war between M. and Edom which is so obscurely referred to in Gn 36 35. According to the Book of Ruth, a Bethlehemite named Elimelech migrated to Moab in the Judges period. His sons married Moabite women, one of whom, Ruth, is the heroine of the beautiful story of the book and is represented as the ancestress of David. The reasons alleged against the historicity of this tradition do not appear to be well-founded.

6. Moab Subject to Israel. Altho David was thus remotely akin to the Moabites, and had placed his parents under the protection of the king of M. during his troubles with Saul (I S 22 3), for some unknown reason, after he had become king of all Israel war broke out between him and Moab. In this war David was completely victorious and treated the conquered people with uncommon severity (II S 8 2). It may be that at this time many Gadite families moved into M., occupying its most desirable cities and pasture-lands (cf. § 4, above). If this is so, it will explain the statement of the Mesha Stone (150 years after David's time), line 10, 'And the men of Gad had dwelt in Ataroth from of old,' and perhaps also lines 17b, 18a, 'And I took thence the vessels of Yahweh and I dragged them before Chemosh,' the reference being to vessels at sanctuaries of J' established by David or by the Gadite worshippers of J'. On this view, also, the confused character of the references Nu 32 1 ff., 33 ff., and Jos 13 8 ff., may be explained, the references to the Reubenites preserving the memory of the earlier Reubenite occupation, those to the Gadites relating to the later immigration of Gadites in the time of David.

The spirit of the Moabites was humbled, but not broken, and at the accession of Rehoboam (c. 933 B.C.), they once more became masters of their old territory N. of the Arnon, and freed themselves from the yoke of Israel. They seem to have maintained their independence until the reign of Omri (c. 883-875 B.C.). This energetic and able monarch reduced M. once more to subjection to Israel (Mesha Stone, lines 4-8), a condition of vassalage which lasted during the remainder of the reign of his son Ahab. The O T contains no account of this conquest of M. by Omri, but does state that the annual tribute Mesha was accustomed to pay was the wool of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (II K 3 4), incidental evidence of the great wealth of the country in this respect.

Mesha was an able, patriotic monarch, and at the death of Ahab, according to the O T (II K 11, 35), revolted from subjection to Israel. The Mesha Stone seems to imply that the revolt took place in the days of Ahab, but as it says merely 'his [Omri's] son,' it is uncertain whether Ahab or his son Jehoram is really intended. At any rate, the O T account of Jehoram's attempt, aided by Judah and Edom, to bring Mesha once more under the yoke of Israel (II K 3 4-27) shows that the crisis of the conflict did not come until Jehoram's reign. Mesha's story deals with the earlier stages of his revolt and can be read in his own words on the Mesha Stone, lines 1-20 (see MESHĀ). His constructive work in developing and organizing his kingdom is partially told in the remainder of the inscription. The war with Jehoram may have occurred after the inscription was made. Jehoram's attempt was unsuccessful, altho Mesha felt himself reduced to the extremity of sacrificing his eldest son to Chemosh, and it was probably the superstitious awe aroused by this terrible deed that led the Israelites to give up the attempt. Nothing further is known of the history of M. in this period, the notice in II Ch 20 1-30 being of questionable historical value, while that in II K 13 20 simply reflects the general hostility between the two peoples in that period. A hint of subjection to Syria (Hazaël) is contained in II K 10 32 f.

7. Moab in the 8th-6th Centuries B.C. We next hear of M., incidentally, in Am 2 1-3, where, with other nations, it is condemned by the prophet of J'' for its unrighteous conduct, in this case for its inhuman treatment of the king of Edom. We know nothing of the event referred to. The nature of this reference in Am seems to imply that M. was at that time (760-750 B.C.) an independent kingdom with its capital at Kerioth. In II K 14 25 the contemporary king of Israel, Jeroboam II, is said to have 'restored the border of Israel from the entrance of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah' (i.e., the Dead Sea). This may imply a renewal of Israelitic control of Moab. In Is 15 1-16 12 there is a most interesting oracle regarding M. Very forcibly it depicts the anxiety and terror of M. because of an impending invasion from the N. or E. What this threatened or actual invasion was is uncertain, and the difficulties in the way of a satisfactory exegesis of these two chapters are so great as to forbid any historical inference from them (cf. Gray, ICC, ad loc.). It is quite possible that the conquests of Jeroboam II (c. 785-745 B.C.) E. of the Jordan seriously threatened M., but he apparently did not actually overrun the country.

M., like the other small states in Syria, was compelled to yield to the irresistible encroachment of Assyria. Salamanu, King of Moab, like Ahaz of Judah, paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser IV in 734 B.C. when that monarch humbled N. Israel and Damascus. Sargon (722-705 B.C.) found M. hostile, but his successor, Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.), speaks of the Moabite king Chemoshnadab as a willing vassal (unlike Hezekiah). Sennacherib's successor, Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.), received contributions for his building operations from Mutsuri of Moab, and the instinct of self-preservation against the Arabs led the Moabites to the same loyalty to Assurbanipal (668-626).

Thus, M., by recognizing the general supremacy of Assyria, maintained itself in prosperous semi-independence for upward of a century. It does not seem to have been seriously implicated in the events connected with the downfall of the Assyrian Empire (606 B.C.). While at times it appears to have been inclined to join in a confederacy to resist Nebuchadnezzar's authority in Syria (Jer 27 3), its general attitude toward Judah was hostile and therefore probably friendly to Babylon (II K 24 2; Jer 9 26, 48 1-47; Ezk 25 8 ff.; Zeph 2 8 f.). The Moabites rejoiced, as did Edom, in the fall of their long-time rival Judah, altho some of the Jews found refuge in M. during the war with Babylon (Jer 40 11). This hostility was never forgotten, and the counterfeeling in Judah manifested itself in legal prescriptions, prophecy, and psalms (Dt 23 3; Ps 60 8, 83 6, 108 9; Neh 13 1, 23; Jer ch. 48, etc.; cf. last ref.).

Little is known of M. subsequent to the time of the downfall of Judah. It probably gradually succumbed to the advance of the Arabian tribes, and eventually the territory was occupied by the Nabataean Arabs. Whatever remained of the ancient Moabites became absorbed in the general population of their conquerors.

8. Religion and Culture of Moabites. The national deity of M. was Chemosh (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 17). The popular religious conceptions of the Moabites were quite similar to those of the Israelites. Some parts of the Mesha inscription read like parts of the O T (cf. lines 3-5, 8, 12-14, 17-19, 32). But the higher ranges of religious thought which so distinguished Israel were altogether foreign to the Moabites. Chemosh remained to the last a mere local, national, nature-deity, whose worship did not exclude that of other deities such as Nebo, Ashtar-chemosh, Baal-Peor (= Chemosh?).

The civilization of the Moabites was comparatively high. Their cities were numerous and prosperous (see DIBON). Twenty-five or more Moabite cities are mentioned in the O T. The people were experts in vine culture (cf. Is 16 8) and sheep-raising. The Mesha inscription is evidence that at least some of the people were able to read and write, using the ancient Canaanite or 'Phenician' alphabet, and also for a considerable knowledge of industrial arts (lines 21-27). It is altogether probable that the Moabites were in no important respect (except religion) behind Israel in their attainments in civilization.

I. HISTORICAL SKETCH.

I. Preexilic Times. Many and diverse objects, such as skins, cattle, corn, tobacco, etc., have served the purposes of money as a medium of exchange and a standard or measure of value. Simple barter without reference to media of exchange generally existed in early times, and is still practised in remote parts of the world. However, even before the conquest of Canaan by the Hebrews, the Canaanites were already advanced in this respect, for they were using money in the form of precious metals, altho no doubt outside of the larger towns and ports barter was to be met. In buying the field of Machpelah, Abraham weighed out to Ephron 400 shekels of silver, 'current with the merchant' (Gn 23 16). The word shekel (shāqal, 'to weigh'), it should be noted, was a weight, and not until much later a coin, as was also true of the English pound.

1. Money by Weight. Gold being rarely used, silver became the common form of money so that the word used for money was kešeph (silver), as in Gn 17 13, where silver is the price of a slave. The only references in the O T to shekels of gold, with one exception (I Ch 21 25), are to the weights of certain objects, spoons, rings, etc., altho one of these mentioned below may have been used as a form of money. That silver was a measure of value is seen in the case of fines for offenses (Ex chs. 21 and 22), contributions to the Tabernacle (Ex 30 13), and payments to the seer (I S 9 8), all of which were regulated by weight. It would seem from the references to the use of gold and silver in commercial transactions that the precious metals were actually weighed only when large sums changed hands. For ordinary payments the metals were in ingot form, cut into familiar sizes or rather weights, and easily recognized. Indeed only in large transactions did abrasion or loss of weight from other causes demand that the balance be used (Is 46 6). A direct reference to portions of ingots may probably be seen in I S 9 8, where Saul's servant reports that he happens to have a fourth part of a shekel of silver, and in the use of the word gesitāh, translated 'piece' in the O T, when Job's friends gave him each a piece of money (Job 42 11), and Jacob bought a parcel of land for 100 pieces (Gn 33 19). Probably the tongue or wedge of gold mentioned in Jos 7 21 and in Is 13 12 was also an ingot.<sup>1</sup> The O T is indefinite in its frequent mention of pieces of silver, but it is probably right in many of these to recognize ingots of a shekel-weight of silver (or Silverlings, Is 7 23), as without doubt it is in the case of the 30 pieces of silver in Zech 11 12, 13 and Mt 26 15.

2. Babylonian Standard. Rings of gold were the common form of money in Egypt, and reference to rings of certain weights in Gn 24 22 may reflect the influence of that country as it was in close communication with Canaan. Nevertheless it was Babylonian which gave the cultural background to Western Asia. From this age-old country and civilization, Abraham had journeyed about 2,000 B.C., and in his time the Babylonian weight system prevailed in Canaan. This weighing out of silver by Abraham was no isolated case, for in the cuneiform letters found at Tel el-Amarna (Egypt) and written about 1380 B.C. by Syrian governors to Amenhotep IV and his father, more than 100 years before the conquest of Canaan by Israel, mention is made of the weighing of gold and silver on the Babylonian standard. This system continued to prevail in Syria and Asia Minor, but at some later period, certainly by the time of the issue of the first Phenician coins, and probably very much earlier, the weight standard of Tyre and Sidon, cities which dominated the trade of Palestine, was in use there for silver. The Babylonian standard, however, was retained for gold.

Both systems contained two standards, a light and a heavy, the latter double the weight of the former.<sup>2</sup>

The light Babylonian manû (Heb. māneh, Gr. μν, Lat. mina, and so Eng. mina) weighed 7,580 grains, the heavy 15,160 grains. The light Babylonian shekel, being  $\frac{1}{60}$  of a manû, weighed 126 grains, the heavy 252 grains. These weights applied to both gold and silver. The light gold shekel which was in general use was thus in weight between an English sovereign (123 gr.) and a U.S.A. five-dollar gold piece (129 gr.). The value of gold to silver over a very long period stood at  $13\frac{1}{4}$  to 1, an awkward ratio for commercial transactions. The silver shekel was therefore altered in weight to make a whole number of them the equivalent in value of the gold shekel. This was done by raising the weight of the silver shekel from 126 to 168 gr., so that 10 silver shekels then equaled 1 gold shekel ( $168 \times 10 = 126 \times 13\frac{1}{4}$ ). The influence of the decimal system met by the Babylonian trader as he traveled westward was also seen in the alteration of the mina<sup>3</sup> from 60 shekels (on the Babylonian sexagesimal system) to 50, making 3,000 to the talent instead of 3,600 (Ex 38 24-26). This was for the weighing of the precious metals only, the older system being retained for ordinary merchandise. In all this it must be remembered that these shekels were not coins but pieces of metal of approximately the weights mentioned. At what time the change from the silver shekel (weight) of Babylonia weighing 168 gr. to the heavy Phœnician one of 224 gr. took place is uncertain, but it may well have been early in the history of the Hebrews in Canaan. The heavy Babylonian shekel of 252 gr.<sup>4</sup> continued to be used by the Hebrews for weighing gold until N T times, altho large sums were expressed in talents. The mina is seldom mentioned in the Bible, the sum usually being given in shekels. In fact this usage was so common that the word shekel itself was frequently omitted (Gn 37 28; Jg 17 2, 3, 4, etc.).

<sup>2</sup> A royal norm existed with a slightly higher scale employed in payments to the Royal Treasury. It is doubtful if this occurs in the Bible unless in II S 14 25.

<sup>3</sup> Sixty minas equaled 1 talent. The references in the O T to talents and to māneh or mina (Ezk 45 12) are to weights. The same is true of the pound (I K 10 17, etc. AV), which in the Hebrew is māneh.

3. Phœnician Standard. The Phœnician standard referred to above was a modification of the Babylonian, for the Phœnician silver shekel weighed only two-thirds of the Babylonian (168 gr. and 336 gr.), or 112 gr. for the light and 224 gr. for the heavy. Hence 15 Phœnician silver shekels equaled 10 Babylonian shekels of silver or 1 of gold. It was on this Phœnician heavy standard (224 gr.) that the so called Shekel of the Sanctuary, or Sacred Shekel, was calculated. At first it was paid by weight, later the shekel<sup>5</sup> and half-shekel coins were struck on this basis, and right down through the 1st cent. A.D. Phœnician money was used for the Temple tribute.

4. Trading Conditions and Money. Many of the complex functions of money familiar now were absent during preexilic times, altho behind Palestine lay the ancient commercial experience of Babylonia with its great eastern and western trade, its systems of banking and mortgage, and its safe deposits. We read of Tyrian traders having their quarters at Jerusalem (Neh 13 16), and of Ahab desiring trading quarters in Damascus (I K 20 34), but Palestine was in the main an agricultural country. Loans at 'usury' (=interest) are mentioned. Nevertheless, these are not to be interpreted until N T times (Mt 25 27, etc.) as capital lent for trading purposes, but merely loans to the distressed. Exceptionally, and notably in the reign of Solomon, there is evidence of a lively foreign trade and an abundance of the precious metals. This coincided with the success of the Phœnicians who had controlled the Cilician silver mines and similarly gained control of those in Spain, thus rendering silver abundant. Perhaps it would be true to say that until a considerable time after the return from the Captivity, the payments of large sums recorded in the O T are rather the high lights of the picture.

The next step in the development of money was the use of the precious metals stamped officially by the issuing authority to guarantee their weight and purity. This is the stage of the coin, of which, however, there is no evidence in Palestine until after the return from the Exile.

II. Postexilic Times. 5. Persian Coinage. After their return from Babylon (536 B.C.), the Jews found <sup>4</sup> This heavy gold shekel equalled $10 or £2 1s., the mina, $500 or £102 1s., and the talent $30,000 or £6,150. The light gold weights were worth half of these amounts.

<sup>5</sup> Value 67c. U. S. or 2s 9d Engl. The Phœnician or Jewish silver mina (heavy) = $33.25 or £6 16s 8d, and the talent $1,995 or £410.

many strangers in occupation of their land, and the returning exiles must have formed a lean colony, with but a poor trade and a small foreign commerce. In the busy ports Greek coins probably circulated, for the Lydians and Æginetans are credited with having coined money early in the 7th cent. B.C. The Phœnicians in their wide trading enterprises must have been familiar with this currency, but there is no evidence that the Hebrews used it before the exile. The first coins to circulate generally in Palestine were almost certainly Persian. Palestine formed part of a satrapy of the Persian Empire, and we know that Darius Hystaspes (521-485 B.C.) issued great numbers of gold and silver coins. The former, called darics (of 130 gr.), were slightly heavier than a five-dollar gold piece, and bore the type of the Persian king as an archer; but this appearance of a 'graven image' did not apparently deter its being used by the Jews. In the RV the word 'daric' is substituted for the AV dram in I Ch 29 7; Ezr 2 69, 8 27, and Neh 7 70-72. The Hebrew is 'dark<sup>6</sup> mōnīm,' but the events referred to in these passages were prior to the issue of the actual daric, and the original word may have referred to a weight. The sole right of issue, as an attribute of government, was retained by the kings of Persia only in the case of gold coins, hence the freedom of Tyre and Sidon to coin silver. Silver coins called sigloi, or shekels (of 86½ gr.),<sup>7</sup> 20 of which equaled the gold daric, were also issued by Darius Hystaspes, and were about the size of the U.S. silver quarter dollar or an English shilling. The 40 shekels mentioned in Neh 5 13 may therefore have been either Persian sigloi (86½ gr.) or Phœnician shekels (224 gr.).

6. Phœnician Coinage. Tyre issued early in the 5th cent. B.C., and more especially after the fall of Athens, shekels or staters as they were sometimes called, on the Phœnician basis of 224 gr. or 15 to the Babylonian gold shekel of 252 gr. (15×224=13⅓×252). These early Tyrian silver shekels,<sup>7</sup> influenced by Athens and Egypt, bore the design of an owl with an Egyptian crook and flail, and on the obverse a dolphin or the god Melqarth riding a sea-horse, etc. The double and half-shekels of Sidon bore the device of a galley and on the reverse a king of Persia driving a chariot or on foot slaying a lion.

These Tyrian silver shekels are the Phœnician coins which were used for payment of the Shekel of the Sanctuary (Lv 27 25, etc.).<sup>8</sup> The Talmud repeatedly states that all payments based on the Shekel of the Sanctuary are to be made in the <sup>6</sup> Many of these weighed but 84 gr., and therefore equalled in weight half a Babylonian shekel (168 gr.).

<sup>7</sup> The earliest Phœnician shekels were thick and heavy. Later they were of normal thickness and about the size of a U. S. silver half dollar or an English florin.

<sup>8</sup> The offering was finally fixed at a half-shekel (Ex 30 13 P [later strand]), increased from the earlier rate of one third of a shekel fixed in Nehemiah's time (Neh 10 29).

It has been claimed that Artaxerxes (458 B.C.) commissioned Ezra (Ezr 7 16-18) to coin silver and gold, but there are no surviving coins to substantiate this claim.

7. Coinage of Alexander. Palestine remained a subprovince of Persia until the conquest of that empire by Alexander the Great (332-323 B.C.). This great military genius brought not only peace and a united empire, but in their wake, trade and a single currency, the last a great lubricator of commerce. He issued gold staters on the Attic standard (of 133 gr.), which are found to-day as far N. as Lithuania and as far E. as India. It will thus be seen that the Babylonian light gold shekel, the Persian daric and the stater of Alexander were approximately the same weight. Silver tetradrachms (266 gr.)<sup>9</sup> were also struck under his authority at the local mints of Joppa, Acre, etc. The staters bore the head of Athena helmeted and on the reverse Winged Victory holding a mast and spar, with the inscription Alexandrou Basileos. The tetradrachms bore various designs, but the most common were the head of young Heracles in a lion's skin and on the reverse Olympian Zeus seated on his throne holding an eagle, with the legend Alexandrou.

8. Seleucid and Ptolemaic Coinage. After his death and the rise of the Seleucid dynasty with its seat at Antioch, Palestine became a bone of contention between the Seleucids on the one hand and the Ptolemies of Egypt on the other. The Seleucids coined the tetradrachm (266 gr.) and drachma (66½ gr.) on the Alexandrian standard, and at first their coins bore the same devices, the inscription being amended to Seleukou Basileos. The Ptolemaic currency struck at Alexandria altho at first repeating Alexander's designs was based on the Phenician weight standard (224 gr.), which naturally led to its use by the Jews. Both the Seleucid and Ptolemaic issues are said to have borne the earliest portraits of deified kings, and if the stricter Jews were reluctant to handle them, more than a century and a half was to elapse before they could dictate what designs should and should not appear on their currency. Under the Seleucids of Syria, Tyre and Sidon continued to issue silver shekels and thus to add to the variety of the currency in Palestine.<sup>10</sup>

9. Jewish Coinage. The Seleucid king Antiochus Epiphanes, (176-164 B.C.), fearing the defection of Jerusalem to the Ptolemaic king, attacked and despoiled it. When he went further and tried to suppress Judaism and to foist Hellenism upon the Jews, which had already gained ground since the time of Alexander, he roused national opposition which culminated in the Maccabean rebellion. Begun for religious freedom, it was continued for political autonomy. Led by members of the Maccabean family, a successful resistance was maintained against the successive Syrian kings until Antiochus VII (139 B.C.) granted Simon, the High Priest, the right 'to coin money for thy country with thine own stamp' (I Mac 15 6). It is therefore under the Maccabees that the first Jewish national coin with Hebrew legends and Hebrew religious symbols appeared. Bronze half and quarter shekels dated (possibly) between 141 and 135 B.C.) were struck by Simon Maccabeus,<sup>11</sup> and smaller pieces under his son John Hyrcanus (135-104 B.C.). See illustrations in art. ALPHABET, §§ 1 and 2. The former bore various devices, including a citron, two bundles of twigs (carried at the Feast of Tabernacles), a palm tree with two baskets of fruit, a chalice (of manna in the Sanctuary? Ex 16 33), etc. They also bore the legend 'The Redemption of Zion' and the year of the High Priest's rule. By some authorities certain silver shekels and half-shekels bearing the device of a chalice and on the reverse a triple lily (?) with the inscription 'Shekel of israel,' 'Jerusalem the Holy,' are attributed to Simon Maccabeus, but by others to the First Revolt (66-70 A.D.). It will thus be seen that the Jews had guarded against the suspicion of idolatry by avoiding the representation of animals and human beings common on Greek coins of the period, and had substituted designs connected with their national worship. However, the wave of Hellenism would not be denied. The High Priestly family of the Maccabees aspired to princely rights and position against the sentiment of the Jewish people, and eventually Alexander Jannæus (103-76 B.C.) claimed to be king and brazened it in Greek on his earlier coins. The sacred Hebrew language gave way, at least on the obverse of the coins, to pagan script, and the symbols of the Jewish Temple worship and fatherland to devices of a wholly pagan character.

<sup>10</sup> From 126 B.C. Tyre, freed from Seleucid rule, issued tetradrachms (or shekels) with the device of the Tyrian Heracles (Melqarth) and lion-skin and on the reverse an eagle with foot on ship's prow and palm branch over shoulder. These and the didrachmas (half-shekels) were popular with the Jews for payment of the Temple offering.

III. New Testament Times. The coinage of the N T period consisted mainly of the Imperial Roman currency of gold and silver and the bronze issues of local rulers.

10. Imperial Roman and Local Coinage. The Maccabean, or Asmonean, dynasty which had given the Jews a national currency, and from which the Herods were descended, closed with Antigonus (37 B.C.), in whose time Judea became a Roman province. In fact the Roman denarius (penny AV, shilling RV) was legal tender at Jerusalem as early as 53 B.C. Herod I (37-4 B.C.), the Idumean, married the niece of Antigonus, and ruled over Judea as feudatory vassal of Rome. He was followed by his sons Herod Archelaus, the ethnarch of Judea, Samaria and Idumæa (4 B.C.-6 A.D.), whom Joseph feared, and Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (4 B.C.-39 A.D.), before whom Christ was arraigned. The currency of all these rulers was exclusively of copper, and the legends on the Herodian coins were wholly in Greek, and the designs pagan. Herod Philip II (4 B.C.-34 A.D.), mentioned in Lk 3 1, went further and issued bronze coins bearing the head of Tiberius Cæsar, a grave breach of the Mosaic Law. A coin exists which was struck by Herod Agrippa (37-44 A.D.) bearing the inscription 'King Agrippa the great lover of Cæsar,' which recalls the term used by the Jews to Pilate, 'Thou art not Cæsar's friend.' Herod Agrippa II, before whom Paul was brought at Cæsarea, issued coins with effigies of many Roman Emperors during his long reign from 48-100 A.D.

Denarius of Tiberius Cæsar (probably type Pharisees tempted Christ with).

Bronze Coin of Pontius Pilate.

From 6-58 A.D. Judea was treated differently from the other provinces, being ruled directly by Roman officials—Procurators—of whom there were no less than 14 during this period. These procurators, in contrast with the Herodian princes, showed respect for the feelings of the conquered, as is illustrated by a coin of Pontius Pilate (26-36 A.D.), on which the device in no way offended Jewish religious sentiments. None of the foregoing rulers had authority to issue gold or silver coins. These were directly under the Imperial authority, and it was the Imperial currency which generally prevailed, except for the Temple purposes. It consisted of (1) the denarius, a silver coin a trifle larger than a U.S. dime, or about the size of an English sixpence, and passing in trade as a Greek drachma, but slightly heavier; and (2) the aureus (120-126 gr.), closely approximating the other gold coins hitherto circulating in Palestine, and worth 25 denarii. A few Imperial bronze coins issued by the Antioch mint may have found their way south.

During Apostolic times the Jews once more issued their own currency. This occurred during their revolt against the Romans from 66-70 A.D., when the High Priest and Sanhedrin struck silver and copper coins. The copper coins bore the device on one side of an amphora with the year, and on the other a vine leaf with tendril and the words 'Deliverance of Zion.' The silver shekels and half-shekels, which as we have seen are attributed by some to Simon Maccabeus, bore a chalice with the words 'Shekel of Israel' and the year, and on the reverse a triple lily (?) with the legend 'Jerusalem the Holy.' This shekel was approximately the weight of the Phœnician shekel, or actually 220 gr., and the half-shekel 110 gr., and in size equaled respectively a U.S. nickel, 5-cent piece, and a dime.

In the year 70 A.D. Jerusalem was besieged and taken, the Temple destroyed and 'not one stone left upon another.' Vespasian the conqueror issued coins to commemorate the destruction of Jewish hopes, with scenes of their pathetic fate and the legend 'Judæa capta.'

II. LIST OF COINS CIRCULATING IN N T TIMES.

Penny. Perhaps the commonest coin during this time was the denarius (Shilling RV), an Imperial silver coin mistranslated in AV as 'penny,' or pennyworth (Mt 20 2, etc., 22 19; Mk 6 37; Lk 10 35, etc.). It was really the equivalent of the modern French franc (at par), or about 19¼ cents and was the tribute payable by the Jews to their conquerors. Most probably it was a denarius struck under Tiberius Cæsar and bearing the Emperor's head, with which the Pharisees sought to trap Christ.<sup>12</sup> It is this coin which is probably intended in Ac 19 19. In Mt 18 24, 28, the contrast between the 100 pence and the 10,000 talents is greater than seems. The Roman-Attic talent<sup>13</sup> was no longer a weight, but consisted of 6,000 denarii or drachmas, therefore the value of 10,000 talents of silver was 60 million denarii against 100 (pence) or denarii.

Farthing. This is the translation of the Gr. word assarion (Mt 10 29; Lk 12 6), originally a Roman bronze coin weighing nearly a pound, but gradually reduced to the size of an Eng. halfpenny and adopted by the Greeks. In these instances it was probably a Greco-Roman coin issued in Syria. The value of the assarion was  $1\frac{1}{6}$  cents, or three-fifths of a penny, and sixteen equaled 1 denarius.

A one as piece (assarion) and a 4 as piece (sestertius) equal to one quarter denarius were issued by the Imperial mint at Antioch.

The word farthing is used also in the AV and RV to translate the Gr. word kodrantes, which was really the smallest Roman coin called a quadrans and equal to one quarter of an assarion, or about three-tenths of a cent or three-twentieths of a penny.

Mite. This, of which two went to the kodrantes (Mk 12 42, etc.), is a translation of the Gr. word lepton, the smallest Gr. coin, of which 7 went to the chalcus, a word used by Mk (see below). As a foreign coin could not be used for a Temple offering it is probable that the smallest copper coins of the Maccabees with their Hebrew symbols and inscriptions were dropped into the box by the widow. The mite equaled about three-twentieths of a cent, or three fortieths of a penny.

Pound. This word in the N T is a weight, but in Lk 19 13, etc., the original reads mina (Gr. μνᾶ). This is the Roman-Attic mina consisting of 100 denarii, and equal to $19.25 or £4.

Shekel. The tetradrachm (4 drachmas) or shekel (RV Mt 17 27) was equal to about 4 denarii, and at this time was accurately named by the Evangelist a stater. Imperial coins of this value were issued from the mint at Antioch, and were of about the same weight as the old Phenician shekel (220-224 gr.). For the Temple offerings the former would have had to be changed for the latter or current Tyrian shekels. These Tyrian shekels are believed to be intended by the 30 pieces of silver in Mt 26 15, etc., 27 3, and in Zech 11 12, 13

Half-Shekel. The didrachma (2 drachmas), or half-shekel, was the sacred tribute money voluntarily offered by the Jews for the support of the Temple. It approximated the half-shekel of the old Temple tribute (Ex 30 13; Mt 17 24, RV). As the didrachma was a very rare coin, if not obsolete by this time, it had become the custom, as is illustrated by our Lord and by Peter, for two to pay the offering together, using a shekel. Since foreign coins with their references to the conqueror and their pagan symbols were not allowed to defile the Temple, it was necessary to resort to the money-changers in making offerings to the Temple.

Drachma. This is only once mentioned in the N T, in the case of the loss of 10 pieces of silver by the woman of the Parable (Lk 15 8). Greek coins found their way into Palestine, but more frequently the drachmas were Imperial coins struck at Antioch. They passed for denarii in trade, but were at a discount in paying the Imperial tribute.

The Roman gold coin Aureus (120-126 gr. = 25 denarii) must have been familiar to the Jews, and perhaps is referred to in such passages as Mt 10 9.

There are various indeterminate references to silver (money) in the N T, which may be to denarii, drachmas, Phenician or Syrian shekels, or tetradrachms, of early or current issues (Mt 10 9, 28 12-15), etc. In Mk 6 8 and 12 41 the AV uses the word money in translating the Greek word referred to above chalcus, which was the name of a copper coin equal to 7 lepta, or about three-fourths of a cent. The same word is translated brass in Mt 10 9.

Summing up, the chief silver coins in circulation during N T times were the Roman denarius, Imperial drachmas, and tetradrachms of Antioch, together with shekels both early and contemporary of Tyre and Sidon. Probably a few Ptolemaic and Seleucid shekels survived.

The copper currency consisted mainly of the issues of the Roman procurators and the Herods. Small copper coins of the Maccabees were in demand for the Temple offerings, and a few Greek and Roman coppers from the outside may have found their way into circulation.

Gold receives little mention, but there may still have circulated with the Roman aureus some few of Alexander's staters and even Persian darics.

III. COMPARATIVE VALUES.

The value of moneys in the Bible is not easy to translate into their equivalents to-day, not merely because of the change in the relative value of the precious metals, but because of the differences in real purchasing power. Perhaps an illustration will give an instructive comparison. The agricultural day-laborer's wage in the N T is one penny (Mt 20 2-11), i.e., a denarius the equivalent of a French franc (at par), and this is the very same rate of pay demanded of and paid by excavators in Greece and Crete before the Great War.

MONEY CHANGER. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

MONSTER: The rendering of the Heb. tannîn, a word meaning literally 'the large fish of the sea' (sea-monsters, Gn 1 21, etc., 'whales' AV), and also used of serpents (Ex 7 9 f., etc.). The same term served to designate the mythological monster, or 'dragon' AV, that played such a part in the Babylonian creation myths (Ps 74 13; Is 51 9; cf. Jer 51 34, see COSMOGONY, § 4). As such, it was frequently used by the prophets, perhaps contemptuously, for Egypt (Is 27 1; Ezk 29 3, 32 2). See also SEA-MONSTER; and DRAGON. E. E. N.

MONTHS. See TIME, § 3.

MONUMENT: The rendering of (1) yādh, 'hand' (I S 15 12, 'place' AV), probably a sign for purposes of recognition of the place later on. In II S 18 is the same word signifies something more imposing, but the object is still that of recognition as it is in (2) tsiyyūn, 'sign' (II K 23 17, 'title' AV). (3) n'tsūrīm (apparently from nālsar, 'to guard' or 'keep') 'secret places' RV, 'vaults' RVmg. (Is 65 4, 'monument' AV). Here the word is a synonym of sepulcher or tomb. The passage, however, is obscure. Some form of the worship of the dead, or necromancy, may be referred to. In the general sense of a simple memorial the word does not appear in Biblical usage. A. C. Z.

MOON: The rendering of the Heb. yārēah (from a root meaning 'to wander' [?]), and lāhānāh ('white,' or 'pale'). The new moon was hōdhash ('new'), and the full moon keṣe ('covered,' [?]). To the early Semites, the ancestors of Israel, dwelling in the desert, the moon must have seemed of almost equal importance with the sun. Traveling was done largely by night. The moon's phases were great natural phenomena, by which time could be measured. The moon and the tides were seen to have some connection, a fact observed very early by the Arabs living near the coast and engaged in commerce. The moon thus came to hold a prominent place in all thought and speculation concerning the heavenly bodies, their influence upon the earth and in the affairs of men, and especially in the astral religion of the Semites, which was so highly developed in Babylonia. For illustration of the estimation of the moon see Gn 1 16 f.; Dt 4 10, 33 14; Job 31 26; Ps 81 3 RV, 104 10, 121 6, 136 9. See also ASTRONOMY, § 2; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 32. (Cf. Nielsen, Altarabische Mondreligion (1904). E. E. N.

MOON, NEW. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2.

MOON, SMITING BY THE. Perhaps the reference in Ps 121 6 is to the fear of injury from the moon which often leads Orientals to carry umbrellas as a protection against such injury, altho they do not seem to know what evil they thus seek to avert (so G. E. Post, in 1st ed. of this work.). E. E. N.

MORASHTITE, mo-ras'-thait (מֹרַשְׁתִּי, mōrashṭī, Morashtite AV): The designation of the prophet Micah (Mic 1 1), indicating that he belonged to Moresheth-gath (1 14).

MORDECAI, mōr'di-kai. See ESTHER, § 5 f.

MOREH, mō'rī (מֹרֶה, mōreh), 'soothsayer,' or 'director' (cf. tōrāh, 'direction'): 1. The 'Holy Tree' Oak, RV ('terebinth' ARVmg., 'plain' AV) or 'Holy Trees,' Oaks, RV, of Moreh (Gn 12 6; Dt 11 30). The place indicated seems to have been a sacred tree, or grove, in the plain E. of Shechem, whose priests gave oracular information and advice. It is probably the same as 'the augurs' oak' (Jg 9 37 ARVmg.), and possibly is also the 'oak' of Gn 35 4 and Jos 24 26. 2. The Hill of Moreh (Jg 7 1) is apparently Jebel eḏ-Dāhī ('Little Hermon'), on the opposite side of the Valley of Jezreel from Gilboa and the spring of Harod (cf. Jg 6 33 with 7 1).

MORESHETH-GATH, mōr'esh-eth-gath'' (מֹרֶשֶׁת גֹּת, mōresheth gath): The birthplace of the prophet Micah (Mic 1 14). It lay (according to Eusebius and Jerome) a little E. of Eleutheropolis (Map II, D 2). Not the same as Mareshah (ver. 15).

MORIAH, mo-rai'a (מֹרְיָה, mōriyyāh): The knoll or hillock on which, according to tradition, Abraham offered up Isaac in sacrifice. But the name is used simply as a general designation of the region (Gn 22 2). See also JERUSALEM, § 18.

MORNING. See TIME, § 1.

MORTAR, MORTER. (1) The rendering of two Heb. terms, hōmer and āphār, the former a common word for cement or clay, the latter usually meaning 'soil,' 'dust,' etc., but in Lv 14 42, 45 it means mud plaster. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 4.

(2) 'Mortar' also renders mōdhōkhāh (fr. dākh 'to pound') (Nu 11 8) and makhṭēsh (fr. kāthash, also 'to pound fine') (Pr 27 22), both terms meaning a house-utensil, a heavy bowl in which spices etc. are pulverized by a pestle (q. v.).

MORTGAGE. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

MOSERAH, mō'si-ra (מֹסֶרָה, mōsērāh): One of the stations of the wilderness journey, mentioned in the fragment of an itinerary found in Dt 10 6 f. as the place where Aaron died, probably the same as Moseroth in the itinerary of Nu (33 30 f.), and near Mt. Hor. The exact location is unknown. Cf. Driver, ICC on Dt in loc. E. E. N.

MOSEROTH, mō'si-rēth. See MOSERAH.

MOSES. 1. Name. The Heb. form of 'Moses' (מֹשֶׁה, mōsheh) is derived in Ex 2 10 apparently from the Heb. root māshāh, 'to draw out.' But from the earliest times, assuming its Egyptian origin, another etymology has been sought for it. Josephus (Ant. II, 9 6) makes it from mō, 'water' (Egyptian), and ushe, 'saved' (cf. also Philo, Vit. Moys. 1 4). This was commonly accepted, until Lepsius and Ebers suggested another, which, in spite of the objections raised by Cheyne (EB s.v.), is to be preferred. It identifies the name with the Egyptian mes, or messu, 'child,' or 'son' (Brugsch, Wörterb., p. 698, extractus [ex utero]), often found in Egyptian proper names in combination with some Divine appellation (Ahmes, Thotmes, Ra-messu, etc., i.e., divinely born; cf. Gr. Diogenes).

2. Historicity. The personality of Moses is thoroughly identified with the Exodus and the making of Israel as a nation. The understanding of the people's life is very much embarrassed by the denial of the historicity, either of his person or of the event of the Exodus. Both, however, are known to later ages through the documentary sources J E D P, which have been interwoven into one story, and this, for the practical purpose of securing an adequate idea of Moses, it is unnecessary to unravel (cf., in general, HEXATEUCH). Neither is it necessary, nor even possible, to separate the idealizing element infused into the account by a grateful and admiring people. On the one hand, it is quite possible to exaggerate this element by comparison with misleading analogs (Solon and Lyeurgus). On the other hand, one may fall into error by denying it altogether. For a just estimate of the character and work of the hero, it is necessary to take into account not only what he appears to be in the outward events of history, but also what he became in the beliefs of his people. This latter element in the picture offers a fairer test of his power than might a dry, annalistic enumeration of his traits and deeds.

3. Birth and Preservation. Moses was born near the capital city of Egypt (Memphis?) of Hebrew parents, Amram and Jochebed, just at the time when the oppression of the Hebrews by the Egyptians had reached its severest form. His father was a Levite and had two other children, Aaron and Miriam. According to the Law, which prescribed the death of every male Israelitic child, he was to be put to death as soon as born (Ex 1 22). But he was saved from this fate by a clever plan of his mother<sup>1</sup> in the carrying out of which he passed under the care of Pharaoh's daughter. According to some ancient writers (Artapanus, quoted by Eus. Præp. Ev. IX, 27, and Philo, Vit. Moys. 1 4), this princess, named Merris (but Jos. Ant. II, 9 5 says Thermuthis, Θερμοῦθις, and some rabbis, Bithiah [I Ch 4 18]), was married, but childless, and saw in the helpless Hebrew infant the fulfilment of her yearnings and prayers. Adoption was common in Egypt (cf. Brugsch, Gesch. Aeg., 884 f.).

4. Early Life and Education. The childhood<sup>2</sup> and youth of Moses were spent in the palace of the princess. He was instructed 'in all the wisdom of the Egyptians.' Manetho says (ap. Jos. Cont. Ap. I, 26 9, 28 12) Moses served as a priest of Osiris at Heliopolis under the name of Osarsif. Tradition represents him as a young man of exceptionally attractive appearance and manly strength. According to Philo (Vit. Moys. 1 5), the princess did not reveal to him his true relationship to her. But from Ex 2 11 it is clear that he was not ignorant of his Hebrew descent. In fact, his sympathy for the sufferings of his brethren, breaking out in an impetuous deed of bloodshed, compelled his flight from the land. According to later Alexandrian Jewish writers, known to and used by Josephus, he early showed signs of military genius. Taking command of the Egyptian army, he repulsed the Ethiopians from the very gates of Memphis, drove them back to their own capital Suba (later Meröe), and captured that city by the aid of the princess Sharbin, who fell in love with him, and accompanied him back to Egypt (Ant. II, 10).

5. Moses in Midian. Revelation of Yahweh. The next period of his life was passed in Midian. This period, like the preceding, is said to have covered forty years [P]. In the land of Midian Moses found refuge with Jethro (also called 'Reuel, the priest,' Ex 2 18). Entering into the house of this leader through a marriage with his daughter Zipporah, he was given the superintendence of his flocks. In the course of his duties in connection with Jethro's flocks, Moses received the Divine commission to become the ruler and deliverer of his oppressed brethren. The message came to him through the experience of the burning bush (q.v.) at Mount Sinai. At the same time, he received a revelation of God as Jehovah (Yahweh), the God of the Covenant

<sup>1</sup> Jos. Ant. II, 9 3 gives the story that Jochebed was moved to this by a supernatural revelation of the future mission of the child.

<sup>2</sup> The analogous tales of wonderful preservation of persons destined to become great (Semiramis [Diod., 2: 4], Perseus [Apollod., II, 4:1], Cryus [Herod., 1:113], Romulus [Livy, 1:4]) do not affect the credibility of this account. The only case that could have served as a model is that of Sargon I (cf. Maspero, Gesch. d. Morgenl. Völker, p. 194).

(Pledge), which was to transcend the former knowledge of God as the God of power (El Shaddai). The name is certainly more ancient than the date of Moses, as it constituted a component part of his mother's name. And underlying its specific sense, which associates it with the Covenant, it includes the fundamental notion of self-existence and self-consistency, thus leading up to the higher idea of a God who keeps faith with His people. There are traces of the recognition of J' by the Kenites and other tribes in the Sinaitic peninsula (cf. Budde, Rel. of. Isr. to the Exile, 1898, pp. 1-38). But at the burning bush the expansion and transformation of this knowledge constituted a new era in the history of the name (see ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, §§ 3-8).

6. The Commission of Moses. The commission of Moses was one calculated to stagger the bravest man. Neither did he fail to realize its difficulty. He shrank from it, feeling his weakness, especially in the art of persuasive speech. To overcome this difficulty he was directed to take his brother Aaron into his confidence and use him as his spokesman (prophet). His task at once resolved itself into the two stages, first of leading the people to accept him as leader, and then inducing Pharaoh to let them go out of Egypt (Ex ch. 4). As far as the people were concerned, their hardships led them to give ear, tho cautiously and slowly, to his declaration that the hour for deliverance was come. It was otherwise with the king who ruled over them. Naturally he would not permit a race of hard workers to slip out of the land, where monuments of astounding magnitude and difficulty had been erected in the past by the use of the accumulated muscular force of many human beings.

7. The Plagues. The efforts of the deliverer were now directed to the work of producing on the Egyptian king the impression that the will of the God of the Hebrews could not be withstood. This task was not easily accomplished. It required ten manifestations of the Divine power called 'plagues' (Ex 7 20-12 36; see PLAGUES), in all of which there appeared a common attack upon the gods of the Egyptians and a common design to show the great power of J' as against the impotence of the native deities. These plagues also proved effective in inspiring courage and fortitude among the Hebrews themselves, stemming the often rising tide of disaffection among them and preventing them from falling back into a condition of hopelessness when their request for freedom was denied by Pharaoh (Ex 5 20 f.). The repeated shocks thus inflicted on the king had their effect. By the tenth plague he found himself overawed and defeated, and gave the Hebrews over into the hands of Moses, who forthwith led them through a way least to be expected, toward the wilderness of Midian.

8. Organization in the Wilderness. But if the task of getting Israel from under the yoke was a difficult one, that which confronted Moses on the Asiatic side of the Red Sea was much harder. To marshal the clans into some sort of community of action required the gifts of a general and legislator. How Moses proved himself equal to the occasion is told in the fourfold story of the Pentateuch. His first experience was in a conflict with Amalek (Ex 17 8-16). Next came the covenant at Sinai (Ex 19 2-24 16), with the Decalog as its special ethical center. How necessary Moses' personal presence among the people had become is made clear by the incident of the golden calf (see CALF, GOLDEN), showing that even Aaron was not fully dominated by the new light on the religion of J" (Ex chs. 32-34). Just before the Israelite tribes left Sinai, Jethro joined them, and, acting upon his suggestion, Moses established a form of government for the people. It was simple enough, and there is no reason to think that it was unsuited to the circumstances. But with all its simplicity it must have been more or less of an ideal not easy to enforce (Ex ch. 18; Nu chs. 11, 16, 17).

9. Training of Israel. From Sinai Moses led Israel to the borders of the promised land. The only incident recorded of this portion of his life is the affair of Miriam and Aaron, who claimed the same prophetic gifts and, therefore, equal authority with him. Their claim was the germ of anarchy. Division of authority at this time would inevitably have led to disorganization. Hence the severe penalty inflicted on Miriam, which, however, Moses removed by his magnanimous intercession (Nu 12 13). On the eve of the attack on Canaan, Moses sent a deputation to inspect the land and the people. The report brought back by the majority was discouraging (see SPIES). Discontent arose, so that the people were not ready for the task of entering and possessing the land. It became evident that a new generation must be raised and trained in the wilderness, and thus hardened and prepared for the work. The story of the years following is simple. It is summed up in the picture of a great leader confronted by a people unaccustomed to the freedom of self-government, and fretting at the hardships they were called on to endure. The incident of Dathan and Abiram (see DATHAN), the Reubenites, who together with Korah the Levite rebelled against Moses, is perhaps one of several such uprisings. As against these, it is clear that Moses must have in every case vindicated and strengthened his authority.

10. Death of Moses. As the discipline of the wilderness was coming to its close, the end of the mission of Moses came with it. Moses made an effort to reach the promised land through Edom, but as this proved futile, because of the refusal of the king to let them pass through his land, Moses led Israel to the east side, reaching the frontiers of Moab. Here the men of the tribes of Gad and Reuben and a large number of Manasseh asked leave to stay (Nu ch. 32), and were given this permission, on condition, however, that they should first assist their brethren of the other tribes in conquering the country beyond the Jordan. The final scene in the great leader's life came when he received the summons to go up into Mount Nebo (in Abarim, q.v.; see also NEBO), and there, after viewing the land of promise in its entire length and breadth, he died satisfied upon the heights of Pisgah. He was buried 'in the valley, in the land of Moab over against Bethpeor, but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day' (Dt 34 5 f.).

11. Character and Greatness. Naturally tradition seized upon this element of mystery and wove supernatural legends out of it (cf. Assumption of Mos.; Jude ver. 9). It was natural, too, that, standing as he does at the very beginning of the united life of Israel, and furnishing for that life fundamental principles, he should be made the center and, later, the author of a great number of literary productions. How much or how little he wrote is not known. Ps 90 (a 'Prayer of Moses') and the contents of the Pentateuch have been ascribed to his pen. It is a tribute to his greatness that this should have been done. But his distinctive characteristic, shining above all intellectual qualities, was his realization that only through obedience to spiritual and moral laws, the laws of the only true God, Yahweh, could the new people accomplish a national task and achieve a world-destiny. He was the first of the great prophets. 'He brought J" to Israel and Israel to J".' See also ISRAEL, RELIGION OF, §§ 3-8.

MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF: 1. Apocalyptic Writing in Moses' Name. An apocryphal book, based upon the account of the death of Moses (Dt 34 5 f.). Here it is said that Jehovah 'buried him, . . . but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day.' Evidently upon the ground of this statement, legendary representations arose of the great leader's passing into heaven in an exceptional manner. Early Christian writers allude to at least four books that might have contained elaborations of this legend. These are The Apocalypse of Moses, The Assumption of Moses, The Ascension of Moses (Orig. de Princ. 3, 2, 1), and the Testament of Moses (Stichom. Niceph.). But these may be only different names of one or two books.

2. Rediscovery of the Assumption. In any case, it is probable that there were at least two works bearing on the subject, which have been fused into the one now extant, under the single title, Assumption of Moses. This pseudepigraph was brought to light in modern times, first in Latin, in 1861 by Ceriani (Monum. Sac. et Profan., fasc. I, pp. 55-64), and has since been edited, with an introduction and notes and with an English translation, by Professor Charles (1897).

3. Contents. The work begins with an exhortation by Moses, addressed to Joshua to preserve his writings (ch. 1). This is followed by the prediction that Israel would forsake J" and be divided into two nations (ch. 2), but should awake to the enormity of her crime and repent (ch. 3); the two tribes should be restored, and the ten preserved among the Gentiles (ch. 4); they should repeatedly fall away (ch. 5), should be oppressed by Herod (ch. 6), and fall under the dominion of wicked leaders (ch. 7); the Romans should subjugate them (ch. 8), but a great Levite, Taxo<sup>1</sup>, should appear to restore a better condition of things among them (ch. 9). For this deliverance a song of hope is inserted at this point (ch. 10). Joshua, to whom this revelation is made by Moses, laments and refuses to be comforted (ch. 11), but is exhorted by Moses to take up his work of conquering and destroying the Gentiles (ch. 12). At this point the book comes to an abrupt end.

4. Identification. In the ancient patristic allusions to the Assumption of Moses, the words of Jude ver. 9 are said to be quoted from this book; but, as they do not appear in the extant text, it must be inferred either that there was a confusion of names or that the part of the book from which the quotation was made has been lost (Schürer), or that our work is a Testament of Moses, with portions of the original Assumption incorporated into it (Charles).

5. Original Language. The Latin text is a translation from a Greek original, and this again is believed by many to have been rendered from a Hebrew or Aramaic original (cf. Hilgenfeld's attempted restoration into Greek in Messias Judæorum, 1889, pp. 435-468). Cf. Charles, Apoc. and Pseudepigr. of the O T (1913). A. C. Z.

MOST HIGH. The rendering of the Heb. 'elyōn which was frequently used of God, sometimes with 'ēl, 'God,' prefixed (as in Gn 14 18, etc.), but more often without. It may well be that it was taken over by Israel from Canaanite usage (cf. Skinner on Gn 14 18 in ICC). See God, § 1.

MOTE (μάκρος): As used in Mt 7 3 f., Lk 6 41 f., the Gr. means a 'dried twig,' or 'splinter,' in contrast with 'beam.' The original meaning of the English word 'mote' is similar (cf. G. B. King in Harv. Th. Rev., Oct. 1924). J. M. T.

MOTH. See PALESTINE, § 26.

MOTHER. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 5.

MOUND (sōlāh, what is 'raised up'): A heap of earth, timber, etc. (Jer 6 6, 32 24, 33 4; Ezk 4 2, etc., 'mount' AV), designed to facilitate a siege. See also BESIEGE.

MOUNT, MOUNTAIN (רָם, har, ὄρος), 'mount' or 'mountain range,' 'mountainous region,' as distinguished from the lowland: The RV has, more uniformly than AV, 'hill-country,' for 'mountainous region,' and uses 'mountain' more correctly than AV, which often has 'hill' for an isolated high elevation. The more correct use of 'mount' is for specific mountains, as Sinai (Ex 19 11, 18; Nu 3 1, etc.), Hor (Nu 20 22, etc.), Hermon (Dt 3 8; Jos 11 17, etc.), Carmel (1 K 18 19, etc.), Zion (Is 4 5, 10 12, etc.), and others. 'Mountain,' in sing. and pl., is used for high elevations in general. In Ps 68 15 f. [16 f.], 'mountain of Bashan' is the mountain range of the Jebel Hauran; with this meaning it is more often translated 'hill-country.' 'Mountain' is often used in parallelisms with 'hill,' and in contrast with 'valley.' See HILL, HILL-COUNTRY. Various references to mountain are of interest. 'Mountain (AV hill) of God' (Ps 68 15 [16]) means a majestic mountain; cf. the simile in Ps 36 6 [7]. 'M. of God' in Ex 4 27, 18 5, etc., refers to Horeb (Sinai). 'Mount of congregation' (Is 14 13) is the dwelling-place of the gods in the far North. The mountains first appeared at creation (Ps 104 6 f.), are one of God's chief works (Ps 65 6 [7], 90 2), Am 4 13, they feel God's displeasure (Is 42 15; Ps 104 32; Jg 5 5; Mic 1 4; Is 5 25, etc.); are called to witness God's dealings with His people (Mic 6 2; Ezk 36 1, etc.). They leap in praise of J' (Ps 114 4, 6). Mountains are hiding-places (Jg 6 2; Ps 11 1), abodes of animals (1 Ch 12 8; Song 4 8); in them sheep go astray (Nah 3 18; 1 K 22 17; Jer 50 6); good places for grazing (Ps 50 10; Job 39 8). Among the many figurative uses are Israel's overcoming its foes (Is 41 15); overwhelming calamities (Jer 13 16); stability, though not as unchanging as God's love (Is 54 10). In Dn 2 35, 45 the Aramaic ܐܪܡܐ, ār, 'mountain,' is used. In Is 29 3 mulstēāh is 'siege-works' as in RV, and in Jer 6 6, 32 24, 33 4; Ezk 4 2, 17 17, 21 22, 26 8; Dn 11 15 sōlāh is a 'mount' or 'mound' (as in ARV) thrown up in besieging a city.

MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS:

1. The Mourning Garment. Upon news of the death of a relative or an important personage, people rent their garments (II S 1 11) and put on the mourning garment of sackcloth, saq (II S 3 31, 21 10). As to what this garment was opinions differ. Some (Kamphausen and others) think it was very much like a corn-sack, open at both ends; others think that it was originally nothing more than a loin-cloth, which in prehistoric times was the customary and, in fact, the only article of clothing worn by Israel's ancestors. Consequently, in later times it was worn only as a religious duty, i.e., on extraordinary occasions, in mourning festivals, processions, etc. Even the late book The Ascension of Isaiah (2 10) speaks of the loin-cloth as a mourning-garment. Since old modes of dress, as they pass out of use, easily take upon themselves, from their very antiquity, a holy character, it is not surprising that the prophets chose the saq as a piece of clothing. It is also probable that as time passed and civilization developed, the dimensions of the saq were enlarged (cf. Schwally, ZATW, XI, 174 f.).

2. Dust or Ashes on the Head. As a sign of grief it was the custom to sprinkle ashes on the head, as the Arabs do to-day (II S 1 2; cf. Mic 1 10). It is probable that originally the ashes were those of the articles burned with the body (II Ch 16 14, 21 10), or dust from the grave (see W. R. Smith, Relig. of the Semites, p. 413 f.).

3. Cuttings in the Flesh. In Jer 16 6, Dt 14 1 f., Lv 19 27 f. the practise of making cuttings in the flesh is presupposed as common. The prohibition of this custom was not due to the feeling that it involved a disfigurement of the body created by God, but to the conviction that it was a cultus-usage irreconcilable with the religion of J' (cf. 1 K 18 28). Evidently, the purpose was by means of blood to propitiate the spirits of the dead, and to persuade them to enter into fellowship, to a certain degree, with the living.

4. Shaving the Head or Beard. In like manner, the prohibition of the kindred custom of shaving the head or beard (Lv 19 27; Dt 14 1 f.) dealt with an old cultus-usage dating from a time when the worship of the dead was common in Israel. It was, in reality, an offering of hair brought to the dead—a practise in vogue also among the Egyptians, Arabs, Greeks, and other peoples. Wellhausen suggests that probably the original meaning of the custom was that thereby the offerer confessed himself to be dedicated to the deity. The covering of the head in times of grief (cf. II S 15 30; Jer 14 3; Est 6 12) Schwally compares with Elijah's reverent covering of his head when God appeared to him (I K 19 13). The custom would thus be due to a feeling of awe and reverence in the presence of the dead, as was probably the custom of removing the sandals (cf. Ex 3 5 with Is 20 2 f.; II S 15 30). Whether the covering of the beard (Ezk 24 17; Jer 14 3; II S 15 30) is to be understood as due to a weakening of the earlier custom of cutting off the beard (so Benzinger) seems doubtful. In view of the fact that spirits of the dead were also feared as powers that could work injury to man, it is not improbable that a number of the above-mentioned customs, including that of covering the beard, were due to an effort to render oneself inoffensive and thus protect oneself against harm.

5. Lamentations. Such mourning customs were usually accompanied by loud cries of sorrow. The relatives cried 'Ho! Ho!' and with loud lamentations preceded the body to the grave, often accompanied by professional female (at times male) mourners (Jer 9 16 f.; Am 5 16), musicians or minstrels (Mt 9 23, 'flute-players' RV), who chanted the mourning-song (qînāh), or played mourning-tunes which had a peculiar rhythm and were always sung in a monotonous strain. The same custom is observed to-day in the neighborhood of Damascus, in the Hauran, and elsewhere. There is direct reference to the lament over the dead in Zec 12 10 f., which can not be understood as meaning simple natural outbreak of sorrow, but must refer to the established cultus-usages of which each family had its peculiar forms.

6. The Meal for the Dead and Offerings to the Dead. The period of fasting was closed (or, in case it extended over several days, interrupted) by a feast for the dead (Hos 9 4; II S 3 35; Jer 16 7 f.; Ezk 24 17, 22). Besides such a feast, there were also offerings to the dead. In fact, the feast probably was an outgrowth of the custom of presenting offerings to the dead. The requirement in Dt 26 14, that when one brings his tithes he shall affirm that he has not 'given thereof for the dead,' can have reference only to offerings to, or meals in honor of, the dead. The latter had also a cultus significance, inasmuch as such food was considered unclean (Hos 9 4). Survivals of such a practise are met with in much later times. Tobias (To 4 17) is enjoined to lay food only on the tombs of the just, and not to give any such honor to sinners, while the son of Sirach ridicules this custom when he asks: 'What profit is an offering to a shade? Good things poured out upon a mouth that is closed are the offerings of meat laid upon a grave' (Sir 30 18 f.). The burning of spices, of which we find mention in late references (Jer 34 5; II Ch 16 14, 21 19) should also be viewed as a form of offering to the dead. It is, of course, to be understood that no claim is made that in later times there was any clear knowledge of the original nature of these mourning customs. As with many other customs, even more so with these, the practise survived long after the root from which it sprang had withered away. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS; L. B. Paton, Spiritism and the Cult of the Dead in Antiquity (1921), ch. x.

MOUSE, MICE. See PALESTINE, § 24.

MOUTH: This term translates the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) gārōn, 'throat' (Ps 149 6, 'throat' RV). (2) hēkh, 'palate' (Job 12 11, 20 13, 'palate' RV; Pr 5 3). (3) ādhi, 'ornament' (Ps 32 9, 'trap-pings' RV; 103 5, 'desire' RV). (4) peh, 'mouth' (Gn 4 11; Ex 4 11; Job 3 1). (5) pām, Aram. 'mouth' (Dn 4 31, etc.). (6) pānīm, 'face' (Pr 15 14) (7) trā, 'gate' (Dn 3 26, 'door' RVmg.). (8) λόγος, 'word' (Ac 15 27, 'word of mouth' RV). (9) στόμα, 'mouth' (Mt 4 4; Lk 1 64). Most of these terms have besides their literal usage, also a figurative one in which 'mouth' is often equivalent to 'words,' 'speech,' 'judgment,' 'wisdom,' and, in general, the character of a person as put into articulate expression. A. C. Z.

MOVING THINGS: The rendering of sherets (Gn 1 20) and remes (Gn 9 3 AV). In Gn 1 20, however, this phrase is changed in RV to 'living creatures.' The difference between the two Heb. synonyms is that the first (sherets) conveys the idea of swarming and the second (remes) that of gliding or creeping. A. C. Z.

MOW, MOWER, MOWING. See, in general, under Reaping, AGRICULTURE, § 6. In Am 7 1 'king's mowings' has reference to a special cutting and gathering of grass for the king's cattle. E. E. N.

MOZA, mō'zā (מֹצָא, mōtsā'): 1. A son of Caleb by his concubine Ephah (I Ch 2 46). 2. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 36 f., 9 42 f.). C. S. T.

MOZAH, mō'zā (מֹצָה, mōtsāh): A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 26). Map II, E 1. (Site uncertain.)

MUFFLERS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8.

MULBERRY-TREE. See PALESTINE, §§ 21 and 23.

MULE (מִלָּה, peredh; fem. מִלָּהּ, pirdah, properly, the term mule means the offspring of a he-ass and a mare, but the Heb. term probably includes that of the stallion and she-ass): An animal much used in the East, both in ancient and modern times. Mules, known in Egypt and Assyria long before, were introduced into Israel by David, whose riding animal was a mule (I K 1 33; cf. II S 13 29, 18 9). From David's time on they seem to have been quite common, and their importation was an important item in the commerce of the day (I K 10 25; cf. Ezk 27 14). They were used for riding and also as pack-beasts of burden (cf. II K 5 17). On Gn 36 24 and Est 8 10, 14, cf. RV. E. E. N.

MUNITION: The term renders the Heb. mētsādh, mētsōdhāh (Is 33 16), elsewhere (Is 29 7) rendered in RV 'stronghold,' and mētsūrāh in AV, but RV 'bulwark' (Nah 2 1). A. C. Z.

MUPPIM, mōp'pim (מִפִּי, muppim): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Benjamin, and the clan itself (Gn 46 21; called Shephupham[n], in Nu 26 39, Shupham AV and I Ch 8 5, and Shup-pim in I Ch 7 12, etc.).

MURDER. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2.

MURMUR, MURMURING: With one or two exceptions all the instances in which these terms occur in the Bible have reference either to the frequent complainings of the Israelites against Moses in the Wilderness (Ex 15 24, 16 8, 17 3; Nu 14 2, etc.) or to the fault-finding of the Jewish religious leaders with Jesus (Lk 5 30; Jn 6 41, etc.). In no case is there anything technical or peculiar in the expressions used.

E. E. N.

MURRAIN. The Heb. debher, only once (Ex 9 3) rendered 'murrain' is the usual term for 'pestilence.' Also only here and Ps 78 50 is it used of the cattle plague. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (2); and PLAGUES.

MUSHI, miū'shai (מִשִּׁי, mūshī: The ancestral head of one of the subdivisions of the Merarite Levites, the Mushites (Ex 6 19; Nu 3 20, 26 58; I Ch 6 19, etc.).

MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS: 1. Hebrew Music in General. Music in some form is almost universal among all peoples, from the savage or primitive grade upward, its primary application being as a social diversion, but usually with extensions in connection with magic and religious ceremony, often with the aid of instruments of much ingenuity. It is, therefore, natural that musical customs and implements should have been well known to the ancient Hebrews. Yet, altho the O T refers often to singing and dancing, and names nearly twenty instruments, the whole subject remains obscure, since pictorial delineations are lacking, as well as helpful allusions to practical methods. Conjecture as to the facts must constantly take refuge in the use of analogies from adjacent countries (Egypt, Babylonia, and Assyria), or from usages now found among the Arabs.

2. Summary of Principal References. Without attempting an exhaustive summary of the references, four classes of the applications of music may at once be distinguished. (a) Singing, dancing and playing on instruments are frequent features of social jubilation, as in connection with the stories of Jacob (Gn 31 27), Miriam (Ex 15), Israel at Sinai (Ex 32 6, 18), Jephthah (Jg 11 34), David (I S 18 6-7), among the profane and riotous (Job 21 12; Ec 2 8, 7 5; Is 5 12; Am 5 23, 6 5), in general (Jer 31 4; Ezk 33 32), in contrast with times of despair (Is 24 8; Job 30 31; Ps 23 5, 42 5-7), and at Babylon (Is 24 11) and Tyre (Is 23 16; Ezk 26 13, 28 13). The instruments mentioned are the drum, two kinds of pipe and two with strings. In one case drums and stringed instruments are named, apparently for war use (Is 30 32). In the list of the Cainites, Jubal is set down as the progenitor of instrumentalists (Gn 4 21). Social music, then, was evidently common and customary. (b) Music as a help to prophetic ecstasy is but lightly touched, but in a way that implies familiarity (II K 3 15; Ps 49 4). Akin to this was the use of music to relieve Saul's depression (I S 16 16-23). (c) Music in a distinctly religious use appears with the story of David's transfer of the Ark to Jerusalem (II S 6 5, 15). In the early histories Temple usages are implied in I K 10 12, as in passages in the prophets (Am 8 3, 10; Is 30 29; Ezk 40 44). The later histories magnify the matter, tracing the founding of the system to David, mentioning instances of use under Solomon, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoiada, Hezekiah, Josiah and after the Return, giving lists of singers, etc. (I Ch 6 31-47, 9 33, 13 8, 15 16-20, 16 4-6, 41-42, 25 1-31; II Ch 5 12-14, 7 6, 9 11, 15 14, 20 21-22, 28, 23 13, 29 25-28, 30 21, 34 12, 35 15; Ezr 2 41, 65, 70, 3 10-11, 7 7, 24, 10 24; Neh 7 1, 44, 67, 73, 10 28, 39, 11 22-23, 12 27-43, 46-47, 13 5, 10; with a note on a Temple procession in Ps 68 24-25). The distribution of the references leaves some question as to the amount of music in the First Temple, but they clearly imply its prominence in the Second, after the Exile had given knowledge of Babylonian customs. To these are to be added the many passages where instruments are mentioned in the Pss (33 2-3, 43 4, 47 5, 57 8, 71 22, 81 2-3, 92 3, 98 5-6, 108 2, 137 2-4, 144 9, 147 7, 149 3, 150 3-5), besides frequent allusions to the custom of song. The instruments oftener named are drums, cymbals, two kinds of trumpets and at least two varieties of stringed instruments. (d) The use of trumpets for signaling, usually in war, but also in civil and religious observances, is frequently indicated, both as a fact (in the stories of Saul, Absalom, Solomon, etc.), as a ceremonial rule (as in Lv 25), and as a figure for prophetic utterance (as in Am, Hos, Jer, Ezk, etc.). A very peculiar reference is incorporated into the story of Nebuchadnezzar's image (Dn 3 5, 7, 10, 15), on which see under (5) in the following section.

3. Instruments. The instruments designated belong to certain groups that are everywhere found—those struck or shaken (percussive or pulsatile), those blown with the breath (flatile) and those with strings that are twanged by the fingers or by means of a plectrum. The Hebrews are not known to have had any stringed instrument sounded by means of the friction of a bow (altho the AV and the RV employ the term 'viol' four and three times respectively). The subject has been greatly confused by the terms used by successive versions, the editors and translators either misinterpreting the Hebrew or else using musical terms without care.

(1) The percussives or pulsatiles number four or five. The tabret or timbrel, tōph, was probably a small, bowl-shaped drum or possibly some sort of tambourine. Most of the 17 references are connected with merry-making (as Gn 31 27; Jg 11 34; Is 6 12; Jer 31 4) and the most religious, in the hands of prophets (I S 10 6) or of worshipers (as Ps 68 25, 150 4). It rarely occurs with the cymbals or trumpets, but is common with other instruments, doubtless as marking the rhythm. The cymbals, tselts'īm, m'tsillayim, were either hollowed metal cups held in the hands or little plates fastened to the fingers (castanets). The 10 or more references are all in religious use and all but one (II S 6 5) in late books (as I Ch 16 5; Neh 12 27; Ps 150—in the last with intimation of noisy effect). In I Ch 15 19 they are said to be of brass. These, too, were time-and rhythm-markers. A pulsatile instrument, m'nā'an'īm (AV, cornet, RV, castanets), appearing only in the story of the upbringing of the Ark (II S 6 5), was probably the Egyptian sistrum (a loop-shaped metal frame with loose, jingling rods run through it). Bells, or jingles, ṣillōth, in the trappings of horses, are once named (Zec 14 20).

(2) The flutes include representatives of both the flute (or oboe) and the trumpet classes. The pipe, hālil (and perhaps the instrument [?] designated by the pl. term ṣillōth, Ps 5, superscription), was either a direct flute (flageolet) or possibly an oboe, doubtless made of cane or wood. Of 5 references, one shows use by the prophet-gild (I S 10 5) and the rest are social (as Is 5 12). Another pipe, ʿugābh (organ AV), is supposed to be some form of Pan's-pipe or syrinx (a graduated set of tubes of cane). It appears always with the kinnōr (see below). Except for one case that may be generic for wind-instruments (under Jubal, Gn 4 21), the references are poetic (Job 21 12, 30 31; Ps 150 4). A third pipe, neqebh (Ezk 28 13), is doubtful, the term perhaps meaning some form of jewelry. The ram's-horn, qeren, is but rarely mentioned (Jos 6 5; I Ch 25 5; Dn 3), but was probably common as a rude implement for signals and noisy demonstrations. The curved trumpet, shōphār, was probably derived from the qeren, tho often made of wood. The nearly 40 references all concern the giving of signals, except a few in religious connections (II S 6 15; I Ch 15 23; II Ch 15 14; Ps 47 5, 81 3, 98 6, 150 3). The straight trumpet, hātsōts'rāh, is more likely to have been of metal. This is clearly named over 15 times, mostly of signaling, but in later times almost wholly in the Temple ritual (as I Ch 16 6, 42; II Ch 29 26-28; Ezr 3 10, etc.). Apparently it became the characteristic instrument of the priests.

(3) The stringed instruments are decidedly prominent, but their exact form is uncertain. The commonest is the kinnōr (harp, AV and RV), which is usually supposed to have been a lyre rather than a harp and therefore analogous to the Arab kissar. The over 35 references imply its constant employment for both secular and sacred purposes. It is usually associated with the nebel, but also with one of the trumpets, with the cymbals and the drum. The nebel (psaltery, AV and RV), was probably not a psaltery (a variety of zither), but either a triangular harp, perhaps resembling the Greek trigon (as Jerome believed) or, still better, some form of lute and analogous to the common Egyptian nefer. In about 25 references it is usually associated with the kinnōr, which perhaps implies that they were complementary rather than related (like lyre and lute). Monumental evidence (in Egypt) indicates that the Hebrews used the lyre, but whether this was called kinnōr or nebel is not clear.

(4) Collective terms for instruments also occur, especially 'implements of song' or some similar phrase (Am 6 5; Neh 12 36; I Ch 15 16, 16 42, 23 5; II Ch 5 13, 7 6, 23 13, 29 26, 27, 30 21, 34 12). Stringed instruments are supposed to be meant by ṣḥānāh (Is 38 20; Job 30 9; La 3 14, 5 14; Ps 69 12, 77 6, and in the plural form ṣḥānōth, in the captions of Ps 4, 6, 54, 55, 61, 67 and 76, with the colophon to Hab 3), and by minnām (Ps 45 8, 150 4); and similarly pipes by ṣillōth (caption of Ps 5). In three cases (Ps 33 2, 144 9, 92 3) the word āsōr, 'ten,' occurs, in the first two with nebel. This has been rendered 'of ten strings,' which, if correct, militates against making the nebel a lute. In three cases (I Ch 15 21 and the captions to Ps 6 and 12) the word shemīnāth, 'eighth,' occurs, in the first with kinnōr. This has often been said to mean singing or playing in 'octaves' or 'eighths,' which is far-fetched in the extreme (since it involves the notion of an 8-tone scale); it is much more likely to refer to the number of strings. In I Ch 15 20 and the captions of Ps 46 and 49 (in the last by a shift of text from the end of 48) the word ālāmōth, 'maidens,' appears, in the first with nebel. This perhaps refers to some soprano effect. The word gittith (captions of Ps 8, 81, and 84) may signify some sort of instrument. The elucidation of all these terms, as of others below, is at best very uncertain, as the text may be corrupt or the reference be to facts or usages now unknown.

(5) The terms used in the story of Nebuchadrezzar's image (Dn 3 5, 7, 10, 15) are so peculiar as to require special comment. The first, qarnā, is the emphatic form of qeren, horn; the second, mashrō-qithā, is probably some kind of pipe or flute; the third, qithrōš or qithārōš, is plainly the Greek κitharis, lyre; the fourth, sabbekkhā, is the Greek σαμβυκή, a triangular harp (probably of Oriental origin); the fifth, p'santērīn, is perhaps the Greek ψαλτήριον, another harp, or, better, the Persian santir, a dulcimer; and the sixth, sūmpōn'yāh, is evidently the Greek συνφωνία, probably a form of bagpipes. The rendering in both of the EVV, 'cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer,' needs rectification, especially in the last three terms, since 'sackbut' (an old English form of trombone) is strikingly inapt, and 'dulcimer' is either misplaced or wholly wrong. The occurrence of loan-words from the Greek in this passage is naturally regarded as indicating the late date of the whole book. The term maḥālath, in the superscription of Ps 53 and 88, is of unknown derivation and meaning.

4. Musicians as a Class. It is likely that among the Hebrews, as among other peoples of antiquity, musicians as a class were somewhat definitely recognized. 'Singing men and singing women' are named as helpers at festivities (II S 19 35; cf. Ec 2 8) and perhaps as professional mourners (Ec 12 5; Mt 9 23). In later periods, if not earlier, the Temple had a notable body of singers and players, both men and women, set apart from among the Levitical class. The Chronicler makes frequent reference to these, but they are also mentioned by other writers (as II K 12 13; Am 8 3, 10; Ezk 40 44), especially at the close of the Exile (as Ezr 2; Neh 7, 12, etc.). Their institution is attributed to David, under the advice of Gad and Nathan (II Ch 29 25, etc.), and they are said to have been divided into Kohathites, Asaphites and Merarites (I Ch 6 31-48). In another place the supervisor is stated to have been Chenaniah and the leaders Asaph, Heman, and Ethan, or Jeduthun (I Ch 15 16-24). In the Temple their station was east of the brazen altar (II Ch 5 12); they also served on occasion with the army (II Ch 20 21-22, 28). At the Return the number of the Asaphites is given as 128 or 148 (Ezr 2 41; Neh 7 44) and the total as 200 or 245 (Ezr 2 65; Neh 7 67), with Jezrahiah as supervisor in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 42). Provision was then made for their free maintenance, as for the priests and other Levites (Ezr 7 24; Neh 11 23, 12 47, 13 5, 10-13). All this detail certainly has value as indicating their importance in the postexilic time.

5. Actual Effects. As to the actual styles and forms of music used, we have little but inference and conjecture to guide us. We suppose that vocal effects were emphasized, instruments being used only for accompaniment and contrast. Analogy suggests that song was almost wholly in unison, tending to be loud and harsh, sometimes strongly rhythmic, but often cast in the form of free recitative or cantillation, the melodic outline being based on modes or scales unlike those of our modern European music and embellished with manifold tonal decorations, as in Oriental singing generally. The structural parallelism of Hebrew poetry seems to imply more or less use of antiphony or responsion in musical declamation. It is a mooted question whether or not the traditional cantillation of modern synagogues sheds any light upon ancient usages. It is unlikely that it does, since this synagog music seems to have been progressively influenced by its local surroundings; in any case, there is insuperable difficulty in identifying what little may remain in it of ancient material. The vociferous praise that was apparently characteristic of Hebrew worship after the Exile is to be emphasized not so much for what it may have been artistically as for the general example that it established for the application of musical art in Christian public worship.

6. Musical Titles and Directions. In the Psalter occur several expressions (besides those already cited) whose meaning is obscure, but which are supposed to be musical or at least liturgical. In the captions of about fifteen poems are apparently the titles or first words of well-known melodies to which the poems were to be sung. These include 'al-tashhēth, 'Destroy not,' in Pss 57, 58, 59, 75; shūshan-ēdhūth, 'Lily of the Testimony,' in Ps 60; shōshannīm-ēdhūth, 'Lilies of the Testimony,' in Ps 80, simply shōshannīm, 'Lilies,' in Pss 45, 69; 'ayyeleth hashshahar, 'Hind of the dawn,' in Ps 22; yōnath 'ēlem r'hōqīm, 'Dove of the distant terebinths,' or 'Silent dove of those afar off,' in Ps 56, and mūth labbēn, perhaps 'Death of —?' in Ps 9 (which may be a corruption in the text). The attempt to connect these expressions with any particular melodies is quite futile. Indeed, they may not refer to such melodies at all, especially as it is hard to see what precise similarity of form connects the poems to which the same title is assigned.<sup>1</sup>

7. Early Christian Music. The N T references to music are few and mostly unimportant. Jesus and the Disciples sang post or all of the Hallel (Pss 113-

118) at the Last Supper (Mt 26 30; Mk 14 26). Among the early Christian fraternities singing had place as a method of social worship (Ac 16 25; I Co 14 15, 26; Eph 5 19; Col 3 16; Ja 5 13). In the Apocalypse and elsewhere musical symbols are used in describing the coming of the Last Day as well as the praises of heaven. The instruments named are the cymbal, κύμβαλον (I Co 13 1); the pipe or flute, αὐλός (Mt 9 23, 11 17; Lk 7 32; I Co 14 7; Rev 18 22); the trumpet, σάλπιγξ (Mt 6 2; I Co 14 8; He 12 19; Rev 1 10, 4 1, 18 22, and, as the signal for the Last Day, Mt 24 31; I Th 4 16; I Co 15 52; Rev 8 2-13, 9 1, 13-14, 10 7, 11 15); and the lyre, κιθάρα (I Co 14 7; Rev 5 8, 14 2, 15 2, 18 22). Of these, the flute and the lyre were the most characteristic types in general Greek use. We infer that the first Jewish converts brought over with them the habit of psalmody from the synagogues, to which additions were soon demanded by the new conceptions and spirit of the new faith. The precise musical form used doubtless varied in different regions, the Jews using such styles and melodies as they already had and the Greeks adapting the more elegant and artistic methods of Hellenic society. At Corinth we perhaps catch a hint of the Greek custom of 'rhapsodizing' or extempore cantillation (I Co 14). Some distinction seems to have been made between 'psalms, hymns and spiritual songs' (Eph 5 19; Col 3 16), the first being properly songs from the O T, the second probably similar formal poems of a Christian origin and import, and the third perhaps freer and more popular songs. In the NT are preserved some late Jewish psalms (Lk 1 46-55, 68-79, 2 14, 29-32), and it is also thought that there are some fragments of the new hymns of the Early Church (as Eph 5 14; I Ti 3 16; II Ti 2 11-13; Rev 48, 11, 5 9-10, 12-13, 7 10, 12, 11 15-18, 15 3-4, 19 1-2, 5-8).

LITERATURE: Among monographs on the subject are Ernest David, Musique chez les Juifs (1873); J. Stainer, The Music of the Bible (1879, new ed. 1914); J. Weiss, Die musikalischen Instrumente des ATs (1895); H. Gressmann, Musik und Musikinstrumente im AT (1903); F. Leitner, Der gottesdienstliche Volksgefang im jüdischen und christlichen Altertum (1906), and C. Sachs, Die Musikinstrumente des alten Ägyptens (1921), besides many articles. In JRAS (1921), S. Langdon connects terms in the Psalms with those in Babylonian liturgies, rendering it likely that several obscure words will thus be explained. For technical details about instruments various histories and dictionaries of music should be consulted. See also references in HDB. W.S.P.

MYRA, mai'ra (Μύρα): A city on the southern seaboard of Lycia, one of the twenty-three republics, which, after 189 B.C., formed an independent Lycian league. Over this the Lysiarch presided. Myra, being one of the six chief cities of Lycia, had two votes in the general assembly of the league. Theodosius II severed Lycia from Pamphylia, making Lycia a separate province, with Myra as capital. Its site, now Dembre, contains the ruins of a magnificent theater and rock-cut tombs, bearing inscriptions in the Lycian language, written in an alphabet peculiar to Lycia. None of the inscriptions are very old, but they prove that the Lycians were Aryans, tho they do not settle the entire question of nationality. Myra was the seat of the worship of the sailors' god (of unknown name), whose functions have been assumed by St. Nicholas (Bishop of Myra, at the beginning of the 4th cent.), the modern patron saint of sailors. Myra was a port on the direct route between Syria-Egypt and Rome. Strong westerly winds prevail throughout the summer and carry ships easily to Syria or to Egypt. On the return voyage ships from Egypt-Syria worked N. and E. of Cyprus and hugged the coast—because of the land breezes—past Myra to Cnidus. This explains the course of Paul's ship (Ac 27 5).

<sup>1</sup> It is not impossible that these titles refer to some passage, ritual occasion or object by which the poem was suggested or with which it was used. For example, 'Destroy not' is the opening of a notable prayer in Dt 9, with which it is not hard to associate the four poems in question. The 'Lily' titles recall the ornamentation of the two brazen pillars and the brazen sea in the Temple (I K 7 15-26), possibly hinting at a customary place of rendering. It is curious that the 'Dove' title has verbal similarities with Ps 55 6-7, so that it may be a subscription to 55 instead of a superscription to 56. Thirtle believes that all these expressions are subscriptions.

MYSTERY (μυστήριον): In the simplest and most natural sense a mystery is something beyond the comprehension of the human understanding. As such, it is an inevitable factor in religion, which, from the nature of the case, associates the soul with God and the word of transcendental realities. Consequently, even in the most strictly scientific age, mystery in religion must abide. To eliminate it is to destroy the very essence of religion. All the more forcibly was its necessity felt in the ancient world when toward exploring this unknown element no means were available, and when every effort to peer into its obscurity was followed by a greater sense of awe. This condition gave rise to a twofold development, i.e., first, the observation of problems in religion, and, second, the invention of a series of conventional forms, rites, or symbols, supposed to embody and convey knowledge of divine realities. The mysteries of the first class include such matters as the suffering of the just man and the prosperity of the wicked, the destiny of human beings after death, etc. Such mysteries constitute the subject of the Wisdom writings generally (Job, Pss 73, 139, etc.).

But in the Bible the word is used predominantly in the second sense. A mystery is knowledge imparted to, and possessed by, a limited circle of initiates in an organization. Among the non-Israelitic religions of ancient times there was hardly one in which worship was not in some portion of it turned into mystery. Toward this end the first step was to establish a line, on one side of which should stand the few initiated privileged characters, and on the other the great outside multitude. The subject-matter of knowledge by which the few were distinguished was next reduced to a system of symbolical representations. To pass from the ranks of the uninitiated into the circle of the initiated, one must receive the necessary instruction from the consecrated priest (hierophant—'revealer of sacred secrets'), and must be conducted through a course of significant actions, including sacramental guarantees which secured him his privileges both in this life and in the future. The Eleusinian mysteries in ancient Greece were the maturest and fullest expression of the type, but others, both more ancient and elaborate, are known to have existed (e.g., the Orphic mysteries).

The O T knows no mysteries of this type. The symbolical meaning of its ritual, including such features as the Holy of Holies with its cherubim and mercy-seat, the rites of the Day of Atonement, etc., are not peculiar secrets for the few, but the expressions of a living religion common to the whole people. The spirit of democracy ran too high among the Hebrews to admit of the growth of such a system. But when Israel came in touch with Greek life, the idea was adopted and gained ground (cf. Wis. 14 15, 23, 12 5).

In the N T the idea of mystery appears first as that of a secret known to God, and known by men only as revealed to them from above. Thus in the Synoptic Gospels the kingdom of God has its mysteries (Mt 13 11; Mk 4 11; Lk 8 10). There is nothing in this of a ritual element or of exclusiveness. It is not the designed withholding of knowledge, but the obtuseness of men that keeps them from fully appreciating some of the teachings of Jesus, and renders these mysteries (cf. also I Ti 3 9, 16). Paul, more than any other N T writer, makes use of the figure of mystery in its Greek sense for the purpose of bringing into view the exact nature of the Gospels. And yet he uses the term not uniformly and with a mechanically fixed meaning, but with a considerable freedom. When he employs it, for instance, in the apocalyptic passage in II Th 2 7, it is in the sense of something that was still kept from the idle multitude, but soon to be made manifest. This is comparatively simple. On the other hand, in I Co 2 7, 15 51 he speaks as an initiate who instructs the uninitiated (cf. also I Co 4 1; Col 1 26, 4 3; Eph 3 3 f.) So also in the 'interpretation of tongues' (I Co 14 2) he who speaks with tongues occupies the place of a hierophant, communicating knowledge to the small and select circle. Inasmuch as the Gospel is a message communicated by God in accordance with His sovereign grace to the circle that will accept it, the term 'mystery' seems eminently expressive of this aspect of it. Hence it is 'the mystery' (with or without the attached phrase 'of Christ,' Eph 3 4; Col 4 3, or 'of God,' I Co 4 1; Col 2 2). No amount of investigation or search could have brought this to the knowledge of man. But the effort by Kirsopp Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul (1911) to include the Sacraments among Christian mysteries has been successfully met by Schweitzer, St. Paul and his Interpreters (1912), and H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions (1913). In the Apocalypse the general sense is analogous to that of the Pauline usage, but from the nature of the case it involves the employment of elaborate symbolism (Rev 1 20, 10 7, 17 5, 5, 7).

N

NAAM, nē'am (נָאֵם, na'am), 'pleasant': The ancestral head of a Calebite clan (I Ch 4 15).

NAAMAH, nē'a-mā (נָאֵמָה, na'amāh), 'pleasant': I. 1. A daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain (Gn 4 22). 2. An Ammonitess, wife of Solomon and mother of Rehoboam (I K 14 21, 31; II Ch 12 13). II. A town in the Shephelah of Judah, between Beth-dagon and Makkedah (Jos 15 41). Site unknown. C. S. T.

NAAMAN, nē'a-man (נָאֵמָן, na'amān), 'pleasant': 1. A Syrian general under Ben-hadad, perhaps also his political adviser or prime minister (II K ch. 5). Jewish legend identifies him with the young man who drew a bow at a venture and mortally wounded King Ahab (I K 22 34; Jos. Ant. VIII, 15 5). He was afflicted with leprosy. Through an Israelitic slave girl in his household he heard of the wonderful powers of the prophet Elisha in Israel, and, procuring an introduction from Ben-hadad to the king of Israel, he went in search of the healer. The king of Israel at first suspected a snare and an occasion of hostilities on Ben-hadad's part, but was induced to send Naaman to the prophet, by whom the Syrian general was healed. He was also converted by this experience into a worshiper of J'; whereupon the problem arose as to his conduct in Syria. In the performance of his official duties, he must go into the temple of Rimmon and bow before the idol-god. He made it clear that this was not a violation of his devotion to J'. Further, in accordance with the notion that each god had exclusive jurisdiction of the land where he was worshiped (cf. I S 26 19), he asked permission to take with him two mules' burden of earth of the land of Israel upon which, as on a shrine of J', he might offer his worship. 2. A grandson of Benjamin (Gn 46 21) and eponym of a family, the Naamites (Nu 26 40). 3. A son of Ehud (I Ch 8 7). Perhaps same as in 2. A. C. Z.

NAAMATHITE, nē'a-mā-thait' (נָאֵמָתִי, hanna-āmāthī): A gentilic noun with the article, applied to Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11, 11 1, 20 1, 42 9), signifying that he was an inhabitant of Naamah (but not the town in Judah of that name). C. S. T.

NAAMITE, nē'a-mait. See NAAMAN, 2.

NAARAH, nē'a-rā (נָאֵרָה, na'ārāh): I. The ancestress of several Calebite clans (I Ch 4 5 f.), and originally probably a clan-name. II. A place on the border of Ephraim (Jos 16 7, Naarath AV; I Ch 7 28, Naaran). Map III, G 5.

NAARAI, nē'a-rai (נָאֵרָי, na'āray): One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 37; called Paarai in II S 23 35).

NAARAN, nē'a-ran. See NAARAH, II.

NAARATH, nē'a-rath. See NAARAH, II.

NAASHON, nē'a-shen. See NAHSHON.

NAASON, nā-as'ən (Ναασών, the O T Nason, q.v.): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 32).

NABAL, nē'bal (נָבָל, nābhāl), 'foolish,' 'reckless': A wealthy sheep-owner of the clan of Caleb (I S 25

2 f.), which owned the country about Hebron. He lived in Maon and pastured his flocks in Carmel. When N. was shearing sheep, David, in hiding from Saul, sent to him for a contribution. Churlish in disposition, and at the time intoxicated, he insultingly refused. His wise and comely wife, Abigail, however, went with bountiful gifts to meet David, who was on his way to attack N. Later N. heard from Abigail of his danger, and of her action, and soon after died from a shock. His widow, Abigail, then became the wife of David (I S 25 39 f., 30 5; II S 2 2, 2 6). C. S. T.

NABOTH, nē'bēth (נָבוֹת, nābhōth): A Jezreelite, probably one of the leading men of the city (I K 21 9; cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 13 8), whose judicial murder furnished the occasion for Elijah's prophetic denunciation of Ahab (I K ch. 21). The coveted vineyard ('field' in II K 9 25) was near the palace (LXX. 'threshing-floor') in Jezreel; but the sacredness of paternal inheritance was so firmly established (I K 21 3; cf. Nu ch. 36) that even Jezebel did not dare annex the land until Naboth (and his sons, II K 9 26) had first been executed upon a perjured charge of blasphemy (cf. Ex 22 28). L. G. L.—E. C. L.

NACHON, nē'ken (נָכֹן, nākhōn, 'Nacon' RV): The name of the threshing-floor, or of its owner, where Uzzah was smitten for touching the Ark (II S 6 6), called 'Chidon' (I Ch 13 9). The place was named by David Perez-uzzah (II S 6 8). See NACON. C. S. T.

NACHOR, nē'kōr (Ναχώρ, the O T Nahor, q.v.): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 34).

NACON, nē'ken (נָכֹן, nākhōn, Nachon AV), 'fixed': This word is read as a proper name in EV of II S 6 6, and the structure of the sentence in Heb. seems to demand a proper noun here. But the word nākhōn is a very improbable form for a proper noun. The LXX. reads 'Nodab.' The || text in I Ch 13 9 reads 'Chidon,' which is a more probable reading, and possibly gives the correct form of the name. The site is unknown. E. E. N.

NADAB, nē'dab (נָדָב, nādhābh), 'generous,' 'noble': 1. The eldest son of Aaron (Ex 6 23); see ABIHU. 2. A son of Jeroboam (I K 14 20) and king of Israel for two years (15 25). While besieging Gibbethon, a Philistine town, he was assassinated by Baasha, who exterminated the house of Jeroboam after he became king (15 27 f.). 3. A Jerahmeelite family (I Ch 2 28 f.). 4. A Gibeonite name (I Ch 8 30, 9 36). C. S. T.

NAGGAI, nag'gai (Ναγγαί, Nagge AV): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 25).

NAHALAL, nē'hā-lal (נָהָלָל, nahālāl), NAHAL-LAL, nā-hal'lāl, and NAHALOL, nē'hā-lēl (נָהָלֹל, nahālōl): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 15), long held by the Canaanites (Jg 1 30), and later counted a Levitical city (Jos 21 35). Map IV, D 7 (another identification is with Malul, 3½ m. W. of Nazareth, Map IV, C 7). E. E. N.

NAHALIEL, nā-hē'li-el (נַחֲלִיֵּל, nahālī'el), 'brook of God': A brook on Israel's march from the upper waters of the Arnon to the plains of Moab (Nu 21 10). Its identification with any particular brook in that region is uncertain, tho the Wādī Zerqa Mā'in has many advocates (see Map II, H 2).

NAHAM, nē'hām (נַחַם, naḥam), 'He comforts': A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 10).

NAHAMANI, nē'hā-mē'nai (נַחֲמָנִי, nahāmānī), 'comforted': One of the leaders of the Return (Neh 7 7; omitted in Ezr 2 2).

NAHARAI, nē'hā-rui (נַחֲרָי, nahāray and נַחֲרִי, naharī): One of David's heroes, the armor-bearer of Joab. His home was at Beeroth (II S 23 37, Nahari, AV; I Ch 11 39).

NAHASH, nē'hash (נֶחֱשׁ, nāḥāsh), 'serpent': 1. A king of the Ammonites, whose intolerable conditions for the peaceful surrender of Jabesh-gilead brought Saul to the rescue, and inaugurated the successful struggle for the independence of Israel (I S 11 1 ff.). His kindness to David elicited, on the news of the death of N., a return of kindness on David's part to his son Hanun, who rudely insulted David's messengers (II S 10 2; I Ch 19 1). Another son of the same Nahash was Shobi, who brought needed supplies to David during his retirement to Gilead at the time of Absalom's rebellion (II K 17 27). 2. The father of Abigail and Zeruiah, sisters of David (II S 17 25; I Ch 2 16). 'Nahash' here, however, may be a textual error for 'Jesse,' or Jesse may have married the widow of N., or N. a widow of Jesse. If this N. were the same as the king of Ammon, it would be easy to account for the kindnesses interchanged between David and him, and at the same time unnecessary to assume more than one of the names in all the accounts.
A. C. Z.

NAHATH, nē'haṣṣ (נַחֲתָנִי, nahath): 1. One of the 'dukes' or clan-chieftains of Edom (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37). 2. One of the ancestors of Samuel (I Ch 6 26, called Toah in ver. 34 and Tohu in I S 1 1). 3. A Levite overseer under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 13).

NAHBI, nā'bai (נַחֲבִי, nahbī): One of the spies (Nu 13 14).

NAHOR, nē'her (נָחֹר, nāḥōr, Nachor AV; Jos 24 2; Lk 3 34): 1. The grandfather of Abraham and son of Serug (Gn 11 24 f.). 2. The brother of Abraham and son of Terah (Gn 11 26-29). His marriage to Milcah and the genealogy of his children are given for the double purpose: first, of showing the relationships of the patriarchal families, as his son Bethuel was the father of Rebekah and Laban (Gn 24 15); and secondly, as an ethnographical datum indicating the kinship of the Semitic peoples. Abraham was counted the ancestor of the south and N. of the north Semites.
A. C. Z.

NAHSHON, nā'shen (נֶחֱשׁוֹן, nahshōn): The 'prince' (Nu 1 7, 2 3, etc.) of Judah. He was also an ancestor of David (Ru 4 20; I Ch 2 10; Lk 3 32 Naason AV). The same person is probably meant in Ex 6 23, Naashon AV.

NAHUM, nē'hūm (נִחֻם, nahūm), 'comfort': I. One of the minor prophets.

1. The Prophet. The only description of N. we have is found in the single word the Elkoshite (Nah 1 1). This appears to be derived from the name of a place, Elkosh; but a place bearing this name is nowhere else mentioned. A late tradition identifies it with Alkush, a locality near Nineveh, where the prophet Nahum is also said to have been buried. But every consideration within and without the book militates against this identification. Another tradition, supported by Jerome, makes Elkosh a town in Galilee (Elcesi, or Helkesai). But this, too, fails to harmonize with the internal marks of the book, which show the prophet to have been a Judean (cf. 1 15). The town Elkosh was probably on a lost site in southern Judah, near Eleutheropolis.

2. Date. The date of Nahum's ministry can be fixed within certain limits. On the one hand, he looks upon Nineveh as still standing. As its fall did not take place before 606 B.C., this date furnishes the latest limit of Nahum. On the other hand, in 3 8-10 the city of Thebes is spoken of as already captured by her enemies. As Thebes was taken by the Assyrians in 663 B.C., this is clearly the earliest limit. Whether Nahum prophesied in the earlier or later half of this period of fifty-seven years depends upon whether he viewed the fall of Thebes as a very recent event or a somewhat remote one; partly also upon the significance of the condition of weakness and decay which he pictures in the Assyrian Empire. Such a condition, growing rapidly worse, was already in full view in the middle of the 7th cent. B.C. The probabilities are, therefore, in favor of the earlier dating of Nahum's ministry, and the year 650 may be taken generally as its central point. The relation of Manasseh to Assyria furnishes a suitable occasion for the warmth of feeling displayed in it on the part of a faithful Israelite.

3. Book: Contents. The contents of the book present J" coming in wrath and power to take vengeance on the enemies of Judah (1 1-15). From this general proclamation, which, however, portrayed the destruction of the enemy as total and irreparable, the prophet passes to the more particular denunciation of Nineveh and the announcement of her day of doom (2 1-13). The picture is drawn vividly. The destroyer of Nineveh is at her very gates, her defenders are in flight, and can not be rallied (ver. 8), and her devastation and ruin are evidently complete. The reason for this fate is the sin of the city (3 1-7). It will rouse itself to a desperate resistance and struggle, but in vain (3 8-10).

4. Integrity. There is a difference in form and tone between the passage 1 2-2 2 and the remainder of the book. The section 1 2-10 has an alphabetic arrangement of verses, which, tho not carried through, has given ground for the conjecture that it originally extended to 2 2. But if so, an alphabetical psalm, whose general thought harmonizes with Nahum's prophecy, has been prefixed to that prophecy. The prophecy then strictly began with 2 3. In such a case, in order to bring it into still greater harmony with Nahum's words, the psalm itself, or else its last portion, must have dropped out, and another ending

(1 11, 2 2) must have been attached to it. These conclusions are, of course, based upon meager data, and can not be regarded except as tentative (cf. Bickell, Beiträge z. sem. Metrik. 1894; per contra, Davidson, in Camb. Bible). No doubt the text of Nahum has been greatly tampered with, and yet the general vigor and vividness of the prophet's style largely overcome the obscurities created by textual corruption.

5. Characteristic Point of View. The striking peculiarity of Nahum's thought is its fixed gaze on the enemies of God's Chosen People. The prophet evidently has no fear for the people themselves. At all events, he alludes neither to their sin nor to any impending wrath to be visited upon them. Presumably, the destruction of Assyria meant to him the deliverance of Israel from a source of distress and a menacing danger.

II. One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 25, Naum AV). A. C. Z.

NAIL: This word renders (1) the Heb. yāthēdh, the 'peg' or 'pin' used to hold the tent-ropes (Jg 4 21 ff., 5 26; 'tent-pin' RV), or to bind together the beams of a house (Zec 10 4); also a peg driven into the wall on which things may be hung (Ezr 9 8; Is 22 23, 25, and (2) mašmērōth (pl.), ordinary metal nails (I Ch 22 3, etc.); except in Dt 21 12 and Dn 4 33, 7 19, where the meaning is obvious. E. E. N.

NAIN, nē'in (Nālv; mentioned only in Lk 7 11): The modern village, which is still called Nein (Map IV, D 8), is beautifully situated on a small, elevated plateau at the foot of Little Hermon, but the mud-built hamlet is squalid and filthy. Numerous ruined houses show that it was formerly much larger, and in the hillside there are rock-cut tombs; but no traces of walls or of very ancient buildings have been found. The little mosque in Nain is called 'The Place of Our Lord Jesus,' a survival, apparently, of the name of an earlier Christian chapel commemorating the miracle.

NAIOTH, nē'yōth (K'thābh, נֵיֹוֹת, i.e., nāwīth, or nāwīyath, קִרְיַת נֵיֹוֹת, nāyōth, or נֵיֹוֹת, nāwīyōth): A place 'in Ramah,' where Samuel and the 'sons of the prophets' dwelt, and where David dwelt while in hiding from Saul (I S 19 18-20 1). The absence of the article (see esp. I S 20 1) seems to indicate that the word is a proper name. It perhaps means 'dwelling,' and refers to a cenobium, or cloister, in which the prophets dwelt (cf. I S 10 5; II K 6 1-7). For criticisms of the Heb. text and conjectures as to the etymology, see Driver (Notes on Heb. Text of the Books of Samuel) or H. P. Smith (in ICC).

NAKED: In the following instances the word 'naked' needs some explanation. In Ex 32 25 the RV renderings 'broken loose,' 'let them loose' express the sense of the Heb. pāra' much better than the AV 'naked.' The same may be said of II Ch 28 15. In Hab 3 9 'bare' RV the reference is to the protective covering of the battle-bow, which was removed before going into action. In Is 20 2 f. and Mic 1 8, the reference is to the mourning custom of stripping off the outer clothing and arraying oneself in sackcloth. In these two instances the sackcloth was to be dispensed with, not necessarily as an evidence of greater mourning, but simply of deeper and more intense feeling. See also MOURNING and MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 1, under Sackcloth. For the use of 'naked' in Mk 14 51 f., Jn 21 7, and Ac 19 16, see DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2. E. E. N.

NAMES: 1. Importance Attached to Names. Among the Israelites, as among other peoples of antiquity, great importance was attached to names, whether of places, persons, or deity. This is evidenced by the many instances in the O T of explanation of the origin of names, and altho these explanations with their accompanying philological interpretations are in many cases only superficial and popular, they show clearly how important names were considered to be. The derivation and primary significance of the Heb. word shēm, 'name,' are uncertain. It is used nearly always of some definite proper name. Occasionally, it signifies 'renown' or 'fame' (I S 18 30; II S 8 13). In this brief discussion we shall consider, first, person-names, then place-names, and, finally, Divine names.

2. How Names Were Given. So far as the O T gives us light on the subject, it appears that a child was named usually at birth by the mother (Gn 4 1, 25, 19 37 f., 29 32 ff., etc.), altho this was by no means always the case. The father often (Gn 4 26, 16 15, 21 3, 35 18; II S 12 24 f., etc.) and, in one case at least, friends (Ru 4 17) are mentioned as giving the name. While in later times a child was named when circumcised (Lk 1 59, 2 21), this seems not to have been the case in early (O T) days. The primitive reason for naming the child at birth was, possibly, to thereby protect it from demonic hostility (Bertholet, Kulturgesch. Israels [1919], p. 116). In later life it was also possible for a person to receive a name, sometimes called his surname, which was used alongside of, or supplanted, his original name. In all, or nearly all, such cases the new name was imposed by a superior, or due to a change of status which seemed to demand a new name. Examples of such changes are: Abram to Abraham, Sarai to Sarah, Jacob to Israel, Joseph to Zaphenath-paneah, Eliakim to Jehoiakim, Mattaniah to Zedekiah, Daniel to Belteshazzar, Simon to Cephas, etc. In the earliest times names seem to have consisted of but one significant word (simple or compound), an appellative term of some sort (see next section). But in a closely settled region it would become necessary to distinguish individuals bearing the same name, and thus arose the habit of adding 'son of' so and so to the person's name. Another way was to add a gentile indicative of the place to which the person belonged (cf. e.g., II S 23 24 ff.). Both patronymics and gentiles are very common in the O T. When Palestine became bilingual, as was the case in N T times, many Jews bore two names, their native Hebrew or Aramaic name, and a Greek or Roman one, which was sometimes the equivalent in meaning of the Aramaic (e.g., Cephas=Peter), in other cases not so (e.g., John [Heb. yōhānān] Mark [Lat. Marcus]). Many Heb. or Aramaic proper names also became Hellenized, e.g., Joshua (Heb.)=Jesus, Eliakim=Alcimus, etc. Since the reasons governing the choice of names are given in so many cases, it may be inferred that names were generally chosen, especially in the earlier times, because of some special circumstance or condition at birth which the name selected seemed capable of commemorating or symbolizing. Esau was so called (apparently) because he was either 'red' or 'hairy,' Jacob, because he had his brother by the 'heel' (Gn 25 25 f.), Isaac, because Sarah 'laughed' (Gn 18 13; cf. 17 17) at the promise of his birth (cf. also the reasons for the names given to Jacob's sons, Gn 29 32-30 24, to the children of Hosea, Hos ch. 1, or of Isaiah, Is 7 1, 8 1 f.). In later times there was a tendency to make use of the same set of names in the same family. This had become a well-established custom in N T times (cf. Lk 1 59-61), but it can not be traced certainly further back than the postexilic age (cf. Gray, Heb. Proper Names, pp. 1-9).

3. Kinds of Names. Since Heb. names were in early times appellative designations, it follows that there could be easily many different kinds of names. In the present brief discussion perhaps the most convenient subdivision to make in the first place is, according to their structure, into simple and composite.

(1) Simple Names. No exhaustive classification of names consisting of but one element will be attempted here. Animal names were especially common in the oldest parts of the O T: e.g., Leah, 'wild cow'; Rachel, 'ewe'; Deborah, 'bee'; Nahash, 'serpent'; etc. Trees and plants also furnished names: Elon, 'oak'; Tamar, 'palm'; Rimmon, 'pomegranate'; etc. Personal characteristics were determinative in some cases: e.g., Esau, 'red' (?); Laban, 'white'; etc. The feelings of the parents showed themselves in other names: e.g., Rehum, 'pitied'; Baruch, 'blessed'; etc. From these and other fields the Hebrews drew the material for a very large proportion of their proper names. By means of endings added to the simple words they greatly increased the number of possible names. A final 'i' changed a place-name into a gentile person-name: e.g., Jehudi, 'man of Judah.' In some cases the final 'i' stood for the personal pronoun 'my': e.g., Naomi, 'my delight.' Much more frequent was the use of the endings 'an,' 'am,' 'on,' 'om,' e.g., Nahshon, from nāḥāsh, 'serpent.'

(2) Composite Names. Taking all the O T names together, early and late, the great majority consists of composite names, i.e., names composed of two elements. By far the greatest number of these have, as one element of the compound, a Divine name or its equivalent. With composite names should also be classed those that, tho apparently simple, consist really of a sentence: e.g., Joseph, 'he [God] shall add'; Japhlet, 'he [God] causes to escape'; Jashub, 'he shall return,' etc. In most names of this kind the understood subject is God, tho other subjects are very common. In theophorous names—i.e., names in which a Divine name forms one part of the compound—quite frequently we meet with indirect rather than direct references to Deity. The syllables 'ab' or 'abi,' 'ah' or 'ahi,' 'am' ('am in Heb.) or 'ammi,' 'dad' or 'dod,' meaning respectively, 'father,' 'brother,' 'uncle,' and 'kinsman,' as used in proper names, probably refer to Deity: e.g., Abijah='J' is father'; Abiel='El [God] is father'; Abitub='the father [God] is good'; Ahihud='the brother [God] is glorious'; Ammishaddai='Shaddai is uncle'; Eliam='God is uncle'; Eldad='El [God] is kinsman'; etc. In names of this class when both elements refer to the Deity, sometimes the subject is placed first, as in Eliam, sometimes last, as in Ammiel, which is identical in meaning with Eliam. Another class of theophorous names consists of the names compounded with 'melek' (EV 'melech,' 'king'), 'baal' ('owner,' 'lord,' and frequently used as a proper name for Deity), 'adon(i)' ('lord'): e.g., Ahimelech='the brother [God] is king'; Malchijah='J' is king'; Baaliada, 'Baal knows'; Adonijah, 'J' is lord.'

The names of Deity proper, 'Ja,' 'Jah,' 'Jeho,' all shortened forms of Yahweh (Jehovah), 'El' and 'Eli' (Ele) and Shaddai (quite rare), as used in compound names, are to be taken as subjects of the sentence which the name makes. The predicate may be any of the semi-divine names noted above, or an adjective, or a noun, or some part of a verb. The possible combinations are very many and the Hebrew vocabulary is exceedingly rich in proper names thus formed. If the reader will select the proper names beginning with 'E' and 'J,' he will discover this for himself. He should also bear in mind that there are as many, or perhaps more, cases in which the name of the Deity forms the second instead of the first part of the compound.

These facts throw an interesting side-light on the conceptions of Deity entertained by the ancient Israelites. They not only thought much about God, but also thought of Him as near and, on the whole, well disposed toward them. They spoke of Him as 'father,' 'brother,' 'uncle,' 'kinsman,' and expressed this faith in the names they gave their children.

4. History of Names. Since it is now possible to arrange our O T literature in chronological order, it is also possible thereby to gain some light on the history of personal names in Israel. This subject has been investigated, especially by Prof. G. B. Gray, whose conclusions appear to rest on careful and accurate tabulations. In general, it may be said that the use of animal-names as person-names was most common in the earliest periods; that the tendency to use names with a religious significance was not so marked in the earlier period as it afterward became; that while names compounded with 'El'—the general name for God—were in use from the earliest to the latest times, names compounded with 'Ja,' etc. (short for Yahweh, Israel's national Deity), were rare before David's time, but became common after that; that theophorous names compounded with 'ab,' 'ah,' 'am,' 'dad,' 'did,' 'melech,' 'adon,' and 'baal'—i.e., practically all the semi-divine names used in compounds—had ceased to be formed by the time of the Exile; that those compounded with 'Ja,' etc., and 'El' gradually became the favorite class of names, being used almost exclusively in the later periods; and that the custom of giving religious names continually grew in favor, being the common rule in the late preexilic period, and in the exilic and post-exilic periods (for further details see Gray, op. cit., pp. 243 ff.).

5. Place-Names. The Hebrew names of places are in many instances of uncertain meaning. This is mainly due to the fact that such names are of great antiquity, going back to the pre-Israelite period in Palestine and thus are really of Canaanite or even pre-Canaanite origin. Names of trees or plants, e.g., Tappuah, 'apple'; Tamar, 'palm'; Elah, 'oak' or 'terebinth,' etc., and of animals, e.g., Aijalon, 'stag'; Ir-nahash, 'serpent city,' etc., were frequently used. The natural features of a place—e.g., its fertility, its beauty, the color of the soil, or landscape—all these are found set forth in such place-names as Carmel, Shaphir, Adummim, Lebanon, Kedron, etc. The proximity of water was expressed by prefixes such as 'En-' ('spring' or 'fountain'), 'Beer' ('well'), 'Me-' ('water'). Elevation is found indicated in the many Gebas, Gibeahs, Ramahs, and (probably) Mizpahs. Compound place-names are also, very common. 'Beth-', 'house,' 'Hazor,' i.e., a fixed instead of a movable (as customary with nomads) place of abode—'Kir' or 'Kiriath' and 'Ir' (both = 'city') are frequently found united with some other term to make the full name of a place. More significant, especially of the close association of religion with the life of the Israelites and of the Canaanites before them, are the frequent compound names in which the name of Deity forms one element. Such Semitic deities as Shamash, 'the sun,' Nebo, Anath, etc., appear in names like Beth-shemesh, 'house [i.e., 'temple' or 'shrine'] of the sun,' Mt Nebo, Anathoth, etc. The two old deity names 'baal' and 'el' occur also in a number of compounds, as Baal-shalisha, Baal-gad, Baal-Meon, Beth-el, Jezre-el, Iphtah-el, etc.

6. The Divine Names. To the ancient Israelite, great as was the significance he attached to his own and others' names, the names of God were of the highest importance. Even ordinary person-names were looked upon as being more than mere words; they almost possessed an entity of their own. Consequently, the Divine names were invested with a special and peculiar sacredness. In a vague way the Deity and His name were considered as inseparable. Of the 'Angel of the presence' it is said 'my name is in him' (Ex 23 21). Such passages as Ex 30 7, 34 5 ff.; Dt 28 58, and many others, reveal the importance attached to the name Jehovah (Yahweh). A place became sacred when He there 'recorded' His name (Ex 20 24; Dt 12 5; I K 8 29, etc.). Of the Divine names, Jehovah (Yahweh) was the name par excellence, most holy and most rich in its significance for the Israelite. Of the origin and primary meaning of this name nothing positive can as yet be said, except that, in accordance with the statement of the O T (Gn 4 26 and in many subsequent passages), the name is probably very old, far antedating Moses. With this agrees the probable discovery of the name on ancient Babylonian inscriptions. It is not the origin, but the significance attached to the name that is the important thing in the thought and teaching of the O T. The famous passage in Ex 3 14 f.

gives us what we may well believe to have been the Mosaic interpretation of the name—as indicative of self-assertiveness and the existence, not in an abstract metaphysical sense, but in a practical historical sense, of J'. He is the God who is, who is in history, who is and will be with His people; a pregnant idea, the full significance of which could be unfolded only gradually and during the course of many centuries (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, Exodus, Introd. p. li, and pp. 23 f. and 40 f.). The parallel passage, i.e., as indicating the significance of the name, in the J document in Ex 34 6 f. is essentially of the same character as the E passage in Ex 3 14 f. The name Yahweh thus became the covenant name of God in Israel: the name above every other name in its meaning, and in the sentiments of loyalty and devotion awakened by it, to the Israelite. These sentiments came to expression especially in the religious poetry of the Psalms and in the fervid utterances of prophecy. As time went on, the sacredness of the name Jehovah (Yahweh) was increasingly emphasized until at last it was considered profanation to pronounce it even in religious exercises. This avoidance of the name had probably become common usage in N T times. In reading the Scriptures, for Yahweh was substituted either 'Ādhōnāy' ('Lord') or 'Ēlōhīm' (God), and at last even in writing the text the vowels of 'Ādhōnāy' were attached to Yahweh, making it appear as if it were pronounced Y'hōwāh, whence the Eng. 'Jehovah.'

Other Divine names used by Israel were 'Elyōn, 'the highest' (Gn 14 18 ff.; Nu 24 16, etc.); Shadday, rendered 'almighty,' altho its exact meaning is unknown (Gn 17 1; Ex 6 3, etc.); both of these names are often found combined with 'Ēl'; other rarer and probably only descriptive names were 'ābhār, 'mighty one' (Gn 49 24), tsūr, 'rock' (II S 23 3, etc.), and the like. The term 'Ādhōnāy' 'Lord,' is not strictly a proper name but rather a title. Still, the combination 'ādhōnāy Yahweh, 'Lord Jehovah,' like Yahweh ts'bhā'ōh, 'Jehovah of hosts,' was so common as to be looked upon practically as a proper name (see LORD).

7. Divine Names in the N T. By N T times so excessive was the formal reference rendered to Divine names that even the words for God (i.e., 'Ēl, Θεός, etc.) were rarely spoken by the devout Jew. Substitutions such as 'heaven' were frequently used, where 'God' was meant. This tendency is seen even as early as the books of Esther and I Mac. (See Kingdom of God, § 1.)

Perhaps as much by way of protest against such transcendentalism as for other reasons, Jesus used the suggestive and most significant term 'Father' for 'God,' emphasizing thereby both His supremacy and His love for men, His children. On the other hand, in early Christian circles something of the reverence and awe attaching to Yahweh among the Jews was transferred to the name 'Christ' or the compound 'Jesus Christ,' which even in the Apostolic Age had come to be regarded as a proper name instead of a definitive expression (Jesus the Christ). Cf. the pregnant expressions 'in the name of Christ,' 'in the name of Jesus Christ,' 'in the name of Jesus,' which occur so frequently in the N T writings and the emphasis on the name in baptism (Mt 28 19; Ac 2 38; Ro 6 3, etc.). This name had now become the name that is above every other name (Ph 2 9 f.).

NAOMI, nā-ō'mi (נָּוִי, nā'ōmī or no'ōmī), 'my pleasantness': The wife of Elimelech (Ru 1 2, etc.). Widowed and bereft of her children in the land of Moab, whither they had all removed during a severe famine, she returned with her devoted daughter-in-law Ruth, whose history gives Naomi her importance in the Biblical narrative. A.C.Z.

NAPHISH, nē'fish (נָּפִישׁ, nāphīsh): The ancestral head of an Ishmaelite clan (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 31, 5 19, Nephish AV). It is likely that there was some connection between this Ishmaelite clan and the Nephisim (Ezr 2 50 Nephusim AV), or Nephushesim (Neh 7 52 Nephisheshim AV), of postexilic days, who were counted as Nethinim (q.v.). Note also the collocation with Meunim (q.v.). See also ISHMAEL.

E. E. N.

NAPHTALI, naf'tō-lai. See TRIBES, § 2-4.

NAPHTUHIM, naf'tu-him (נָּפְתֻחִים, naphṭūhīm): Probably a designation for Lower Egypt or the Delta (Gn 10 13).

NAPKIN. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 1.

NARCISSUS, nar-sis'us (Νάρκισσος): A person mentioned incidentally in Ro 16 11 ('the [household] of N'). Perhaps the reference is to a notorious favorite of Claudius, who had been put to death upon the accession of Nero, about three years before Ro was written (Tacitus, Annals, xi-xiii, passim). After the death of N. his confiscated slaves doubtless became part of 'Caesar's household' (cf. Ph 4 22), but might still have been designated by the name of their former master.

NARD, SPIKENARD: A variety of bearded grass (Nardostachys Jatamansi, of the order Valerianaceae) native to India, from which was extracted a fragrant oil much used in the East (Song 1 12, 4 13 f.; Mk 14 3; Jn 12 3). The meaning of the adjective nard (in the N T reff.) is much disputed. On the whole, the balance of evidence seems to be in favor of 'genuine,' or 'pure,' tho 'liquid' has strong advocates. See also OINTMENT AND PERFUMES, § 3.

E. E. N.

NATHAN, nē'ghan (נָּתָן, nāthān), 'He [God] gives': 1. A prophet to whom David looked for guidance in the administration of the spiritual side of his government (II S 7 2; I Ch 17 1; I K 1 3 f.). N., however, was more than a public servant, as he took occasion to rebuke the king for his sin against Uriah (II S 12 1). He was very influential in promoting and securing Solomon's accession to the throne (I K 1 3 f.), and his sons Azariah and Zabud were promoted by Solomon to important positions (I K 4 5). 2. A son of David and ancestor of Jesus (II S 5 14; Lk 3 31). 3. The father of Igal, one of David's valiant men (II S 23 36) (=No. 8?). 4. A son of Attai, a Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 36). 5. A contemporary of Ezra (Ezr 8 16). 6. One who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 39). 7. The head of a family, possibly the same as 2 (Zec 12 12). 8. Brother of Joel, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 38). A. C. Z.

NATHANAEL, na-ghan'a-el (Ναθαναήλ = Heb. nathan'el, 'God has given'): N. is not mentioned by this name in the lists of Apostles in the Synoptics, but figures among the early disciples in the Johannine tradition. In 1 46 he is associated with Philip of Bethsaida. According to the slightly different tradition in 21 2, he is 'of Cana of Galilee.' Beyond the statement of Jn 1 47 f. that he was without guile and the account of his acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah, nothing further is said of him in the N T. He is frequently identified with Bartholomew (q.v.), e.g., by Ewald, Meyer, Westcott, and others; but the only apparent reason for such identification is the association of Bartholomew with Philip in the lists of Apostles. Even this is not true in Ac 1 13, where the name of Thomas is inserted between that of Philip and Bartholomew. N. has also been identified with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' (by Spareth, ZWT, 1868). See Zahn, N T Introd., § 1, N. 16.

NATHAN-MELECH, nē'ghan-mī'lek (נָּתָן מֶלֶךְ, nathan-melekh), 'Melech gave' ('Melech' may be the name of a god, or simply 'a king'): An official in the time of King Josiah, who had a chamber in an annex of the Temple, near which stood the 'horses . . . given to the sun,' which were removed by Josiah (II K 23 11).

NATIONS. See GENTILES.

NATURE, NATURAL: (1) In Dt 34 7 'natural force' is the rendering of the Heb. lēah, 'moist,' 'full of sap,' thus indicative of physical vigor. (2) The Gr. φύσις, well rendered by 'nature' or, in the phrase κατὰ φύσιν, by 'natural' (Ro 11 21, 24), is used in the N T to express several shades of meaning: (a) The inherent character of a person or thing, the principles according to which normally it is governed (Ro 1 28, 2 14, 11 21-24; I Co 11 14; Gal 4 8); (b) as equivalent to 'by birth' (Ro 2 27; Gal 2 15); (c) acquired characteristics which have become fixed (Eph 2 3); (d) that which is peculiar or distinctive as marking one class of beings from another (II P 2 12 (AV, cf. RV), 1 4; cf. Ja 3 7, where it is rendered 'kind'). (3) The term γένεσις, 'birth' or 'origin,' is once rendered 'natural' (Ja 1 23, lit. 'of his birth'), and once 'nature' (in the peculiar passage Ja 3 6, on which see COURSE). (4) ψυχικός (from ψυχή, 'soul,' i.e., the animate, sentient entity) is rendered 'natural' in I Co 2 14, 15 44, 46, in each case in contrast with 'spiritual.' Since the ψυχή was often viewed as the principle of the animal or physical life alone, ψυχικός refers to the lower, merely animal nature, not as yet controlled or reanimated by the Spirit (cf. its use in Jude ver. 19).

NAUM, nē'um. See NAHUM, 2.

NAVES: The AV rendering of the Heb. gabbīm (I K 7 33), which means the 'bends' of the wheel, i.e., the 'felloes' (so RV). On the other hand, hish-shārim ('spokes' AV) in the same verse is plausibly, but not certainly, rendered 'naves' in RV. E.E.N.

NAVY. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2; also TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 1.

NAZARENE, naz'-a-rin': The common rendering of the Gr. Ναζωραῖος is 'of Nazareth' (Mt 26 71 Lk 18 37; Jn 19 19), but in Mt 2 23 and Ac 24 5 the word evidently has a different sense. In Mt 2 23 N. seems to be regarded as interchangeable with 'Nazirite' (q.v.), possibly because both were viewed ordinarily as persons of inferior class. In Ac 24 5 'N.' is the equivalent of 'Christian,' or 'follower of the Man of Nazareth.'

A. C. Z.

NAZARETH, naz'-a-refh (Ναζαρέτ, also Νάζαρεθ): A city in Galilee where Joseph and Mary, the parents of Jesus, lived, and, therefore, His own home in childhood and early manhood. Accordingly, He is called 'Jesus of Nazareth' (Mk 1 9, Jn 1 46); also 'Nazarene' (Ναζαρενός, Lk 4 34; Ναζωραῖος, Jn 19 19; Ac 2 22). The town is located on the side of a hill (Lk 4 29), which commands a splendid view of the Plain of Esdraelon and Mt. Carmel, and is very picturesque in general. Map IV, D 7. In the days of Jesus it was held in contempt, but no reason is given for this (Jn 1 46). It is not mentioned in the O T, in the Talmud (tho Jesus is named as 'the Nazarene,' Sanh. 43a, 107b; Soṭ 47a), or by Josephus. It possessed a synagog, in which Jesus taught (Lk 4 29). Its modern name is En-Nasira. The Virgin's fountain, being the only one in the town, can safely be associated with the life of Jesus. Other 'sacred' spots (Mt. of Precipitation, etc.) are fictitious.

NAZIRITE, naz'-i-roit (נָזִיר, nāzīr, fr. נָזַר = 'separate' Nazirite AV 'consecrate' RV mg., Nu 6 2 f.):

1. Idea of Naziritism. A separated or consecrated person, a 'devotee.' Forms of consecration to God that go beyond ordinary requirements are of common occurrence in religious life. Among the Hebrews such forms were subjected to minute regulations (Nu ch. 6). The primary idea being devotion to the service of J', the object of the regulations was to secure an impressive and complete separation from the rest of the world. The ceremony by which this was done was inaugurated with a vow, nedher nāzīr (Nu 6 2). The person making the vow might be either a man or a woman; but there is no record of any woman taking the vow for her own sake. The mothers of Samson and Samuel were both under Nazirite regulations during the period of their bearing their Nazirite sons. But there is no evidence that they so continued after the end of that period, or resumed the Nazirite life for any other purpose later.

2. Life of the Nazirite. From the moment of the taking of the vow the Nazirite was put into a class separate from common men. The chief signs of the consecration were: (1) The cultivation of long hair. No razor must pass on the head of the Nazirite. The object of this provision was either to avoid profanation by the touch of a tool of human make, or the desire to offer the long locks as a sacrifice to God. In favor of the latter explanation may be cited the regulation in Nu 6 18, and the fact that similar practises existed in other religions (Moore on Jg 13 5, in ICC). In favor of the former is the quite prevalent conception that anything touched by common tools was thereby profaned (cf. the profanation of stones by the chisel, Ex 20 25; cf. I K 6 7). A sacrificial victim must never have been shorn or have borne the yoke or have been used in ordinary labor (Nu 19 2; Dt 15 19; in this case the shears are analogous to the razor on the Nazirite's head). (2) Total abstinence from wine and all other strong drink (Nu 6 3 f.). In order to secure perfect conformity to this requirement, the prohibition was made to include all that grew upon the vine in any form or shape. This was either in order to be on the safe side against the ill effects of intoxicants, or because of some belief that the evil which appears in full force in wine was in the grape even tho latent. (3) Ceremonial purity, especially by the avoidance of all contact with the dead. This requirement is self-explanatory. Any pollution of the kind would at once annul the vow and necessitate purification and the renewal of the whole ceremony (Nu 6 12).

3. Classes of Nazirites. Nazirites were of two classes: (1) Those who became such of their own free will and decision, and (2) those who were devoted by their parents. The law of Nu ch. 6 evidently refers to the former; for it contains a provision for the termination of the Nazirite life at the end of a period voluntarily fixed by the Nazirite Himself. There is no reason to suppose that the prescriptions were different in the case of Nazirites devoted ex utero, except on this single point, that their Nazirite-ship was for life.

4. Naziritism in History. The first instance on record of a Nazirite is that of Samson (Jg 13 5, 7, 14). The next is that of Samuel (I S 1 11), who was not only a Nazirite but also a prophet. During the period of the monarchy there must have been Nazirites, especially of the self-devoted class, in comparatively large numbers. Amos rebukes the people for enticing the Nazirites to drink wine (Am 2 12). As late as the days of Jesus, the Nazirite vow was observed by many. John the Baptist was in all probability a Nazirite of the second class (ex utero, Lk 1 15; cf. also I Mac 3 49). The case of Paul's vow is another illustration (Ac 21 23). That the Nazirite vow antedates the law of Nu ch. 6 in history, there can be no doubt. The practise is assumed as already common and simply needing regulation. The Nazirite life was almost purely a religious and ceremonial one. For, while it secured abstinence from intoxicants, it did not affect the moral life in other matters. Nazirites do not seem to have been restrained from giving way to their passions (cf. Samson's relations to Philistine women). A. C. Z.

NEAH, nī'a (נָעַח, nē'āh): A city of Zebulun (Jos 19 13). Site unknown.

NEAPOLIS, nī-ap'-o-lis (Νεάπολις): The seaport of Philippi in N. Macedonia, lying opposite the island of Thasos. It shared in the prosperity of the larger city, 10 m. inland, and was the point where the great Egnatian Road across Macedonia reached the sea. An aqueduct and other remains identify it with the modern Kavalla. On his second missionary journey, in obedience to the vision he had received, Paul crossed from Troas, landing at Neapolis, and proceeded thence to Philippi, where he began his European work (Ac 16 11). R. A. F.—E. C. L.

NEARIAH, nī'ā-rai'a (נֶאֱרִיָּה, ne'aryāh): 1. The head of a family descended from David (I Ch 3 22 ff.). 2. A Simeonite leader (I Ch 4 42).

NEBAI, nī'bai. See NOBAI.

NEBAIOTH, nī-be'yōth (נֶבַיִת, nebhāyōth): One of the 'sons' of Ishmael (Gn 25 13, 28 9, 36 3; I Ch 1 29), the genealogical way of stating that N. was a N. Arabian clan or tribe. The wealth of this tribe in cattle is referred to in Is 60 7, where, as in the Gn passages, it is closely associated with Kedar. The same association of N. with Kedar is found in the Assyrian inscriptions of Assurbanipal (668-626 B.C.), where the two are spoken of as Arabian tribes (cf. KAT<sup>3</sup>, p. 151). It is usual to identify N. with the Nabatean Arabs, so well-known to later history. But it is difficult to see how נְבַיִת and נֶבַח can be closely connected. It is more probable that the Nabateans appeared later on the scene, displacing the earlier Nebaioth, Kedar, etc. (cf. KAT<sup>3</sup>, p. 151 f.). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 11. E. E. N.

NEBALLAT, nī-bal'at (נֶבֶלֶט, nebhallāt): A city occupied by Benjamites after the Exile (Neh 11 34). Map III, D 5.

NEBAT, nī'bat (נֶבֶט, nebhāt): Used only in the phrase Yārobh'ām ben Nebhāt. The father of King Jeroboam, the first king of the Northern Kingdom (I K 11 26, and often). C. S. T.

NEBO, nī'bō (נֶבֹ, nebhō): 1. A town E. of the Jordan, fortified and occupied by Reubenites (Nu 32 37; Is 15 2; Jer 48 22). It was besieged and captured by King Mesha of Moab, who destroyed the altar of J' in it, and put its inhabitants to death (see Mesha Stone, lines 14 ff., under MESHA). According to Onom. 283, 142, it was situated 8 m. from Heshbon, which would point to the modern Et-teim, S. of Heshbon, as the site. 2. Supposed to be a town in Judah (same as Nob in Is 10 32), whose inhabitants (Ezr 2 29, 10 43; Neh 7 33) returned with Zerubbabel. In Ezr 2 29, however, they are called 'the children of Nebo,' which makes it questionable whether a city is meant, as 'children of' is a phrase universally used of clans, and never in prose of the inhabitants of a town. On the supposition that Nebo is here a town, its site has been fixed at Beit Nābā, just N. of Ajalon, Map III, E 5, and 12 m. NW. of Jerusalem (Buhl, Geog. Pal., p. 193). The conjecture that families from the Nebo E. of the Jordan had maintained their identity and name through the Exile and had become a postexilic clan (Bennett in HDB) is plausible, but has no support in the text. 3. Mt. Nebo (נֶבֹ, har-nebhō): A peak in the Abarim range (Nu 33 47; Dt 32 49, 34 1 [P]; in JE 'Pisgah'), from which Moses viewed the promised land just before his death. Until recently Jebel Attarus, about 10 m. NW. of Heshbon, was supposed to be Mt. Nebo. But a better knowledge of the ground leads to Nēbā, half-way between Heshbon and the N. end of the Dead Sea, Map II, J 1. While this site also scarcely harmonizes with the literal interpretation of Dt 34 1 ff., the description here must be taken as that of the land as it afterward proved to be (cf. Driver, Deut in loco in ICC). 4. A widely worshiped Semitic deity. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 27

NEBUCHADREZZAR (II), neb''yu-kād-rez'ar (נְבוּכַדְרֶצְצַר, nebhūkhadhre'tsar), NEBUCHAD-NEZZAR (Babyl-Assyr. Nabū-kudurri-ulsur), 'Nebo, defend the boundary': The king of Neo-Babylonia, or, better, Chaldea, 605-562 B.C. He was the son and successor of Nabopolassar, the real founder of the Chaldean Empire, the dynasty being of Chaldean origin. He was the second king of that name, the first having ruled in Babylon, about 1140 B.C. The first notable act of N. was, as head of the army, the defeat of Necho II of Egypt (and the last remnant of the Assyrian army!) at Carchemish in 605 B.C. (Jer 46 2). While on this campaign at Pelusium, near the borders of Egypt, N. was notified of the death of his father, and, after a hasty return, he made secure his claim to the throne. His campaign, however, won for him the control of Syria and Palestine—the beginning of empire-extension toward the southwest. Of his numerous inscriptions, the larger proportion deals with his religious achievements, reconstruction of temples, dedications to his gods, and his devotion to the whole religious system. His conquests and final destruction of Jerusalem, and his Babylonian exile of the Jews, are narrated in the O T only. During the final siege of the Jewish capital, N. met and defeated the army of Apries (Hophra O T) the Egyptian king, the ally of the Jews (Jer 37 5-8). During and after the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.), N. besieged Tyre for thirteen years (585-573 B.C.), before it acknowledged the sovereignty of Babylon. A fragment of N.'s own inscriptions indicates that he was still at war with Egypt in this thirty-seventh year (568 B.C.). In the forty-third year of his reign, he died and was succeeded by his son, Evil-Merodach. Under N. Babylon became the chief commercial, political, religious, and literary center of the Mesopotamian valley and of SW. Asia. Babylon was really N.'s creation, and the Chaldean kingdom was centered in this city. I. M. P.

NEBUSHAZBAN, neb''yu-shaz'bān (נְבוּשַׁזְבַּן, nebhūshazbān; Babyl. Nabū-she-zib-a-ni, 'Nebo, deliver me'): The name of the Rab-saris ('chief captain') in the Chaldean army at the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 13). The name is actually found in Babylonian inscriptions as that given to a son of Necho II, (609-593 B.C.) King of Egypt, as a mark of his allegiance to the king of Assyria. I. M. P.

NEBUZARADAN, neb''yu-zār-ē'dān, (נְבוּזַרְדַּן, nebhūzar'ādhān; Babyl. Nabū-zēr-iddin(a), 'Nebo has given a seed'). The chief of the body-guard of Nebuchadrezzar at the time of the fall of Jerusalem 586 B.C. (II K 25 8, 11, 20). He had charge of the captives after Jerusalem fell, and, in accord with the orders of Nebuchadrezzar, showed special favor to Jeremiah (Jer 39 11). Five years after the fall of Jerusalem he carried off 745 Jewish captives from Palestine (Jer 52 30). I. M. P.

NECROMANCER, NECROMANCY. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

NEDABIAH, [ned'ā-bai'ā (נְדַבְיָה, ndhabbyāh): A son of Jaconiah, the captive king of Judah (I Ch 3 18).

NEEDLE'S EYE: In the phrase 'it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye,' etc., found in all the Synoptics (Mk 10 25 and ||s), the term is used in an entirely figurative sense to denote the extreme difficulty of entrance into the kingdom of God on the part of the rich (cf. Bruce in Exp. Gr. Test. and Swete's Com. on Mark, in loc.). A parallel figure is found in Mt 23 24. J. M. T.

NEEDLEWORK. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 14.

NEESING (from 'neese,' an old Eng. word, now obsolete, allied to 'sneeze'): The word occurs once (Job 41 18 AV, 'sneezings' RV), and denotes the heavy breathing of the crocodile ('leviathan') basking in the sun (cf. RV).

NEGINAH, ni-gai'na; NEGINOTH, neg'i-nefh. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (4).

NEHELAMITE, ni-hel'ā-mait (נְהִלְמִי, nehēlāmī, nehlāmī): A gentile or a designation of the town or district of the false prophet Shemaiah, an exile with the Jews in Babylon, who sent a letter to Jerusalem complaining of Jeremiah's letter to the Exiles. Jeremiah prophesied that Shemaiah would die in exile (Jer 29 24, 31 f.). C. S. T.

NEHILOTH, ni'hi-lefh. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (4).

NEHUM, ni'hum (נְחֻם, nēhūm), 'comfort': The name of one of the leaders of the Exile, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh 7 7). In Ezr 2 2, the name is given as Rēhūm, which is probably correct. C. S. T.

NEHUSHTA, ni-hush'ta (נְחֻשְׁתָּה, nēhushtā): The mother of King Jehoiachin (II K 24 8-12; cf. Jer 13 18 f., 22 26).

NEHUSHTAN, ni-hush'tan (נְחֻשְׁתָּן, nēhushtān): The name of the brazen serpent destroyed by Hezekiah (II K 18 4). Altho the statement in EV is quite simple and clear, the Heb. text is not free from difficulties. The derivation and meaning of the Heb. are uncertain. The derivation from nēhōsheth, 'brass,' with the diminutive ending ān (expressive of contempt), is not so satisfactory as that from nāhāsh, 'serpent,' altho this leaves the significance of the ending tan undetermined. If we render the verb of the sentence 'it was called' instead of 'he called it,' then nēhushtān was the name by which the object was known to its worshipers. It was probably some form of serpent-worship that was carried on in connection with this object, which tradition, rightly or wrongly, identified with the brazen serpent said to have been made by Moses (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 31). That this object was worshiped in the Temple is not said, nor is it said that it was used as an image of J', as is often assumed. For various speculations concerning nēhushtān see Cheyne in EB, s.v. E. E. N.

NEIEL, ni-ai'el (נְעִיֵּל, nē'ī'ēl): A town on the border of Asher (Jos 19 27). Site not certainly known.

NEIGHBOR: The rendering of 'āmūth, 'equal' (Lv 6 2, 19 15, 24 14, 25 15), qārōbh, 'near one' (Ex 32 27), rēa', 'friend,' 'friendly companion,' more used in the O T than all the others put together (Ex 11 2; Lv 19 18, etc.), shākhēn 'fellow' inhabitant' (Ex 3 22), or 'fellow countryman' (cf. γέγων, Lk 14 12, etc.), δ πλησίον (Mk 12 31, etc.), and πλησίος (Lk 1 58). The necessity of living in villages, rather than in scattered farmhouses, for purposes of defense and the habitual residence at the same place, as distinguished from frequent removals, combine in the Biblical Orient to give the neighborhood idea a peculiar importance. The neighborhood takes a distinct place as a social unit between the family and the town as a whole, and neighbor comes to be next to kin. From this point of view, the relation was at the same time promotive of good and full of risks. Hence the provisions in the O T legislation bearing on social duties are often couched in the terms of neighborhood (Ex 20 16 f.), including even the law of love for the neighbor (Lv 19 18; cf. Lk 10 29), where the idea is used as a stepping-stone for the inculcation of the law of universal love. A. C. Z.

NEKEB, ni'keb. See ADAMI-NEKEB.

NEKODA, ni-kō'da (נְקֹדָה, nēqōdhā): 1. The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50). 2. The ancestral head of a family who could not prove their genealogy (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62).

NEMUEL, ni-miū'el (נְמוֹּעַל, nēmū'ēl): 1. The ancestral head of the Nemuelites, one of the clans of Simeon (Nu 26 12; I Ch 4 24), also called Jemuel (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15). 2. The head of a Reubenite family (Nu 26 9).

NEPHEG, ni'feg (נְפִיג, nephegh): 1. The head of a Kohathite family (Ex 6 21). 2. A son of David (II S 5 15; I Ch 3 7, 14 6).

NEPHEW. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 1.

NEPHILIM, nef'i-lim (נְפִילִים, nēphīlīm): A word of unknown etymology, rendered in the LXX. and AV by γίγαντες, 'giants,' (Gn 6 4; Nu 13 33). In Nu 13 33 the rendering 'giants'—i.e., a race of men of extraordinary size, otherwise known as 'sons of Anak'—is satisfactory (see GIANTS). But in Gn 6 4, if the statement about the nēphīlīm was an integral part of the original text, superhuman or semi-divine beings are meant (see Skinner in ICC, ad loc.). E. E. N.

NEPHTHALIM, nef'thā-lim (נְפֹתָלִים, nēphthalīm): The AV form in the N T for 'Naphtali' (Mt 4 13, 15; Rev 7 6).

NEPHTOAH, nef'to-ā (נְפִתּוֹא, nēphṭōāh): A place, more exactly 'the fountain of the waters of N.' (Jos 15 9, 18 15), which was on the border between Judah and Benjamin. It is identified with the spring Lifta in a bottom of a valley three-quarters of an hour NW. of Jerusalem, and also with Etam, now 'Ain 'Aḏān, SW. of Bethlehem. C. S. T.

NEPHUSIM, ni-fū'sim. See NAPHISH.

NER, nōr (נֹר, nēr), 'light': Saul's uncle (I S 14 50; II S 2 8; I K 2 5). According to I Ch 8 33, however, N. was the father of Kish, and therefore Saul's grandfather. There may have been two different persons of the same name. But from Jos. Ant. VI, 6 it appears that I Ch 8 33 is based on confusion of readings.

NEREUS, nī'ri-us (Νηρεύς): A Christian greeted in Ro 16 15, apparently belonging to a family of which other members are mentioned (see JULIA). The name occurs in Roman inscriptions (CIL, VI, 4344). For the later Roman legend of the Acts of Nereus and Achilleus, which may have been suggested by inscriptions, see Lipsius-Bonnet, Apok. Apostelgeschichte, II, 106 f.

NERGAL, ner'gal. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 28.

NERGAL-SHAREZER, nor'gal-shār-i'zir (נֶרְגַל־שָׂרֵצֶר, nērgal sar'etser); Babyl. Nergal-shar-utsur, 'Nergal, protect the king': The Rab-mag (q.v.) of Nebuchadrezzar at the capture of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer 39 3, 13). He was one of the officers who rescued Jeremiah from prison (Jer 39 13). In a cuneiform letter from Erech recently read we find that N. occupied high military rank in Nebuchadrezzar's reign, and that the army was not up to standard at the close of that reign. He married a daughter of Nebuchadrezzar, and thus was brother-in-law, and became successor of Evil-Merodach on the throne, under the popular name of Neriglissar, and ruled almost four years (559-556 B.C.). He was succeeded by his son, Labashi-Marduk, a mere child who was deposed after a reign of nine months.

NERI, nī'rai (Νηρέ): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 27).

NERIAH, nī-rai'ā (נֶרְיָה, nēriyyāh), 'J' is light': The father of Baruch, Jeremiah's disciple (Jer 32 12 ff., etc.).

NEST: Besides the literal and metaphorical applications of the original word (gēn, Nu 24 21; Jer 49 16; Ob 4; Hab 2 9; Job 29 18), the EVV also so translate a Greek term meaning 'lodging-place,' κατασκήνωσις (Mt 8 20; Lk 9 58).

NET. See FISHING and HUNTING.

NETAIM, nē'tā-im (נֶתַיִם, nē'tā'im): The name of a place, the seat of an ancient pottery, probably near Gederah (I Ch 4 23 RV, cf. AV and RVmg).

NETHANEL, mī-ṭhan'el (נֶתַנְאֵל, nēthan'el, Nethaneel AV), 'God has given': The name of ten individuals in the O T—all occurring in late (post-exilic) documents as follows: 1. The 'prince' of Issachar (Nu 1 8, 2 5, etc.). 2. David's brother (I Ch 2 14). 3. A priest (I Ch 15 24). 4. A Levite (I Ch 24 6). 5. A son of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 4). 6. A prince of Judah (II Ch 17 7). 7. A Levite (II Ch 35 9). 8. One of the 'sons of Pashhur' (Ezr 10 23). 9. A priest (Neh 12 21). 10. A musician (Neh 12 30).

NETHANIAH, nēth'ā-noi'ā (נֶתַנְיָהוּ, nēthanyāh), 'J' gives': 1. A chief musician (I Ch 25 2, 12). 2. A prince of Judah and father of Ishmael, the opponent of Gedaliah (II K 25 23, 25; Jer 40 8, etc.). 3. A Levite (II Ch 17 8). 4. The father of Jehudi (Jer 36 14).

NETHINIM, nēth'i-nim (נֶתְיִינִים, nēthīnim): The Hebrew word etymologically signifies 'those given,' and is applied to those who were given or dedicated to the sanctuary. It occurs frequently in postexilic literature as a designation of the slaves of the priests and Levites, who performed the menial services connected with the Temple and its ceremonies. Josephus terms them ιερόδουλοι, and the O T indicates that they were temple-slaves. They were the descendants either of Canaanites who had been reduced to forced labor or of captives of war. It was a custom in Israel to give prisoners of war to priests as their portion. This was done by Moses in the case of the Midianites (Nu 31 30, 47), and, according to Jos 9 23, the Gibeonites also were made temple-slaves. Among the names of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43-54; Neh 7 46-56) there are several pointing to an alien origin, e.g., Meunim and Nephisim. The employment of aliens as temple-slaves is severely censured by Ezekiel (44 6 f.), and was prohibited in Herod's Temple. According to Ezr 8 20 the Nethinim were organized by David; with the other ecclesiastics they were exempt from taxation and resided in special cities (Ezr 7 24, 2 70); after the Return, Ophel, opposite the water-gate, was assigned to them (Neh 3 26). Under Zerubbabel 392 Nethinim returned, while 220 accompanied Ezra (Ezr 2 58, 8 20). See also PRIESTHOOD, § 9, d.

NETOPHAH, mī-tō'fa (נֶתּוֹפָה, nētophāh), 'dropping': A town in Judah mentioned with Bethlehem and Anathoth (Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 20), reinhabited by Jews who returned with Zerubbabel. From the name is derived the gentilic Netophathite (Neh 12 28 AV Netophathi), applied to two of David's heroes (II S 23 28, 29; I Ch 11 30). Before the Exile it was inhabited by Calebites (I Ch 2 54). It is identified by some with Khurbet umm-Toba, S. of Jerusalem; by others with Beit-Nettif, W. of Jerusalem at the entrance to the Wady es-Sunf, or Vale of Elah.

NEW TESTAMENT, CANON OF. The idea conveyed by the word 'canon' is that of a collection of sacred writings regarded as authoritative.

The word 'canon' (κανών, from κάνω, 'read') means a 'straight thing' like a reed, and was applied to a 'rod,' a 'ruler,' or a 'list,' (cf. the papyrus lists of names of things arranged in a narrow vertical column). From such meanings as 'ruler,' or mason's 'rule,' it came to have the more general meaning 'rule,' 'standard.' As applied to the New Testament, it probably was originally used in the sense of

'list' to denote the list of New Testament books (cf. the 'canon of the mass,' which is a catalog of martyrs and saints; also the Eusebian 'canons,' which were lists of passages in the Gospels). But a list is in most cases intended to be correct, that is, authoritative; and in view of the other meaning of the word canon ('rule'), and of the growth of the idea of Scriptural authority, it was almost inevitable that the 'canon' of the New Testament should come to be used in the sense of an authoritative collection of Christian writings in distinction from other writings not so regarded.

1. Introductory. The Idea of Canon. Its adoption by Christians was probably influenced by the Alexandrian custom of using collections of Greek authors as models and calling them κάνονες. It is not possible to say whether the more prominent idea is that of the Scriptures as normative, or that of a defining list of Scriptural books; probably both ideas were present from the beginning. It should be noted that the phrase ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας was also used for 'the faith.'

The idea of a canon of Scripture, apart from the word 'canon,' was inherited from the Jews, and was at first expressed by other words. The earliest of these expressions is probably in II Clement, which speaks of τὰ βιβλία καὶ οἱ ἀποστολοι; but more important is the usage of Clement of Alexandria and Melito of Sardis, who adopted the word διαθήκη and who distinguish the N T as ἡ νέα διαθήκη. From this is derived the adjective ἐκδιόθηκος, used by Origen and others in the sense of 'canonical.' In Latin this became testamentum, but Tertullian preferred instrumentum. Another phrase used by Origen was θεδημοστυμέναι γραφαί, meaning especially, tho perhaps not exclusively, Scriptures which could be read publicly in church; with these were, of course, contrasted the ἀπόκρυφοι γραφαί. The earliest use of κανὼν (in the form τὰ κανονιζόμενα) is in the Festal letter of Athanasius for 367, and from that time the word became popular.

In discussing the history of the N T it is essential to observe the distinction between the use of its writings and their reception into the Canon. Documents may have existed for many years before they became canonical, and quotation by an early writer does not prove that he regarded the book as Scripture. The failure to recognize this point has sometimes led to the assignment either of impossibly late dates for the origin of various books in the N T, or of impossibly early dates for their reception into the Canon. The present article is concerned with the question of canonicity, and only incidentally with that of origin.

2. The Teaching of Jesus the Earliest N T Canon. The Canon of our Lord and of the Apostles was the Jewish Scriptures. In the N T 'scripture,' 'scriptures,' means the whole or portions of the Jewish Bible, perhaps including some apocryphal books. The only exception to this rule is II P 3 16, where there is at least a tendency to rank the Pauline writings as Scripture. II P is, however, almost certainly a pseudepigraph, and is not evidence for the first generation. At the same time, even in the earliest days of the Church, the O T did not stand as the sole authority; coordinate with it was the teaching of the Lord, as may be seen from the Pauline Epistles (e.g., I Co 7 10; I Th 4 15). Between this and the authority of the O T there was only a difference of form. The latter was an authoritative book, the former was the teaching of an authoritative person. It is uncertain precisely when the teaching of the Lord was collected into book-form, but for the present purpose the important point is that no step had been taken before the end of the 1st cent. to transfer the authority of the Lord and His teaching to documents describing Him or it, thus forming a canon.

3. Canonization of Writings Begun. In the sub-Apostolic period this transference of authority began to be made, but quite slowly. The earliest instance is probably in the Ep. Barn. 4 14, which introduces the sentence 'Many are called, but few are chosen' by 'as it is written.' This passage seems to be a direct quotation from Mt 22 14; but many scholars find difficulty in accepting this view, and think that a common apocryphal source lies behind both Mt and Ep. Barn. Much depends on the date assigned to Ep. Barn. If it was written c. 80 A.D. the former view seems less probable, but if Harnack's dating of c. 130 A.D. be accepted, there is much less to be said against it, and it ought perhaps to be adopted. A more certain instance is in the book known as II Ep. of Clement, where a document containing the sayings of the Lord is unquestionably placed on the level of Scripture. But the date of this book is very uncertain; it is not earlier than 135 A.D. and is probably later (cf. Harnack, Chron. I, 438). A little earlier in some localities there began to be marked the tendency to exalt the Apostles and their teaching. This can be seen especially in Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, c. 115 A.D. (cf. Ep. ad Magn. 7 1). Such a tendency of thought, however, could end only in the establishment of Apostolic writings as canonical by the side of the written sayings of the Lord, tho as a matter of fact this process was not completed till the next generation.

4. Gospel Canon of 140-200. Putting aside Ep. Barn. and II Clement, the first writer who places Christian writings definitely on a level with the O T is Justin Martyr, who (c. 140-150 A.D.) refers to 'Memoirs' of the Apostles, called 'Gospels' (Apol. I, 66), and in his description of an early Christian service (Apol. I, 67) ranks them with the writings of the prophets. This was the first step in the actual formation of the N T Canon. It is not easy, however, to define exactly what were the books referred to as the 'Memoirs' of the Apostles. It seems almost certain that he knew and used all the Four Gospels and possible that he was acquainted with at least one other; but an important point, which has not yet been cleared up, is whether he used them as separate documents or in the form of a harmony. It is also likely that he was acquainted with at least some of the Pauline and other Epistles; but as he probably did not regard them as 'scripture,' further definition is for the present purpose unnecessary. Almost contemporary with Justin were Papias of Hierapolis and Marcion of Rome. Papias seems to represent a more conservative attitude in that he preferred oral to written tradition, and this perhaps suggests that the Church in Rome was more progressive than that in Hierapolis. He was acquainted with documents bearing the names of Matthew and Mark and probably also with the Apocalypse and perhaps other books of the N T; but the evidence is doubtful, and in any case does not prove that he regarded them as 'scripture.'

5. Canon of Marcion. Marcion, on the other hand, went further than Justin. He established a canon consisting of 'Gospel' and 'Apostle,' which seem to have been identical, the former with our Luke and the latter with the Pauline Epistles (omitting the Pastorals); tho the text differed from ours and perhaps had been altered by him. This is really the earliest evidence for the use of the Epistles as canonical. There is plenty of earlier evidence for their existence; but until Marcion they do not seem to have been reckoned on the same level as the O T and the Gospels, so that in this respect the heretic anticipated the verdict of the Catholic Church.

6. Status of Gospels at Close of 2d Cent. Thus the evidence of the first half of the 2d cent. suggests that before its close the Church in some localities, notably in Rome, had taken the step of canonizing Apostolic writings which contained accounts of the Lord's life and teaching. A tendency can also be observed which emphasized the importance of the Apostles, but it can not be shown that this had as yet led to the actual canonization of any of their writings. A considerable advance was made in the second half of this century. The authorities which we possess for this period show that the N T Canon was becoming settled, and that it consisted of Gospels and Apostolic writings. Points which were not settled were the restriction of the Gospels to the four which are now recognized, and the limits of the Apostolic writings. Before the end of the 2d cent., however, the Four Gospels, neither more nor less, were firmly established in the West and in Africa, and the writings of Irenæus show that an extensive system of symbolism was growing up around the number four. But in Alexandria Clement (c. 190) used other gospels besides the Four (e.g., that of the Egyptians), apparently without drawing any distinction between them, tho the point is open to dispute, and in the East there is the negative evidence of Theophilus (c. 180) and the positive evidence of Tatian (c. 170), who introduced into the Syrian Church, not the fourfold Gospel, but the harmony based on it, which remained in general use until the beginning of the 5th cent. Tatian's evidence is especially valuable, as he came from Rome. It shows that, altho the Four Gospels had there a preeminent position, the emphasis laid on the fourfold canon, as against either the recognition of more gospels or the redaction of them into a harmony, belongs to the period between Justin and Irenæus (c. 180-190), the latter of whom, altho bishop of Lyons, may be taken to represent the Roman standard. The existence of the Alogi, who rejected the Fourth Gospel, is also a sign that the fourfold Gospel had for a time to face some opposition.

7. Status of Apostolic Writings at Close of 2d Cent. Turning to the Apostolic writings, the kernel of the collection was everywhere the Acts and thirteen Pauline Epistles. The only possible exception to this was in the Syrian Church. It is not at all certain that Tatian introduced these writings as canonical along with his Diatessaron; but this is not for the present purpose of great importance, as it is probable that a little later the influence of the Greek Church of Antioch brought in the 'Separated Gospels' and with them the Acts and Pauline Epistles. Certainly, until the beginning of the 5th cent. the evidence is that the Syriac Canon contained no other Apostolic writings, such as the Catholic Epistles. It is, however, remarkable that among the Pauline Epistles the Syriac Canon seems to have at first included some spurious letters connected with Corinth, still preserved in the Armenian N T, which were probably extracts from the Acta Pauli. A problem of importance, but at present insoluble, is the origin of the collection of the Pauline Epistles. It is certain that the exchange of valued books by neighboring communities was an important factor, but how the unanimity was reached which fixed on thirteen epistles is unknown. Outside the Pauline Epistles the Canon was still far from fixed. Except in the East, I Peter, I John, and the Apocalypse were generally received; but there was a considerable literature on the fringe of the Canon, some of which has been since accepted and some rejected. For the West a valuable piece of evidence is the Canon discovered by Muratori, in 1740, the earliest known list of canonical books, which is attributed by some scholars to Hippolytus, tho there is room for much doubt on this point. The evidence of this document, which originated in the Roman Church, together with that of Irenæus, Tertullian of North Africa, and Clement of Alexandria, may be exhibited in the following table, which fairly represents the Church opinion in the last quarter of the 2d cent. It should, however, be noted that the tabular form exaggerates the clearness of the evidence, which is not all equally satisfactory.

	He	II P	Ja	Jude	II Jn	III Jn	Rev	Hermas	Barn.	I Clem.	Ap Pet.
Irenæus.....	No	No	No	No	Yes	No	Yes	Yes	No	?	No

Clem. Alex. ....	Yes	No	No	Yes	Yes	No?	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes

8. Completion of Canon, from 3d to 6th Cent. It will thus be seen that at the beginning of the 3d cent. the N T Canon was fairly established with a fourfold Gospel, a collection of Pauline Epistles, and a less closely defined body of other Apostolic writings, as to which local opinion varied.

The work of the next period in the West was the definition and gradual enlargement of the list of Apostolic books. In the end Hebrews, II Peter, II and III John, and James won acceptance, owing chiefly to the belief that they had been written by Apostles, and that all Apostolic writings were authoritative. But the other books, tho lingering on in some quarters, were dropped. A somewhat eccentric list, which seems to represent some such survival, is the so called Claromontane Canon, found in Cod. D<sup>Paul</sup>, which still retains Hermas and the Apocalypse of Peter, adds the Acts of Paul, and calls Hebrews the Epistle of Barnabas, as did Tertullian and Novatian. In Alexandria the greater vagueness of the Canon in Clement's time demanded more thoroughgoing measures, and Origen (189-254) introduced a new classification of books. He divided the extant literature which had claims to be Apostolic into three classes: genuine, rejected, and doubtful. His division seems to have been that the Four Gospels, Acts, thirteen Pauline Epistles, Hebrews (with some hesitation), the Apocalypse, I Peter, and I John were recognized as genuine; certain heretical books, such as the Gospel of the Egyptians, were classed as rejected; while II and III John, James, Jude, and II Peter were doubtful. He used Hermas as Scripture, but recognized that some Christians differed from him. Eusebius of Caesarea (265-340) followed closely in Origen's footsteps, and this division of the books had much influence on the succeeding generation. One point is especially noteworthy: Origen included the Apocalypse among the genuine books, but he was not in sympathy with that kind of literature. His opponent Methodius, however, accepted also the Apocalypse of Peter. We may probably trace here the influence of the antipathy to apocalyptic literature, which grew more pronounced in the East in the succeeding generations. The Canon of the Eastern Church was ultimately the same as that of the Western, but the Palestinian and Syrian churches long rejected the Apocalypse (cf. the Decree of the Council of Laodicea in 363, the Stichometry of Nicephorus, and the List of Sixty Canonical Books). The Alexandrians hesitated; but, following the lead of Athanasius, in the end they accepted it, tho not without controversy (cf. Eus. HE, VII, 25), and gradually the Alexandrian tradition gained ground, and the Apocalypse was generally accepted. Only the Syrian Church kept a more conservative position. Even at the beginning of the 5th cent. it did not accept the minor Epistles or the Apocalypse, and these were not added to the Syriac Bible until the 6th cent., while in some Nestorian circles they probably were never adopted at all. With this exception the Canon of the N T was generally fixed in its present form before the 6th cent. It is true that in outlying districts eccentricities were still to be found, such as an occasional use of the 'Epistle to the Laodiceans' among the Pauline Epistles. In the Reformation an attack was made on some of the Catholic Epistles, and Luther relegated to an appendix to his New Testament the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistles of James and Jude, and the Book of Revelation, but these points are not of the first importance, and are outside the scope of this article.

LITERATURE: The subject may be studied especially in Zahn Gesch. d. neut. Kanon (1888-92); but one should also read Harnack's Das N T um das Jahr. 200 (1889), or the section on the Canon in his History of Dogma (Eng. transl. 1897); also Leipoldt, Neutestamentlichen Kanon (1907-8). Satisfactory statements of the main points are given in H. J. Holtzmann's Einführung in d. N T (1893), pp. 75-204, and in Jülicher's Introduction (Eng. transl. 1904), pp. 459-566. An indispensable collection of texts is given in Preuschen's Analecta (1893), pp. 129-185. Westcott's History of the Canon of the N T (1875) is still valuable, tho rather old and somewhat too apologetic. See also A. Souter, Text and Canon of the N T (1913).

NEW TESTAMENT CHRONOLOGY. In the absence of sufficient data no precise and detailed chronology of the events recorded in the New Testament is possible. The margin of uncertainty is indeed seldom very serious, but exact dating is not attainable. For the Gospel narrative our information is singularly scanty and not easily reduced to consistency. The earliest history of the Church lies in the same obscurity. Only as we advance into the second part of the Acts of the Apostles do we approach a definite chronology. Perhaps the first important event in Christian history which can be quite precisely dated is the outbreak of the Neronian persecution in 64 A.D., which already lies outside the scope of the historical writings of the New Testament.

II. THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.

I. Internal Chronology of the Gospel Narratives.

(I) Date of the Crucifixion. That the death of Jesus fell on a Friday at Passover-tide is a fixed point in all our records. According to the Fourth Gospel it took place on Nisan 14, immediately before the beginning of the Paschal Feast (Jn 13 1, 18 28, 19 14, 17-37). According to Mark, followed by the other Synoptics, Jesus had already eaten the Paschal meal with His disciples before His arrest (Mk 14 12-17), and consequently must have suffered on Nisan 15. There are, however, apparent inconsistencies in the Synoptic account which tell in favor of the Johannine date, which is now generally accepted.

(II) Duration of the Ministry according to the Synoptic Gospels. Prima facie the course of events related would not seem to extend beyond the limits of a single year, terminating about Easter. That the Ministry of Jesus did in fact last no more than a year is a view held by many both in ancient times and to-day. But there are data in the Synoptic Gospels themselves which make this view difficult.

(a) There are in any case several unfilled gaps of unknown length in the Marcan narrative (e.g. 1 13-15, 39, 6 12-30). Altho only one visit to Jerusalem is recorded there are elements in the narrative which are better intelligible if Jesus had been in the capital before the last week.

(b) Very shortly before the end of the Galilean ministry Jesus had fed a multitude in open country (Mk 6 34-44, related with varying detail again in 8 1-9), at a time when the grass was green, i.e., in early spring and probably not long before Easter (Mk 6 39). It seems difficult to find room for the events recorded between the abandonment of Galilee and the Crucifixion on the assumption that these events happened in the same spring. We conclude that the Galilean ministry ended roughly about a year before the Crucifixion.

(c) During the Galilean ministry the disciples plucked ripe ears of corn (Mk 2 23). This would only be possible between Easter and Whitsuntide. It is very unlikely that this incident is so seriously misplaced by Mark that it could be brought into the time between the Feeding of the Multitude and the Crucifixion. Hence it probably happened some months before the Feeding. At that time Jesus already had disciples and was already a marked man. Hence it was not quite at the beginning of the ministry. It would appear to be difficult to bring the Synoptic narrative as a whole within less than about 2 years.

(III) Duration of the Ministry according to the Fourth Gospel. This Gospel gives a fairly complete chronological scheme in which the course of events is punctuated by visits to Jerusalem for various Feasts. Three Passovers are mentioned (2 13; 6 4—where the reading  $\tau\delta\ \kappa\acute{\alpha}\tau\alpha$  is almost certainly genuine—11 55 sqq.). As the Ministry has already commenced, tho only in a very tentative way, before the Passover of 2 13, the period implied is somewhat over 2 years. While the correlation of the Johannine scheme with the Marcan in detail presents difficulties, the period allotted to the Ministry as a whole will fit the Marcan narrative sufficiently well.

(IV) Length of the Life of Jesus. Luke makes Jesus 'about 30 years old' at the opening of His Ministry (3 23). This is doubtless only a rough approximation. According to John 8 57 the Jews said to Jesus 'Thou art not yet 50 years old.' This may imply a theory (which is actually found outside the NT) that Jesus reached middle-age. This theory is in itself improbable, and it is perhaps not a necessary inference from the words of the Fourth Gospel.

II. Correlation of the Gospel Narratives with General Chronology.

(I) Jesus was crucified under Pontius Pilate (26-36 A.D.), in the High-Priesthood of Caiaphas (18-36 A.D.). Attempts to obtain a more precise dating by calendar computations are somewhat precarious, but they are thought to favor 29, 30, or 31 A.D. A tradition of the early Church, going back at least to Tertullian, names the consulate of the two Gemini, i.e., 29 A.D., as the date of the Crucifixion.

(II) The date of the opening of the ministry is to be inferred from the elaborate synchronism given for the appearance of John the Baptist in Lk 3 1-3. The data here given are consistent with known facts. The most precise date which the passage affords is the 15th year of Tiberius. It is natural to suppose that this is reckoned from the beginning of Tiberius' sole reign upon the death of Augustus in 14 A.D., as was usual in Syria and elsewhere. But there are several ways of reckoning the years. As Augustus died in August, strictly the 15th year of Tiberius is August 28-August 29 A.D. Counted according to the Roman calendar year, it would be January to December, 28 A.D. Counted according to the Seleucid civil year it would be October 1, 27 to September 30, 28 A.D. This last has recently been shown to be a normal way of reckoning regnal years in the province of Syria throughout the first century. If this was Luke's meaning, his date for the opening of the Ministry would be consistent with the date 29 A.D. for the Crucifixion, if the shorter reckoning of the duration of the ministry be accepted (as Luke probably intended), or with 30 A.D. if the Ministry be held to have lasted over two years.

From John 2 20 it appears that the Passover of the 46th year of the building of Herod's Temple (i.e., probably the year 27 A.D.) was believed to have fallen within the Ministry. This can not be reconciled with Luke's dating unless he be supposed to reckon Tiberius' regnal years from some point other than the customary. That he did so is the view taken by many authorities, but it leaves us in complete uncertainty about the year intended.

(III) The birth of Jesus is placed by Luke (2 2) at the time of a census held by Quirinius as Governor of Syria. The only known census held by Quirinius is that of 6-7 A.D. Clearly this is not the one intended. It has been supposed, on very slight evidence, that Quirinius may have had a previous term as Governor of Syria, about 3-1 B.C. If Jesus were born about that time he would be 'about 30 years old' in 27-28 A.D. But in any case no census is likely to have been held in those years. Tertullian states that a census of the province of Syria was held by Sentius Saturninus (9-7 B.C.). Ramsay dates this census, by inference, to 8-7 B.C., and supposes that a corresponding census for Palestine was carried out by Herod the Great in 6 B.C. About that time Quirinius was holding high command in the East for the Homonadensian War (8-5 B.C.), and it is just possible that this might account for the association of his name with the census. If such a date be accepted for the birth of Jesus it would be necessary either to allow a somewhat wide latitude to the phrase 'about 30 years old,' or to suppose that the 15th year of Tiberius is reckoned in some unusual fashion. On the other hand the date 6 B.C. would harmonize with the statement of Mt 21 sqq. that Jesus was born under Herod the Great (and, it seems to be implied, not at the very end of his reign), which is probably to be understood also from Lk 1.5. The attempt to use the 'star' of Mt as a basis for astronomical calculations is quite illusory.

III. THE APOSTOLIC AGE.

1. With the latter part of the Acts of the Apostles something like a definite chronology begins to emerge. In Ac 18.12 we learn that Gallio became Proconsul of Achaia while Paul was at Corinth during his 'Second Missionary Journey.' An inscription found at Delphi enables us to date the beginning of Gallio's term of office with a high degree of probability to the summer of 51 A.D. (see Deissmann, St. Paul, Appendix I). Again, it is regarded by competent authorities as almost certain that Felix was succeeded by Festus as Procurator of Judea (Ac 24.27) in 60 or 61, most probably the latter. This makes it possible to approximate to a definite chronology of Paul's trials and imprisonment. From these two fixed points we can construct a chronology of the latter part of Paul's career with only a narrow margin of uncertainty.

(a) 'Second Missionary Journey' (Ac 15.36-18.22). S. Galatia revisited, Macedonia, Athens, Corinth (1½ years), Antioch; 49-53 A.D. Paul arrives in Corinth shortly after the expulsion of Jews from Rome, of which the probable date is the ninth of Claudius, 49-50 A.D., and leaves it shortly after Gallio's arrival in 51.

(b) 'Third Missionary Journey' (Ac 18.23-21.30). S. Galatia, Ephesus, Corinth, Jerusalem; 54-59 A.D. Ephesus 2½ years, 55-57; the journey by Troas to Macedonia (II Cor 2.12, 13) and thence to 'Greece,' with 3 months at Corinth (no doubt Ac 20.3); and the journey via Philippi to Jerusalem, winter of 57-8 to Pentecost 59.

(c) 'Two years' imprisonment (Ac 24.17) 59-61; appeal to Cæsar shortly after Festus' accession in 61.

(d) Start for Rome, autumn 61; 3 months in Malta (Ac 28.11); arrival in Rome spring 62. Two years in Rome (Ac 28.20), 62-64 A.D.

This, it will be observed, brings us down to the outbreak of the Neronian persecution, in which according to tradition Paul fell. There is however another tradition according to which Paul was first liberated, and subsequently suffered a second imprisonment. If the succession of Festus be placed in 60 instead of 61 A.D., and the journey described in II Cor 2.12, 13 and Ac 20.1-3 somewhat curtailed in time, then it is possible to bring the two years in Rome to an end in 63 and to suppose that Paul was clear of the metropolis, perhaps in Spain, before the outbreak of persecution. He may then have been rearrested and put to death at a later stage of the persecution. But we have no data of value to go upon for these events. It is improbable that the Pastoral Epistles, which (in the opinion of the writer of this article) are not Pauline as they stand, tho incorporating Pauline material, can be used as evidence for a second imprisonment, and so far as any solid testimony goes, Paul's career ends in 63 or 64 A.D.

2. For the earlier part of Paul's career the evidence is less satisfactory. Gal 1.18-2.1 offers some information regarding the interval between his conversion and a certain fateful conference with Peter, John, and James the Lord's brother. But there are two uncertain factors here: (a) it is not certain whether the 3 years of 1.18 are to be added to the 14 years of 2.1, making a total of 17 years (or perhaps according to our less inclusive reckoning 16 or even little more than 15 years), or are included in the 14 years, reckoned from the epoch-making event of the conversion; (b) it is not agreed whether the conference described is to be identified with the 'Apostolic Council' of Ac ch. 15, or to a less formal interview which is supposed to have taken place on the occasion of the visit described in Ac 11.29-30. A recent theory is that the author of Acts has duplicated accounts of what was really only one visit, but even then the question arises, whether Ac ch. 11 or Ac ch. 15 represents the true place of this visit in the narrative. These uncertainties make any chronological scheme based on these data precarious.

The dominant view is that the conference described in Gal ch. 2 occurred between the (so called) first and second Missionary Journeys, as described in Ac ch. 15. As Paul was in Corinth by 50, after a devious and prolonged journey through Asia Minor and Macedonia, the start for the second journey can hardly be placed later than 49. For the earlier journey, through Cyprus and S. Galatia (Ac chs. 13 and 14) we have no chronological data. The proconsulate of Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (Ac 13.7) is attested epigraphically, but without indication of date. If 48 be taken as a roughly approximate date for the Jerusalem conference, then the reckoning of Gal 1.18-2.1 would give 34-35 A.D. as the latest, 31 A.D. as the earliest, date for the conversion of Paul.

3. For the chronology of the narrative of Ac chs. 1-12 we have only one clearly fixed point, the death of Agrippa I (Ac 12.20-23), 44 A.D. This permits us to date approximately the death of James son of Zebedee and the imprisonment of Peter (Ac 12.1-19). The famine mentioned in Ac 11.28 can not be dated with precision; various dates between 46 and 49 have been shown to be possible. But in any case the exact relation between the famine and the order of events is problematical. Indeed the frequent changes of scene and the absence of any precise indications of succession of events or lapse of time make the whole chronology of this period uncertain. As the conversion of Paul may fall in any year from 31 to 35 A.D., we are left uncertain whether the events from Pentecost (perhaps 29 or 30 A.D.) to the martyrdom of Stephen are to be spread over a period of 6 or 7 years, or brought within little more than a year. The visit of Paul to the Jerusalem Church recorded in Ac 9 26-29 is evidently identical with that mentioned in Gal 1 18, but the account in Ac would never have led us to suspect an interval of 3 years from the conversion. According to the varying construction of the Galatians passage it might be dated approximately to either 34 or 37 A.D.

The following may be offered as an extremely rough approximation to the chronology of this period.

Pentecost (Ac 2).....	perhaps 29 or 30 A.D.
Death of Stephen (Ac 7).....	about 31 A.D.
Missions to Samaria and to Syria (Ac 8, 11 19-21).....	years from 31 A.D. onward
Conversion of Paul (Ac 9 1-19).....	about 32 (or 35) A.D.
Paul's first visit to Jerusalem (Ac 9 26-29).....	about 34 (or 37) A.D.
Herod Agrippa's persecution (Ac 12).....	about 43 A.D.
Paul and Barnabas in Cyprus and S. Galatia (Ac 13).....	about 46-47 A.D.
Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15).....	about 48 A.D.

4. New Testament History ends with Paul's two years in Rome. Traditionally Peter as well as Paul suffered in the Neronian persecution which began in 64 A.D., but of this nothing is said in the N T. The next landmark is the Fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D.; but altho this event has left its mark on certain parts of the N T, it is not definitely alluded to except by way of forecast. It is probable that the Apocalypse reflects the persecution under Domitian, about 93-96 A.D. But all such questions are involved with the dating of the N T writings, and reference should be made to articles on the several books.

LITERATURE: For the enormous literature of this subject a general reference must be made to articles in the larger encyclopedias: in PREB, Jesus Christus by Zöckler, and Paulus by Zahn; Chronology by C. H. Turner, HDB, (the best conservative statement), and by v. Soden in EB. (highly critical). See also Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ (1890); Harnack, Chronologie der altchristl. Literatur (1897); Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? (1898), and St. Paul the Traveler and Roman Citizen (1897); Zahn, Introduction to the N T (1907), all representative recent works. In James Moffatt's Historical N T (1901) there are very complete and useful tables and summaries of recent opinions. See also The Chronology of the N T by A. L. NEW TESTAMENT, LANGUAGE OF. See GREEK LANGUAGE.

NEW TESTAMENT TEXT: 1. N T Autographs Not Extant. The Bible did not fall from heaven as a ready-made book. It was written by men; men also have copied it. God has not been pleased to protect the text miraculously from all corruption. The autographs, inscribed upon perishable papyrus, and not preserved with any special care, soon disappeared. Each copy brought into existence unintentional or intentional changes in the text. Even attempts to correct errors produced new mistakes.

2. Origin of Textus Receptus. As we must interpret the Bible, i.e., establish its original meaning, through the intelligent use of our understanding, so also we should seek to restore its original text through scientific criticism. The consciousness of this duty has never entirely left the Church since the days of the great Alexandrian and Caesarean Greek scholar Origen (lived 184-253). The exegetes of the ancient Church debated text-differences with perfect freedom. Even in the Middle Ages it was well-known that for the sake of accuracy correcting was necessary to copying, and various Bible Correctoria were actually in use. Only with printing could the idea arise that one text alone could be supreme, and this actually happened in the case of the text following the Erasmian edd. of 1516 ff., i.e., the Stephanus (1550) and the Elzevir (1624).

3. Rise of Modern Textual Criticism. But the Englishman John Mill, as early as 1707, shattered the belief in the Divine origin and infallibility of this Textus Receptus through the 30,000 variants which he counted in eighty manuscripts. During the 19th cent. the greatest progress was made in this field, especially in two respects: (1) Through Tischendorf's discovery and publication of the most important old MSS. (1841-1869), which greatly increased the apparatus in size and value over the collections of Mill, Wettstein, Matthaei, Birch, Alter, and Scholz. (2) Through the development of a method of classification of manuscripts and textual criticism by Lachmann (1842-1850) and Westcott and Hort (1881) which, founded on Bentley's Proposal (1721), far outdistanced the earlier attempts of Bengel, Griesbach, and others. While, before his day, corrections were made only here and there in the Textus Receptus, Lachmann followed the right principle in deserting this text altogether and constructing one based directly upon the ancient manuscripts and versions. It was Westcott and Hort, however, who showed in a masterly way how to estimate the historical worth of all these witnesses, and therefrom to reconstruct the text.

4. Witnesses to the Text. The fullest surveys of the extant materials for text criticism are given by F. H. A. Scrivener, C. R. Gregory, and H. von Soden. These are: (1) The Greek manuscripts, which are divided according to the character of the writing into Majuscules, or Uncials (3rd-10th cent.), and Minuscules (9th-15th cent.), the former being designated in the lists by capital letters, the latter by numbers (a more complicated system has been adopted by von Soden). The most important manuscripts are these: four that originally comprised the whole N T, viz.; the Vaticanus (B) and Sinaiticus (K) of the 4th cent., the Alexandrinus (A) and Ephraemi Syri Rescriptus (C) of the 5th cent.; the Washington (Freer) of the 5th cent., containing the Gospels, the Koridethi of the 8th cent., containing the Gospels; and two bilingual (Greek and Latin) manuscripts, once in the possession of Beza, the Cantabrigiensis (D), containing the Gospels and Acts, and the Claromontanus (D or D2), containing Paul's Epistles, of the 5th or 6th cent. (2) The Ancient Versions. Of these the most important are the Latin, the Syriac, and the Coptic—of which the old Latin is not later in origin than the middle of the 2nd cent., the old-Syriac dates from about A.D. 200, and the Southern Coptic (i.e., Sahidic) can not be later than the 4th cent. Of secondary importance are the Gothic, Armenian, Georgian, and Ethiopic, of the 4th and 5th centuries. These versions have been preserved in manuscripts various in contents and date, with many variations in readings, and should, therefore, be used only in the critical editions of Oxford and Cambridge (the Vulgate by Wordsworth and White, 1889 ff., the Old-Syriac by Burkitt, 1904, the Peshitta by Gwiliam, 1901, the North-Coptic (Bohairic) by Horner, 1898 ff., the South-Coptic (Sahidic) by Horner, 1911 ff.). As these versions generally experienced continual revision, on the basis of Greek texts, they reflect, in their variations, the development of the original text itself. (3) The Patristic Quotations. Since these, in the long process of manuscript copying, were often accommodated to the standard biblical text as known to the copyists, it is necessary in their case also to use only the critical editions, especially those of Cambridge Texts and Studies, Texte und Untersuchungen (Leipzig), of the Vienna Academy (for Latin) and the Berlin Academy (for Greek) (see, for example, Barnard's excellent study, The Biblical Text of Clement of Alexandria, in Cambridge Texts and Studies, vol. v. 5, 1899). If the versions serve to determine the readings which were referred to in the church of any given province, and thus help to localize a text, so the patristic quotations help to date as well as localize it, by enabling one to follow back even to the 2d cent. a reading for which, among the manuscripts, there may be only late witnesses or, perhaps, no witness at all. Just as the text of manuscripts which include several parts of the N T differs in purity and character for the Gospels, Paul, Acts and Cath. Epp., and the Apocalypse, so the versions and the patristic quotations vary in value, according as the versions are careful renderings of the Greek in the one case, and the patristic quotations are exactly taken from a copy of a scripture book in front of their authors in the other.

5. Principles of Criticism. How is the value of the testimony offered by this material to be ascertained? It is not sufficient merely to add up the witnesses for and against a reading; they must be weighed. Nor does age decide; often witnesses of equal age stand opposed to each other. A late manuscript may have been copied from a very old one, and contain a text better than that of an older manuscript that happens to be extant. The witnesses must be grouped genealogically (the safest criterion of relationship is community of error), since the later manuscripts are to be referred back to earlier (extant or lost) originals (e.g., the so called Ferrar Group, consisting of Gospel-manuscripts 13, 69, 124, 230, 346, 543, 788, 826, 828, 983, 1689, 1709, all derived from a lost Calabrian MS. (probably) of the 9th cent.). Most N T MSS., however, contain mixed texts, agreeing now with this, now with that group. Consequently it is the ever-changing grouping that decides. When NBD agree, their reading is generally correct. Less certain is the grouping NB against D, or ND against B, or BD against N. In the Epp. of Paul NAC is stronger than BDG. Furthermore, the groups must be arranged according to the history of the text. It is comparatively easy to distinguish certain late recensions. Rejecting these, we concentrate on the old types of text current in the several great geographical divisions of the Church, the Alexandrian, Antiochian, and Cæsarean (these three underlying the recensions respectively of Hesychius, Lucian and, Pamphilus), and the Western. This may be illustrated by the following diagram:

x = Original text.
a = text current in the churches of Egypt. 2d and 3d cents.	b = text current at Antioch. 2d and 3d cents.	c = text current at Cæsarea. 2d and 3d cents.	w = 'Western' text, never subjected to a scholarly revision
Hesychius's recension. c. 300 A.D.?	Lucian's recension. (†312 A.D.)	Pamphilus's recension. (†309 A.D.)

Later Antiochian
recension c. 350 A.D.

Hesychius preferred a short text; Lucian a rich one (with many conflate readings); Pamphilus a good style.

The fact that the 'Western' text was never revised explains the indefinite and fluctuating character of the witnesses to this type of text. Westcott and Hort believed that in B we have the representative of a neutral text, and they are probably not far wrong. Since their day abundant papyrus evidence has shown that this was the prevalent type of text in Egypt, which, being a sheltered district, with a splendid scholarly tradition, was more likely to preserve a pure text than any other region of the Roman Empire. It is perhaps more than a possibility that Origen had something to do with its preservation. On the other hand, the 'Western' text has gained in importance; because it is now known that it was widely current in most ancient times, especially since the discovery, by Mrs. Lewis, in 1892, of the Sinai-Syriac text. Blass, Bousset, Burkitt, Lagarde, Nestle, Wellhausen, and others are enthusiastic advocates of this Syro-Latin text. The agreement of the Old-Latin MS. k (representing the text in use at Carthage about 200-250 A.D.) and the Sinaitic-Syriac MS. (representing the text in use at Antioch about 200 A.D.) must never be despised. The truth is that the external witnesses alone do not decide. The history of the text shows that practically all the most important variants were widely current as early as the 2d cent. The 3d and 4th cents. produced only new combinations on the basis of material that was already to hand. The decision rests finally upon the internal probabilities. We have to ask, which reading is the one from which it is most probable that the others were derived? For example, in Mk 1 41 the reading 'aroused to anger' (D) is more likely to be original than 'being moved with compassion,' because later reverence rejected the more human touch. Again in I Th 3 2 Paul calls Timothy the 'fellow worker of God' (D). At this offense was taken and it was corrected to 'fellow worker,' i.e., with us (B), or 'servant of God' (N). Later copyists, before whom lay both readings, combined them, in some instances mechanically, as 'God's servant and fellow worker' (G), or, with more insight, as 'God's minister and our fellow worker'

(K L Chrys.). Hence the value of Bengel's Canon: Proclivi lectioni praeferat ardua ('the difficult reading is to be preferred to the easy'). Copyists are inclined to make readings smooth or more intelligible. Therefore the text that causes difficulty or gives offense is to be considered the more original; also nearly always the text that is shorter, simpler, or less elegant. The tendency to improve the style is especially noticeable in the quotations by the Fathers. Furthermore, the context and the style of the Biblical author must be taken into account. Copyists familiar with the Bible are easily misled into making similar passages more nearly alike. O T quotations made in the N T were apt to be brought into harmony with the O T readings as known to the scribes. The first three Gospels were especially subject to this harmonizing process. In particular, there was a tendency to conform Mk and Lk to Mt, because Mt usually came first in copies of the fourfold Gospel, and seems to have been the favorite in the early centuries. Thus the shorter text of the Lord's Prayer in Lk 11 2-4 was often supplemented according to the longer text of Mt 6 9-13.

6. Importance of Textual Criticism for Other Disciplines. B. Weiss is altogether right, therefore, in claiming that textual criticism can not be carried on safely apart from exegesis, nor may it be dissociated from literary criticism. If, for example, Mt and Lk used our Mk, as is now generally becoming recognized, they can be of service as the oldest text-critical witnesses for Mk. On the other hand, it is a service rendered to literary criticism if it be proved by textual criticism that some verbal parallels between Mt and Lk originally did not exist, that Mk 16 9-20 and Jn 7 53-8 11 do not belong to these Gospels, or that in Eph 1 1 the words 'at Ephesus' were not in the original text. The text of the N T has also been influenced by dogmatic interests. The opposing parties in the ancient Church accused each other of falsifying the text, and even to-day we are able to detect in the MSS. we have the intrusion of dogmatic corrections. For example, the Cappadocian fathers Basil and Gregory (of Nazianzus), who were strenuous advocates of the doctrine of the Trinity, read at I Co 8 6 an addition concerning the Holy Spirit; while the famous Trinitarian passage 1 Jn 5 7 is of Latin origin, and can not be traced farther back than Priscillian, a Spanish writer who died in 385 A.D. A very slight scribal alteration in I Ti 3 16 had a far-reaching dogmatic significance. OC, 'who' being read as, or altered into, ΘC, (the usual abbreviation for ΘEOC 'God'). Cf. also the variants at Mt 1 16; Jn 1 18; Ac 20 28. It was in the interest of asceticism that in Lk 2 36 the 'seven years' were shortened to 'seven days,' in Mt 3 4 the 'locusts' were altered into 'honey-cakes,' and at Mk 9 29 to 'prayer' was added 'and fasting.'

7. Value of Conjecture. In spite of the large content of the tradition and the quantity especially of Greek MSS., it is not at all impossible that at some places the original text is lost and can be restored only through conjecture. So, for example, Origen conjectured that at Jn 1 28 'Bethabara' should be read for 'Bethany;' at Mk 8 10 the reference to 'the parts of Dalmanutha' is an unsolved problem, and many attempts have been made to recover the true text; and Jerome approved 'Banereem' for the difficult 'Boanerges' of Mk 3 17; Westcott and Hort, with others, consider that at Col 2 18 and 23 all extant texts are corrupt. Conjectural criticism is not to be rejected because of its abuse in the hands of some, particularly Dutch critics.

8. The External Form of the Text. Our oldest MSS. are not punctuated, nor are there any spaces between the words. The punctuation and word-division of the later MSS. are not always to be taken as correct. At least as early as the 4th cent. attempts were made at several chapter-divisions. The one now current was the work of Stephen Langton of the 13th cent. Our verse-division originated with the printer Robertus Stephanus, 1551. The super- and subscriptions to the different books, which vary greatly in the MSS., are none of them original. The notices as to the dates of the Gospels, the place of writing, and bearers of the Epistles are not earlier than the 4th cent.

9. Modern Versions. The translations now in common use in Protestant churches were made, for the most part, in the time of the Reformation and are based upon the Erasmanian Textus Receptus. As it then marked a great advance to set forth a translation based on the original Greek text in the place of the medieval ones that were derived from the Vulgate, so the present time demands a translation based upon a critically corrected text. A praiseworthy beginning has here been made by the English and American Revised Versions. The modern translations of Dr. Weymouth, the Twentieth Century, of Dr. Moffatt, and of Dr. Goodspeed are all based upon a careful study of the N T text.

NEZIAH, nī-zai'a (נִזְיָה, nētsiāh), 'excellent': The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56).

NEZIB, nī'zib (נִזְיָה, nētsibh): A town of Judah (Jos 15 43). Map II, D 2.

NIBHAZ, nib'haz. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 28.

NIBSHAN, nib'shan (נִבְשָׁן, nibhshān): A city in the wilderness of Judah (Jos 15 62). Site unknown.

NICANOR, nai-kē'nar (Νικάνωρ): 1. A general of Antiochus Epiphanes and afterward of Demetrius I, defeated and slain by the forces of Judas Maccabeus at Beth-horon in March, 161 B.C. (I Mac 7 39-50; II Mac 15 36 ff.; Jos. Ant. XII, 10 5). The day of his defeat was celebrated annually as 'Nicanor's Day.' 2. One of the seven deacons appointed in Ac 6 5. For later legends concerning him, see Baronius, Annales, I, 34, cccix. J. M. T.

NICODEMUS, nik'o-dī'mos (Νικόδημος): A Pharisee and member of the Sanhedrin, who visited Jesus by night when the latter opened His ministry in Jerusalem (Jn 3 1 ff.). As a well-meaning Pharisee, he was impressed, doubtless, by the interest shown in the preaching of John the Baptist, and Jesus' first public appearance in Jerusalem attracted his serious attention. With others, he was convinced that Jesus was 'a teacher come from God.' It was Jesus' 'signs' that had so convinced him. For his own satisfaction he sought an interview with Jesus and chose the night-time as perhaps most convenient, possibly in order to avoid criticism on the part of his fellow Sanhedrists. The conversation is evidently only partially reported in the account in the Fourth Gospel. But the salient points are evidently reproduced. N. was a sincere Pharisee with the general theological and religious conceptions of that sect. He probably inquired about the 'kingdom of God' with no question in his own mind as to his own full right to membership therein. Jesus' answer was intended to open N.'s mind to the inadequacy of the whole Pharisaic position, and He did this by pointing out that it is the spiritual condition of one's heart that determines his membership in the Kingdom and nothing else. When N. shows himself slow to take this in, Jesus gently rebukes him for claiming to be a 'teacher of Israel' and not knowing these elementary ('earthly') things. The immediate result of the conversation is not known. We next hear of N. in connection with Jesus' visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles, six months before His crucifixion and eighteen months after the conversation of Jn 3 1 ff. At this time N. stands out in the Sanhedrin for a fairer treatment of Jesus than that court was inclined to give Him (Jn 7 50 f.). Six months later N. and Joseph of Arimathea, another member of the Sanhedrin, cared for the body of the crucified Jesus and saw that it was decently buried instead of being exposed on the cross over the Sabbath (Jn 19 39). These last two incidents indicate a sincere appreciation by N. of the purity of Jesus' motives and respect, if not affection, for Him personally. That N. later became a Christian is not stated in the N T, but it is altogether probable. He was so viewed in early Christian legend, and a late Apocryphal Gospel (also called Acts of Pilate) attributed to him was once current in Christian circles (cf. HDB, vol. III, pp. 544-547). E. E. N.

NICOLAITANS, nik'o-lē'i-tanz (Νικολαῖται): A sect of Christians mentioned in the Apocalypse (Rev 2 6, 15). Their words are said to have been abhorrent to the church at Ephesus. But at Pergamum their teaching was tolerated, contrary to the Lord's desire. What their teaching or work was is not clear, altho the fact that they are named in the same connection with Balaam (2 14) indicates, in general, a form of antinomianism. As to how they got their name, there is a great difference of opinion. Some have suggested that 'Nicolaitan' is another name for Pauline Christian, and that the passage is an attack on Paul (Van Maanen, Paulus, 1891, II, pp. 244-251). But that Pauline Christians should be hated by the Ephesian Church is not to be thought of. Some take Nicolaitan to be the Greek equivalent of Balaamite (both words meaning 'one who overcomes (destroys) the people.' It is more natural to derive it from Nicolas without reference to its Heb. equivalent. As there is only one man of the name in the Apostolic Age (Ac 6 5), tradition early fixed on him as the founder of the sect, upon the assumption that he had apostatized. This, however, can not be regarded as certain. As a matter of fact, there was a sect of Gnostic Nicolaitans in the 2d cent. A.D.; but its connection with Nicolas of Antioch, the deacon, is probably fictitious. Either the heresiarch was another Nicolas or the sect took the name from a desire to trace its origin to an Apostolic man. A. C. Z.

NICOLAS, nik'o-las (Νικόλαος): One of the seven chosen to deal with the complaint of the Hellenistic widows, a proselyte from Antioch in Syria, and probably, as his name indicates, a Greek (Ac 6 5). Nothing further concerning him is certainly known; but Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and other sources of tradition, probably on insufficient grounds, and not without strong dissent from other contemporary writers, connect the Nicolaitans (Rev 2 6, 15) with him. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

NICOPOLIS, ni-kep'o-lis (Νικόπολις, 'city of victory'): A city of Greece, where Paul planned to spend the winter and directed Titus to meet him (Tit 3 12). There were numerous cities of this name, but doubtless that in Epirus on the E. coast of the Ionian Sea, situated on the promontory opposite Actium, enclosing the Ambracian Gulf on the NW., is meant. After his victory over Antony in 31 B.C. Augustus founded this city both to commemorate that event and as a center of new Hellenic life, and under imperial patronage it soon grew in magnificence and political importance. Quadrennial games were instituted in honor of the Actian Apollo, and they ranked with the other four athletic festivals of Greece. The teaching of Epictetus also brought it renown. Paul probably found it a good center for evangelizing the west of Greece, and may have been arrested here before his second imprisonment. R. A. F.—E. C. L.

NIGER, nai'jər (Νίγερ): The gentile name of a certain Simeon, who was prominent in the early church life of Antioch (Ac 13 1). Nothing more is known of him.

NIGHT. See TIME, § 1.

NIGHT-HAWK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

NIGHT MONSTER: The rendering of the Heb. lilith (Is 34 14, screech-owl AV). In Babylonian belief Lilith was originally a female evil demon, and then considered as particularly the demon of the night. The Biblical writers often made use of such popular beliefs in enforcing or illustrating their own higher teaching. E. E. N.

NILE: The classic name of the great river of Egypt. It is used from the days of Hesiod onward (Νεῖλος), but occurs nowhere in the AV, tho it appears in RV in Is 19 7, 8, 23 3, 10; Jer 46 7, 8, and Zec 10 11. Neither does it occur in the Heb. O T. Moreover it has no Egyptian or Semitic cognates. Efforts to connect it with the Phenician nahal (Movers), or the general Semitic nāhār (Lepsius), have not been regarded as successful. The Egyptians called the river H'p (Hapi), and personified it in a god of human form, characterized by masculine and feminine features. This Nile god is also represented as wearing a bunch of aquatic plants and the girdle of a fisherman. In the Biblical text the Nile is mentioned simply as "The River" (hayyē'ôr and yē'ôr, modified from the Egyptian Iotr, Io'r, and with the article; also Shihor, Is 23 3, 'Nile' RV; Jer 2 18, Shihor AV. By some the Gihon of Gn 2 13 is supposed to be the Nile.

The Nile has always occupied a distinguished place among the great streams of the world, chiefly because it furnishes the basis of the life of Egypt. It has been truly said, 'Egypt is the gift of the Nile'; for not only is the river essential to the productiveness of the soil as a means of irrigation, but it is the very source of that soil, which it brings in solution from the interior of Africa, and deposits on each side of its channel during its period of inundation. The exact length of the river was unknown to the ancients, its sources being regarded as shrouded in mystery. Its regular and periodical rise and fall were, however, accurately understood and utilized. At Cairo the inundation begins with the first days of June and reaches its height about the 1st of October; it then recedes until April. It changes its color from white, when low, to ruddy, and then to green, when it becomes unwholesome on account of decaying vegetable matter. As it falls it becomes ruddy again, and finally white.

Nile God.

NIMRAH, nim'ra. See BETH-NIMRAH.

NIMRIM, nim'rim (נִמְרִים, nimrīm), or more exactly 'the waters of Nimrim': The context in Is 15 6, Jer 48 34 suggests a well-watered and fertile region in Southern Moab. Eusebius identified N. with a town, Benmamereim, N. of Zoar. The name is found to-day in Wādy Numêre, at the SE. end of the Dead Sea, and higher up, at the source of the Wādy, are found the ruins of a town in what is still a well-watered and fertile region. C. S. T.

NIMROD, nim'rod (נִמְרוֹד, nimrōdh): One of the great characters of Gn ch. 10. He was a son of Cush, and 'began to be a mighty one in the earth' (ver. 8). Tho the other sons of Cush (ver. 7) were peoples, Nimrod possessed all the marks of an individual. 'He was a mighty hunter before Jehovah' (ver. 9). His imperial sway extended over 'Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh (Is 10 9, 'Calno'), in the land of Shinar' (ver. 10). 'Out of that land he went forth into Assyria, and builded Nineveh, and Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah (the same is the great city)' (vs. 11, 12). He is thus distinguished as a hunter, a ruler, and a builder of extraordinary ability. We find also in Mic 5 5 that the land of Nimrod is in parallel with the land of Assyria.

Various attempts have been made to identify this ancient Biblical hero with some of the legendary characters in early Babylonian inscriptions. One of the plausible identifications is that with the Babylonian national hero, Gilgamesh (formerly read 'Izdubar'), when we consider the herculean tasks performed by him. From the view-point of his renown as a mighty hunter, and the possible linguistic similarities, the identification of him with Ninib, transliterated into Aramaic as נִינִיב, and read Namurtu by Jensen (KB VI, 2, p. 12, l. 44) is not wholly improbable. No identification hitherto made, however, is entirely satisfactory. The presence in Assyria of many names in which this name Nimrod is preserved testifies to the real basis of the legends and traditions still extant. I. M. P.

NIMSHI, nim'shai (נִמְשִׁי, nimshī): The father of Jehu, King of Israel (I K 19 16, etc.).

NINEVEH, nin'-vā (נִינְוָה, nīn'wēh), Assy. Ni-na-a, Ni-nu-a: 1. Nineveh in Its Glory. The last eastern capital of the Assyrian Empire, located on the E. bank of the upper Tigris, opposite the site of the modern city of Mosul. The building of Nineveh is attributed to Nimrod. Gn 10 11 f. reads: 'Out of that land [Shinar] he went forth into Assyria and builded Nineveh, and Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah, and Resen between Nineveh and Calah (the same is the great city).' Its beginnings reach into the third millennium B.C. From 885 B.C., the beginning of the reign of Assurnatsirpal, it was one of the regular residence cities of the Assyrian kings. But not until the time of Sargon II (722-705 B.C.) does it seem to have been promoted to the position of real capital of the empire; even then this king built his great palace at Khorsabad, a suburb to the N. of the chief city. Sennacherib was apparently the first king who made this city exclusively his residence. His son and successor Esarhaddon, and his grandson Assurbanipal, likewise made N. their royal capital, and erected therein palaces of stupendous and magnificent proportions.

2. Nineveh Fallen. The glory of Nineveh waned with the decline of the Assyrian power. According to the Nabopolassar Chronicle, this first Neo-Babylonian king, 'the king of Akkad,' battled with the Assyrian army from 616-612; finally, in alliance with the Ummān Manda (the Medes from the N. and NE.), the combined armies crushed Nineveh, the Eastern capital in 612 B.C. Assyria's Western capital, Harran, was probably existent until about 605 B.C. The prophecies of Nahum (ch. 2 f.) and Zephaniah (2 13-15) paint in realistic colors the tragedy that overwhelmed the great lion of the nations. The catastrophe was so disastrous and the results so complete that Xenophon with his 10,000 Greeks, who passed the ruins in the beginning of the 4th cent. B.C., could not ascertain what they represented. From that date almost to the middle of the last century, the identity of these ruins was a mystery to every traveler who saw them.

3. Nineveh Uncovered.

It was in 1820 A.D. that Rich, an Englishman, resident at Bagdad, after careful examination of the ruins, was the first to conclude that they represented all that remained of ancient Nineveh. In 1842 Botta began excavations on this site, but soon transferred his activity to Khorsabad, about 10 m. to the north, where he uncovered parts of Sargon's palace. Between 1845 and 1850 Layard uncovered a part of the palace of Shalmaneser III at Nimroud, about 18 m. S. of Mōsul, and also identified the site of ancient Nineveh just across the Tigris from Mōsul, by bringing to light some of the palaces of its last three great kings. The actual ruins of Nineveh consist of two mounds separated by the stream Khosr. One of these, Kuyunjik, on the north, was found by Layard to have covered the palaces of Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) and Assurbanipal (668-626 B.C.); and the other, Nebi Yūnus ('prophet Jonah,' for a tradition says he was buried here), covered the palaces of Sennacherib and Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.). These royal residences were built in magnificent proportions, and their ruins were found to be vast storehouses of valuable antiquities, including thousands of clay tablets, cylinders, bas-reliefs, statues, and other objects of genuine interest. The wall line of old Nineveh has been carefully traced, and the walled city has been found to have been about 3 m. in length and from 1 to 1½ m. in width, containing on a conservative estimate about 3 sq. m., or a little more than 1,800 acres of ground. On one of the cylinders of Sennacherib (B. M. 103,000) we find that Nineveh had fifteen gates piercing its walls, seven on the S. and E. sides, three on the N. and five on the W., each bearing a significant name, and together specifying the ruling divinities, the character of the king, the guardianship of trade, tribute, etc. If the statements of the Book of Jonah (3 3, 4 11) regarding

Nineveh's size and population are to be considered, we must conceive of the capital as covering in the mind of the writer the whole stretch of territory embraced within these adjacent suburban cities, viz.: Calah, 18 m. S. on the E. bank of the Tigris, Resen, and Rehoboth-ir, all, as we remember, included in the record of Gn 10 11 f. Then almost due N., about 10 m. distant, stood the palace of Sargon II, nearly as large as Calah, and to the E. about 7 m. another town still unidentified. The inclusion of these towns with their territory and populations would amply satisfy the largest requirements. (But see JONAH, BOOK OF.)

NITER: The Hebrew nether or Greek νίτρον is not what is now called 'niter,' i.e., saltpeter (potassium nitrate), but common washing soda (sodium carbonate) properly known as natron. It is found in many parts of the world as a deposit of alkaline lakes, notably in the famous natron lakes of Egypt, 60 miles WNW. of Cairo, and also in Syria and Asia Minor. When an acid, such as vinegar, is poured upon soda it produces effervescence (Pr 25 20 'soda' RV). The RV renders 'lye' in Jer 2 22. E. C. L.

NO, NO-AMMON, nō'-ē'men (נֹ, nō', נֹחַ nō', nō' ammōn): A great city in Upper Egypt known to the classical writers under the name of Thebes. Its Egyptian name was n't, n't-m'n. Tho Thebes was the capital of Egypt as early as the 11th dynasty, its period of glory really began with the New Empire (16th cent. B.C.). It was enlarged and embellished by the kings of the 18th and 19th dynasties, and even when their later successors moved their residence into Northern Egypt, Amōn worship with its powerful priesthood maintained for Thebes a controlling influence in the affairs of the state. Thebes, however, began to decline after the repeated occupations of it by the Ethiopians in the 8th cent. It was captured both by Esarhaddon (670 B.C.) and Assurbanipal (perhaps in 667 B.C. and certainly in 663) at which time it was sacked and despoiled of its glory and from this attack it never recovered. Nah 3 8 alludes to one of these events, tho it is quite uncertain to which. In the days of Jeremiah (46 25) and of Ezekiel (30 14 ff.), it was still known as a populous city. But these prophets predicted its final collapse. Its significance ceased under the Ptolemies. Since then the site has been occupied only by a group of small villages on both sides of the Nile, which, however, abound in magnificent ruins (Luxor, Karnak, and Medinet-habu). A. C. Z.

NOADIAH, nō'-dai'a (נֹדִיָּה, nō'adhyāh): 1. A Levite (Ezr 8 33). 2. A prophetess who opposed Nehemiah (Neh 6 14).

NOAH, nō'a (נֹחַ, nōah, Noe in the Gospels AV, 'rest,' but, according to the explanation of the Heb. writer, 'comfort' in Gn 5 29): 1. One of the ancient patriarchs, the tenth in order of descent beginning with Adam (Gn ch. 5 P) and the hero of the Biblical Flood-story (in both J and P). The story of Noah is interwoven in that of the Flood (q.v.). The Noah (Sit Napishti) of the Babylonian flood-legend is immediately after the Flood glorified. Of this there is an echo in Gn 6 9 (cf. Gn 5 22). Noah is further said to have been the discoverer of the culture of the vine and of wine-making (Gn 9 20-29). 2. One of the daughters of Zelophehad (Nu 26 33; Jos 17 3). A. C. Z.

NOAH, APOCALYPSE OF: A lost apocalyptic writing, fragments of which have been incorporated in the Book of Enoch. The name and traditional character of Noah were, for obvious reasons, used by the apocalyptists in the same way as those of Enoch. But the nearness of the traditional dates of the two ancients and their similarity led to the merging of the Apocalypse of Noah into that of Enoch. That there was a separate book supposed to be written by Noah is explicitly stated by the Little Genesis or Book of Jubilees (10 13; cf. also Jub. 21 10). But whether this was the book incorporated in Enoch is a matter of conjecture. The Apocalypse of Noah consists of chs. 60, 65-69 25, and 106, 107 of Eth. Enoch, and is more usually known under the name of The Noachic Fragments. It bears unmistakable marks of having at one time existed in a separate form. Ch. 65, for instance, begins with Enoch as the speaker, but quite abruptly in ver. 5 the narrator appears to be Noah himself. In ch. 60 it is the 500th year that is cited as the starting-point; but Enoch was in his 365th year translated, and the Flood took place in the 500th year of Noah. These fragments can be put together into an approximate unity, but the complete reconstruction of the original book is, of course, not possible. The book contains accounts of the Flood (chs. 60, 65-67 3), of the punishment of the sinful angels (67 4-69 25), and of the wonders accompanying the birth of Noah (chs. 106, 107). A. C. Z.

NOB, nob (נֹב, nōbh): A priestly city (I S 22 11, 19), the home of the descendants of Eli (I S 14 3, Ahijah = Ahimelech), with a sanctuary and ephod (21 1 ff.), perhaps founded after the destruction of Shiloh. David rested here in his flight from Saul at Gibeah, and later all the priests were slain by Doeg, at Saul's command, and the city destroyed. N. seems to have been between Gibeah and Adullam, where David hid himself (22 1). According to Neh 11 32 there was a Nob in Benjamin near Anathoth, and in Is 10 32 a place of the same name is mentioned which must have been on a hill immediately to the N. of Jerusalem. The same location would answer for the three references, altho as yet no trace of a N. near Jerusalem has been found. Jerome mentions a Nābe, near Lydda, the modern Bēt Nābā, 10 m. SE. of Lydda, but this place is too far N. and W. for the account in I S 21 ff. C. S. T.

NOBAH, nō'ba (נֹבָה, nōbah): I. The name of a Manassite clan which captured the town Kenath (the modern Kanawāt), evidently on their NE. boundary, in the Hauran (I Ch 2 23) toward Aram, to which the clan gave its own name Nobah (Nu 32 42). II. 1. Nobah (Nu 32 42); see I. 2. A town on a road in Gilead, named with Jogbehah (Jg 8 11), perhaps the original home of the clan referred to in I, above. C. S. T.

NOBAI, nō'bai (נֹבַי, nōbay), in AV and RVmg. Nebai (the Q'rē): One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 19 [20]). C. S. T.

NOBLE: This term renders Heb. and Gr. words as follows: (1) 'addār, 'mighty' (Jer 30 21, 'prince' RV; Nah 3 18); (2) gādhōl, 'great' (Jon 3 7); (3) hōr, 'free-born,' noble in the strict sense (I K 21 8; Ec 10 17, etc.); (4) yaqqār, 'precious' (Ezr 4 10); (5) nāghīdh, 'leader' (Job 29 10); (6) nādhīb, 'liberal' (Nu 21 18; Ps 83 11), and (7) εὐγενής, 'well-born' (Ac 17 11; I Co 1 26). A. C. Z.

NOBLEMAN: The rendering of two Gr. words: (1) εὐγενής, 'well-born,' which is comparatively rare in the N. T. In Lk 19 12 there may be an allusion to the journey of Herod Antipas to Rome to secure the rank and title of King (cf. Jos. Ant. XVII, 9 4). (2) βασιλικός, which in Jn 4 46 is rendered 'nobleman' and probably means an officer in the royal household. J. M. T.

NOD, nōd (נֹד, nōdh): The land of 'wandering' (cf. nādh, 'wanderer,' vs. 12, 14). It is represented as a land E. of Eden, in which Cain settled when he fled from the presence of J' (Gn 4 16). C. S. T.

NODAB, nō'dab (נֹדָב, nōdhābh): The name of a tribe mentioned with two Ishmaelite tribes E. of the Jordan, with whom Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh had war (I Ch 5 10). C. S. T.

NOE, nōi (Nōs): The AV form of the word 'Noah' (q.v.) in the N T (Mt 24 37, etc.)

NOGAH, nō'ga (נֹגַח, nōghah): A son of David (I Ch 37, 14 6).

NOHAH, nō'ha (נֹחַ, nōhāh), 'rest': The ancestral head of a Benjamite family or clan (I Ch 8 2).

NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE: 1. Origin and General Nature. This is the designation of that type of life in which the main source and means of support is the raising of herds of cattle or flocks of sheep and goats. Such a mode of life is purely pastoral when private ownership of land is recognized; but it becomes pastoral and at the same time nomadic when all land is held as common property and the pasturage and water needed by herd and flock are regarded free to the first comer just as air, sunlight, and navigable waterways are in modern civilization. When this is the case the shepherd community, finding the nourishment necessary for its flocks and herds exhausted in one region, moves to another, and a nomad life results ('nomad' = Gr νομας, from νέμειν, 'to graze'). The conditions for the development of this type of life are particularly favorable in the great inland territory of Arabia, which abounds in rocky plateaux and hill slopes, with a thin layer of soil ill adapted to purposes of cultivation, but yielding an annual crop of vegetation which can best be used as it stands as food for grazing animals. Thus from the earliest period the inhabitants of Arabia appear to have been nomads. In early history they made themselves felt as far as Egypt, invading that country as a horde of shepherds, and for a time holding it under complete control (the dynasties of the Shepherd Kings, or Hyksos). The inhabitants of Arabia were for the most part a Semitic people, and Semitic tradition carries nomad life back to the very beginnings of the world's history. It represents Abel as a shepherd and ascribes the beginnings of migratory life to Jabal (Gn 4 20).

2. The Hebrews Originally Nomads. That the Israelites, after they had settled in Palestine, looked upon themselves as immigrants is shown by the very name they took to themselves. (See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 9 and 13, under Eber.) Abraham, tho represented as leaving a city in Mesopotamia, spent his life in tents and was the owner of large flocks as well as the head of a roving tribe. Lot, Ishmael, Jacob, and Esau are also represented as heads of tribes wandering about the country with flocks and herds as their main possessions and means of subsistence. The standing and place of residence of the children of Israel in Egypt were fixed by the fact that they were shepherds, and in the transaction of locating them there lurks a suspicion that they might grow to be a public menace, due perhaps to the earlier experiences of the Egyptians with the Hyksos. Down to the days of the Exodus the Hebrews maintained their distinctive character, so that before Moses could assume the position of leader among them he needed to pass through a period of training as a shepherd under a nomad chief. The origin of a new nomadic tribe from an old one is illustrated in the story of the separation of Lot from Abraham (Gn ch. 12). As soon as the younger leader had gathered about him a band sufficiently large and capable of self-support and self-defense, questions of pasturage arose between his adherents and those of the older chief. Such differences might be settled amicably and fairly, as in the case of Abraham and Lot, or they might occasion bloody feuds and lasting animosities. In either case, the end would be the formation of new tribes parting from the old ones and seeking advantageous territories whereon to pitch their tents. Such tribes numbering from four to three hundred tents (families) are scattered over N. Arabia to-day. (See Cornill, Hist. of Israel, p. 36.)

3. Pastoral Life After the Settlement. Palestine, in the larger definition of it as including Moab and the Negeb (S. of Judah), furnishes soil for the development of pastoral life unrivaled anywhere. But as it abounds also in tracts of land suited for agriculture, when Israel took possession of it, the nation ceased being a purely nomad people, adopting the agricultural manner of life of the conquered Canaanites, occupying their built villages and cities, tho continuing to raise flocks and herds as of old. The result was a civilization combining the features of both types of life. Arable lands everywhere were accepted as subject to private proprietorship; they were bought and sold, filled and owned as in all settled communities. But large sections difficult or impossible to cultivate remained common territory. These were the hillsides and stony plateaux in the neighborhood of villages used in common by all the shepherds of the village in each case. The name 'wilderness' is given such stretches of land down to the present day, but what is meant is simply a grassy, shrub-clad hillside or highland unimproved by cultivation. Tho held and used by the men of a village in common, such pasture-lands are carefully distinguished from similar lands belonging to neighboring villages.

4. The Shepherd's Possessions. The shepherd takes his name from the chief object of his care which is at the same time the chief item of his wealth, the sheep. This is, however, his chief, not his only possession. In fact, the Heb. and Gr. words (rō'eh, ποιμήν) go back to a more general conception of his character and represent him as a 'feeder' or 'tender' of pasturing animals. For besides sheep he keeps also goats and cattle (oxen, cows), and, in the purer nomadic condition, camels (Gn 12 16, 24 10 ff.; Job 1 3, 17, 42 12). The last-named, along with asses (Gn 12 16; I S 15 3; Job 1 3), served as beasts of burden, carrying the tents and other simple but necessary furnishings belonging to the tribe.

5. The Shepherd's Natural Enemies. Pasture-grounds, such as those described in § 3 above, are generally found adjoining gorges and ravines (wādys). These with the rocky ridges that bound them are often irregular in their courses, sometimes converging and again diverging, crossing one another or abruptly lost in a maze of bewildering summits and depressions. The gorges are in the present day, for the most part, bare and rocky; but in ancient times they were more thickly wooded, a condition of things which furnished convenient lurking-places for the wolves, the jackals, the bears and, down to crusading days, also for the lions, which prowled about for stray members of flocks, and sometimes even attacked the flock and carried away a sheep or goat (cf. I S 17 34; Jer 5 6; Jn 10 12). From another quarter, the shepherd had to fear, as he does to-day, 'the thief' who 'cometh not, but that he may steal, and kill and destroy' (Jn 10 10). The 'thief' of the present-day Palestinian pastoral life is the Bedawi, who regards the stealing of sheep an honorable pursuit. In the O T period marauding bands of the Amalekites, Midianites, etc., gave the shepherd many an anxious hour.

6. The Shepherd's Means of Defense. To protect his flocks and herds from these dangers, the shepherd provided a fold (cote) into which he gathered the sheep and goats. The fold differed according to the nature of the locality where it was to be used. If this was a level stretch, the fold was an enclosure surrounded by walls sufficiently high to prevent wolves and jackals from leaping over, and also surmounted with branches of thorny bushes to render climbing over them very difficult if not impossible. If, however, the locality was a hillside, a natural cave more usually served the purpose of a fold. Such is the case to-day with the cave of Pan at Caesarea Philippi (Banias). Before the entrance to such a cave-fold was built a wall with a narrow door, with a guardhouse commanding it. In this guard-house the shepherds gathered by night and took turns in watching. As a general thing, for purposes of mutual protection and assistance, several shepherds combined to keep their flocks in the same fold (cf. the pl. in Lk 2 8, 15, 20). In the task of watching, the dog is to-day found to be of the greatest service. Because of his fidelity and capacity for training, this animal becomes a guardian, not only by detecting the presence of the prowling wolf and jackal, and giving warning through his prompt barking, but also by constraining the sheep and goats to take the path pointed out by the shepherd in cases in which, on account of large numbers, they miss the shepherd's own guidance. Dogs are also useful in searching for and rescuing straying members of the flock.

7. The Shepherd's Manner of Life. The Eastern shepherd's day begins at early dawn. His first act is the calling of the sheep together. Each member of the flock has its name (Jn 10 3 ff.), commonly that of a flower or fruit, and each knows its name, or at least distinguishes the voice of its own shepherd from that of all others. As soon as the flock is gathered about him, the shepherd leads the way, the sheep and goats following him in file, with the dogs bringing up the rear. The shepherd himself is always armed with a long staff. When he has decided upon which patch of green herbage he will let his flock settle for the day, he leads the way to it, and the sheep dispose themselves about on the grass, while the goats climb the rocks in search of their own peculiar pasturage. At midday the shepherd guides his flock to some spring or well to water them; for unlike Europe and large portions of America, Palestine, by its dry and hot climate, makes it necessary to water pasturing animals regularly. After a season of rest following the watering, the flock is again led to the pasture-ground, and at night, with the same care and watchfulness for each individual, it is taken back to the fold. By this time some of the younger lambs may find it hard to keep up with the older and stronger sheep; these the shepherd carries in his arms, giving each one in turn some needed rest. This daily routine is interrupted only by the sheep-shearing (Gn 31 19, 38 13), which comes in the summer. At this season the shepherd gathers in his harvest of wool, one of the largest sources of his revenue. The occasion is accordingly celebrated with great festivities, which occur at the end of the shearing. Lambs and kids are slain and roasted night after night, and the whole village shares in the good things provided by its shepherd population (cf. II S 13 23 ff.). It is at this season that the freebooter, who has been of service in warding off attacks of thieves and marauders, can step in to claim some compensation for his informal and perhaps uninvited police protection during the year. Such was probably the ground on which David made his request for a gift from Nabal (I S 25 2 ff.).

8. Shepherd Life in Institutions and Literature. No phase of life has left a deeper impress than the pastoral on the ideas, institutions, modes of expression, and literary productions of the Hebrews. The traces of its influence are found in the provisions of the Mosaic legislation (Ex 22 1, 30; Dt 7 13, 15 19, 28 4, 18, 31, 51), which was drawn up upon the assumption that the care of flocks and herds was a large and important part of the people's employment. The relation of the shepherd to the sheep served to bring to the consciousness of the Israelite the nature of the relation held by all leaders to the people led by them. The prophets never tire of reminding kings, priests, and princes of their duties by means of this comparison (Jer 23 4, 25 34 ff.; Ezk 34 2, 5, 8 ff.; Zec 10 2 f., 11 3, 5, 8, 15 f.) The incidents of the shepherd's daily experience furnish some of the most picturesque imagery of the Psalter (cf. Pss 23, 80; also Pss 44 11, 49 14, 78 52, 72, 79 13, 95 7, 100 3) as well as the ground of some of the most touching prophetic appeals (Jer 50 6; Is 40 11; Ezk 34 6, 11 f.; Zec 13 7). The comparison of human beings to sheep was also used by Jesus Himself in His teaching (Mt 7 15, 12 11 f., 25 32 f.) and with most telling effect in His parables (Lk 15 4; Jn 10 2 ff.). Finally the redemptive work of Christ, both on its passive and its active sides (Ac 8 32), was expressed in the ascription to Him of the title of 'Shepherd' by His first disciples (I P 2 25, 5 4; He 13 20), and in this they were but voicing again His own claim (Jn ch. 10). NON, nen. See NUN.

NOON, NOONDAY: Besides denoting a part of the day (see TIME, § 1), this word is also used to designate the time most favorable for an attack on a city (because the defenders might be taking their siesta? So Peake, Jer 6 4, 15 8; or because then the daylight is most intense? Cf. Job 5 14, 11 17). A.C.Z.

NOPH, nef. See MEMPHIS.

NOPHAH, nō'fa (נֹפָח, nōphāh): A town of Moab (Nu 21 30, text uncertain). Site unknown.

NORTH. See EAST.

NORTH COUNTRY, THE (צִפְרֵן, 'ereṣ tsāphōn): A designation, used by the prophets, of the quarter from which invaders were to come, also from which the exiles would return, in some passages translated 'land of the N.' (Jer 10 15; Zec 2 6). At times, tsāphōn, 'north,' is used by itself with the same meaning (Jer 1 14 f., 25 26). It designates Assyria (Is 14 31; cf. Zeph 2 13); Babylonia (Jer 6 1, 15 12, 46 20, 24, 47 2; Ezk 26 7); various lands (Jer 1 13 f., 4 6, 10 22, 13 20, 25 9, 26); the quarter from which Cyrus would march against Babylon (Is 41 25; cf. Jer 50 3, 9, 41, 51 48); Babylon (Zec 2 6, 6 6, 8); various countries from which the exiles would return (Jer 3 18, 16 15, 23 8, 31 8; cf. Is 43 6, 49 12). The expression 'king of the north' in Dn 11 8 ff. denotes successive kings of the Greco-Syrian kingdom of Antioch. C. S. T.

NOSE, NOSTRILS: (1) The Heb. 'aph, 'nose,' is used sometimes in the O T with a meaning other than its simple and literal one. (a) By synecdoche the 'nostrils' are viewed as the seat of the 'breath of life' (Gn 2 7, 7 22, etc.). (b) Anthropomorphically, the 'blast' of God's 'nostrils' is spoken of when the destructive wind or other nature forces, as His agents, are meant (Ex 15 8; Ps 18 8, 15, etc.). The expression in Ezk 8 17, 'they put the branch to their nose,' is obscure, but appears to refer to some foreign mode of worship condemned by the prophet. In Ezk 23 25, 'take away thy nose,' etc., refers to the mutilation of captives in war. (2) naḥar, 'snorting,' is rendered 'nostrils' (Job 39 20 AV, 'snorting' RV), but its cognate nāḥūrīm is properly rendered 'nostrils' in Job 41 20. E. E. N.

NOSE JEWEL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS § II, 2.

NOVICE (νεόφυτος, 'newly planted'): Used in I Ti 3 6 in the sense of 'lately converted' and, therefore, inexperienced. In later times the word became a technical term ('neophyte') for new converts.

NUMBERS, BOOK OF: 1. Composite Character. The fourth book of the Pentateuch, which carries on the history of Israel in the wilderness from the second to the fortieth year of the Exodus. In structure it resembles Gn and Ex (see HEXATEUCH, § 7), the same sources, JE and P, reappearing in it, and being continued to the close. P, as elsewhere, comprises chiefly statistical and legal matter; the bright, picturesque narratives belong to JE.

2. Contents. (I) The section 1-10 28. The book begins with a long extract from P (1 1-10 28), the leading topics of which are the numbers and disposition of the tribes, both in the camp and on the march, and the duties of the Levites. Ch. 1 gives a census of the tribes, with the exception of that of Levi (whose numbers follow in ch. 3). The number of males above twenty years old is stated to have been 603,550. Ch. 2 describes the position of the tribes in the camp, and their order on the march. Chs. 3 and 4 state the number of the Levites (22,000 above one month old, 8,580 between thirty and fifty years of age), their position in the center of the camp about the Tent of Meeting, and their duties in connection with it. Chs. 5 and 6 contain laws on different subjects—the exclusion of the unclean (5 1-4), certain priestly dues (5 5-10, supplementary to Lv 6 1-7), the ordeal prescribed for the woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness (5 11-31), the obligations of the Nazirite vow (6 1-21), ending with the beautiful formula of priestly benediction (6 22-27). Ch. 7 describes, with unusual circumstantiality of detail, the offerings of the twelve princes of the tribes, at the consecration of the Tent of Meeting and the Altar. Ch. 8 is again a collection of laws—on the arrangement of the lamps upon the golden candlestick (8 1-4), the consecration of the Levites to their duties (8 5-22, connecting with 3 5-13), and the period of their service (8 23-26). Ch. 9 1-14 enjoins the celebration of the Passover of the second year, and lays down regulations for the observance, in certain cases, of a supplementary Passover. Ch. 9 15-23 describes the signals given by the cloud for the marching and the halting of the camp. Ch. 10 1-10 directs two silver trumpets to be made, to be used for starting the camps, and on certain other occasions. Ch. 10 11-28 narrates the departure of Israel from Sinai, and the order of their camps on the march.

(II) The section 10 29-25. With 10 29 the narrative of JE is resumed (from Ex 34 28). In 10 29-32, Hobab is urged by Moses to act as the Israelites' guide through the wilderness. Ch. 10 33-34 describes the functions of the Ark in directing the stages of their march. In 10 35-38 there is preserved to us, in verse, what must have been originally the old war-prayer, with which the Ark was taken out to, and brought back from, battle. Chs. 11 and 12 narrate the murmurings of the people at Kibroth-hattaavah, the appointment of seventy elders to assist Moses, the sending of quails to satisfy the people's hunger, the vindication of Moses' prophetic dignity, and the leprosy of Miriam. Chs. 13 and 14 contain the narrative of the spies sent out from Kadesh to explore and report upon the land. This narrative is composite, 13 17b-20, 22-24, 26b-31, 32b, 33, 14 1 (partly), 3 f., 8 f., 11-25, 31-33, 39-45 belonging to JE, and the rest to P. The two accounts differ in representation. In JE the spies go only as far as Hebron, in the S. of Judah (13 22-24); in P they go to the far N. of Canaan (13 21); in JE the land is fertile, but one which the Israelites are unable to conquer (13 27-31); in P it is a barren land (13 32); in JE Caleb is the only faithful spy, permitted afterward to enter Canaan (13 30, 14 24); P couples Joshua with him (14 6, 30, 38). Ch. 15 contains chiefly laws from P, 15 1-16 on the meal- and drink-offerings, 15 17-21 on the annual offering of a cake of the first dough, 15 22-31 on the sin-offering, to be offered for accidental dereliction of duty, 15 32-38 an account of the punishment of a Sabbath-breaker (essentially a law in the form of a narrative), 15 37-41 on the tassels (RVmg.)

to be the distinguishing mark of the Israelite. Chs. 16 and 17, on the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, is another composite narrative, the different strands of which vary materially in representation. (1) JE (16 1b-2a, 12-15, 25-26, 27b-34) describes a rebellion of laymen (Dathan, Abiram, and Reubenites) against the civil authority of Moses; (2) the main narrative of P (16 1a, 2b-7a, 18-24, 27a, 32b, 35) describes a rebellion of the people at large, headed by Korah, against the exclusive priestly rights of the tribe of Levi, as a whole, and the subsequent confirmation of the rights of the tribe (16 41-50, 17); (3) a secondary stratum of P (16 7b-11, 16-17, 36-40) describes a rebellion of Levites, under the leadership of Korah, against the exclusive priestly rights of the family of Aaron. Sections (2) and (3) thus differ, in that in (2) there is no trace of opposition between the priests and the ordinary Levites, while in (3) this opposition is strongly marked (so Nu chs. 3, 4, 8, 18 1-7). Ch. 18 (P) defines the duties and revenues of the priests and Levites; ch. 19 (also P) prescribes the ritual of purification, after defilement by a corpse, by means of water mingled with the ashes of a red heifer. Chs. 20-22 (P and JE) describe Israel's journey from Kadesh to the Steppes of Moab, on the E. of Jordan, with incidents of the way (e.g., the death of Miriam and Aaron, the brazen serpent, etc.). Notice here the ancient poetical fragments cited as historical authorities, 21 14 f. from the 'Book of the Wars of Jehovah,' 21 17 f. the Song of the Well, and the poem of the Ballad-singers (21 27-30). Chs. 22 2-24 give the history of Balaam (JE). The poems in chs. 23, 24, describing partly the splendid destiny in store for Israel, partly the fate reserved for some of its neighbors, are to be regarded as composed not by Balaam himself, but by a later hand, and placed in his mouth for the purpose of giving expression to thoughts deemed suitable to his position; 24 17-19 seem clearly to allude to the conquests of David. Ch. 25 (JE, 25 1-5; P, 25 6-18) records how the Israelites were seduced at Shittim into idolatry and immorality, and how the zeal of Phinehas was rewarded with the promise of the permanence of the priesthood in his family.

(III) The section, chs. 26-36. Chs. 26-31 all belong to P. Ch. 26 describes the second census of Israel (cf. chs. 1 and 2) during the wanderings; the sum total of males (from twenty years old) is given at 601,730, besides the Levites (from one month old), 23,000. Ch. 27 1-11 contains the law of inheritance of daughters. In 27 12-23 Moses is commanded to view Canaan before his death, and Joshua is instituted as his successor. Chs. 28 and 29 are a priestly calendar, prescribing the public sacrifices to be offered at every sacred season. Ch. 30 relates to vows, defining the conditions under which a vow was to be binding. Ch. 31 describes how, in accordance with 25 16-18, a war of extermination was successfully undertaken against Midian. The narrative contains much that is both historically improbable and morally repugnant. It is, in reality, not history, but 'midrash,' a story written with a religious purpose. No doubt there was a war of Israel against Midian; but the details handed down by tradition have been elaborated by the compiler into an ideal picture of the manner in which, as he conceived, a sacred war must have been conducted, with the collateral aim of establishing the rule of the distribution of booty taken in war (31 25-30)—a rule which is elsewhere (I S 30 24-25) referred to David. That the Midianites were not in reality exterminated is shown by the fact that they afterward invaded Israel in large numbers (Jg chs. 6-8).

In ch. 32 (P and JE) Moses allots the land E. of Jordan to Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, on condition that they help the other tribes to conquer the territory W. of Jordan. The closing chapters (33-36) are all from P. Ch. 33 contains P's itinerary of the journeyings of the Israelites from Rameses to the Steppes of Moab. Ch. 34 defines the borders of Canaan (vs. 1-15), and nominates the tribal leaders who are to assist Joshua and Eleazar in the division of the land (vs. 16-29). In ch. 35 forty-eight cities are appointed for the residence of the Levites (vs. 1-8); six of these are to be, in addition, cities of refuge for the manslayer, and regulations for their use are laid down. Ch. 36 (supplementary to 27 6-11) provides that heiresses possessing landed property are to marry into their own tribe, in order to preserve the inheritance of each tribe intact.

3. Characteristics and Historical Value. The most attractive parts of the book are those belonging to JE. Here Moses is brought before us, 'in his solitary grandeur, patient strength, and heroic faith; steadfast amid jealousy, suspicion, and rebellion, and vindicated by God himself (12 8) as a prophet of transcendent privilege and power' (McFadyen, Introd., p. 45). Every reader will remember his noble prayer (11 29), that God would make all the people prophets, and put His spirit upon them all. The beautiful poems of Balaam are instinct with a high sense of Israel's national destiny. The poetical fragments preserved in ch. 21 introduce us to an interesting type of popular Hebrew poetry. In P the laws of ordeal in case of suspected adultery (ch. 5), of the Nazirite (ch. 6), and of lustration by the ashes of a red heifer (ch. 19) preserve archaic elements, with analogies in the institutions of many other primitive peoples, which have been assimilated to the religion of Israel, and appear here in the form and character which they finally assumed. In the historical sections of P there is a large artificial element, especially in chs. 1-10, where the numbers are in many cases historically impossible, and the general picture is at variance with that of JE, as well as with the data afforded by the subsequent history. The simpler nucleus, supplied by tradition, has been elaborated by the writer into an ideal picture of the organization which it was supposed that a sacred nation, marching through the wilderness, with its God in the midst of it, must have exhibited. In chs. 34 and 35 (the borders of the land, and the Levitical cities), also, there is much that is ideal; on ch. 31 (the war against Midian), see the remarks above. Behind the earlier source JE lie ballads (cf. 21 14, 27) and oral traditions, but even so 'the history of the forty years themselves is a complete blank' (McNeile), as the principal events recorded are confined to a few days at the beginning and a few months at the end of the wilderness period.

NUMBERS, SIGNIFICANT AND SYMBOLIC:

1. Method of Counting. The method of counting among the Hebrews, as far back as it can be traced, was the common decimal system. The language contains names for nine units and the number ten, with compounds. The ten fingers of the two hands are believed to have furnished the starting-point and standard for the system.

2. The Writing of Numbers. In the earliest period numbers were spelled out in full. This is shown in the Moabite Stone and in the Silsara Inscription, and is the common practise of the O T. It was not until the postexilic period that the necessity was felt for employing special signs to represent the numbers. In fact, the earliest traces of the use of such signs occur on Maccabean coins, and consist of the letters of the alphabet. There is no evidence that the Hebrews ever invented, or adopted, a system of numerical notation such as was used by the Phenicians (Schroeder, Phoeniz. Sprache, pp. 186-189, and Merx, Gram. Syr., table to p. 17). But the significance for subsequent generations of the introduction of numerals was very great. While, on the one hand, the processes of arithmetic were largely facilitated, and the convenience of the system led to a great development in the science of computation, on the other, in the written records confusion of numbers became very easy and common. There is no part of the documents transmitted by copying so much subject to corruption as the record of numbers.

3. Approximation in Numbers. The Hebrews looked upon statistics somewhat as the other nations of the Orient. They occasionally took a census (Nu 1 2; Ezr 8 1; Neh 7 8). But there are indications also that they entertained superstitious thoughts about such enumerations (II S 24 2 f.); and, upon the whole, it does not seem likely that in estimating and reporting numbers they tried to be very precise. On the contrary, the evidence is strong that figures, wherever given, except the smallest, were meant as general, or round, numbers, which for practical purposes within definite limits, varying with different individuals and peoples, seemed to produce quite adequate impressions, and were more convenient for use.

4. Sacredness of Numbers. But in addition to such convenience of approximation, among the Hebrews a distinction was drawn between some numbers regarded as sacred and others regarded as profane. Thus there arose a somewhat peculiar method of usage involving extensive and elaborate symbolism. In other words numbers were made to convey not only the ideas of arithmetic, but certain mystic significations.

5. Difficulty in Interpreting Numbers. The practical effect of the foregoing principles is such an interplay of ideas as to render all generalization on the subject untrustworthy. No rule can be laid down as to what should be regarded as precise, what approximate, and what sacred or symbolical numbers. And yet the absence of such a general rule does not preclude the recognition of the difference. In Gn 30 36 Jacob sets a three days' journey between himself and Laban (cf. Gn 42 17; I K 12 5, etc.). Here the number 3 can not have a religious or sacred significance; but in Nu 6 24-26, with the threefold repetition of the Divine name in the benediction, and in Is 6 3, with the threefold occurrence of the term 'Holy,' and in other similar instances, the number 3 must be viewed as somehow connected with the sacredness of the subject.

6. Approximation and Hyperbole Combined. Approximate, or round, numbers are more naturally apt to appear in the region of large figures. Such are 1,000 and 100. Both of these are found in the same connection in Lv 26 8 (cf. also Pr 17 10; Ec 6 3, 8 12; Mt 18 12; Dt 1 11, 32 30; I S 18 7; Is 30 17). In most of these cases, in addition to the approximation, there is an accessory design to enhance the impression by hyperbolic statement. This is all the more present when the number used is larger than 1,000, as in Dt 32 30, or in I Co 4 15, 14 19, and in Rev 5 11.

7. Sacred Numbers. The symbolical, or sacred numbers are 3, 4, 7, 10, 12, 40, 70, and their multiples. The right of 3 to appear in this list has been called in question. In the O T, taken by itself, the sacredness of 3 does not appear clearly. The case of the three choices given David (II S 24 13), the threefold prostration of Elijah on the dead child (I K 17 21), and the three daily prayers of Daniel (Dn 6 10) are not convincing. Those already cited (§ 5, above) from Nu 6 22-24 and Is 6 3 are more to the point, and indicate Babylonian influence. Among the Babylonians the triad was the favorite sacred group. The primary gods of the pantheon were three (Anu, Bel, and Ea); they represent the three parts of the universe, heaven, earth, and the abyss. Moreover, the number 3 is the smallest of those that can not be divided into equal integers, and, as confronting one in so many common aspects of nature and life, would naturally assume a symbolical value. The number 4 early became a symbol of completeness. It is undoubtedly based upon the four directions which stand open to one, i.e., the right hand, the left hand, before and behind. From these, in the second place, arises the recognition of the four points of the compass 'four corners of the earth,' Is 11 12, Ezk 7 2, Rev 7 1, 20 8. But each of these corresponds to a wind (Jer 49 36). There are, therefore, four winds of heaven (Ezk 37 9; Rev 7 1), and also four great rivers (Gn 2 10). Accordingly, in apocalyptic writings 4 is of frequent occurrence. There are four world kingdoms (Dn 7 3, 6, 17), four horns and four chariots in Zechariah's vision (Zec 1 18, 6 1), four living creatures, and four angels of destruction (Rev 4 6, 9 13-15). The number 5 is significant only as the half of a perfect number (Lv 5 16). The same is true of 6, which, however, derives its importance not so much from its being one-half of 12, but because of its nearness to 7. In the seven-day period of creation, the six days' work must be completed before the seventh day of rest, in order to make the perfect cycle (cf. Jos 6 3, 4, capture of Jericho). The significance of 7 has been variously derived, either from (1) its being reached by adding 4 and 3, (2) from the division of the lunar month into four seven-day sections (weeks), according to the phases of the moon, (3) from the fact that seven planets were recognized in the earliest Babylonian observation of the sky, or (4) from its combining two triads and a unit. Of these explanations the most probable, as far as Biblical usage is concerned, is the astronomical one (3), which was certainly widely diffused in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The Amarna tablets indicate that a sacred number was recognized among the Semitic peoples who had dealings with one another. Among the Hebrews 7 became the sacred number par excellence. The sacred times of the calendar were based upon it. Besides the weekly Sabbath, the seventh month, the Sabbatical year, the Jubilee year were determined by it. In other sacred relations it appears as the number of the priests who blew the horn at the siege of Jericho, in the number of days required for the capture of that city (Jos 6 4), the number of sacred locks (Jg 16 13-16), the frequent seven-day periods taken for deliberation or preparation (I S 10 8, 11 3, 13 8; I K 18 43; Ezk 3 15 f.), the seven pillars of Wisdom (Pr 9 1), the seven princes of Persia (Est 1 14), etc. In some of the above-named uses the symbolic value of 7 may have either suppressed its numerical value or been combined with it. The following, however, are select instances of predominant stress on the symbolical aspect: The number of times that Jacob bowed before Esau (Gn 33 3), the number of women who shall take hold of one man (Is 4 1), the number of unclean spirits taking possession of the cleansed heart (Mt 12 45), and the number of times that the disciple must forgive his offending brother (Mt 18 21, 22). The half of 7 ( $3\frac{1}{2}$ ) has likewise a similar sacred significance (Dn 7 25, 12 7), of which the Apocalypse furnishes other instances (Rev 12 14; cf. also 1,260 days [=  $3\frac{1}{2}$  years], 11 3, 12 6, and 42 [=  $6 \times 7$ ] months, 11 2, 13 5). The number 10, as the highest of the series of units and at the same time the first of the second series, or, in other words, as the basis of the whole decimal system, could not but be vested with sacredness. Whether, as has been suggested, it acquired additional regard because it is the sum of 7 and 3 is doubtful. Like 7, it is used as both a round number and a sacred number, and in some of its uses, approximation and symbolic value are mingled, whereas in others either appears without the other. In Gn 24 10, 22, for instance, it is a round number (cf. also Jos 22 14; Jg 17 10, etc.). But in the Decalog and in the decades of generations in Gn, in the parables of the Talents and of the Virgins (Mt 25 1; Lk 19 17), and in the apocalyptic usage (Dn 7 7; Rev 13 1), the notion of completeness is more clearly present. But its sacredness is most fully brought into view in the tithe system and its correlative ritual (Nu 18 24 ff.; Dt 14 22 f.; Neh 10 37 f.; cf. Nu ch. 7). The significance of 12 may be traced to the Sumerian subdivision of the year into as many months, or revolutions of the moon. Twelve also happens to be the product of 3 and 4; but, as in the case of 7, it is doubtful whether this fact has much to do with its sacredness. The tribes of Israel and of Ishmael (Gn 17 20, 35 22) were 12. That there was in this number something more than the fact of twelve patriarchs, the sons of Jacob (or of Ishmael), is manifest from the effort to maintain the number, in spite of natural defections from or additions to it. When one tribe (Levi) was withdrawn, another was artificially created by subdivision (Joseph into Ephraim and Manasseh). The same is true in the N T with the number of the Apostles. Twelve is doubled in Rev 4 4, 5 8, 11 16, probably by the addition of the number of the Apostles to that of the tribes. Multiples of 4 and 10, forty, and 7 and 10, seventy, naturally follow the significance of their components. Forty plays an important part in the chronology of the period of Judges and perhaps of the early monarchy. It is evidently used as a unit equivalent to a generation (Jg 3 11, 30, 5 31; cf. CHRONOLOGY OF O T). The duration of the wandering in the wilderness (Nu 14 33 f.) and the three periods of the life of Moses are also reckoned as 40 each. Seventy was the number of the elders of Israel (Ex 24 1), of the persons in the household of Jacob at the time of the removal to Egypt (Gn 46 27), of the duration of the Exile (Jer 25 11 f., 29 10), and of the 'year-weeks' of Daniel (9 2, 24).

8. Multiples of Sacred Numbers. Multiples of 12 occur with the same regular meanings of approximation and sacredness in the twenty-four courses of the priesthood (I Ch ch. 24), the forty-eight Levitical cities (Nu 35 6) the  $12 \times 12 \times 1,000$  of the redeemed in Rev 5 11.

9. Interpretation: Gematria. This symbolical use of numbers gave rise in the later rabbinical age to the theory that all numbers are full of secret meanings, being the archetypes of the ideas of God in the creation of the world and, therefore, the molding principles of the universe (Philo, De Leg. Alleg. I, 4; II, 1; De Mund. Opif. 3, 17, 31). But, if this were true, then the converse of it must also be true, i.e., that each object has its fundamental number, and that the names of objects conceal in the numerical value of their letters the ideal nature of the objects themselves. Thus suggestions as to further mysteries in nature and religion were discovered in the numerical values of all words in the sacred text. This conception led to the building up of a system of rules by which these suggestions might be followed. Words were transmuted into numbers, and numbers back into other words, and the secrets supposed to be concealed in the text of the O T were laid bare. The system, from its mathematical basis, was called gematria (a corruption of γεωμετρία). See SHESHACH. The only clear case of gematria in the N T is to be found in Rev 13 18. The number of the Beast is here given as 666. From the context it appears very clearly that it was intended to be recognized as the name of a definite person by the inner circle of the readers of the book. At the same time, outsiders were to be left in the dark as to his identity. The innumerable interpretations attempted of the passage may, therefore, be sifted and reduced to a very small number by the exclusion of those that ignore this fundamental assumption.

NUN, nun (נּוּן, nūn): A man of the tribe of Ephraim, the father of Joshua (Ex 33 11; Nu 11 28, etc.), always 'nun' except in I Ch 7 27, where the Heb. has nōn, Non AV, which should probably be read, as in RV, 'Nun.' C. S. T.

NURSE, NURSING: The translation of two Heb. roots: (1) yānaq, 'suckle.' The fem. Hiph'il ptepl., mēneqeth means a 'wet-nurse' (Ex 2 7; Is 49 23, figuratively), and also a caretaker for a weaned child (II K 11 2; II Ch 22 11). Such a one often remained as a special servant to the mature woman (Gn 24 59, 35 s). Usually, mothers suckled their own children (Gn 21 7; I S 1 22 f.), but on occasion and in the wealthy and noble families a wet-nurse was employed (Ex 2 7 ff.). The Hebrew child, as are children in the East to-day, was suckled for two years (I S 1 22 f.), and the weaning was celebrated by a feast (Gn 21 8). (2) 'āman, 'support.' The fem. ptepl. 'ōmeneth means a female caretaker in charge of children (Ru 4 16; II S 4 4). The masc. ptepl.

'ōmēn means a foster-parent (Nu 11 12; cf. the figurative use in Is 49 23). King Ahab entrusted his five sons to such guardians (II K 10 1, 5, where the same word is translated 'they that brought them up'). C. S. T.

NUTS. See PALESTINE, §§ 21 and 23; and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5.

NYMPHAS, nim'fas (Νυμφᾶς): If the variant reading (Νύμφα), which has good direct textual support (B<sup>e</sup>, Euth) and is confirmed indirectly by MSS. having αὐτῆς in the same verse (B, Syr.<sup>P</sup>), be correct N. was a Christian woman living in Laodicea (Col 4 15), whose house was used as a gathering-place for Christians (cf. Ro 16 3, 15). Perhaps she is especially mentioned here because the Colossian Epistle was to be read in her house (Col 4 16). J. M. T.

OAK. See PALESTINE, § 21; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 37.

OAR. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

OATH: Normally, the oath is an invocation of God to witness the honesty of one's motives and words. In the O T two varieties of it are found, one of which was reserved for cases of greater solemnity. The simpler and more common of the two was called sh'bhū'ah, 'swearing'; the more solemn 'alāh, a 'self-invoked curse.' These appear in the N T as ὅρκος, ὀρκίζω and ὀνύω for the first, and as ἀναθεματίζω and κατὰ θεματίζω (cf. Mt 26 72-74). The oath was taken in a formal way, altho one of several forms might be chosen, such as 'Jehovah is a witness between me and between thee forever' (I S 20 23, similar to Paul's asseveration in II Co 1 23; Ph 1 8; Gal 1 20), or 'God do so to me and more also' (I S 14 44; II S 3 35), or 'As Jehovah liveth' (I S 14 39, 19 6; for other forms cf. I S 3 17, 25 22; II S 15 21). In addition to the words of the oath, certain symbolical acts were performed for the sake of greater impressiveness. The simplest of these was the raising of the hand toward heaven (Gn 14 22; Dt 32 40). In exceptional cases the hand might be placed under the thigh of the person imposing the oath (Gn 24 2, 47 29), as a sign of regard for the mystery of generation, whose source was God. A more elaborate ceremony consisted in the division of a sacrificial victim, and the act of walking between the parts (Gn 15 10, 17; Jer 34 18). When an oath was imposed by another, the simple formula 'Amen, Amen' on the part of the taker was sufficient (Dt 27 15-26). Judicial abjurations are mentioned in I K 8 31; Mt 26 63. In later times, instead of God, things associated with His person or service were invoked, such as heaven, Jerusalem, the Holy City, the sun, the earth, the Temple (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, I, 168). The abuse of oaths reached such a pass that Jesus expressed Himself sweepingly against all oaths, presumably, however, with a view of correcting the abuse (Mt 5 34). See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTICE, § 5; and CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (b). A. C. Z.

OBADIAH, ō'bā-dai'a (עֲבַדְיָה, 'ōbhadhyāh[ā]) 'servant of J''': 1. The author of the short prophecy which bears the name of Obadiah. 2. The governor of Ahab's house, described as a 'man who feared J' greatly' (I K 18 3 ff.). 3. A son of Azel, of the family of Saul (I Ch 8 38). 4. A son of Izrahiah of Issachar (I Ch 7 3). 5. A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 9). 6. The father of Ishmaiah (I Ch 27 19). 7. A son of Hananiah and grandson of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 21). 8. A Merarite Levite (II Ch 34 12). 9. A son of Shemaiah of Jeduthun (I Ch 9 16; but in Neh 11 17 'Abda'). 10. An officer under Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 7). 11. A son of Jehiel (Ezr 8 9). 12. One who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 5). 13. The head of a family of doorkeepers (Neh 12 25). A. C. Z.

OBADIAH, BOOK OF: 1. The Prophet. One of the minor prophetic writings of the O T. The author gives even less information about himself than is customary with the others of his class. In fact, with the exception of his name, nothing is known of him save what may be indirectly gathered from his message. Josephus does, indeed, identify him with Obadiah, the governor under Ahab (I K 18 3 f.); but this is entirely inconsistent with the data deducible from the book concerning its setting and date.

2. Contents of the Book. The subject of the book is the doom of Edom. Evidently some great calamity in the form of an invasion had visited the country. The people, who were trusting in the alleged impregnable rocky fastnesses of their land (vs. 1-4), had been forced out of their homes; their towns had been plundered and thoroughly stripped of all that was of value (vs. 5, 6); and this had been done by those in whom they had reposed confidence as confederates. The prophet sees in the visitation the power of J' as a moving and directing cause (vs. 7-9). Moreover, the ground for the calamity was the unbrotherly treatment of Judah by Edom, after the siege of Jerusalem (vs. 10-14). The God of Israel was to visit a day of vengeance upon all the nations (vs. 15, 16), lay Edom low, exalt Israel, restore the exiled to their homeland, and establish His kingdom among them (vs. 17-21).

3. Dates. In determining the date of the production, two facts afford help: First, the allusion in vs. 11, 12 to the capture of Jerusalem. This can be no other than that by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. For in this distress of Judah Edom gave its sympathy and applause to Babylon (Ps 137 7). Obadiah must then have uttered his words after 586. But, secondly, the relation of vs. 1-9 to the oracle of Jeremiah 49 7-22, while offering a puzzling complication, throws light on the literary relationships of the book. The similarity of these two passages can not be due to coincidence. The difficulty would disappear if Obadiah were assumed to have used the words of Jeremiah. For the date of the latter's oracle is given as 605 B.C. (46 2); but the unity and movement of Obadiah's thought and the general nature of the resemblance in the two passages point rather to Jeremiah's dependence on the minor prophet. But this would raise the date of Obadiah to 605 or earlier—a result that does not harmonize with what has been said of the allusion to the capture of Jerusalem. It follows then that either both Obadiah and Jeremiah have made use of an older anonymous oracle, or that the text of Jeremiah has been amended by the incorporation of Obadiah's words. But, if the allusion to the capture of Jerusalem gives the earliest date possible for Obadiah, opinions have differed greatly as to the latest. Some have fixed it as after the Return (432 B.C., Nowack), and even as late as 312 (Hitzig). The question hinges on who the invaders of Edom were whose destructive work furnished Obadiah with the occasion for his prophetic discourse. Wellhausen is probably right in answering that they were Arab nomads. On the whole, 500 B.C. is the best latest limit for the ministry of Obadiah, and the book was probably written not much earlier than that date. Cf. Nowack in Hand Kommentar; G. A. Smith in Expositor's Bible; Horton in The New Century Bible; J. M. P. Smith in ICC (1911). A. C. Z.

OBAL, ʾōbāl. See EBAL.

OBED, ʾōbed (עֲבֵד, ʾōbhēdh, ʾIwβḡḏ, ʾIwβḡλ), 'worshiper': 1. The son of Ruth and Boaz (Ru 4 17) and father of Jesse, the father of David (Ru 4 21 f.; I Ch 2 12; Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32). 2. A Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 37 f.). 3. One of 'the mighty men of the armies' (I Ch 11 47). 4. A son of Shemaiah and grandson of Obed-edom, of the Korahite family (I Ch 26 7). 5. The father of Azariah, a captain of a hundred, who aided Jehoida against Queen Athaliah in setting Joash on the throne (II Ch 23 1). C. S. T.

OBED-EDOM, ʾōbed-ʾīdem (עֲבֵד יְדֹם, ʾōbhēdh ʾēdhōm), 'worshiper of [god] Edom': 1. A Philistine of Gath, dwelling near Jerusalem. David left the Ark in his house for three months before he carried it to Jerusalem (II S 6 10 f. = I Ch 13 13 f., 15 25). 2. The ancestor of a family of doorkeepers (I Ch 15 18 f., 16 35, 26 4 f.; II Ch 25 24), perhaps the same as the preceding. 3. A family of singers in post-exilic times (I Ch 15 21, 16 5). C. S. T.

OBEISANCE (כַּנְיָו, shāhāh), 'to bow down,' 'prostrate oneself': This term was used especially of the act of homage before a monarch or superior, often with a descriptive clause, 'bowed with his face to the earth' (I S 24 8 [9]), 'bowed the head' (Gn 43 28), 'fell on her face to the ground' (II S 14 4). RV has 'did obeisance' (II S 9 6; I K 1 31) for 'reverence' AV, and (I S 24 8; II S 14 22; I K 1 53) 'bowed himself' and 'do obeisance' for 'humbly beseech thee' AV (II S 16 4). In many other passages 'bow down' or some similar expression is used. In relation to a god it means 'worship.' C. S. T.

OBIL, ʾōbil (אֲבִיל, ʾōbhīl), 'camel-driver': The overseer of David's camels (I Ch 27 30).

OBLATIONS. See HEAVE-OFFERING; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 17.

OBOOTH, ʾōbōth (אֲבוֹת, ʾōbhōth): A station on the journey from Kadesh-barnea to the plains of Moab, probably near the SE. boundary of Moab (Nu 21 10 f., 33 43 f.).

OBSERVING OF TIMES, Etc. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 3.

OCHRAN, ok'ran (אֲכְרָן, ʾokhrān, Ocran AV): The father of Pagiel (Nu 1 13, 2 27, etc.).

ODED, ʾōded (עֲדֵד, ʾōdhēdh): 1. Father of the prophet Azariah (II Ch 15 1, 8). 2. A prophet in Samaria (II Ch 28 9).

ODOR. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15.

OFFEND, OFFENDER, OFFENSE: The English word offend means literally 'to strike against,' as an obstacle in the way, and is thus closely related to 'stumble.' The word is now used almost exclusively of injury or displeasure caused to one's personal feelings, but when the AV was made, the more objective senses of 'doing wrong to,' 'sinning against,' 'causing to go wrong' were conveyed by the word. Consequently, the RV has changed the AV renderings 'offense' and 'offend' in many cases in which they no longer adequately convey the sense of the original, altho it has inconsistently retained them in not a few instances. These words render the following Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) hāṭāʾ, 'to miss [the mark],' commonly rendered 'to sin' (Gn 40 1; II K 18 14; Is 29 21; Gn 20 9 and Jer 37 18, 'sinned' RV), and its derivatives hāṭāʾ, 'sin' (Ec 10 4), and hāṭāʾ, 'sinner' (I K 1 21). (2) mikhshōl (from kāshal, 'to stumble'), 'obstacle' (I S 25 31; Is 8 14, where J" Himself is spoken of as a 'rock which is an obstacle [in the way],' a passage which is applied to Christ by Paul, Ro 9 33, and by Peter, I P 2 8; Ps 119 165, 'occasion of stumbling' RV). (3) ʾāsham, 'to be guilty' (Ezk 25 12; Hos 4 15, 5 15, 13 1; Jer 2 3, 50 7 and Hab 1 11, 'guilty' RV), and ʾashmāh, 'guilt' (II Ch 28 13, 'trespass' RV). (4) bāghadh, 'to deceive' (Ps 73 15, 'dealt treacherously' RV). (5) pāshaʾ, 'to rebel' (Pr 18 19). (6) hābhal (in Piʿel), 'to injure' or 'destroy' (Job 34 31). (7) ἁμαρτάνειν, 'to sin' (Ac 25 8, 'sinned' RV), and ἁμαρτία, 'sin' (II Co 11 7, 'sin' RV). (8) παράπτωμα, 'a fall' or 'lapse,' i.e., from truth, etc. (Ro 4 25, 5 15-20, 'trespass' RV). (9) προσκοπή, 'stumbling-block' (Ro 14 20), προσκοπή, 'an occasion of stumbling' (II Co 6 3), and ἀπροσκοπος, an adj., the negative of the preceding (Ac 24 16; I Co 10 32 AV; Ph 1 10). (10) πταίνειν, 'to cause to fall,' or 'to fall or 'err' (Ja 2 10, 3 2, 'stumble' RV). (11) ἀδίκημα,

'to do unjustly' (Ac 25 11, 'am a wrong-doer' RV). (12) σκάνδαλον, properly a 'trap' or 'snare,' and then 'that which causes to stumble or fall,' 'a stumbling-block,' and the derived verb σκανδαλλίζω, 'to cause to stumble.' These two terms occur most frequently in the Gospels (Mt 5 20 f., 11 9, 18 7; Lk 17 1, etc.) and are often rendered by 'stumble,' 'stumbling,' 'cause to stumble,' etc., in RV.

OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 17.

OFFICER: This term appears in the AV as the translation of nine Hebrew and two Greek words. (1) nitsābh (Niphal ptpl.), 'one appointed,' 'deputy,' 'prefect,' used of Solomon's officers, who had charge of the commissariat, or oversight of his various building operations (I K 4 5, 7, 27 [5 7], 5 19 [30], 9 23; II Ch 8 10, Q<sup>re</sup>). In I K 22 47 it is translated 'deputy' (of Edom). (2) netsibh, 'prefect,' 'garrison' (I K 4 10); elsewhere (except in Gn 19 20, 'pillar'), translated 'garrison' (I S 10 5, 13 3, 4, etc.). (3) šārīs, 'eunuch' (q.v.), and in the derived meaning of 'officer,' or, as some affirm, there is another (loan) word with this general meaning. EV renders 'officer': of Pharaoh (Gn 37 36, 40 2, 7, 39 1 [married]); of Israelitic kings (I S 8 15; I K 22 9 = II Ch 18 8; II K 8 6); in Judah (I Ch 28 1; II K 24 12, 15 [perhaps of the royal household, as they are mentioned with the women; but Jer 29 2 has 'eunuch' in same account, as is the case in 34 19, 38 7, 41 16], II K 25 19 [military officer = Jer 52 25, where ARV has 'officer']). RV has 'eunuch' in mg. for all these passages except in Gn. Elsewhere in Kings, Is, and Jer šārīs is translated 'eunuch,' except II K 23 11, 'chamberlain,' an officer in the Temple area; in Est always 'chamberlain' with 'eunuch' in mg.; in Dn always 'eunuch.' The Rab-šārīs appears as a high military officer of Assyria (II K 18 17), of Babylon (Jer 39 3, 13). (4) pāqudh, 'appointed over,' officer of host of Israel (Nu 31 14, 48, also II K 11 15, for which RV has 'that were set over'). (5) p<sup>re</sup>quddāh, 'mustering,' 'oversight,' 'office' (II K 11 18 for the overseer of the Temple worship, Is 60 17; I Ch 26 30 AV). (6) pāqudh, in the sense of 'deputy' or 'overseer' for special duties (Gn 41 34 AV; Est 2 3); of the deputy of the king (Jg 9 28), or of the high priest (II Ch 24 11); in the Temple (Jer 20 1 'chief officer' RV 'chief governor' AV, 29 26). (7) rahb, 'chief,' officer of king's house (Est 1 8). This word appears in compound words, titles of Assyr.-Babyl. officers. (8) In Est 9 3 AV 'officer' stands for the phrase 'they that did the king's business' (so RV). (9) shōtēr, 'scribe,' 'arranger,' 'organizer,' apparently a subordinate officer; with 'judges' (Dt 16 18; Jos 8 33, 23 2, 24 1); with 'elders of the people' (Nu 11 16; Dt 29 10 [9], 31 28; Jos 8 33, 23 2, 24 1); in time of war used in conveying orders and organizing people for marching (Dt 20 5, 8, 9; Jos 1 10, 3 2). In I Ch 23 4, 26 29; II Ch 19 11, 34 13, similar subordinate officers are mentioned. In II Ch 26 11 RV has 'officer' for AV 'ruler,' but in Pr 6 7 both versions render shōtēr by 'overseer.' (10) πράκτωρ (Lk 12 58), an officer of justice who inflicts punishment. In the parallel passage Mt (5 25) uses (11) ὑπηρέτης, originally 'under-rower'; then 'under-officer': used for officers or servants of the Sanhedrin (I Jn 7 32, 45 f., etc.; Ac 5 22 f.), elsewhere translated 'attendant,' 'minister.' C. S. T.

OG, eg (אֹג, 'ōgh): The king of Bashan, over whom, and his ally Sihon, Moses obtained a decisive victory at Edrei (Nu 21 33). This city and Ash-taroth were the capitals of Og's realm (Jos 13 12). He is said to have been a man of gigantic stature, 'of the remnant of the Rephaim' (Dt 3 11). A black basalt sarcophagus (called 'iron bedsted') of his was shown at Rabbah of Ammon. His defeat was always looked upon as one of the providential events of Israel's history (Ps 135 11, 136 20; Neh 9 22). A. C. Z.

OHAD, ō'had (אֹחַד, 'ōhadh): The ancestral head of one of the clans of Simeon (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15).

OHEL, ō'hel (אֹהֶל, 'ōhel), 'tent': A descendant of David (I Ch 3 20).

OHOLAH, o-hō'la, OHOLIBAH, o-hel'i-bā (אֹהֶלָּה, 'ohōlāh, אֹהֶלִּיבָה, 'ohōlībāh), Aholah, Aholibah AV, 'her tent' (or better, 'she who has a tent'), and 'my tent is in her' (or better, 'tent in her'): Symbolical names given to Samaria and Jerusalem respectively, with special reference to the seats of worship ('tent-shrines') in them (Ezk 23 3 ff.). A. C. Z.

OHOLIAB, o-hō'li-ab (אֹהֶלִּיָּאב, 'ohōlī'ābh), Aholiab AV, 'father's tent': The associate of Bezaleel in the planning and construction of the Tabernacle (Ex 31 6, etc.). A. C. Z.

OHOLIBAMAH, o-hel'i-bā'mā (אֹהֶלִּיבָמָה, 'ohōlī-bhāmāh), Aholibamah AV, the 'tent of the high place': 1. The wife of Esau (Gn 36 2). 2. An Edomite chieftain (Gn 36 41, 'duke' AV).

OIL, OLIVE-OIL (expressly so stated in Ex 27 20; Lv 24 2, but always so to be understood (except in Est 2 12, oil of myrrh): One of the most necessary means of subsistence in Palestine. (1) It was used both as a plain article of food and in cooking, just as butter is among Occidentals. No house could conveniently dispense with the oil-cruse (I K 17 14 f.); hence also the profuse employment of oil in sacrifice (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 6). (2) Another common service to which it was put was that of lighting (Ex 27 20, 25 6). Altho torches often served as illuminants in the open air, the oil-lamp was far more convenient and available within the house (see LAMP). (3) Oil was also used in personal adornment, especially as a hair ointment preparatory to participation in high social functions (Is 61 3; Ps 45 7). To this end it was often mixed with perfume. The custom of anointing kings and priests in the ceremony of their inauguration is probably due to this decorative use (see ANOINT). A honorific action is compared to oil (Ps 141 5). The medicinally beneficial properties of oil were at least dimly known (Ja 5 14). See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3 (7). These various uses stimulated the production of oil in great quantities; so that not only the demand for internal consumption was supplied, but a surplus was raised for exportation, justifying the classing of oil with corn and wine as a principal source of national wealth (Dt 7 13; Hos 2 8; Neh 5 11, etc.). Oil was ordinarily extracted from the olive by the application of pressure; but a finer quality was obtained by gently pounding the ripe fruit in a mortar (Terumoth, 1 s f.). This was the beaten oil of Ex 27 20, etc. A. C. Z.

OIL-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES: The word rendered 'spices,' b'sāmīm (Ex 30 23), šammīm (25 s), designates, properly, the ingredients used in the preparation of ointments, perfumery, etc.

1. Anointing Oil. The holy anointing oil (Ex 30 23 ff.) was composed of the following elements, in addition to olive-oil: (1) mor-drōr, i.e., the self-exuding myrrh (myrrha stacte), in distinction from that which is obtained by puncturing the bark of the Balsamodendron (terebinth, acacia); (2) qinn-mon-besem, fragrant cinnamon; (3) q'nāh bösem, fragrant calamus (Calamus odoratus); (4) qiddāh probably cassia (Laurus cassia, L.).

2. Incense. For the incense offering also four kinds of spices were necessary (Ex 30 34). (1) nālāph, stacte, a variety of fragrant resin that exudes from its tree in drops (LXX, στακτή); (2) sh'hēleth, onycha, the so called incense-claw, or devil's-claw, i.e., the operculum of several varieties of mollusks found in the Red Sea (LXX, ὄνυξ), which when burned emit a strong odor (as to the possibility of its meaning 'amber,' cf. ZDMG, XLIII, p. 354); (3) hēl'nāh, galbanum, a pungent gum from the milky sap of the Syrian fennel; (4) l'bhōnāh, frankincense, the white incense that the Hebrews procured from S. Arabia. Frankincense was used also as an addition to certain varieties of the minhāk (meal-offering) and to the showbread (Lv 2 1 f., 15 f., 6 s, 24 7). The earliest mention of frankincense is in Jer 6 20, where it is spoken of as a foreign variety of sacrificial material. Calamus is also mentioned in this same passage (here qāneh ha'tōbbh, sweet cane EV), and in Is 43 24, as used for incense. In fact, there can be no doubt that the use of incense in cultus-practise was unknown in primitive Israel. See also SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15. As an article of luxury it could come into use only in a cultus which was strongly influenced by a well-developed civilization. Moreover, the prohibition (Ex 30 32 f.) of the use of the holy anointing oil for any profane purpose shows that persons were often not content with the pure oil alone for personal use, but mixed it with expensive fragrant ingredients, which were imported from foreign countries (I K

10 10; Ezk 27 22), and prepared either by female slaves (I S 8 13, confectionaries AV), or later by professional perfumers (apothecaries AV) (Ec 10 1; Neh 3 8; cf. Ex 30 35). An especially costly ointment was that made of pure nard-oil (cf. 'spikenard' in Song 1 12, 4 13 f. and νάρδος πιστική in Mk 14 3 f.; Jn 12 3). See NARD.

3. Use on Festal Occasions. It was customary for one to use ointment especially at feasts and in times of joy. The head was anointed with costly oil (Ps 23 5, 92 11; Ec 7 1, 9 8), sometimes so abundantly that it flowed down on the beard (Ps 133 2). Those who could afford it sprinkled their garments with powder, 'abqath rōkhēl, and myrrh, mōr (Song 3 6), aloes, 'āhālōth (Ps 45 9; Song 4 14), saffron, karkōm (Song 4 14), and cassia, q'lsē'ōth (Ps 45 9). Women also sometimes carried bags of myrrh, ts'rōr hammōr (Song 1 13), on the breast, and perfume-boxes (Is 3 20).

4. Use in Burial of the Dead. The oil of the cedar is known to have been used, particularly on the bodies of the dead, since it was believed to have the effect of preserving them from corruption and decay. Cedar wood also was used by the Israelites, as by the ancient Babylonians, in certain cases as an incense offering (Lv 14 4, 49; Nu 19 6).

OLD: This term renders a number of Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'āz (only Ps 93 2) with a prep., literally 'from that time.' (2) 'ethmāl, with prep. min, only Is 30 33, lit. 'from yesterday' = 'already.' (3) bālāh, bāleh (cf. b'lē, Jer 38 11, 12), 'to become old' by wearing out (Gn 18 12; Dt 8 4, 29 5; Jos 9 4 5, 13; Ezk 23 43, etc.). (4) ben (Dn 5 31, Aram. bar), 'son of' (used of males), bath (Gn 17 17), 'daughter of' (used of females), in the common expression giving the age of persons or animals, e.g., 'Noah was five hundred years old' is literally 'the son of five hundred years' (Gn 5 32; cf. Gn 7 6; Nu 1 3, 3 15, etc.). (5) zāqēn and derivatives, 'to be old' or 'aged' = πρεσβύτερος (Gn 18 11, 19 4; Jg 19 16, etc.), at times with the coordinate idea of wise (I K 12 6, 8, 13; II Ch 10 6, 8, 13). (6) yāshīsh, 'aged' (only Job 32 6; cf. 12 12, 15 10, 29 8). (7) yāshān, always rendered 'old,' the opposite of 'new,' 'fresh' (Lv 25 22, 26 10; Neh 3 6, 12 39; Song 7 13; Is 22 11). (8) 'adh, 'antiquity' (only Job 20 4). (9) 'ōlām (Aram. 'ālam, Ezr 4 15, 19), 'long duration,' 'antiquity,' is used in the sense of 'ancient,' especially in the Prophets (Gn 6 4; Dt 32 7; Is 46 9, 51 9; Am 9 11; Mic 5 2 [1], 7 14, etc.). (10) 'āthēg, 'to advance' in years (Job 14 8; Ps 67 [8]). (11) hayyīm, 'life' (Gn 23 1 AV; cf. also the literal rendering in Gn 47 8 RV for the less exact 'how old art thou' of the AV). (12) pānīm with prep. l', 'formerly,' Dt 2 20; I Ch 4 40; Ps 102 25 [26], all AV; elsewhere in AV and always in RV, except in Ps 102 25 [26], 'aforetimes,' etc. (13) qedhem, and derivatives, 'before in place' (often in poetry) comes to mean 'before in time' (Neh 12 46; Ps 44 1; La 1 7, etc.). (14) rī'shōn with prep. l', 'at the first' (only II S 20 18). (15) rāhōg, 'distance' of time (Is 25 1; Jer 31 3). (16) sēbhāh, 'hoary head,' parallel to (3) above, and often rendered 'old age' (Gn 15 15, 25 8; Jg 8 32; I Ch 29 28; Ps 92 14 [15]). (17) yāmīm, 'days' (Nah 2 8, 'days' RVmg.). (18) ἀρχαῖος, 'primeval' (Lk 9 8; Ac 21 16, etc.). (19) γέρον, 'old man' (Jn 3 4). (20) γηράσκω, 'to become old' (Jn 21 18; He 8 13; cf. Lk 1 36), γήρας, 'old age' (Lk 1 36). (21) παλαιός, and derivatives, 'old,' 'ancient' (Mt 9 16; I Co 5 7, etc.). (22) ποτέ, 'once,' 'at some-time or other' ('old time,' I P 3 5 AV, 'aforetime' RV; II P 1 21, 'ever' RV). (23) πρεσβύτερος, 'elder' in years (Ac 2 17; cf. Lk 15 25), πρεσβύτερος, 'an aged man' (Lk 1 18; Tit 2 2; Phm ver. 9), πρεσβύτις, 'an aged woman' (Tit 2 3). (24) χρόνος, 'time' (Ac 7 23), lit. 'when the time of forty years was being fulfilled to him.' C. S. T.

OLD GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

OLD PROPHET, THE: In I K ch. 13 an account is given of how an 'old prophet' deceived a 'man of God' from Judah who had announced the destruction of the altar and priests of Bethel where Jeroboam had established the calf-worship of J' for the Northern Kingdom. The emphasis placed on the efficacy of 'the word of Jehovah' (vs. 1, 2, 9, 18, 20, 32), the mention of the 'cities of Samaria' (ver. 32; cf. ver. 2), not founded until later by Omri, the namelessness of the chief personages, the definiteness of the prophecy as to the name Josiah, and the details of his deed, 350 years before the event (II K 23 16-18), are proof of the late date of the account as given. There is probably a kernel of historic fact at the basis of the tradition connected with Bethel. There may be some reference to the prophecy of Amos against Bethel (Am 3 14), and the destruction of the altar by Josiah (II K 23 16-18) may have recalled the tradition to mind. It is possible that 'man of God' is considered a higher title than 'prophet' (nābhī; cf. Am 7 14), but the distinction is not brought out. The 'old prophet' was not a false prophet (as Josephus, Targ. Jonath., and the rabbis claimed), but a real prophet (Ephrem. Syr., Theodore, etc.). It is difficult to understand his motive in deceiving the man of God. Thenius suggests that he was envious because he had not been sent to Jeroboam; Hengstenberg and Keil, that, having sinned by his silence in the face of Jeroboam's deeds, he wished to right himself both with himself and others by the companionship of the man of God. Whatever the motive, he later received a true word from J', and acknowledged the worthiness of the man of God. The narrative was evidently intended to teach the necessity of the unconditional obedience of the prophet to God's command, which should not in any way allow itself to be led astray. Thenius finds the additional truth that the spirit of God can speak even out of the mouth of the unwilling (cf. the case of Balaam). C. S. T.

OLD TESTAMENT, CANON OF. I. Preliminary Considerations: (1) The Name of a Special Class of Books. Students of to-day are familiar with the terms 'canon,' 'canonical,' and 'non-canonical'; no doubt they are also aware that the words have been in use a very long time, and that the idea which gains precision in these expressions exerted its influence at a still earlier period. It is our business to state with such clearness and simplicity as may be possible the outline of that long history of the life of Israel which has given to the world the Old Testament. Early in the Christian era the conception of a list of books, possessing a special character and conforming to a certain standard, was present to the minds of thoughtful men, but it required a long period of experiment and controversy to give to the terms their fixed and final meaning. The word 'canon' is not found in the N T, but in such passages as Mt 21 42; Jn 5 39 the word 'Scriptures' points in this direction, a usage which is all the more significant when we remember that the fourteen apocryphal books receive no direct recognition. This is substantially true even if we admit that there are some references to passages not found in the O T, and that the apocryphal literature influenced, in some measure the N T writers. (Cf. Budde, par. 57 and Ryle, p. 165). The Christian writers of the next period spoke of 'The Old Covenant' showing that the Church had claimed, as a sacred possession, the Jewish documents. These were regarded as books fit to be read and published in the Churches, and about the middle of the 4th. cent. A.D. the terms 'canonical' and related forms began to be used.

(2) The Books of the Hebrew Bible that form this Class. When we open the printed Hebrew Bible commonly used by students we find on the title page, the words 'The Book of Law, Prophets, and Writings.' The first section, The Torah, consists of the Pentateuch, the five books attributed to Moses. The second division has two parts: (a) 'The former Prophets,' Joshua, Judges, I and II Samuel, I and II Kings, and (b) 'The latter Prophets,' including Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and 'The Twelve' so called 'Minor Prophets.' The Writings, which form the third section, are Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, I and II Chronicles. As they now stand they are counted as thirty-nine books but, while this is exactly the list accepted by the Jewish Synagog, they were then reckoned as only twenty-four. This is accounted for by the fact that Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles were each counted as one book; Ezra and Nehemiah were also one; and 'The Twelve' (minor) Prophets were also regarded as one book. The fact that Josephus counts twenty-two books has caused much discussion into which we can not enter; two of the most plausible suggestions are that he excluded two doubtful books, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, or that, for the purpose of making the list coincide with the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, he added Ruth to Judges and Lamentations to Jeremiah. These twenty-four books have been regarded as standing in a class by themselves by both Jews and Christians, tho, as we shall see, there were doubts in particular cases, and there were a number of books (the Apocrypha) competing for a similar position with varying fortunes but without complete success.

(3) The Final Result of a Long Process. We can now, taking our stand at the end of a long movement, give a brief description of this list or canon, which forms the O T of our English Bible, then our task demands that we attempt to show that behind a product that has been rigidly fixed and carefully guarded for nineteen centuries, there lies a long period of living growth. We may call this canon Hebrew because all of it, except a very small part (found mainly in Dn and Ezr) was written and has come to us in that language, while many of the post-canonical books were written in Greek. It is also Palestinian or Jewish, being the list finally accepted by the strict Jews of the homeland. Alexandria in Egypt was the center from which the additions to this canon arose and exerted a widespread influence. Further, it is the Protestant canon as, when the time came for a final decision, in the 16th cent. A.D., the Protestants claimed for this list a unique position and supreme authority. The position gained in the world by this remarkable collection of sacred books is likely to be maintained, arising as it does from a variety of forces acting at critical hours of the world's history.

2. The Various elements of this Long Process:

(1) The Origin and Collection of the Literature. The work of scholars on the Old Testament, specially during the last two centuries, has made many changes in our views as to the origin of the literature, the nature and dates of many of the documents. These do not call for direct discussion here, but they affect the background of the subject. The literature reflects the life of the people and enables us to sketch, if not an absolutely accurate, at least a useful outline of their history. The period of the origin and growth of this literature covers about one thousand years. What we have is a survival and selection which reflects the power of a progressive revelation. The idea of revelation, which was once held in a dogmatic, rigid form, has become more fresh and living through the fuller appreciation of the literature in which it is enshrined. From the beginning when the life of the people was nourished by patriotic songs, wonderful stories, and simple laws, it was a continuous movement until the time when the fixed result just indicated was reached. The passage from oral traditions to written documents and the compilation of these documents into books was made gradually. Later we may find fixed periods and definite events, but in the preparatory stages we must be careful not to make our distinctions too deep. Such words as 'sacred,' 'secular,' 'profane' may be used in describing the attitude of men's minds in different periods, if we remember that they take their tone and color from the atmosphere of the time. The words of early prophets and poets in the moments of enthusiasm had a suggestion of the 'divine,' and before it became the subject of scholarly study the written word had its own magic and mystery. And yet we may say that in this millenium of Israel's life there was first literature, then sacred literature, and finally canonical literature. One careful scholar has used the words 'formation,' 'redaction' and 'selection' or 'elemental,' 'medial,' and 'final' (Ryle, p. 17) in connection with the growth of the Canon. Such phrases are suggestive, and useful, if we bear in mind that not until the end are they separate and complete; while the movement lasted there was an overlapping of these stages.

(2) Historical Stages of the Movement. From Moses onward men of prophetic spirit were recognized as speaking in the name of God for the guidance of the people. But it is difficult to fix upon the exact time when the consciousness arises that such words have a mission for the future. The 8th cent. B.C., when the sermons of prophets began to be preserved, marks a new stage. It has been suggested that in the following passages we may possibly find the beginning of the O T and the nucleus of a Church (B. Duhm), 'Bind thou up the testimony, seal the teaching among my disciples, and I will wait for Yahweh,' etc. (Is 8 16). 'Now go, write it before them on a tablet, and inscribe it in a book, that it may be for the time to come for a witness forever' (30 s).

The Book of The Law found in the Temple (621 B.C.) certainly exerted a strong influence in this direction (II K 22 s). The authority of the book had to be supported by a 'prophetess,' but the time was coming when it would rule by its own power. This book (Deuteronomy, q.v.), marks an epoch in the religious life of the Jews; for two centuries it exerted a powerful influence on their life and literature. What its full effect would have been if the great catastrophe had not come we can not tell. For the first time, so far as we know, a religious reform was based upon an appeal to the book. It is possible that the prophet Jeremiah uttered warnings against a slavish literalism and a superstitious reliance on the written word. Much can be said for the view expressed in the following words: 'In the authority and sanctity assigned at this juncture, to a book, we recognize the beginning of the Hebrew Canon. And we can not but feel, that it was no mere chance but the over-ruling of the Divine Wisdom, which made provision for the spiritual survival of His chosen people on the eve of their political annihilation' (Ryle, p. 61).

(3) The Growing Importance of the Book. Less than forty years after the discovery of the Deuteronomic documents, the great blow fell upon Judah and her national life was, for the time being, destroyed. That she survived at all proves that the spirit of the true religion lived in the hearts of the best people. Ezekiel we know, his preaching for the present and his plans for the future; Deutero-Isaiah's message of consolation and hope still speaks in tender tones; one of these was prophet and pastor, the other was student and writer. But there must have been many loyal men who could appreciate these messages and thereby rise to a higher level of faith. The remains of the ancient literature played a part in saving the religion. When the land lay desolate and the Temple was destroyed, men must have been driven back upon the writings, the laws that linked them to antique days, the songs of Zion, the stories of the patriarchs and prophets. It is impossible to estimate the loss to the world if this small people had been at that time completely crushed or absorbed into the life of the surrounding tribes.

The postexilic period (520 B.C. onward) has often been regarded as a dull, barren time, but from the point of view of the history of the Canon it is of great significance; the books that were written in this period (cf. Job, Jonah, etc.), and the varied compilations show, not the narrowness of a sect, but the catholicity of a true Church. True, the worship of the Law and the supreme importance ascribed to the written word did tend towards hardness and exclusiveness, but the terrible tasks of that age could scarcely have been completed in an easy, tolerant temper. That the task was accomplished at all is one of the miracles of history. In Babylon, in Judea, and later in Egypt the book began to play its noble part.

3. The Three Stages of the Formation of the Canon. (1) Jewish Legends. From the middle of the 5th cent. B.C. to the 1st cent. of the Christian era brings us to the last stage of our subject when more definite lines can be drawn. The Jewish legends are interesting as showing the attitude of the ancient scholars to historical problems, but they do not throw any real light on the movement. The tradition (or legend) that Ezra, under Divine inspiration, restored the books that had been destroyed and wrote other books under the same influence shows simply the great importance attached to the work of Ezra 'the scribe,' and reflects the importance of the period in which he played his part (see EZRA).

The legend that the Canon was fixed by the men of The Great Synagog, with Ezra as their President, has persisted down to recent times. They were supposed to have 'determined the number of the canonical books, and then reduced them to the compass of a single body of Scripture; they divided it into three principal portions, viz., the Law, the Prophets, and the Sacred.' It is quite true that the final canon was formed according to this threefold division, but not at one time or by any one council. Partly from lack of historical knowledge and partly because of the way in which the past was viewed, there was tendency to gather round one outstanding figure events which we now see to have been the result of slow successive steps. The same point of view is illustrated in the legend of the LXX, which represents the first translation of the Hebrew O T into Greek as having been accomplished within a brief period by 70 or 72 Jewish scholars. The evidence we now possess points to the conclusion that this important work began about 250 B.C. and extended over the following century. The fuller light that we possess on the history of Hebrew religion and how that religion found expression in the literature and finally became fixed in the Canon confirms the view that the threefold division finally accepted by the Jewish Church is the result of long movement and that each stage is connected with a critical period in the life of the religion.

(2) The Law. The word Torah which, in this connection, we translate 'law' has in the original text varied shades of meaning; it may mean 'teaching' or the precepts which are the result of the teaching; in later times it came to mean the collection of laws attributed to Moses, and then to denote the whole Pentateuch. This section of the Old Testament was the first to reach real canonical position and in that way came to have, for the Jews, the supreme place that was never lost. The Jewish Church was based upon this 'Law-book' as its authoritative constitution, and in this crisis the work of Ezra and Nehemiah exerted a great influence. Even if 'the book of the Law' (Neh 8 8) publicly presented was only that part of the Pentateuch known now as the Priest's Code it is certain that all the documents were combined soon after this time (c. 444 B.C.) and regarded as sacred scripture. (For the view that it was a collection of Ezra's from various Pentateuch sources, see Ezra, etc., in The New Century Bible.) Pointing in this direction are the following facts: (1) The Samaritans, who at this time were driven into the position of a separate sect, kept only the Pentateuch; (2) This section was the first part to be translated into Greek for the use of the Jews at Alexandria and was probably the only official translation; (3) The tradition that the Sadducees did not accept the other books as canonical may be mistaken, but there are many evidences that the Canon of the Jews was not on a dead level and that the supreme position was assigned to the Torah.

(3) The Prophets. It was natural, under the influence of a great reformation based on the Law, that the other writings should for the time be overshadowed. But a reaction against the strictness of legalism and a fuller appreciation of the prophets was bound to come in an age that produced such books as Job, Jonah, and the more spiritual Psalms. It is likely that the second division existed as a collection of sacred books before the Maccabean revolt and in fact about the beginning of the second century. In II Mac 3 13 it is claimed that Nehemiah showed an interest in preserving the books concerning Kings and prophets. The author of Ecclesiasticus (c. 180 B.C.) in his eulogy of famous men is dependent on the historical books, and mentions the Twelve (minor) Prophets (49 10). Dan (9 2) appears as a student of the books and specially of 'the prophet Jeremiah.' The reference in the prolog of Ecclesiasticus (c. 130 B.C.) to the law, the prophecies and the rest of the writings implies the existence of the first two divisions. The struggle for their religion and the effort to preserve the sacred books would tend to exalt these books in the estimation of pious Jews who declare with regret that 'There is no more any prophet' (Ps 74 9).

(4) The Writings. The miscellaneous collection of books that forms the third group in the Hebrew Bible did not attain to complete canonicity until the beginning of the Christian era. Here again historical circumstances must be remembered. The Temple at Jerusalem was destroyed and the sacrificial system was swept away forever. The growing power of the synagog and the increasing reverence for the sacred books and the traditions of the elders enabled the religion to survive when the national life was completely crushed. The influence of the Christian movement, with its intense missionary spirit, must have thrown the parent Church back upon its own documents and dogmas. It is probable that all these writings except Dn were substantially complete before 200 B.C., and that they were used with some degree of reverence before their final position was settled. The Psalter was the most popular and did much to quicken spiritual life in a time of increasing legalism and scholasticism. What was done at the fixed points, when definite lists were formed, was the recognition and registration of decisions that have been reached, through the action of varied forces and motives in the spiritual life of the nation; after the process is complete, and the one task is merely to copy accurately the manuscripts of the chosen volumes and to see that no changes, additions or corrections are made in the text, then, we are apt to think of it as something lifeless and cold. As a matter of fact, it grew out of and was associated with all the great moments of the nation's life.

4. Disputed Books and Concluding Remarks. Even after these three lists were complete, questions were raised as to the rights of certain books to the position claimed for them. On the whole, Dr. Ryle states the situation fairly: "Their position in the Canon had given rise to scruples or perplexity. The reasons, however, which led to these adverse criticisms are not such as would have any weight at the present day. They reflect the subtlety of academic discussion more than the anxiety of a perplexed conscience. As a rule, they illustrate only too well the character of the Rabbinism from which they emanated. At the most they testify to the degree of tolerance permitted in the range of controversy and to the probability that, at an earlier date, the admission of certain books into the Hebrew Canon had met with considerable opposition, or with only a moderate degree of approbation" (p. 203).

(1) Ezk was the only book of the prophetic canon that caused any serious difficulty, tho there is a suggestion of doubts as to whether Jon was equal in historical value to the other prophetic books. The chief cause of perplexity in the case of Ezk was the fact of variations from the Law of Moses (The Priestly Code). It was thought that Elias when he came would explain the difficulties, but it is said that Hananiah, a younger contemporary of Hillel (c. 75 B.C.-10 A.D.) proved equal to the emergency; he, when supplied with 300 measures of oil, sat down and discovered a satisfactory method of interpretation. He is credited with saving the book from being classed as 'hidden' (apocryphal); perhaps the danger has been exaggerated.

(2) It can easily be understood that with regard to Ec, Song and Est the difficulties might be more serious. Even after their inclusion in the third canon doubts were expressed and complete unanimity was not attained all at once. The emphatic and extravagant language used in affirming their sacred character shows the strength of the opposition that had been overcome. Rabbi Akiba (c. 135 A.D.) who admitted that there might be grounds for doubt in the case of Koheleth (Ec) declared that "The Song of Songs defileth the hands, for the whole world is not equal to the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel." Whatever may be the origin of the phrase 'to defile the hands,' it is evident that it is a strong assertion of the sacred or canonical character of the book to which it is applied. It is not our business, in this article, to attempt to criticize or justify the choice that was made, but simply to tell the story of an important historical movement that has been fraught with rich consequences for the literature and religion of the world.

(3) Concluding Statement. Nothing more needs to be said about the Samaritans, who accepted only the Pentateuch as their canon. Their copy is useful for textual purposes and questions arise as to the significance of the fact that it is written in the old Hebrew characters; but the people who used it persisted merely as a small sect apart from the main current of the world's life.

With regard to the Apocrypha, Budde's words are worth noting: "In fact, to speak strictly, there never was such a canon. The Alexandrian collection of Holy Books never underwent that revision in accordance with the Pharasaic conception of 'defiling the hands' which finally fixed the Hebrew Canon." But these extracanonical books made their appeal to Greek-speaking Jews and to the early Christians. From the earliest times down to the Reformation there was fluctuation of opinion and three views prevailed: (1) that they were canonical (Augustine); (2) that they were outside the true i.e., the Hebrew Canon (Jerome), and (3) that they held a middle position, that they were 'ecclesiastical' writings having a good moral influence and suitable for reading in the churches (Rufinus). These different views remained, but in the Reformation period the Protestant and Roman Catholic positions were more clearly defined and set in opposition to each other. The Council of Trent 1545-63 reaffirmed the Canon of the Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397) and decreed that the said books as they appear in the old Latin Vulgate are sacred and canonical. The Protestants placed them on a lower level as books that have no authority in matters of doctrine.

For a time in Protestant Bibles they held an intermediate position 'between the Testaments,' but now they have been dropped, but at the same time increased study has been given to them by scholars who are dealing not with the dogmatic issue, but with the life of ancient times as revealed in all kinds of literature. The question whether some of these books show a higher quality of inspiration than certain canonical books, e.g., Est, does not concern us; as that may be a matter of individual opinion and our subject is the origin of the O T Canon as fixed by the Jewish Church and its relation to the wonderful history out of which it grew. It is likely to hold its place, an enduring monument of the 'Divine discipline of Israel.'

OLD TESTAMENT CHRONOLOGY. While the O T contains a great many chronological notices, as a whole it has no chronological system. A chronological system requires some fixed event or point of time from which all dates may be reckoned. No such event finds mention in the O T, altho a limited use is made of several different eras. In the Pentateuch many events are dated according to the year of the life of the person concerned, and the life-periods of a long succession of individuals are parts of an era computed from the creation of Adam. But this mode of reckoning ends with Jacob. All such dates, moreover, belong to the late P element of the Pentateuch and are entirely absent from the earlier J and E documents (see HEXATEUCH), which gave only the vaguest sort of dates and had no chronological system whatever.

An attempt seems to have been made at one time to use the Exodus as a starting-point for chronology. The notices Gn 15 13, Ex 12 40, and I K 6 1 seem to belong to calculations connected with such an era. But there is no evidence that this system was generally used. The chronological figures of the Book of Judges give no satisfactory results, partly because they probably rest primarily on vague tradition, partly because they belong to events that were in many cases contemporaneous, not successive (as they are viewed in the book), and partly because they are open to the suspicion that they have been manipulated to work out an ideal scheme of  $12 \times 40 = 480$  years from the Exodus to the Temple (cf. I K 6 1).

With the Books of Kings definite chronological data begin. These are not connected with an era but with the regnal years of the kings of Judah and Israel. During the period of the divided monarchy, we have two sets of figures in the Books of Kings. One is a synchronistic scheme in which the accessions of the kings in Israel are dated according to the regnal years of the kings in Judah and vice versa. The other is an independent set of figures for each reign. There can be no doubt that the latter is the older and more trustworthy on the whole and was the basis of the synchronism, altho the results obtained from the two systems do not agree, indicating probably that all the figures have not been transmitted correctly.
